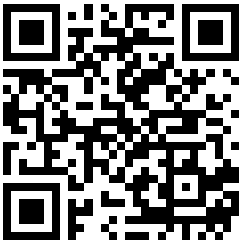
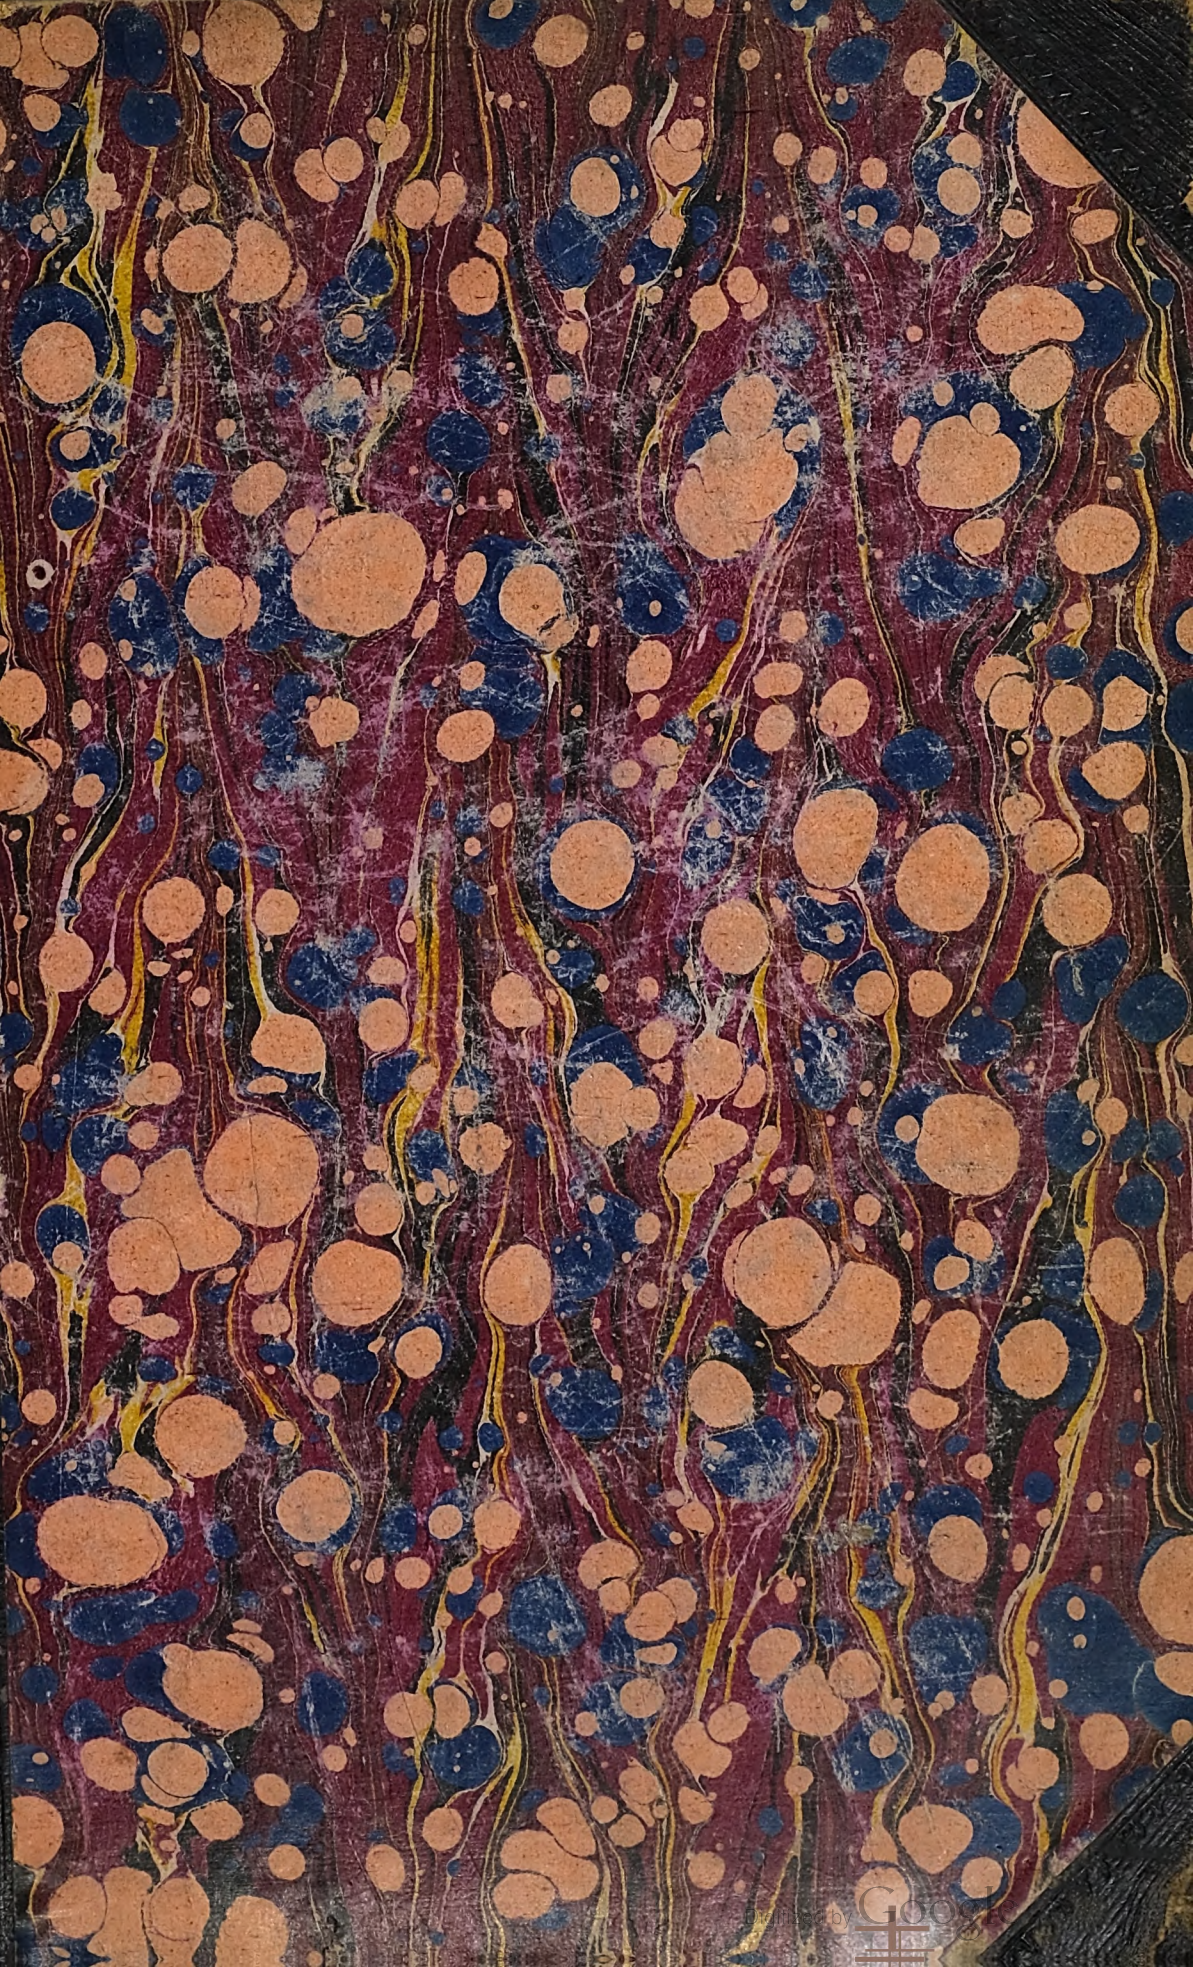
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google™ books

https://books.google.com





Per. 256 d. 768

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

FOOTBALL PICTURES. £100 IN PRIZES.

SHORT STORIES
A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 627. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 5TH, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

"Absolutely Pure therefore Best."

CADBURY'S

COCOA

Free from Kola, Malt, Hops, or any foreign admixture. It is Cocoa and Cocoa only.

What CADBURY'S Cocoa is:

The Great Scientist, Baron von Liebig, says:

"COCOA is a perfect food, as wholesome as delicious, a beneficent restorer of exhausted power; but its quality must be good, and it must be carefully prepared. It is highly nourishing and easily digested, and is fitted to repair wasted strength and preserve health. It agrees with those whose occupations oblige them to undergo sevère mental strains; with public speakers, and with all those who give to work a portion of the time needed for sleep."

CADBURY'S COCOA is Absolutely Pure, and a Perfect Food.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

BIG PRIZE SCHEME FOR MARCH 1901.

25,602 PRIZES, value £10,000

LIST OF PRIZES!

1	Cash Prize	£50	£50 0
1	Cash Prize,	£40	40 0
10	Handsome Pianos, in walnut,	£40 each	400 0
5	Cash Prizes,	£25 each	125 0
10	Gents' Bicycles, Freewhee's,	£17 17s. each	178 10
10	Ladies' Bicycles, Free wheels,	£17 17s. each	178 10
10	Cash Prizes,	£10 each	100 0
20	Jones's Sewing Machines,	£8 each	160 0
20	Cash Prizes,	£5 each	100 0
50	Rolled Gold Lever Watches,	£2 10s. each	125 0
100	Cash Prizes,	£2 each	200 0
50	Dinner Services (56 pieces),	£2 each	100 0
50	Folding Bed Chairs,	£2 each	100 0
50	Ladies' Travelling Trunks,	£2 each	100 0
200	Cash Prizes,	£1 each	200 0
200	Ladies' Leather Hatboxes,	£1 each	200 0
100	Basket Arm Chairs, upholstered,	£1 each	100 0
400	pairs Blankets,	15s. per pair	300 0
200	½-doz Electro-plated Forks, large,	15s. per ½-doz.	150 0
200	½-doz. Electro-plated Forks, small,	15s. per ½-doz.	£150 0
500	Ladies' Umbrellas,	15/- ea.	375 0
500	Gents' Umbrellas,	15s. each	375 0
400	Best Electro-plated Teapots,	15s. each	300 0
400	Handsome Meat Carvers, with Steel in Case,	15s. set	300 0
1000	Cash Prizes,	10s. each	500 0
1000	pairs Bed Sheets	10s. each	500 0
1000	White Linen Table Cloths,	10s. each	500 0
1000	Ladies' Umbrellas,	7/6 each	375 0
1000	Ladies' Leather Purses,	7/6 each	375 0
200	½-doz. Table Knives,	7/6 per ½-doz.	75 0
200	½-doz. Dessert do.,	7/6 per ½-doz.	75 0
2000	Ladies' Dress Lengths, Navy Blue Serge,	7/6 each	750 0
2000	Cash Prizes of	5s. each	500 0
4715	Ladies' Leather Handbags,	4s. each	943 0
4000	½-doz. Fine Linen Cambric Handkerchiefs,	2/6 per ½-doz.	500 0
4000	Handsome Work-boxes,	2/6 each	500 0
25,602			£10,000 0

CONDITIONS OF COMPETITION.

The Tablets of Watson's Matchless Cleanser and of Nubolic Soap are enclosed in distinctive Wrapper. The prizes will be awarded in the above order to persons who send the highest number of Wrappers of either soap or both of them to Joseph Watson & Sons Limited, Whitehall Soap Works, Leeds, not later than MARCH 31ST, 1901. Each wrapper must be complete, and each package of the wrappers sent will be taken as one lot. Separate entries must be sent under separate covers. Full postage or carriage must be Paid. Each parcel must contain the full name and address of sender, and the number of Wrappers sent in must be marked on the same paper. On outside of parcel write lesibly "Prize Competition." A list, giving result of the Competition, will be sent with each prize when it is sent out. Every wrapper must have first contained soap. No employee of Joseph Watson & Sons Limited will be eligible. All prizes will be despatched about April 25th.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER
The Best Soap for all purposes. Saves Health, Strength, and Wealth. Washes clothes with ease, Leaves them sweet and pure. Does not injure the most delicate fabric. Largest sale of 1-lb. Tablets in the World.

NUBOLIC SOAP
A PURE & PERFECT DISINFECTANT.
War s off Disease.
Saves Doctors' Bills. For Kitchen, Laundry, Bathroom, or Nursery.

Sold by all Grocers, Oilmen, &c., throughout the United Kingdom.

THE "GEO R. SIMS" HAIR RENEWER "TATCHO"

"While you wait"

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES TO-DAY. 1s. 6d.
Sent Post Free in plain package, twenty one stamps.

MRS. BROWN POTTER, whose beautiful hair is the envy of her sex, writes:
"I Use only 'TATCHO.'"

If your hair is falling or failing, you have your remedy. Don't hesitate. Use "TATCHO." The result will surprise you and will be intensely gratifying. It is sold in bottles by Chemists and Hairdressers allover the world; 2/9 and 5/-, or may be had direct in plain sealed package, post free, 2/11 and 5/3. Address:
The Geo. R. Sims Co., 81c Great Queen St., London, W.C.

WARNING. Instead of using the common White Headache Powders, which generally consist entirely of a crude drug, which has been condemned as dangerous by the medical papers, insist on having a bona-fide anti-quack remedy, recommended by such eminent medical authorities as Dr. RAMAGE, L.R.C.P., Dr. THURSTIN, L.R.C.P., late Dr. BOYD-WILLIAMS (Liverpool), the Editor of the Medical Journal, "Health," etc., etc. The name of this safe remedy is KAPUTINE.

ALL LEADING CHEMISTS SELL IT, OR CAN GET IT FOR YOU IN A FEW HOURS.

Sold by BOOT'S, TAYLOR'S, DAY'S, WHITE'S and other Stores. Most Co-operative Stores sell it.

PACKETS, 1/-. SAMPLES ONE PENNY,

or KAPUTINE LIMITED, HUDDERSFIELD,
will send it FREE for 12 stamps.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.
EPPS'S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
COCOA
BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

VARICOCELE.
Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.
S. S. MURRAY,
7, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

VIE D'OR FOR THE HAIR.
THE AMERICAN TREATMENT.
Vie d'Or puts 10 years on the life of the hair.
SOLE AGENT:
GUSTAV ROSSELLI, 4 New Park Street, Park Lane, LEEDS.
Price 2/9 post free.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.
GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS, 148 Old Street, London, E.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

BODLEIAN LIBRARY 20 MAR 1901

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 627.] For the Week Ending January 5th, 1901. [One Penny.

FOR HIGH STAKES.

A cloudless June sky above, a dusty California moutain road, and a young tenderfoot from Ohio, mounted on a stout broncho, with an outfit consisting of a roll of blankets and a six-shooter.

Fired with visions of suddenly acquired wealth, I had a few weeks before started for California, sorely against the wishes of my parents and advice of my friends.

I was riding slowly up the long mountain grade, headed for the gravel mines of the North Fork of Yuba, and calculated to make the Mountain House by dark, when I was overtaken by a horseman, who rode up beside me with a genial "How are you, stranger?"

He was a fine-looking man of about thirty, with a blonde beard, and the handsome horse he bestrode was somewhat jaded. We rode on together up the grade, and fell into conversation.

He inquired where I was from, and where I was bound for, both of which questions I answered frankly. He told me that he was a mine-owner on the Middle Fork; that he had just made a business trip down the ridge, and was in a hurry to get back, and added that I had better come on with him and he would give me a job. I gratefully accepted his offer, and when we stopped to water about half-way up the grade, he asked me to carry a small pair of saddle-bags, as his horse was pretty well beat.

I complied cheerfully, as my beast was comparatively fresh. The bags were heavy, and he remarked as he handed them over that they contained the coin from his last clean up. With a due appreciation of the importance of the trust, I felt for my six-shooter, and we pushed on up the grade. Arrived at the top he took a cross road, remarking that he guessed we could make old man Brown's by night.

I found him a pleasant, entertaining fellow, and being no doubt conceited, imagined that he found me the same. It was nearly dark when we rode up to a low, rambling, old building, which he designated as "old man Brown's," and added that it was rather a hard place, but any port in a storm.

As we rode up to the porch a slender girl of about fourteen with big brown eyes and a shock of red curls, came running round the corner of the house. She looked as wild as a deer, and my first thought was, "What a beauty she will make some day!" I raised my sombrero, and asked if we could get accommodation for the night.

"Dunno; I'll ask dad," she said shortly, and darted into the house through the bar-room.

A moment later a portly old man in list slippers made his appearance, rubbing his hands and smiling benignly.

"How are you, boys? Want to stop? All right. Here, Jess, call Joe to take the horses."

I had just dismounted, and started to remove the saddle-bags, when a glance at my travelling companion checked me. He was gazing back down the road, and listening intently. I saw a greyish pallor overspread his face. The next moment he struck spurs into his horse, and without a word galloped down the road in the opposite direction, into the gathering darkness.

Glancing back, I saw a number of horsemen riding furiously down upon me.

Surprised and alarmed, I sprang again into the saddle, and as the sound of horses approaching at a rapid rate came to my ears, I started on down the road after my late companion. My first thought was that highwaymen were on our track.

Glancing back, I saw a number of horsemen riding furiously down upon me. I heard loud oaths and orders to halt. Without heeding them, I spurred on, and drew my six-shooter, determined to sell my life as dearly as possible. The next moment a volley of shots rang out, and my horse stumbled and fell.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Before I could rise, I was surrounded by the roughest-looking crowd of men it has ever been my misfortune to encounter. Cries of "Kill him!" "Shoot him!" "Hang him!" were heard on all sides, and a dozen hands seized me in no gentle grasp. My horse lay dead. One of the men thrust his hand into the saddle-bags, and pulled out a sack of coin.

"Here you are, boys! Here's the swag! Hang the blanked thief!" he shouted.

"Let's take him over to Brown's, and hear what he's got to say," said a tall man, who seemed to be leader.

This proposition met with general disfavour, especially from one officious man, who took a rawhide lariat from his saddle, and leading the way to a spreading oak tree that stood near, exclaimed:

"Here's a good limb! Fetch him along, boys!"

But the tall man demurred, and had his way.

"If he can't give a straight account of himself, we'll make short work of him."

I attempted to explain, but a pistol was held at my head with the peremptory command to shut up. My arms were then securely bound with the lariat. I was marched back to Brown's, and placed in one corner of the bar-room.

The crowd then demanded liquid refreshment, which was served by Brown. The girl Jess stood in the doorway looking at me curiously, and I thought rather pityingly.

My trial then began. It was brief and to the point.

The stage had been robbed the day before, the express messenger killed, and several thousand dollars stolen. The robbers, supposed to be two in number, had escaped, and these men had organised a party to hunt them down. Had tracked them thus far, and succeeded in capturing me, with part of the stolen money in my possession.

Brown testified to our riding up a few minutes before they came, and asking leave to stop overnight; and added, with a solemn shake of his head, that they had "let the worst one get away."

They then demanded to know what I had to say, and I told my story in as straightforward a manner as possible. It was listened to incredulously by most of them; but among a few I thought I saw looks that encouraged me, and I wound up with an impromptu appeal for life and liberty which I felt must touch them.

I was doomed to bitter disappointment when the lank man, who had "Missouri" written in every lineament, and who had been so officiously anxious to hang me at once, arose, and after expectorating, remarked, with a harsh laugh:

"Young feller, you can't come it over us that-a-way. Come on, boys! Let's string him up."

Several rose, and with oaths loud and deep seconded the motion. My blood ran cold, as I realised my imminent peril. These rough miners, who certainly had strong circumstantial evidence against me, felt perfectly justified in hanging me to the nearest tree. What could I do? I gazed from one to the other like a hunted animal.

"Surely you would not hang a man on such evidence as this?" I cried. "If you will untie me, I can show you letters that will prove who I am."

The tall man, whom they called Joe, stepped up and untied me. I drew out a letter from my mother which I had received while in San Francisco. It contained a card photograph of my pretty sister Alice, which fell to the floor as I drew out the letter. Joe picked it up.

'It is my sister's picture," I cried. "Here; read the letter, any of you. It will prove that I am an honest man."

Joe was gazing earnestly at the picture.

"Tell you what, boys, this here's a little beauty!"

In my heart I blessed her pretty face, and only wished her there to plead for me in person.

The picture was passed round, and hope sprang up in my heart, when the old Missourian, who seemed thirsting for my gore, dashed it down again by exclaiming:

"How do ye know but what he stole that letter and picter from someone on the stage, or out of the mail bag? It's all bosh! Let's hang him and done with it!"

Joe took the photo again, and glanced from it to me.

"Now, look'ee here, Mizzoo—seems to me yer a-gittin' cold-blooded in yer old age. Anybody with half an eye can see that this gal looks like him."

I thanked Heaven for the resemblance, which was slight, and began to hope again. The girl Jess crowded in among the men, and asked to see the picture. Joe handed it to her, jocosely remarking that he'd marry her when she got to be as handsome as that.

She quietly replied:

"Shut yer mouth," and gazed intently on the picture.

"I'll bet that's his sister," she said presently.

"I'm inclined to think so myself," said Joe. "I think we'd better wait, boys, and take him down to the bar."

At this there was a dissenting murmur, which grew so strong that my courage failed again. Suddenly Joe turned to the crowd, and cried:

"Tell ye what, boys. Let's lay it on to luck. I'll play him a straight game of freeze-out. If he loses, he's our meat. What do ye say?"

The idea seemed to tickle the fancy of the crowd. They evidently had confidence in Joe's ability to play poker. Unfortunately for me it was a game of which I knew nothing, and I told them so.

The girl Jess was still standing beside Joe.

"Let me play for him," she said eagerly. "Luck's always with me."

"Yes! Let her play," cried the men, evidently amused at the novelty of the thing, and also sure that Joe's superior skill would win. "Let Jess play for him. Can you stake her, young feller?"

I looked at the girl curiously. Her big dark eyes were glittering with excitement, but she was cool and self-possessed. Taking out my purse, which contained my wealth, about one hundred dollars, I handed it to her.

The cards were produced, and in a few moments she and Joe were seated opposite each other, and the game began.

It was a weird scene; and I had the odd feeling that I was simply a spectator, and in no way concerned. I remember wishing for sketching materials, that I might transfer it to canvas. What a picture it would make. The low-ceiled, uninviting room; the smoky lamps shedding a flickering light upon the eager group round the table. I could see the face of the young girl, and knew that in all probability my life hung upon her "luck."

She played in silence, except to indicate how many cards she wanted at the draw. It was an even game for a while, then Joe began to win, and her pile of coin gradually diminished. She played coolly on, despite the comments of the crowd.

She was down to her last dollar when the tide turned in her favour. She won steadily, raking in the coin each time, till Joe was nearly broke. He began to bet cautiously, having evidently no desire to be beaten by a girl.

Digitized by Google

I watched her face closely for some sign of excitement, but none was visible. She was thoroughly self-possessed, and the fact that she held my life in her hands had no outward effect upon her. Luck turned in Joe's favour again, and they were soon about even. The crowd grew impatient.

"What 're ye afraid of, Joe? Where's yer nerve? Why don't yer bet?" and like expressions were heard, while others encouraged the girl. "Old man Brown" came round and patted her on the shoulder, remarking that "Jess always did have the dog-on-dest luck."

They made it a jack pot, and it was Joe's deal. Jess opened it for ten dollars and discarded two. Joe also discarded two, and after the draw gave a short laugh and raised her ten. She glanced at her coin in an uncertain way, then at her hand. She had three dollars less than he. The excitement was intense. For a moment only the heavy breathing could be heard. Then Jess laughed a little and pushed her last dollar into the pot.

Old "Mizzoo" broke into a discordant laugh.

"Jess don't bluff worth a cent!" he cried.

Joe calmly pushed in the rest of his money.

"It'll be make or break this time,' he said, glancing over at me. "Sorry fer ye, young feller. Boys, git yer rope. What ye got, Jess?"

She quietly laid down four nines and the jack of hearts. He held three aces and a pair of eights. He struck the table a blow that made the money jingle.

"Good girl! Luck's on your side. I'd 'a' staked my last cent on a full like that, but yours are too much fer me. Come on, boys! Let's irrigate."

He led the way to the bar, followed by the crowd, now seemingly in the best of humours. Jess calmly raked in the pot, put the money in my purse and handed it to me, remarking laconically:

"Here; you'd better take this and git."

"I don't want it all," I exclaimed. "Only what I put in."

"Keep it all. It's yours. They've killed your horse," and before I could say anything more she left the room.

My first impulse was to put as much distance as possible between myself and the crowd, but on second thoughts I reflected that there was no other house within several miles, that I knew nothing of the country, and if I started out on foot I was liable to be run down by another gang of robber hunters. I therefore put on a bold front and asked Brown to give me a lodging for the night.

He struck the table a blow that made the money jingle.

He picked up a guttering candle, called Jess, and told her to show me up to the "corral." This was a big loft over the bar-room, in which there were a dozen or more uninviting-looking beds.

She placed the candle on a box beside one of these and was about to leave the room, when I detained her.

"Miss Jessie, I have not yet thanked you for what you have done for me to-night. My life is not worth much but I should have hated to have given it up in such a manner. Is there nothing I can do to show my gratitude?"

She laughed in an embarrassed manner.

"Why, it wasn't anything. I like to play! I'd 'a' done it for anybody."

"I'm sure of that; but is there nothing I can do for you?"

She hesitated a moment.

"Would you mind giving me that picture?"

"What! My sister's? No, indeed; you can have it and welcome. She is one of the sweetest girls on earth, and would be only too glad to do what she could for anyone who is kind to me."

She took it and thanked me.

"I thought I'd like to look at it. I'm much obliged. Good-night."

I did not see her about the house next morning. All the participants in the wished-for necktie party of the night before had vanished. I saw nothing of the saddle-bags, so concluded they had taken them.

I inquired for Miss Jessie, and was told that she had gone off early to drive up some cattle on the "divide." The Chinese cook provided me with a scanty breakfast, and when the stage came by I mounted it with a feeling of inexpressible relief.

Half-an-hour later, as we rounded a curve in the road, we came face to face with Jess. She was mounted on a vicious-looking, black mustang, and galloped rapidly past, her bright curls streaming in the wind. I had only time to raise my hat in response to a smile of recognition, when she passed, as I then thought, out of my life for ever.

* * * * *

I had been in the mines but a short time when I received the sad news of my father's death, accompanied by an urgent request from my mother that I return home at once and take charge of his business affairs. This was incumbent upon me, as I was an only son.

So within three months of the time of my arrival in California, I was in London again, my gold-hunting fever slightly abated, but still hoping to return to the Pacific Coast; but circumstances combined to prevent it.

Digitized by Google

Without being obtrusive, I kept them in sight.

Alice welcomed me with open arms. She was intensely interested in my California experience, and wished very much to write to Jessie and thank her for liberating me from my dangerous situation; but as I did not know her address, she had to abandon the idea.

She died the second year after I returned, leaving only my mother and myself. As she was averse to leaving the old home, I remained there until her death, some twelve years later. Then finding life intolerably monotonous, I arranged my business, in which I had been very successful, so that I could leave for an indefinite time.

I felt a strong desire to revisit the scenes of my early California experience, and in due time found myself at Peak City. Much of its former glory had departed. The closing of the hydraulic mines had caused quite an exodus from that region. I decided to make the mountain trip on horseback as of yore, so hired a good one from the only livery-stable in the town, and one bright June morning started again over the almost forgotten mountain grades.

About two o'clock I overtook a heavily-laden waggon, drawn by six powerful horses. The sun's rays were uncomfortably warm, the road was dusty. Just ahead was the watering trough, where the stranger overtook me so long ago.

The driver of the team ahead was a stalwart six-footer. He wore a blonde beard and a slouch hat, and walked beside the wheelers. He had a black snake looped about his shoulders, and every now and then spoke encouragingly to the straining animals. As we reached the trough, I drew rein beside him. He eased the horses back from a heavy pull, and answered my salutation pleasantly. Something in the man's face struck me as familiar.

He watered his team, then climbed upon the waggon-box, produced a flask, and invited me to "smile" with him. I returned the compliment with a cigar, and we entered into conversation.

I inquired if he knew what had become of the old man Brown, who kept a stopping-place over on the divide years ago.

He looked at me keenly for a moment.

"Oh, yes. The old buzzard kicked the bucket some time ago. Struck a good mine and couldn't stand prosperity. What's become of the girl? Blanked if I know. Took her down to 'Frisco, and put her to school. Seems to me I did hear she married Tom Stewart, Brown's old partner, but he's gone up the flue, too, I hear. Old place is gone to rack; nobody lives there now. Good stopping-place about a mile the other side, though. Stan' up, Bell!"

The handsome grey mare in the "off lead" arched her neck, the other horses tossed their heads and straightened their traces, the black snake gave a resounding crack in close proximity to the big near wheeler's heels, and the waggon moved on up the mountain side.

I rode on ahead no longer puzzled as to where I had met the stalwart driver, for memory straightway carried me back to my acquaintance of fourteen years before, who had so unceremoniously deserted me that memorable night at old man Brown's. He had changed but little while I, who was but a boy then, was now bearded and bronzed, and had no fear of being recognised.

I rode on, musing on the ups and downs of life, and presently reached the cross-road. I found the old hostelry a heap of ruins, the roof having been crushed in some previous winter by the weight of snow.

I unsaddled my horse and allowed him to graze for a time, while I wondered as to the whereabouts of the red-haired lassie, who had played such a fearless game that night, and reflected that by this time she was probably playing faro in some of the underground palaces of San Francisco.

After drifting aimlessly round among the mining towns of the Sierras for some weeks, I went to San Francisco, and I spent some time in noting the changes time had wrought in that queenly city by the sea.

One day, while strolling on the beach by the Cliff House, I came face to face with a beautiful woman who both interested and puzzled me. She was tall and well formed, with fine brown eyes, and a heavy coil of dark auburn hair. She was dressed in black, plainly, but with distinction, and had every indication of wealth and refinement. She was accompanied by an elderly woman, whom I heard her address as "auntie." I managed to pass and repass them several times, and fancied the brown eyes glanced at me rather interestedly.

Without being obtrusive, I kept them in sight, and returned to the city on the same tram. I secured a seat just behind them, and devoted myself to studying her every detail of dress and manner.

Arrived at the terminus, they entered a cab, and were driven away, and I returned to the hotel, more interested than I cared to confess.

For years I had been so devoted to my mother, and to business, that no thought of marriage had seriously entered my mind. Now I suddenly realised that grey hairs were creeping among the black, and, if I ever intended to marry, it was high time I gave the matter my attention. How much the thought of a pair of brown eyes had to do with this resolution, I cannot say.

For several days I wandered round the various places of amusement and interest, with a vague hope of meeting her again.

Digitized by Google

One evening I strolled into the Opera House, and stood near the door, where I could observe all who entered. My patience was rewarded, for the two ladies came in just before the curtain rose. As she passed me I fancied I saw again a look of interest in her eyes. I procured a seat as near her as possible and watched her all the evening, failing more hopelessly in love each moment, and this without knowing if she were married or single.

At the close of the performance I managed to keep very near them. As they passed me my brown-eyed beauty dropped her fan. I sprang forward, picked it up, and presented it with the most graceful bow at my command. She thanked me most graciously, passed on, and entered a carriage, leaving me in a state of bliss bordering upon imbecility.

A week passed without my seeing her, although I haunted the principal thoroughfares by day and the theatres by night.

I was beginning to despair, when, in strolling through the conservatory at Golden Gate Park one day, I again met her accompanied by the same elderly lady. They were examining some rare orchids. When her eyes met mine, I distinctly saw a pink flush steal over her lovely face, and fancied I saw a smile in the brown eyes, but she bent over a flower, and I passed on, mentally reviling my luck at my inability to obtain an introduction.

They soon passed out and took a shady seat in the park. I sat down as near as possible, without being obtrusive, and, taking out a paper, pretended to read. In reality I watched her over the top.

Presently they rose and passed on, and I saw, with a thrill of delight, that my divinity had left her purse on the seat.

Instantly a spirit of covetousness took possession of me. I must have that purse at all hazards. I immediately arose and appropriated it, dreading lest I should be seen, and passed into another part of the park, feeling delightfully guilty.

Arrived at a place free from observation, I examined my treasure. It contained a twenty-dollar gold piece, some silver, and a few cards and memoranda. On one of the cards was written a name and address, "Jessie E. Stewart, No. 231 Mason Street."

I felt elated. I had heard her companion address her as Jessie, that day in the conservatory. I determined to wait till the next day, call at the address, and return the property.

In the next morning's paper I saw an advertisement of the lost purse, with the request that the finder would return it to the same address as that on the card and receive a reward.

I wondered if I should receive the reward I so much desired—an acquaintance with her—and determined to return it that morning.

About ten I rang the bell of a pretty house, in the prettiest residential portion of the city.

A neat servant maid answered my ring. I asked for the lady who had advertised the lost purse.

"Oh, yes," said she. "Step into the library. She will be down in a moment."

She ushered me into a lovely little room, and ran upstairs, leaving me staring stupidly at a life-sized portrait of my sister Alice, which hung on the opposite wall.

In an instant it all flashed across me. The resemblance to so me one I had met puzzled me no longer.

I saw, as in a dream, the low-ceiled room in the old house in the Sierras, the rough faces of the miners, the eager eyes of the young girl as she sat there playing for my life.

As I gazed at the picture a light step sounded behind me, and turning I stood before the woman I had been following for weeks, to find in her the heroine of my early California experience.

She laughed musically and held out her hand.

"Ah, Mr. Elliott, I see you recognise me through your sister's portrait. Now, my memory is far better than yours, for I recognised you the day I saw you by the Cliff House. Have I, then, changed so very much since that night? Let me see, it was fourteen years ago, was it not?"

I seized both her hands in an impulsive clasp. Though I remembered her as

> A thin slip of a girl like a new moon,
> Sure to be rounded into beauty soon,

I had no idea she would develop into such a beautiful woman as this.

"Changed? Yes. You have changed very much, but it is strange I did not recognise you. I ought to have done so."

"There is nothing strange about it. I have changed very much—for the better, I hope. I have had a strange story. Sit down and let me tell it to you."

I did so most willingly, and and she went on:

"In the first place, I am not old man Brown's daughter. I know nothing of my parents, except that both died of yellow fever in New Orleans, when I was a baby. Mr. and Mrs. Brown adopted me and brought me to California. They built that house, and I was brought up there, with no 'advantages' except to lay up an abundant supply of health. I was as wild as a hawk, and almost as fierce, I think.

I stood before the woman I had been following for weeks.

Digitized by Google

I caught her in my arms, claiming my reward.

"When I was ten years old, Mother Brown died. After that I ran completely wild. Father was always good to me, but always let me have my own way to a shocking extent.

"The year after you were there, Father Brown had the luck to strike rich gravel in land that he owned. He took in a partner, Mr. Stewart, and at once brought me down here and put me to school. What a time I did have at first! I was like a caged hawk. I know I gave my poor teachers no end of trouble, but they were kind, and I soon began to take interest. Besides, I always kept that picture you gave me, and I know the sight of her sweet face somehow kept my feet in the path of duty. I became very much attached to one of my teachers, Miss Rose. She is the one with whom you have seen me.

"Father Brown died the year after I was put in school, leaving me in care of his partner, Mr. Stewart. When I was old enough to leave school, I had no home, so Mr. Stewart kindly got me out of that difficulty by marrying me.

"He was very kind to me, and I missed him greatly when he died. I induced Miss Rose to make her home with me, and she has been with me ever since. We travelled a great deal for some years, and have not been here very long. I have often thought that I should meet you again. The picture you gave me has been a great comfort to me. When I grew restless and discouraged at school, I always fancied her sweet eyes looked at me reproachfully, and when I had won an unusually hard battle with myself, I seemed to read commendation in them. I had it enlarged, as you see, and you don't know what a comfort it has been to me."

She insisted that I should stay to lunch, and brought Miss Rose in to entertain me while she superintended the same. When I finally left, it was with a promise to call the next evening.

Of course I did so, and found her more charming than ever. Before long it seemed that I only lived from one time of seeing her till the next.

One night I escorted them to the opera. When we returned it was late, but Jessie, as I always called her to myself, insisted that I should come in.

She had been unusually full of spirits that evening, and her gay laughter and sallies of wit had completely enthralled me. Miss Rose said good-night, and discreetly left us at the library door.

I had a "now or never" feeling, that caused a peculiar sensation to perambulate up and down my spine. I thought the darkness of the room would be a favourable opportunity, but before I could take the slightest advantage of the situation, she turned a flood of gaslight upon the scene, and gave me a tantalizing look that was too much for even my cowardice, and the next moment I had her in my arms, urging my suit with all my ardour.

But she was obdurate. She broke away from my detaining clasp, and tossing her wrap upon a chair, cried gleefully:

"So you say you love me. Very well, we will let fate decide it. I won you once, fair and square, now see if you can win me. We will play a straight game, just as we did that night long ago, only you shall take Joe's place. If you win, I am yours. If not, I remain single."

She produced a pack of cards and box of chips, seated herself at a small table, and motioned me to the opposite seat. There was nothing for it but to obey. She divided the chips, and at a motion from me dealt.

I had an odd feeling that she would keep her word, and abide by the decision of the cards. We played in silence for awhile she getting the best of the game.

I began to bet recklessly, in hopes of retrieving my waning fortunes, but luck was steadily against me.

I fancied I saw a disconcerted look in her eyes when she saw my pile reduced to five. I took heart at this and began to win. We were soon nearly even, when an idea took possession of me.

On the next deal I drew but one card. She took three and the betting began. I went slowly at first but with a confident air that deceived her.

I raised her till she had but three chips left. I calmly pushed in three.

She hesitated a moment, then threw down the cards, "Take it!" she said.

I quietly gathered in the chips, putting my bobtailed flush out of sight, and saw as I gathered up the cards, that she had jacks and trays.

With such odds in my favour, I began to be very hopeful: I dealt, each drew two. She quietly laid down her last chip, and I called her.

She had three queens and a pair of eights. I threw down four trays, and caught her in my arms, claiming my reward. She granted it, fully and freely, but I never told her what a bluff I played.

E. A. T.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XXXIII.—HE BUYS A FIRE EXTINGUISHER AND PROCEEDS TO EXTINGUISH.

JUST as the Bowsers had finished dinner the other evening a van drove up with a parcel, and as it was brought in Mrs. Bowser looked at it and turned round for an explanation. Mr. Bowser didn't give one until they got upstairs; then he assumed a look of superior wisdom and began:

"Do you know the money value of the property annually destroyed by fire in the United Kingdom?"

"It must be quite large," replied Mrs. Bowser.

"It amounts to millions of pounds, my dear woman. Not only that, but at least a thousand lives are sacrificed to the fire fiend every year. Business is interrupted and ruined, homes made desolate, wives made widows and children made orphans by the devouring element. You should read up the statistics. They will furnish you more food for reflection than a hundred novels."

"Have you posted yourself well up in them?" she asked, with a tartness in her tones.

"Certainly I have. You don't imagine I am talking through the top of my head, do you? It was my duty to post myself, and I know all about it. There were just 11,329 fires in the country last year, and the loss was exactly £23,451,812 19s. 2½d. The point I wish to emphasize is that of these 11,329 fires 9,288 were due to carelessness."

"How carelessness?"

"The carelessness of women and children mostly. Every time you heat your curling-irons you may set fire to the house. The cook's carelessness may start a fire in the kitchen. You light the gas and drop a match. The cook flings matches about where the rats can get at them. At any hour of the day or night your absent-mindedness may reduce this home to ashes."

"And how about your leaving lighted cigar-ends about?" asked Mrs. Bowser. "You have burnt three holes in this carpet, spoilt the piano cover, set the curtains on fire, and done other damage."

"I am talking statistics."

"Woman, I am talking statistics!" shouted Mr. Bowser as he turned on her with such majestic dignity that the cat wondered if she had ever met him before. "Passing over the fact that you and the cook and even this silly old cat are liable to set this house on fire any day in the year, let me say that if people had been prepared for fires there would not have been half the loss of property given in the statistics. While I can't watch over you from hour to hour, I can in a measure guard against your carelessness by being prepared to nip the conflagration in the bud."

"Then that package downstairs is a conflagration nipper?" she asked.

"Don't try to be funny, woman. This is a matter not only of pounds, shillings and pence, but of life and death, and I want it treated seriously. That package down in the hall is a fire extinguisher. You may at some time or other have heard of one, the same as you have heard of a hammer or a thrashing machine."

"Yes; I have heard of them."

"It is to extinguish incipient conflagration. For instance, I awake at midnight and smell smoke. I jump out of bed and come down here to find a fire just starting in that cupboard—a fire due to your carelessness. Left to itself for five minutes more, and away would go the house and our lives, but by means of the extinguisher I extinguish."

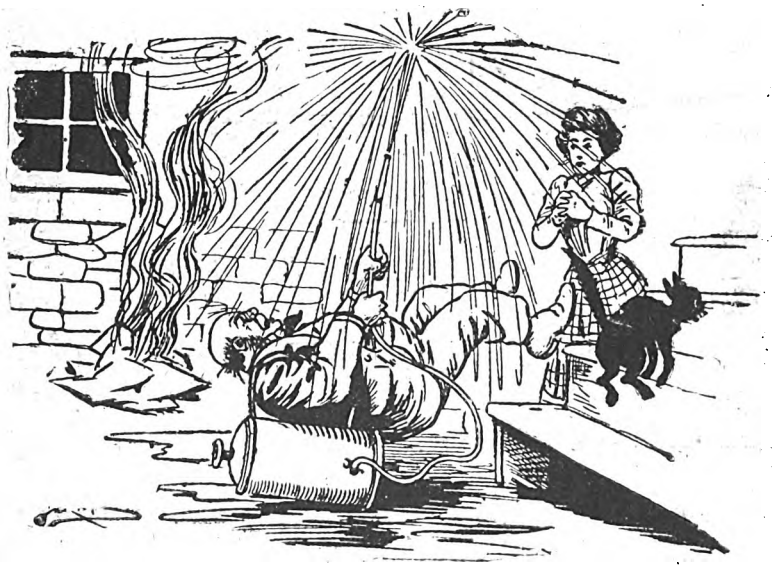
"Which is very kind of you," she observed.

"Still trying to be funny, are you? The object is to provoke me, but it will fail. I have not yet purchased the extinguisher, but have brought it home to test it. I want you to learn how to handle it, so that you may be prepared in my absence. It will also be well for the cook to know how."

"Are you going to set the house on fire in order to put it out?"

"No, madam; I'm not. I am going to set fire to a pile of newspapers

Digitized by Google



He rolled over and over to the cellar bottom.

on the cement floor of the cellar and then show you how to douse the flames out. There will be some little smoke, but that can go out of the windows."

Mrs. Bowser felt certain that some disaster would happen if anything of the sort were attempted, but it was either give in or have a row, and she gave in. The cook felt the same way, but she wanted to keep her place for the winter.

Before going down into the cellar, Mr. Bowser unwrapped the extinguisher and explained what it was charged with and how it worked. He also gave a brief history of the great fire of London which might have been prevented by a cool man and an extinguisher.

Then the trio proceeded down into the cellar, and he heaped up a lot of old newspapers and gave a history of the conflagration at the Paris Bazaar which could also have been checked in its infancy by one squirt from a squirter.

"Now, then," he continued as he opened the cellar windows and got ready to strike a match, "we will make this scene as realistic as possible. It is midnight. I awake to smell smoke and hear the faint crackling of the destructive flames. I bound out of bed without saying anything to Mrs. Bowser, and as I come downstairs I find the cellar ablaze. It is from the cook's carelessness as she brought up coal for the morning. I seize the extinguisher and come dashing down, and, though it appears as if no human power can stay the conflagration, I tackle it and have it out in twenty seconds. I will now light the papers and show you how the thing works."

As the papers were alight he rushed upstairs after the extinguisher. A minute later he reappeared with it strapped to his back and the nozzle in his hand.

He had meant to keep very cool and do the thing beautifully, but he grew excited over it, and as he was met by a volume of smoke he lost his head and footing at the same time.

With a whoop and a yell he fell forward down stairs and rolled over and over to the cellar bottom. As he rolled the extinguisher tried to extinguish, but instead of the stream striking the flames it played on Mr. Bowser's head and feet and body, on the ceiling above and the walls around, on the women who tried to rush forward and help him up.

The pile of papers blazed, and the smoke poured out of the windows, and it wasn't thirty seconds before some one was pounding at the front door and yelling "Fire!"

Mrs. Bowser and the cook dodged the fire and the extinguisher and fled upstairs, but it was too late. A score of people came crowding in as soon as the door was opened, and without asking questions they dived down into the kitchen and snatched up anything that would hold water.

Mr. Bowser had got up by this time and had gained control of the squirter, but he couldn't get upstairs for the people who were throwing down water. As he yelled and shouted and raved an engine came rattling up, a hose nozzle was thrust into an open window, and during the next five minutes three hundred barrels of ice cold water gushed into the cellar.

Everything, including Mr. Bowser, was afloat and soaked and chilled to the marrow when Mrs. Bowser finally made the over-zealous populace understand the situation.

Then Mr. Bowser was hauled out of the window by a fireman, and while Mrs. Bowser and the cat stood on the steps above and the populace crowded round, the fireman held the fire statistician up against the wall and called him seventeen kinds of a fool and added that he ought to be drowned like a rat in a tub.

Five minutes later Mr. Bowser stood in his own front hall, with the door shut after him, and the crowd dispersed. He was soaked and limp and smoke-begrimed and half-scared to death, but he remembered his dignity.

"Well, the incipient conflagration has been extinguished," observed Mrs. Bowser as she looked him over.

"It is extinguished!" he hoarsely replied. "Yes, woman, the incipient conflagration has not only been extinguished, but you have been extinguished with it!"

"Then it was all my fault, was it?"

"A put up job on me from start to finish. Woman, I go upstairs to change my clothes. Do not follow me to offer explanations or assistance or to finish your work by stabbing me in the back! I know you at last—at last—and—and—"

And he pulled himself up step by step, and he halted on every step to point his finger at her and nod his head.

He meant by that the most dire revenge a human being can conjure up, but she only sighed and wiped up the puddles of water left behind him.

M. Quad.

Next Week: "He experiments with a boon to all Mankind."

Digitized by Google

The Peninsular War 1808-1813.

It was an evil day for Napoleon when, in pursuance of his design for reducing Europe to a state of vassalage he resolved on expelling the effete and incapable Bourbons from Spain, and substituting a dynasty of his own.

In 1807, by exercise of the vilest arts, he extorted the abdication of King Charles, and installed in his place his brother, Joseph Bonaparte.

To support the new dynasty, Napoleon poured thousands of troops into Spain, 15,000 of which were intended for the conquest of Portugal.

The moment the Spaniards, recovering from their astonishment, began to exhibit signs of resentment, the troops were scattered over the country in order to nip all rebellion in the bud.

A fatal mistake, for when Spain rose as one man to thrust out the insolent intruder, the French, surprised and divided from each other by a difficult country, every province of which was a natural fortress, found themselves confronted by bands of guerillas, whose mode of fighting was admirably adapted to the country.

Accustomed to regard themselves as invincible, the French were so exasperated at the numerous defeats they experienced that more troops were sent out, and a determined effort made to subjugate the country.

But Britain, ever on the side of the weak, resolved that Spain should not be crushed, and in 1808 dispatched two expeditions to the assistance of the patriots: one under Sir Arthur Wellesley of 9,000 men; the other being led by the ill-fated Sir John Moore, and consisting of 10,000 men.

Soon after his landing, the Conqueror of Waterloo inflicted a severe defeat on Marshal Junot at Vimeria; but the forward movement which Wellesley contemplated was arrested by order of the Government at home. Accordingly, General Wellesley returned to England, and his army was joined to that of General Moore, who now found himself at the head of 28,000 men.

Double that number would not have stayed the disaster which followed.

Napoleon, on hearing of Vimeria, had flown to Spain with huge reinforcements. Quickly re-taking Madrid, he hurried in pursuit of Sir John Moore.

The British officers besought Sir John to fight, but Napoleon had at least 60,000 men, so he retreated to the coast, at his heels being Napoleon, who hoped, by checking the advance, to bring on a general engagement. But the rear-guard did its duty so well that the little army reached Corunna in safety.

Here it was that, to prevent his embarkation from being molested, Sir John Moore was forced to fight. What the result would have been had Napoleon commanded in person it is impossible to say. The threatening attitude of Austria called him to Paris on the eve of the fight. The battle of Corunna was a victory for our troops, but it cost us the life of Sir John Moore.

Britain being now thoroughly roused, Sir Arthur Wellesley was placed in command of a new expedition, 62,000 strong.

After cleansing Portugal of the enemy, the great British general contrived by a most masterly movement in 1809 to cross the Douro, despite the opposition of Marshal Soult.

Digitized by Google

Relying on the co-operation of the Spanish generals, the British then pushed on, and after persuading the Spanish Commander Cuesta to relinquish command of his army, he threw the combined forces at Marshal Victor at Tallavera.

The British numbered 53,000, of whom only 19,000 were Englishmen, whilst General Victor had under him 43,000 foot, 7,000 cavalry, and eighty guns. As the French had all the advantages attaching to superior forces when attacking, we were at first steadily pushed back.

The British, of course, took no notice of so trifling a matter, the day being still young, but to the Spaniards the situation seemed so pregnant with disaster that they began to waver. When a squadron of French horse appeared on their flank they ignominiously, after firing one irregular volley, fled.

By this time Wellington had come to see that the surest way of weakening Napoleon was to act on the defensive. Accordingly, he retreated into Portugal, fortified the famous lines of Torres Vedras, and prepared a campaign which was destined to drive the French out of Spain.

Napoleon in Paris, knowing nothing of the deep-laid plans of the "Sepoy General," as he called him, was furious that his marshals and their 400,000 men had failed to crush and expel the British.

Messina having taken Almeida, and Ciudad Rodrigo, marched at the head of 60,000 men into Portugal. Soult, with even a larger force, declared his intention of driving us into the sea; but when he reached the lines of Torres Vedras he paused, hesitated, and retreated, an example which was presently followed by Messina, but not till he had fought—and well fought, too—the battle of Fuentes d'Ormore.

French historians claim this battle as a victory, which is strange, considering that on the very night it was fought Messina retreated. For this behaviour he was replaced by Marmont. The British, it should be remembered, were greatly outnumbered; but it is by no means certain that, had the marshals been willing to forego their jealousies and hatreds, and combine their forces, France would have triumphed.

Be this as it may, Napoleon at this juncture made a fatal mistake. Believing that Wellesley was much weaker than he really was, he ordered Marmont to send a large portion of his force to Suchet, the only French marshal, we believe, who never suffered a defeat at the hands of the British.

On May 16th, 1811, was fought the battle of Albuera, which nearly ended in a victory for the French, owing to General Blake, who commanded the Spaniards, refusing to change the disposition of his troops when ordered to do so by General Beresford.

The French lancers had already pierced our lines, and defeat appeared so imminent that Beresford was about ordering a retreat, when he observed a couple of his infantry regiments marching stolidly forward to attack the impetuous French cavalry, who were also supported by infantry.

Knowing the qualities of his men, Beresford, instead of retiring, ordered some cavalry to take the French lancers and their supports in the flank. Being in dense columns, the onslaught when it came threw them into such disorder that our infantry, when they got them fairly on the move, literally pushed them off the field at the point of the bayonet. Being by this time tired out they sat down and ate their supper in sight of the astonished French, who were, however, too exhausted to again attack.

Soult declared that there was no chance of beating such troops, despite the mistakes of our generals, and so ordered a retreat.

Wellington, whose confidence in Beresford had been shaken, returned from the north and conducted the siege of Ciudad in person. He had intended to subdue the place by regular approaches, but hearing that Marmont was on the march, he decided to breach the walls and trust to an assault.

As soon as a couple of entrances had been made, the governor was summoned to surrender. Refusing, an attack was ordered from three points. Filling in the ditches which surrounded the fortress, our men rushed forward.

The French fought with the most desperate valour, but although they managed to hold one of the breaches, the British succeeded in storming the other. Even after the contending forces reached the streets the French charged again and again, but the stubbornness of our wonderful infantry would not be denied. We ought to have retreated, but as we wouldn't the French had no choice but to capitulate.

The capture of Ciudad, which ranks amongst the most brilliant exploits of our Army, cost us dear. It is true that when we did get inside we slew 300 of the foe and took 1,500 prisoners, beside 150 guns, and stores, but the storming of the breaches lessened our forces by 226 killed and 1,084 wounded, to say nothing of two generals who were shot in the street fighting.

Wellington now began his advance north, and Marmont, having received reinforcements, attacked him at Salamanca. The battle commenced by Marmont sending round his left wing to take us in the rear. Wellington allowed them to go just far enough to render the intervention of the main body impossible, and then, wheeling his whole force round, fell upon the division and annihilated it.

Marmont, who went to its assistance, was wounded, and General Clausel, on whom the command devolved, tried to retrieve the fortunes of the day by an attack on our centre. But Wellington's eagle eye had foreseen this move and he had his reserves ready, who, arriving quite fresh, greeted the furious onslaught of the French with cries of derision.

When the French began to retreat, we followed them with such expedition that the entire army was nearly driven into the river. This was a most complete victory.

By the time Salamanca was fought, the British army, flushed with victory, had so grown to regard themselves and their commander as invincible, that it is doubtful whether even the genius of Napoleon himself could have withstood the valour of our troops.

Wellington, it is needless to say, received a most enthusiastic welcome on entering Madrid.

Leaving the Spanish army to protect the capital against the Emperor Joseph's return, he invested the town of Burgos, an obstacle to the operations he contemplated.

Such was the confidence of our men, that a large party, acting without orders, actually assaulted the town before a breach was made, and were, as might be expected, repulsed.

The second assault, which took place after a breach had been made by the explosion of a mine, failed, because the storming party lost their way.

Digitized by Google

Drawn by] [Lawson Wood.

When they had all been chased out of the houses a desperate fight took place in the streets.

Digitized by Google

A third repulse was caused by the stupendous vanity of the storming party, who in a most vainglorious manner, leisurely sauntered up to the breach and were promptly shot down.

A fourth attempt met with no better success and the men were nerving themselves for a fifth attack, upon what was, after all, an extremely small place, when Wellington suddenly abandoned the siege because he heard that General Souham with 45,000 men was rapidly approaching. Soult also was marching in his rear from Madrid with 60,000 more. In his retreat to Ciudad Rodrigo Wellington lost 9,000 men. Nothing like this number would have fallen had not the men become demoralised by their failure at Burgos. They committed the wildest excesses on the march, and were scarcely ever sober.

But Wellington did not remain long inactive, and soon the curtain was raised on the last act of that drama which was to end in the fall of Napoleon.

Every available man having been pressed into the army with which Russia was invaded, Wellington's calculations were not to be upset by the armies opposed to him being unexpectedly reinforced.

He, moreover, opened the campaign of 1813 with an army, including Spanish and Portuguese, quite as large as that of the French combined, viz., 160,000 men. To make sure of his prey, however, he seized the passes of the Pyrenees and thus cut the French communications.

But if this disturbed the French, a series of masterly manœuvres by which he forced all the armies in front of him to abandon their positions and retreat, so disconcerted the marshals that King Joseph now became seriously alarmed. A panic seizing the Court, the roads leading northwards became so blockaded with courtiers and their baggage that it was with difficulty the French army reached Vittoria without disaster.

On the plain of Vittoria, a huge expanse eight miles long by ten miles wide, King Joseph drew up his army. His aim was to so dispose his forces that he could keep open his communication both with Madrid and France.

Wellington could cut all the remaining communications with France, but to do so he would have to swing his left right round, thus severing his connection with his base in Portugal. It was a hazardous thing to do, but Wellington risked it.

The French drew up their army on the crest of some ridges at the rear of the plain. It extended over eight miles, and the bridges across the river in front were commanded by sixty pieces of artillery.

The French army expressed itself confident of winning; but the Court could not have been so hopeful, for the roads for miles in the rear of the army were crowded with vehicles of every description, containing the civilian parasites, their wives and families, goods and plunder.

The two armies were so well matched that the chances appeared equal.

At daybreak, June 21st, our right wing commenced the battle by attacking the heights above Puebla, directly in their front. Leaving the Spaniards in possession, Sir Rowland Hill, with the object of clearing the ridges on his side, ran his men across a valley in face of a heavy fire, and stormed the village of Sutigana.

As Sutigana was the key of the position, the French weakened their centre to recover the village.

Wellington, who had anticipated this, at once launched a strong force against the French centre, which would of a certainty have collapsed but for the aid rendered by their artillery. So destructive was their fire that Wellington held back his men till a couple of brigades of guns he had sent for, had silenced the French artillery.

Again advancing, our troops forced back the French centre till the village of Arty was reached. Here they made such a determined stand that Picton and his daredevils were sent for. Picton, who was always reserved for work requiring the clearing out of an enemy who fought behind walls or hedges, at once set to work to make a clean sweep of the lot.

When they had all been chased out of the houses, a desperate fight took place in the streets.

The reinforcements sent to the French were of no avail. Picton's devils steadily forced their way up the village street till they got to the open country, when the French broke and ran.

The French plan of battle now began to betray serious evidence of weakness.

King Joseph insisted on a whole corps being detached to occupy the village of Gamara and so secure his communications with Bayonne. Our right wing had now so effectually driven the French left into their centre, that the various corps, losing formation, presently dissolved into a confusion which prevented them from executing any offensive movement.

Losing heart, the detachments holding a few remaining heights offered but a feeble resistance to our men. Despairing of the issue the retreat was sounded, and away went the French down the Pampluna road with the British in hot pursuit. The French were joined on the road by a large body of reserves who had not been engaged.

It was fortunate they were at hand, for the fugitives presently encountered the force lying in wait on the banks of the Zadora to intercept them.

The struggle waged at this spot was of indescribable ferocity.

Knowing that unless they broke through they would be taken in the rear by the British who were close behind, the French made a supreme effort and fighting in really grand style forced a passage. Never was victory more complete.

The French lost all their guns but two, and all their munitions of war.

Indeed, so precipitate did their retreat become, that the soldiers outstripped the vehicles of the Court and 2,000 of these fell into our hands. The spoils, in fact, were so vast that, when the soldiers held an auction of the booty the day after, the boards on which the booty was exposed for sale, extended for over two miles.

Our losses as usual were heavy—heavy because carrying enemies' positions always results in heavy loss of life. Our dead and wounded exceeded 5,000, of which 3,574 were British.

The French admitted to having lost over 7,000.

With the battle of Vittoria, the Peninsular War may be said to end.

Our matchless infantry, who, as Sir W. Napier has said, could go anywhere, marched 600 miles, fought over a dozen pitched battles, captured two large fortresses, finally driving out of Spain 130,000 of the best soldiers France ever produced.

Next week: The Campaign in the Pyrenees and South of France (1813—14).

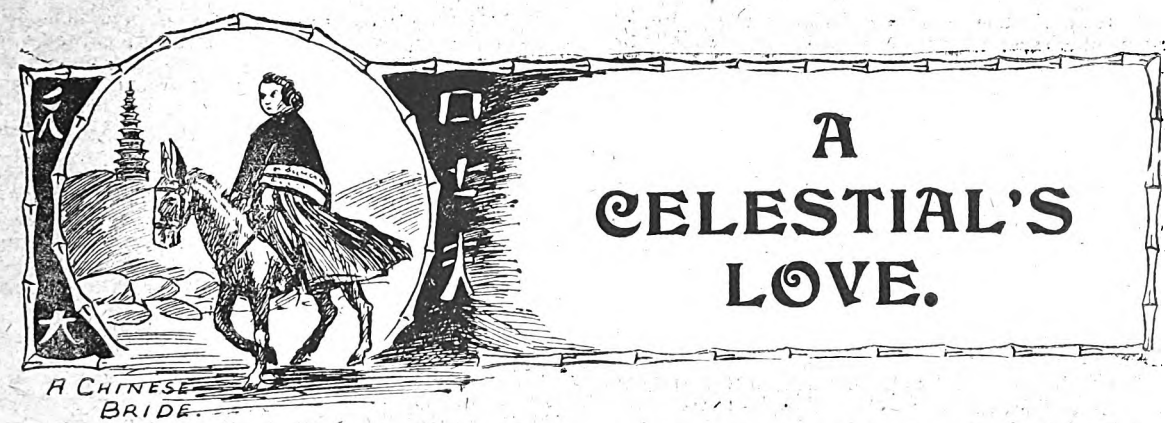
Digitized by Google



A CHINESE BRIDE.

A CELESTIAL'S LOVE.

SARAH BARKER had told Milly Hunt a wonderful tale, and Milly, to whom it had been communicated in strict confidence, as a choice bit of "exclusive" news, of course immediately proceeded to impart it to all the other girls in the laundry.

Latimer Road, Notting Hill, is not famous for excessive refinement in the vernacular of its residents.

The "wash-tub" and the "ironing-board" do not appear to be conducive to a peculiarly high standard of either speech or manners; so t' at when Milly had distributed her budget, it is not surprising that its reception was choicely expressive, not to say flowery.

"Wot! the yaller, dirty lot! a-comin' to do our work? Wash!—why they doesn't wash theirselves. Yah!"

"I tells yer they're not 'a-comin'! they're come!" insisted Milly Hunt, with the superior air of one who knew all about it.

"Then we'll duck 'em in 'ot suds, an' striten 'em out wiv' a flat-iron arterwuds!" cried Susy Maxted, a carroty-headed young amazon, and she certainly looked quite capable of doing it too.

"What O!" screamed the others in deafening chorus.

It was the dinner-hour, and their lungs were their own.

Now Susy Maxted, although a laundry girl, was a born leader in her little world, and by common consent was universally recognised as adviser-in-chief in all matters requiring arbitrative ability.

Disputes (and they were many and frequent), quarrels (mostly the result of feminine jealousy), courting questions (as innumerable as subtle), were referred to her for judgment and woe to the girl who refused to obey the order of the Court.

In this particular instance she was more than ordinarily authoritative, for did not the threatened invasion of the detested Chinaman mean for all of them lower wages and harder work?

"Why! they lives, I've heerd, on a farden a day!" said Susy contemptuously. "If they gets their foot in, where shall we be? In the street or the workus! An' I don't mean to be in neither, bet yer life on that!"

"Good old Susy!" screamed the chorus.

"'Ere! will yer leave 'em to me? I'll tackle 'em!" and the aggressively upward tilt of her impudent little nose, the wicked snap of her fingers, testified to the "goodwill," at any rate, of Susy's intentions. "No! I shan't tell yer what I'm a-goin' to do—I'm on my own this trip. Milly Hunt; if you an' Sally Barker tries ter find out my little bit, I'll mark yer, an' don't yer furgit it!"

That evening there might have been seen in the neighbourhood of Willesden a young woman of strong build and determined manner, loitering up and down the streets of that suburb.

Her appearance gave the impression that she was on conquest bent; as in a sense she was.

The enormous be-feathered and be-flowered hat; the startling bright blue skirt; the scarlet jacket with big pearl buttons (a costume, as a rule, donned only when the male enemy was to be encountered), implied, apparently, that the wearer had matter of unusual importance on hand.

It was a beautiful summer evening, and Susy would, under ordinary circumstances, have revelled in it, according to her lights, but her present business was extraordinary, and forbade frivolity.

For more than an hour did she watch the gates of a certain old house, at the back of which had lately been erected two or three long, low-pitched wooden sheds.

Lights gleamed in every window, especially did the sheds aforesaid send up from their open skylights not only beams of light, but dense clouds of steam.

Susy watched all this with the silent sleuthy keenness of a cat.

Watch as she would, however, nothing human or otherwise passed in or out the gates. To all intents and purposes, it might have been an enchanted place, where the work was done by invisible hands.

Thus patiently waiting, Susy, turning her head a moment to gaze up the long, dreary-looking road, saw something or someone approaching in the far distance.

The house no longer had attraction for her, her eyes were fixed upon the slowly nearing object.

She felt that, whatever it was, she must go to meet it, and with a defiant settling of her hat, a twist of her side fringes, Susy swung up the street.

Wang-Ho, tired, dusty, and barely recovered from the terrors of shipboard, thought the scarlet and blue vision advancing toward him to be the most beautiful and entrancing he had ever beheld. Small-footed, almond-eyed houris of Pekin had he seen and worshipped by the score, but here was a blaze of golden-flamed hair, a picture of pink and white loveliness that fairly overcame him at the very first sight of it.

Hungry, thirsty, he could yet lift his "Celestial" soul to an ecstatic contemplation of this oncoming daughter of the "foreign devil."

Wang-Ho was young and guileless, and quite inexperienced in the ways and wiles of the English girl. She was to him an absolutely unknown quantity.

Digitized by Google

His admiration did not decrease upon newer acquaintance; rather did it grow with wonderful rapidity.

Presently Wang-Ho was conscious of an interruption in his progress.

At the particular spot where it occurred, there were no houses, but plots of waste building land on both sides of the road.

Too, they had the path to themselves, for in either direction other pedestrians there were none.

"Say! are yer a-goin' there?" inquired Susy sharply, standing full in front of Wang-Ho, and pointing with her thumb over her shoulder to the house she had been so persistently watching.

Wang-Ho only grinned, nodded his head in an inconsequent, half-vacuous way, and clasped tighter to his breast, with both his lean yellow hands, the little blue bundle he carried.

"Oh! yer are! are yer! Though yer might be civil enough ter answer a person as speaks civil ter yer. Well, just yer mind wot I'm a-goin' ter tell yer, turn round an' go back agin ter 'Ong-Kong or wotever the place is as yer've cum from! Yer ain't wanted 'ere!"

Wang-Ho had a dim indefinite sort of idea that this beautiful creature was angry with him; was in some way wishful to bar his way to the laundry whither he was bound.

"You allee same plitty gel, velly plitty," he said at length, his mind running only upon this, to him, novel sensation of love at first sight.

"'Ere, chuck it! None o' that! Wot d'yer takeme for?"

"Allee same plitty, velly plitty," he repeated, smiling his most fetching smile.

"If yer says that ag'in, I'll land yer one! I ain't 'ere ter listen ter yer fooleries," said Susy with an ominous shake of her broad shoulders. "See that place?"—pointing again to the house up the road—"Well, sure as yer goes there, I'll cut off yer pigtail, and make yer swaller it, there!"

With that, Susy swung him round, gave him a by no means gentle push, and walked away.

Wang-Ho watched her, as she stepped out ahead of him, and, instead of turning round again, and pursuing his journey according to his original programme, followed in her wake.

From that moment Susy Maxted had no peace. Dinner-times, evening-times, it was always the same; there was Wang-Ho, smiling, patient, waiting for her, until, what with the chaff of the other girls, and her own wrath, she was on the brink of doing something that would cause trouble to somebody.

One day, a little gutter-snipe delivered into her hands a piece of rice-paper, inscribed with Chinese characters, and which the boy averred had been given him by Wang-Ho to pass on to her.

He knew it was for her, he said, because "Chiney" had told him that it was for "Plitty gel—hair allee same this." "This" being the broad red border round the missive.

This occurred in the middle of the day, and Susy, hot-tempered by nature, and now at white heat almost, determined to put an end to the affair that very night, and at any cost.

Sure enough, at the usual hour, at the corner of the nearest turning was Wang-Ho.

His shoes were spotless; his shirt and jacket without a wrinkle; while his eternal smile was, if anything, even more beatific than aforetime.

By permission of the forewoman, Susy came out a few minutes before the other girls, and without a moment's hesitation marched rapidly up to the expectant "Celestial."

"D'yer see that?" she said to him—not loudly, but so as if she meant it, that he could not fail to understand her drift—first flourishing the offending 'love-letter' in his face, and then dropping it in the muddy roadway, and dancing upon it. "D'yer see that? D'yer think I wants yer nasty 'tensions, or yer cumpany? Take that! an' that!"—giving him a couple of resounding slaps on either cheek—"If yer comes 'ere agin, a-follering of me, I'll kill yer! I will—s'elp me!"

Wang-Ho saw the dethronement of his idol with sorrow and regret; but his smile was still there, and without doubt it was this latter peculiarity which roused in Susy such irritation, bitter wrath and vengeful desire.

But her purpose was served. He never troubled her more.

* * * * *

Some little while afterwards the police were called one night to a certain notorious opium den in the East End to remove the body of a young Chinaman, who had evidently succumbed to an over-dose of the deadly drug.

On examination there was found upon him wrapped carefully away in the inner folds of his clothing a small piece of dirty paper, with rudely scrawled upon it that which was probably designed for a woman's head.

The policemen laughed. They generally, upon their own confession, do laugh at such things, but all the same in this case there were the elements of something strangely pathetic. It was a little bit of human nature, and human nature, be it white or yellow, is a very real thing.

Wang-Ho had his little heart-flutter, and—it came to nothing.

Susy Maxted will, possibly, some day mate with a man who will swear at her and knock her about; and who shall say what the end will be? RALPH ENDERBY.

YOUR HEAD AND SHOULDERS ONLY.

IF you have a relative who has passed away either at home in peace or abroad in war, send his photograph—which you probably cherish—and we will enlarge it to a beautiful India ink and crayon portrait, 15in. by 12in., mounted on plate sunk mount 24in. by 19in.

Relatives of soldiers at the front may obtain one of these enlargements for 6s.

Other photographs will be enlarged for 7s.

You will certainly get a genuine bargain by availing yourself of this offer. The enlargements can be made from any photograph, large or small, tin-types, or any kind of glass picture, provided the print is legible. All the enlargements are of the head and shoulders only.

What to do.

Write your name and address plainly in ink on a slip of paper, also on the back of the portrait you are sending us. Get a postal order for 7s. (if the photograph be that of a soldier or sailor get a 6s. postal order). Place all of these in an envelope, or make a securely packed parcel of them and address it to the PORTRAIT EDITOR, Pearson's Weekly, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A Reduction of Threepence

on each enlargement, when the order is for two or more from the same photograph, will be made.

Orders will be treated in rotation.

All photographs—particularly those on glass—should be securely packed. Although all possible care will be taken, we do not hold ourselves responsible for photographs damaged or lost in transit.

Digitized by Google

"QUICK CHANGE" PUZZLES.

First Prize	A Magnificent Graphophone.
Second Prize	£2.
Six Prizes of	10s. each.

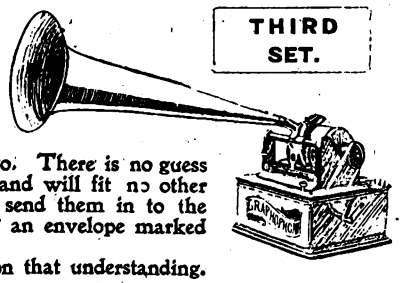
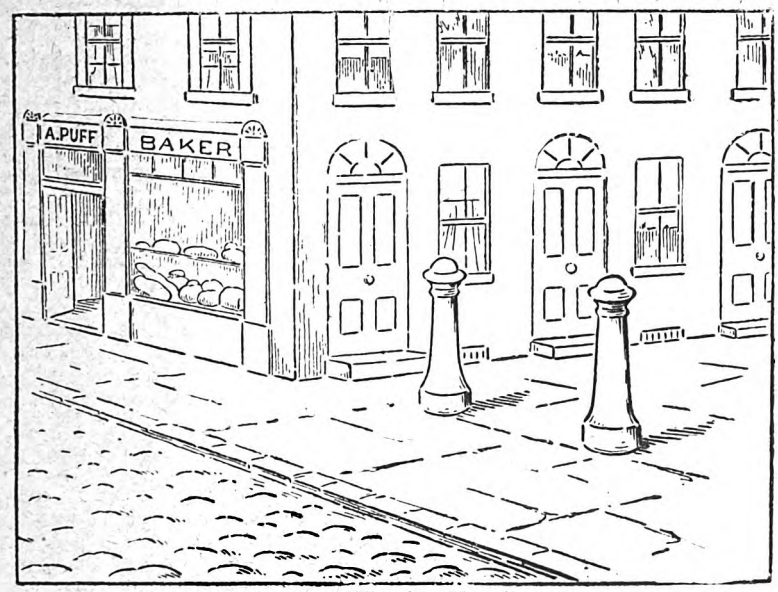
THIRD SET.



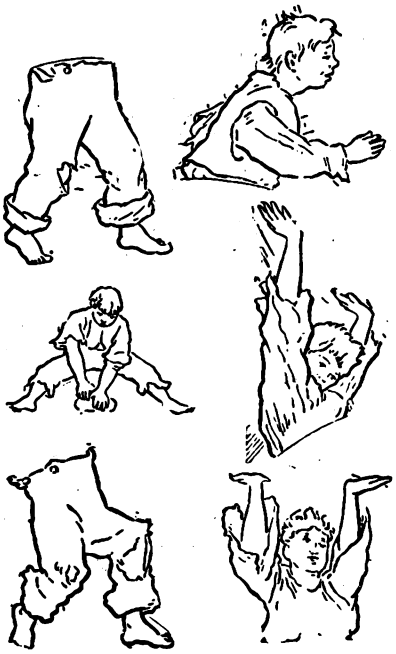
On this page you will find two drawings exactly alike, and a number of parts of figures. What you have to do is to cut out the parts of the figures, leaving a small margin, and paste them on the picture in the way they should go. There is no guess work about it. Each part of the figures should be pasted on a certain spot, and will fit no other spot. When you have pasted up your picture, pin the three sets together, and send them in to the Editor, "Short Stories," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., in an envelope marked "Quick Change," to arrive not later than Thursday, January 10th.

Competitors must abide by the Editor's final decision, and may enter only on that understanding.



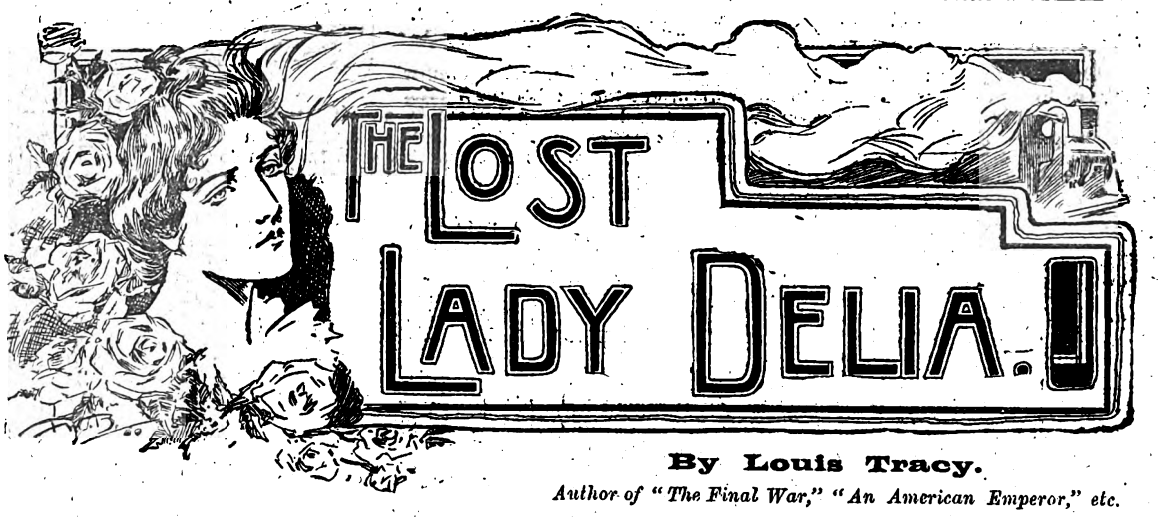
Football.

"Cartwheels."



Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL STORY. START TO-DAY.



By Louis Tracy.

Author of "The Final War," "An American Emperor," etc.

SUMMARY.

LADY DELIA LYLE leaves her house one foggy November afternoon, and is seen at Victoria Station, on the Underground Railway, by Mr. Reginald Brett, a barrister friend of her husband, who gets her ticket and puts her in the train for Richmond, where she says she is going to see her sister.

She does not return home at night, so in the morning her husband, Sir Charles Lyle, wires to her at her sister's, only to find that she has not been there.

Later in the day Brett happens to meet Sir Charles, and tells him that he saw Lady Delia on the previous evening, and is surprised to learn that nothing has been heard of her since.

After some days have passed, without bringing any news of Lady Delia, Sir Charles puts the matter into the hands of detectives, Inspector Winter taking charge of the case.

Brett also promises to do all he can, and he finds out that Lady Delia, on the night of her disappearance, instead of going to Richmond, alighted at Sloane Square, and went to a block of flats called Raleigh Mansions.

Towards the end of the month the body of a woman, evidently murdered, is found wedged beneath a drain-pipe in the Thames at Putney, and, though Sir Charles does not identify the body, Brett imagines it to be that of Lady Delia. Shortly after this discovery Lady Delia's maid, Jane Harding, disappears.

Brett now starts investigations at Raleigh Mansions, and he fixes on two residents there as being likely to have been connected with Lady Delia. These are a Mr. Sydney H. Pyne, who is not at present in residence, and a Mrs. Hilmer, whom he finds to be Pyne's sister, and this lady Brett takes to the theatre one evening.

Among one of the actresses who had a walking on part, Brett notices Jane Harding, and at the close of the performance, after seeing Mrs. Hilmer to her carriage, he follows her to a restaurant. She tells him that she has had a little money left her, which has enabled her to go on the stage.

CHAPTER VII.

IN THE CITY.

MESSRS. DODGE AND CO., of Leadenhall-street, possessed business premises of greater pretensions than Brett had pictured to himself from Mrs. Hilmer's description of their transactions with her brother.

Not only were their offices commodious and well situated, but a liberal display of gold lettering, intermingled with the official brass-plates marking the registered offices of many companies, gave evidence of some degree of importance—whether fictitious or otherwise Brett could not determine, as he scrutinised the exterior of the building on the following morning.

Moreover, workmen were even then busy in substituting the title "Dodge, Son, and Co., Ltd.," for "Messrs. Dodge and Company," the suggestive nature of the latter designation having perhaps proved a stumbling-block in the way of the guileless investor.

When the barrister entered the office, a busy place, with many clerks, and adorned with gigantic maps of the Rand, West Australia, Cripple Creek, and Klondike, he asked for "Mr. Dodge."

His card procured him ready admission. He was shown into an elaborately upholstered apartment of considerable size. At the farther end, seated in front of a gorgeous American desk, was a young man who ostentatiously finished a letter and then motioned the barrister to a seat.

Brett was curious on the question of the age of the head of the firm.

"Are you Mr. Dodge, or the son?" he said, with the utmost gravity.

The other man was taken aback by this unexpected method of opening the conversation. It annoyed him.

"I am the representative of the firm, sir, and able to deal fully with your business, whatever it may be," he replied.

"No doubt. But it will simplify matters if I know exactly to whom I am addressing myself."

After an uneasy shuffling in his seat—he could not guess what this keen-faced, earnest-eyed lawyer might want—the representative of Messrs. Dodge, Son, and Co. (Limited) explained that he was Dodge, and the name of the firm had been adopted for general purposes.

"Then there is no 'son,' I take it?"

"Yes, there is, sir"—this with a snort of anger.

"How old is he?"

"What the dickens has that got to do with it? Will you kindly tell me what you want, sir, as my time is fully occupied?"

"Just now I want to know how old the 'son' is?"

This calm persistence irritated Mr. Dodge beyond endurance.

"Three years, confound you, and his sister is four months. Can I oblige you with any more details concerning my family affairs?"

Having purposely raised his man to boiling point by this harmless method of examination, Reggie went on to tackle the real business in hand. He was quite sure that a financial sharper in a temper was far more likely to blurt out the truth than if he were approached in a matter-of-fact manner.

Digitized by Google

"To begin with," he explained, never taking his eyes off the furious face of Mr. Dodge, "I have called to ask for information with regard to your dealings with Mr. Sydney H. Pyne, of Raleigh Mansions, Sloane-square."

"I never heard of him in my life. You have evidently come to the wrong office, Mr. Brett."

"Are you quite sure?"

"Well, nearly so. However, I can tell you in a moment, as it is impossible for me to carry every name connected with several companies in my memory."

Mr. Dodge had recovered his temper now that he saw a chance of disconcerting his caustic visitor. He touched an electric bell and told the answering youth to send Mr. Hawkins.

"My correspondence clerk," he said to Brett when Hawkins entered. "Are we in communication with any one named Sydney H. Pyne, Mr. Hawkins?"

"No, sir."

"Have you ever heard the name?"

"No, sir."

"That will do. You may go. You see you have come to the wrong shop, Mr. Brett."

"Yes, so I see."

The barrister kept looking at the back of Mr. Dodge's head, but made no move.

Mr. Dodge became puzzled.

"Now, Mr. Brett," he cried, "you know the age of my son and the extent of my information about Mr. Pyne. Is there anything else in which I may be of service?"

"Yes. You do a good deal of underwriting, mostly for the flotation of gold-mining companies?"

"Y-yes. That is a branch of our business."

"I am interested in this class of undertaking, and I was given to understand that Mr. Pyne had had some dealings with you in a similar respect for a considerable sum of money."

"The name is absolutely unknown to me."

"Of course. So I understand. I am sorry to hear it. Several clients of mine have money to invest in that way and I naturally came to a firm whose name apparently figured largely in the transactions of Mr. Pyne."

It was good for Brett to see the manner in which Mr. Dodge metaphorically kicked himself for his previous attitude. His emotion was painful. For quite an appreciable time he could not trust his sentiments to words.

At last he struggled to express himself.

"Really, Mr. Brett, if only you had put things differently. Don't you see, it rather upset me when you came in and began jawing about the youngsters. And then you spring Mr. Pyne's name on me—a man of whom I have no sort of knowledge. It must have been my firm of which your friends heard. There is absolutely no other Dodge in Leadenhall-street. Indeed, we are the only financial Dodges—that is, Messrs. Dodge, Son, and Co. (Limited) are the only name dealing with financial matters—in the City."

By this time Brett had assured himself that Mr. Dodge did not know Mr. Pyne under that name, and that if the change of name had been adopted by Mrs. Hilmer's brother to conceal himself from Dodge, it was likely to be successful.

"Anyhow, I am here, Mr. Dodge," he said cheerfully, "so I may as well enter into negotiations with you. Have you any good things in hand at this moment?"

"Some of the best. We are just waiting for the market

"Really, Mr. Brett, if only you had put things differently."

to ease a bit, and we shall have at least five splendid properties to place before the public. By the way, do you smoke?"

Brett did smoke; and Mr. Dodge produced a box of excellent cigars. Then he warmed to his work.

"Here is the prospectus of the Golden Halo Mine, capital £150,000, for which the vendors are asking £140,000 in cash, with a working capital of £10,000. The ore now in sight is estimated to produce two millions sterling, and the mine is not one-tenth developed. We are offering underwriters ten per cent. in cash, and there is not the slightest risk, as the shares will stand at a high premium within a few days after the lists——"

"It sounds most promising," said Brett; "but my principals are more interested in taking up concerns which have been already established, but in which, for want of sufficient capital, the vendors' shares have, by a process of reconstruction, come into the market. If you have anything of that kind——"

"The very thing," interrupted Dodge, excitedly. "The Springbok Mine will just suit 'em. After all is said and done, Golden Halos are a bit in the air, between you and me. But the Springbok is a genuine article. It was capitalised for a quarter of a million, and the directors went to allotment on a subscription list of about £14,000. This money has been expended, but twice the amount is necessary to properly develop the property. A call was made on the shares, but no one paid up, and there is a talk now of compulsory reconstruction. Believe me, money put into it now will yield 200 per cent. in dividends within twelve months."

"There is a whiff of scent on this trail," said Reggie to himself. He added aloud: "That looks promising. Can you give me details?"

Digitized by Google

"By all means. Here is the original prospectus."

Brett glanced through the document, which dealt with the Springbok claims on the Rand with more candour than is usually exhibited in such compilations. Judging from the reports of several mining engineers of repute it really looked as if, this time, Mr. Dodge was speaking with some degree of accuracy.

"This reads well," said Brett. "What proportion of share capital is falling in on the reconstruction scheme?"

"I hold 50,000 shares myself," cried Dodge, "and though my money is locked up just now I am so convinced about this mine that I will manage to pay the call myself. Roughly speaking, there are 150,000 shares to be underwritten at, say, 3s. each."

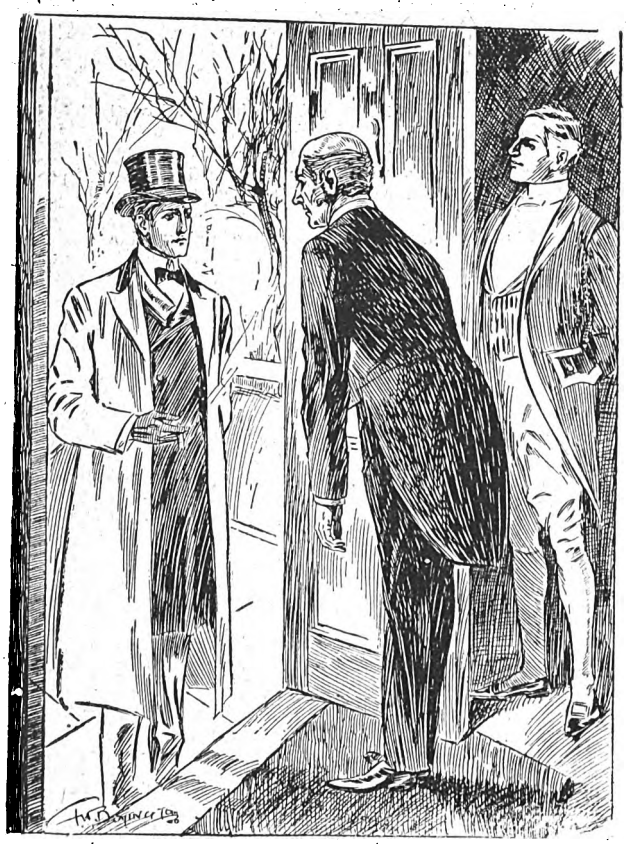
"And who are the present holders?" The barrister asked the question in the most unconcerned way imaginable, yet upon the answer depended the whole success or otherwise of this hitherto unproductive mission.

Mr. Dodge was manifestly anxious. "I take it that we are talking with a definite view to business?"

The barrister hesitated. Even in the detection of crime a man does not care to tell a deliberate lie, and Dodge's attitude so far had been candid enough. The Springbok Mine honestly looked to be a good speculative investment, so he resolved to place the proposition before one or two friends of his who dealt with similar matters, and who were fully able to look after their own interests.

"Yes," he said, "I am here for that purpose. If my principals like this thing they will go in for it."

"Then here is the vendors' list," said Mr. Dodge, taking a foolscap sheet from a drawer.



"Sir Charles left yesterday for Bournemouth, sir.'

Reggie perused it nonchalantly. His quick eyes took in each name and address out of half-a-dozen, and rejected all as being in no way connected with the man whose antecedents he was seeking.

Yet, where possible, he left nothing to chance.

"Have you any objection to a copy of these being made?" he said.

Mr. Dodge hummed doubtfully.

"You see," went on the barrister, "it is best to be quite candid with people whom you ask to invest in risky, if apparently high-promising, ventures. I presume these gentlemen are moneyless. If so it is a factor in favour of your scheme. Should any of them be men of means my principals would naturally ask why they did not themselves underwrite the shares."

Mr. Dodge was convinced. "From that point of view," he cried emphatically, "they are above suspicion. Jot them down, sir."

Reggie armed himself with the requisite documents, and they parted with mutual good wishes. It was only after reflection that Mr. Dodge saw how remarkably little he had got out of the interview. "He was a jolly sharp chap," communed the company promoter. "I wonder what he was really after. And who the dickens is Mr. Sydney H. Pyne? Anyhow, the Springbok business is quite above board. How can I raise the wind for my little lot?"

If Mr. Brett had sufficiently probed Mr. Dodge's holding, he would have been saved much future perturbation. But clever as he was, he did not know all the methods of financial juggling practised by experts on the Stock Exchange.

A hansom brought him quickly west to Portman Square. In fulfilment of his promise he was about to tell Sir Charles Lyle the salient features of his recent discoveries.

When the door of Wensley House opened to him, the butler, Thompson, who happened to be in the hall, anticipated the footman's answer to Brett's inquiry.

"Sir Charles left yesterday for Bournemouth, sir. He was that hovercome by the weather an' his trouble that he has gone for a few days' rest at the seaside. If you called, sir, I was to tell you he would be glad to see you there should you find it convenient to run down. And, Mr. Brett, sir, you'll never guess who came 'ere this morning as bold as brass."

"Miss Jane Harding?"

"Now, how on earth can you hit upon things that way, sir? It was her, her very self. And you ought to 'ave seen her airs. 'Thompson,' sez she, 'is Sir Chawles at 'ome.' 'No, he isn't,' sez I; 'but you're wanted at the polis station.' She was in a keb, an' she 'ad asked a butcher's boy to pull the bell, so 'im an' the cabby larfed. 'Thompson,' she said, very red in the face, 'I'll 'ave you dismissed for your imperence.' An' off she went. Did you ever hear anythink like it, sir?"

"No, Thompson; Miss Harding is certainly a cool hand."

Brett walked to his chambers, and his stroll through the parks was engrossed by one subject of thought. It was not Mrs. Hilmer, nor Pyne, nor Dodge that troubled him. What puzzled him more than all else was the "imperence" of Jane Harding.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE HOTEL DU CERCLE.

BRETT did not go to Bournemouth.

He left London by the night mail, and after a wearisome journey of thirty-six hours, found himself in the garden courtyard of the Hotel du Cercle at Monte Carlo.

Refreshed by a bath and an excellent déjeuner Brett decided to go quietly to work and search the visitors' book for himself without asking any questions. The Hotel du Cercle was a popular resort, and it took him some time, largely devoted to the elucidation of hieroglyphic signatures, before he was quite satisfied that no one even remotely suggestive of the name of Sydney H. Pyne had recorded his presence in the hotel since the first week in November.

Digitized by Google

The barrister, for the first time, began to doubt Mrs. Hilmer. Twice had her statements not been verified by the facts. It was with an expression of keen annoyance at his own folly in trusting so much to a favourable impression that Brett turned to the hotel clerk to ask if the name Sydney H. Pyne was familiar to him.

The courteous Frenchman screwed up his forehead into a reflective frown before he answered: "But yes, monsieur. Me, I have not seen the gentleman, but he exists. There have been letters—two, three letters."

"Ah, letters! Has he received them?"

The attendant examined a green baize-covered board, decorated with diamonds of tape, in which was stuck an assortment of letters, mostly addressed to American tourists.

"They were here. They have gone! Then he has taken them."

"Yes," cried Brett; "but surely you know something about him?"

"Nothing. This hall is open to all the world."

"Do you tell me that anyone can come here and take off any letters that may be stuck in that rack?"

"Will the gentleman be pleased to consider? Many persons give their address here days and weeks before they come to arrive. Some persons, in the manner of Monte Carlo, do not wish their names to be known of everybody. We cannot distinguish. We do not allow the address of the hotel to be used improperly, if we know it; but there are no complaints."

The barrister did not argue the matter further. He only said: "Perhaps you can help me thus far, as I am very anxious to meet Mr. Pyne. About how long is it since the last letter came for him?"

"But, certainly. It came yesterday. It was re-addressed from some place in London. If possible, with the next one I will keep watch for Mr. Pyne."

So Mrs. Hilmer had not misled him. The so-called Pyne was in Monte Carlo, but had possibly disguised himself under another name. Again did Brett consult the hotel register, this time with the aid of the vendors' list in the Springbok Mine, but without result.

There was nothing for it but to familiarise himself with Monte Carlo and its habitués, awaiting developments in the chase of Pyne. In January, when London alternates between fog and sleet, it is not an intolerable thing to remain in forced idleness amidst the sunshine and flowers of the Riviera. There are two ways of "doing" Monte Carlo. You may live riotously, lose your substance at the Casino, and go home on a free ticket supplied by the proprietors of the gambling saloons, or you may enjoy to the utmost the keen air, magnificent scenery, fine promenades, and excellent music—the two latter provided by the same benevolent agency.

It is needless to say which of these alternatives appealed to Reginald Brett. Being a rich man, it was of no consequence to him to lose a five-pound note in backing the red for a five minutes' bit of excitement. Being a sensible one, he then quitted the Casino and went for a stroll in the gardens.

Fashion, backed by the doctors, has decreed that no longer shall the northern littoral of the Mediterranean be the haven of rest for those afflicted with pulmonary complaints. Weak-chested and consumptive people are now banished to the windless icy altitudes of Switzerland; so of recent years a walk through Nice, Mentone, or Monte Carlo itself is not such a depressing experience as it was when every second person encountered looked to be a hopeless invalid.

A pigeon-shooting match was in progress at the base of the cliff, and, as Brett fell in with a friend who took a prominent part in local life, the two entered the club grounds to watch the contest.

At the moment a handsome, well set-up young Englishman was shooting off a tie with a Russian Count. A very pretty girl, with a delicate and refined beauty enhanced by a pleasant expression, was taking a most unfeminine interest in the slaughter of the pigeons by the Englishmen.

Her eyes spoke her thoughts. It was as if they said: "I do not want the birds to be killed, but I want a certain person to win."

Nine birds each had been grassed, and the Russian was growing impatient. The Englishman was cool, his fair backer keenly excited. The Count fired and missed his tenth. Up rose the Englishman's bird, and the girl could not restrain an impetuous "Now!"

The cynic was right. In the thirteenth round the Count alone scored.

Digitized by Google

So the Englishman missed also.

Amidst the buzz of comment that arose, Brett said to his companion: "What's going on?"

"This is the final tie in the International. It is a big prize, and each man has backed himself heavily. The two are Albert Mensmore and Count Bischkoff. That girl has taken all the nerve out of Mensmore. You will see that, bar accidents, he is a goner."

The cynic was right. In the thirteenth round the Count alone scored, and smiled largely in response to his antagonist's quaint congratulations. As for the girl, it was with difficulty that she restrained her tears.

"I think that we have witnessed a tragedy," said Brett's acquaintance as they walked off; and the barrister agreed with him. He was sorry for Mensmore and his pretty supporter. Mayhap the loss of the match meant a great deal to both of them.

That night he found by chance that Mensmore lived at the Hotel du Cercle. He met him in the billiard-room and tried to get him into conversation. But the young fellow was too miserable to respond to his advances. Beyond a mere civil acknowledgment of some slight act of politeness Brett could not draw him out.

Next morning he saw Mensmore again. If the man looked haggard the previous evening his appearance now was positively startling, that is, to one of Brett's keen powers of observation. Ninety-nine men out of a hundred would have seen that Mensmore had not slept well. Brett was assured that, for some reason, the other's brain was dominated by some overwhelming idea, and one which might eventuate in a tragic manner were it to be allowed to go on unchecked.

For some reason he took a good deal of interest in his unfortunate fellow-countryman, and determined to help him if the opportunity presented itself.

It came, with dramatic rapidity.

During dinner he noticed that Mensmore was in such a state of mental disturbance that he ate and drank with the air of one who is feverishly wasting time rather than replenishing his strength.

Soon after eight o'clock, at the hour when frequenters of the Casino go there in order to secure a seat for the evening's play, Mensmore quitted the dining-room. Brett unobtrusively followed him, and was just in time to see him enter the lift.

The barrister waited in the hall, having first secured his hat and overcoat from the bureau, where he happened to have left them.

Even whilst he noted the descending lift, in which he could see Mensmore, who had donned a light covert coat, the breast of which bulged somewhat on the left side, the hotel clerk came to him, triumphantly holding a letter.

"And now, Monsieur," cried the clerk, "we shall see what we shall see."

The missive was addressed to the mysterious Sydney H. Pyne, and had evidently been forwarded by the Sloane Square Post-Office.

With a clang the door of the lift swung open and Mensmore hastened out. Brett had to decide instantly betweeen the chance of seeing Pyne with his own eyes and pursuing the fanciful errand he had mapped out in imagination with reference to the stranger who so interested him.

"Thank you," he said to the clerk, "I am going to the Casino for an hour. You will greatly oblige me by keeping a sharp look-out for any one who claims this letter."

"Monsieur, it shall have my utmost regard."

The barrister had not erred in his surmise as to Mensmore's destination. The young man walked straight across the square and entered the grounds in which stands the famous Casino.

An excellent band was playing a selection from "The Geisha;" the well-kept promenades were fast filling with a fashionable throng; the silver radiance of the moon lighting up gardens, rocks, and sea might well have added the last link to the pleasant bondage that would keep any one from the gambling-saloon that night—but Mensmore heeded none of these things.

He passed the barrier, closely followed by Brett, ran up the steps, crossed the spacious foyer, and disappeared through the baize doors that guard the magnificent room in which roulette is played.

Round the centre table a fairly considerable crowd had already gathered. Several croupiers were installed on their platform seats, but there is something curiously fascinating for the gambler in the presence of others. It would seem to be an almost ridiculous thing for a man to stalk solemnly up to an empty table and stake his money on the chances of the game merely for the edification of the official in charge.

Brett entered the room soon after Mensmore, and saw the latter elbowing his way to a seat about to be vacated by a stout Spanish lady, who had rapidly lost the sum she allowed herself to stake each day.

She was one of those numerous players who bring to the Casino a certain amount daily, and systematically stop playing when they Both men rose simultaneously, the Italian grinning at a smart Parisienne.

Digitized by Google

have either lost their money or won a previously determined maximum.

This method, in fact, is the only one whereby even a rich individual can indulge in this costly pastime, and, at the same time, escape speedy ruin. With a fair share of luck it may be made to pay; with continuous bad fortune the loss is spread over such a period that common sense has some opportunity to rescue the victim before it is too late.

Reggie took up a position whence he could note the actions of the stranger in whom he was so interested. At first Mensmore staked nothing. He placed a small pile of gold, some £20, in front of him, and then he seemed to listen expectantly to the croupier's monotonous cry: "Vingt-sept, rouge, impair, passe," or "Dix-huit, noir, pair, manque," and so on; whilst the little ivory ball whizzed round the disc, and the long rake, with unerring skill, drew in or pushed forward the sum lost or won.

The dominant expression of Mensmore's face as he sat and listened was one of disappointment. Something for which he waited did not happen, and at last, with a tightening of his lips and a gathering sternness in his eyes, he placed five sovereigns on the red, the number previously called being 13.

Black won.

For the next three attempts, each time with a £5 stake on the board, Mensmore backed the red, but still the black won.

Next to him an Italian, betting in notes of a thousand francs each, had quadrupled his first bet by backing the black.

Both men rose simultaneously, the Italian grinning delightedly at a smart Parisienne, who joyously nodded her congratulations, the Englishman quiet, utterly unmoved, but slightly pallid.

He passed out into the foyer and stopped to light a cigarette. Brett noticed that his hand was steady, and that all the air of excitement had gone.

These were ill signs. There is no man so calm as he who has deliberately resolved to take his own life. That Mensmore was ruined, that he was hopelessly in love with a woman whom he could not marry, and that he was about to commit suicide Brett was as certain as though the facts had been proved before a coroner.

But this thing should not happen if he, Brett, could prevent it.

In the gardens the band was now playing one of Waldteufel's waltzes Mensmore listened to the fascinating melody for a moment before he strolled off to the left of the Casino.

He hesitated at the door of the writing-room, but he went on puffing furiously at his cigarette. A guard looked at him as he turned again to the left, and made for the shaded terraces overlooking the sea.

"A silent Englishman," thought the man; and he caught sight of Brett, also smoking, pre-occupied, and solitary.

"Another silent Englishman. Mon dieu! What miserable lives these English lead!"

And so the two vanished into the blackness of the foliage, while the frou-frou of silk on the promenade mingled with the soft laughter of the women, the modulated voices of the men, and the sweet strains of the music.

If it be true that extremes meet, then this was a night for a tragedy.

(To be continued.)

"Another silen Englishman. Mon dieu! What miserable lives the English lead!"

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY MAGAZINE.

In celebration of the birth of the twentieth century, - - - -

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE

comes out with a magnificent January number, crammed with fascinating features.

- - DON'T FORGET TO GET IT. - -

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT XMAS FESTIVITIES.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "The Keepers of the People," by Edgar Jepson, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. C. G. F. Chute, of 3 Belleville Avenue, Rathgar Road, Dublin. Attempts this week must deal with Stories about ANY SUBJECT, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, January 7th. Post-cards only, please.

Poor Old Chap!

UNCLE BARKER asked us all to dinner last Christmas, hinting at the same time that we should have a little surprise. We had!

As the principal dish was brought in, he said:

"Now, my dears, here is the biggest turkey on record, raised on my own bit of farm, too."

It certainly was an enormous bird, and for a long time it sturdily resisted the persuasions of the carving knife.

At length, just as our respected relative paused for breath, a deep and agonised voice broke from its mangled bosom.

"Oh, Barker, Barker! How can you treat me like this? Don't you remember how we used to play together when we were young?"

We gazed at one another in consternation, and it was several minutes before we remembered that cousin Bob was a bit of a ventriloquist.

C. G. F. C.

The Splodgers' Christmas Guest.

"MARIE, my dear, I forgot to tell you, I'm going to bring home a member of the club on Christmas Eve," said Mr. Splodgers, a few nights since.

"Club!" exclaimed the horrified Mrs. S. "What club? Pray, how long have you belonged to this precious club of yours unknown to your wife?"

"About four months, my love," said Splodgers, mildly. "I think you'll like the young fellow. He's very quiet, but only wants drawing a bit."

"I hate your quiet fellows!" exclaimed Mrs. S., spitefully. "At Christmas time I like somebody who's jolly."

"Well, he may rise to the occasion, you know, but I hope he won't."

"That's just like you, Splodgers. So selfish! You two will stick yourselves over the fire, and it will be jaw, jaw, jaw, all day long."

"I won't say but what you may be right," said Splodgers, evasively. "However, he's coming; and as he's under an obligation——"

"Obligation! What obligation, Mr. Splodgers?"

"Well, my dear, I hardly like to tell you. The fact is, there's a little matter of a bill——"

"Oh, Splodgers! Splodgers!" wailed his good lady. "This comes of keeping secrets from your wife. I'm sure this friend of yours is no good."

"Ahem! He's rather a downy customer, I must admit."

"And how much does he owe you, for goodness' sake?"

"I hope to get at least fourteen pounds after he's dressed."

"Do you mean to say, Splodgers, that he's going to sleep here, when we haven't got a room in which we can stuff him?"

"The kitchen will do very well," said Splodgers, calmly.

"The kitchen!" exclaimed Mrs. S., gasping.

"Certainly, my love. Where else would you stuff a goose, and the very finest which ever came out of a club?" And Splodgers chuckled.

A. W.

The Roast Not Required.

A LADY one Christmas in a country district was once expecting some friends to their Christmas dinner, but as she had forgotten to order a roast of beef the day previous when she had been in town, she asked the postman if he would be so kind as to do so on his way through.

But what was her astonishment to hear the postman exclaiming, as he handed her a post-card:

"You needna' bother; they're not comin'."

J. E.

No Escaping it.

A POPULAR minister in Fifeshire, in the good old times, used at Christmas to be inundated with hampers filled with good things. On one occasion an enormous turkey was sent to him by the thoughtful kindness of a neighbouring farmer, but as the minister's family had provided for their Christmas dinner, the bird was sent to the market and sold.

A passer-by seeing this fine specimen of poultry, said:

"What a splendid turkey! Just the thing for the minister's Christmas dinner!"

So to the minister it was again sent.

The provident wife sent it again to the market and sold it again for a handsome sum.

Another friend, similarly struck with the splendid proportions of the turkey, purchased it and sent it to the minister. The good woman, not wishing to fly in the face of Providence, said at last.

"It's clear that Providence means us to have this turkey," and with the approbation of the family it formed part of the Christmas dinner.

D. P. R.

Digitized by Google

His Own, After All!

IT was Christmas Eve, and Simpson sat in his easy-chair, in full enjoyment of bodily health and mental tranquility. He was a connoisseur of wines, with a predilection for port, and two years before had purchased a huge cask of his favourite beverage, which, for greater security, he had placed at the end of his cellar, and had built a wall right across, thus shutting it off completely from all prying eyes.

At length he rose, dressed, and entered the dwelling of his next-door neighbour, where he was invited to spend this Christmas Eve.

"Magnificent port, Mr. Smith," he said, as he emptied his glass. "May I inquire where such rare old stuff is procurable?"

"Well, Mr. Simpson," answered the host, "I'll let you into a secret, but you mustn't tell anyone! I was making some alterations in my cellar a few months ago, and came across a cask of port, which the previous tenant had walled up, and, stupid fool! left when he vacated the house. This is some of it, but, unfortunately, we are into the last bottle, else you would have had some with you."

And Mr. Simpson's mental tranquility was sadly disturbed; but he wisely said nothing.

W. I.

He Wanted his Xmas Box.

As Mr. Squires stood on the doorstep, a seedy-looking individual, wearing a ragged suit and a red nose, came up the garden path and addressed him thus:

"Merry Christmas, guv'nor."

"Same to you, my good man," said Mr. Squires. "What can I do for you?"

"Well, guv'nor, I've called fer me Christmas box."

"Hum! I don't seem to know you. Are you the dustman?"

"No, guv'nor, I'm the bloke who were playing the cornet last Christmas, an' yer told me to take my bloomin' hook."

"Oh! you played the cornet did you!" said Mr. Squires, in a threatening voice. "And why should I give you a Christmas box, eh?"

"Becos I ain't playing it this Christmas, guv'nor."

And Mr. Squires stumped up. J. W.

That Christmas Eve!

LAST Christmas Eve a friend of mine invited me home to spend Christmas with him among his domestic circle.

"Charming place," he said. "Quite in the country. You will thoroughly enjoy yourself."

On Christmas Eve the usual festivities were kept up in the city, and it was late when we left our convivial companions for our jaunt to the suburbs. By a singular coincidence the train landed us at the wrong station, and we had a long muddy midnight walk in country lanes.

At last we arrived at our destination, but were surprised to see that no midnight oil was burning.

On examining closer my friend espied a board at the gate, and with the aid of a match read thereon:

"This charming residence for sale."

Then my friend's fickle memory came back to him with full force.

"Good heavens!" he exclaimed in despairing accents, "we moved to Richmond last week."

A. B.

A £10 Note for a Single Word.

THIS is the biggest price ever paid for literary matter. Kipling has received a shilling a word for his stories; other authors of high repute have at times received nearly as much.

But Ten Pounds for a single word—a word that is capable of being thought of by anybody—is absolutely a new record in big prices.

The word we want from you is simply

THE TITLE OF A NEW PAPER

we shall publish in the early spring.

The title of this paper must be expressed in one word. The shorter, the easier, and the more expressive, the better.

It is necessary, of course, in order that you may choose the best title, for you to know something about the proposed paper.

In the first place, it will be a

FIRST-CLASS HUMOROUS PAPER.

It will be filled each week with the work of the very best humorous artists in the United Kingdom, and will, in consequence, be a week's compendium of hearty, wholesome and unrestrained laughter.

The Editor of the BIG BUDGET is going to be responsible for the new paper, and he will offer a few more remarks for your guidance concerning it in the Century Number of the BIG BUDGET, ready on January 3rd.

Before trying for that £10 note, therefore, it would be advisable for you to purchase this great Century Number of the "B.B." As, however, the number printed is limited, and there will be a big demand for it, you should order a copy at once.

OBTAINABLE AT ALL NEWSAGENTS, SHOPS, AND BOOKSTALLS.

Digitized by Google

The Curate of Crimpington Skateport.

CRIMPINGTON SKATEPORT is a seaside village in the far west of England. It is situated on the north coast where the long Atlantic rollers break magnificently on stretches of gleaming sand, with a roar like distant artillery.

There is a resemblance between Skateport and a famous piece of poetical furniture, which was

Contrived a double debt to pay,
A bed by night, a chest of drawers by day.

For three parts of the year Skateport was a highly-favoured fishing village. For the fourth quarter it was a locally fashionable watering-place in good odour. It had a funny little stone pier, which commenced running out to sea with such stolidity, and solidity, you thought it was going right across to America, but got alarmed after about eighty yards or so, turned abruptly to the right, and presently broke off short.

The houses gathered in close round the sweep of the bay like children going to near the water's edge as they dare. The children, however, have the advantage of being able to run away if the wave breaks further than usual. The houses could not run, and consequently, especially in the winter, were often up to their knees in water.

The church, fortunately, was placed on somewhat higher ground, possibly because its tower was used as a lighthouse to guide the small fishing-fleet to port, and so escaped these inundations, which would have done it considerable damage, for it was old and very dilapidated.

The fact was the vicar had been very neglectful. It was rumoured that, like his church, he wanted a tile or so. At any rate, his bishop had suspended him for his irregularities, and no wonder; for when his lordship came over to inquire into the state of the parish he found the vicar had got out of the way and left one of the churchwardens to do the honours.

From him the bishop learnt, on asking why the bells had been removed, that the vicar had taken them down at the request of the parishioners, who complained that they made such a noise of a Sunday morning that they could not sleep. Finding that there was no Sunday School, the bishop demanded why it was closed, and was informed that the farmers had objected to it for fear the poor folk's children should get to know as much as they did.

Further questioning elicited the fact that there was but one service on Sundays, and that sermons were not the rule, but the exception, because the vicar thought one good sermon now and then was better than a lot of bad ones running. Despite the consolatory explanation of the churchwarden that when there was no sermon the more respectable members of the congregation went and had a pint and a pipe at "The Ship," the bishop was so horrified that he suspended the vicar, and hence it was that my hero became the curate of Crimpington Skateport.

Their appearance was greeted with tittering and shy glances.

The Rev. Singleton Symes, curate of Crimpington Skateport, was a mild and amiable being, not too young to be marriageable, and not too old to be susceptible of the charms of the fair sex. In fact, he might still fairly be classed among the young men who are eligible as guests at humble "Kettledrums," if one may apply the fashionable term to very unpretentious social gatherings, where the oleaginous excellence of the crumpet vies with the crisp piquancy of the sally-lunn.

To be sure, the worthy Singleton had but a brief season of the wild excitement adumbrated in my last paragraph. Muffins and bohea came but as oases in the sahara of his existence. It was only during the watering-place season that he carried the tea-cake round in giddy circles, or crushed cup after cup of stimulating souchong. For the other nine months he sipped his solitary sloe and nibbled his lonely toast in his own abode.

Digitized by Google

He felt the change. He missed female society. He sighed for a heart that would share his humble home, and sew on his schismatic buttons, for it was one of his peculiarities—due, perhaps, to the vigour wherewith his landlady-laundress wielded her iron—that he constantly shed those small mother-of-pearl discs as though they were intended to punctuate the affairs of life. He had never recovered the graces of his delivery from the time when, in the midst of a passionate burst of eloquence, he had cast one of the buttons of his shirt front, and it fell on the bald head of the dozing clerk, who woke up with a loud and distinctive "Amen" that brought Singleton's sermon to a premature close.

It will not, therefore, surprise my readers to learn that Singleton Symes, B.A., was on the look out for a wife. The only difficulty was that, in consequence of the tenuity of his salary, it was necessary that he should find one with a little money; and, strange to say, heiresses, and especially heiresses who would be likely to bestow their hands on middle-aged curates of not too prepossessing loveliness, were not as plentiful as periwinkles at Crimpington Skateport, even in the height of the fashionable season.

The hour came at last—and the woman. Our Singleton's waiting was rewarded, and he learnt that there was a deep truth in the assertion of his favourite poet, that

> No one is so accursed of fate,
> No one so utterly desolate;
> But some heart, though unknown,
> Responds unto his own.

Miss Everilda Matilda Docwra came down on a visit to some friends staying at Skateport. Now Everilda was the heiress of the late Ebenezer Docwra, who had been an eminent drysalter. She was, it must be admitted, not as young as she had been, but who of us is, my brothers and sisters? At any rate, she was not too old for Singleton, and, better still, she apparently did not think he was too old for her, though their courtship was commenced by her coming to him to seek the advantage of "his larger experience and superior knowledge to a poor, ignorant girl" on some not very important theological question.

Everilda was very romantic. She quoted—and even allowed it to be whispered that she wrote—a good deal of poetry. Indeed, she blushingly admitted that some lines in her album, which were greatly admired by Singleton, were a humble effort of hers. The effort must have taxed her memory rather than her invention, for the poem began with

> The sea, the sea, the bounding sea,
> The green, the grand, the fine, the free.

Her poetical instincts and her sentiment were unfortunately backed up by an acquaintance with nature and natural phenomena, her deficiency in this respect being probably due to her long residence in Camomile Street, where the paternal business had been carried on. Under those circumstances we may fairly forgive her for asking in the autumn, of one of the fishermen's wives, "if there were any nightingales in the neighbourhood."

It so happens that the bird is unknown in the extreme west, so the woman did not understand the question. Everlida explained that she meant a kind of bird that sings during the night, whereupon she was told they swarmed up in the ivy at the abbey ruins on the cliff, and made such a noise at night that the people close by couldn't sleep for them sometimes. The woman added, however, that these birds were known in that neighbourhood by the name of "ooles" (owls).

So the swain sat with his legs dangling over the cliff, and tootled away plaintively.

But if this had been the only mistake into which Everilda fell on account of her cockney rearing it would not have been of much consequence. It was nearly leading her into a serious danger. To avoid the tittering and sly glances with which the youthful and heedless among the visitors to Skateport were wont to greet the appearance of Everilda and Singleton on the parade and sands in front of the village, the lovers were in the habit of meeting at a point some distance along the coast westward, whither Everilda would go along the sands, while Singleton took the longer and more tiring route by the cliff, in order not to attract attention to their rendezvous.

Between the village and their trysting-place there was a little bay, the headlands inclosing which ran out so far that the rising tide, soon after its turn, imprisoned any incautious wanderer between the two capes. Luckily there was a sort of rocky islet in the centre of the bay, between the headlands, which was never covered except in very rough weather and at very high tides. In this trap poor Everlida was caught one evening.

She had been late in starting for the rendezvous, and it being a fine, calm evening, had loitered somewhat on the road, so that when she reached the western-point she found herself cut off by the tide, and on looking back found her retreat stopped in a similar way at the other extremity of the bay.

Digitized by Google

Her alarm at first was immense. In fact it was not allayed until Singleton, growing anxious at her failing to keep tryst, and supposing she had been prevented from coming by the rise of the tide, passed by on his disconsolate road home along the cliff, and discovered her plight.

He was able to assure her there was no danger, though not without difficulty, and many relapses into want of faith on her part. He directed her to the little rocky islet, and then proposed going to Skateport and taking a boat to fetch her off. But to this she objected with tears and shrieks.

"Singleton, do not leave me! I should die if I were all alone by myself!"

He explained to her the length of time she would have to wait until the tide released her; but she declared that if he stayed near her the length of her imprisonment was nothing, but that she would expire of fright if left alone for five minutes.

"And if," she added fondly, "the tide should rise and carry me off, you will leap from the cliff and let us perish together, won't you?"

Singleton promised, but he said it was Saturday evening, and he did not see how service could be performed next day, supposing he did jump. He knew by experience the difficulty of getting a substitute in this remote part of the county. And he knew, too, what odd things arose from such substitution, for the last time he had occasion to be absent from Skateport on a Sunday, he had at the last moment prevailed on an old college friend, curate in an agricultural parish a few miles off, and that gentleman had preached a sermon, in which he described the congregation as a nest of sheepstealers, robbers, liars, and ruffians, to the intense surprise and indignation of the worthy Skateporters, until he, seeing the effect of his discourse, told them parenthetically that they must not take any notice of the sermon, which he had written for his own parish, and brought away by mistake instead of another.

The whole thing was explained in a minute.

But to return to our lovers. In as tender a strain as it was possible to maintain an affectionate conversation at the same pitch as you would hail a boat, Singleton cheered his Everilda, and she besought him not to leave her.

The evening shades gathered fast, and the increasing gloom was rapidly snatching Singleton from the anxious gaze of his love, when he fortunately remembered that he had his flute in his pocket. He at once drew it forth, and discoursed upon it such soothing airs as he could achieve without the notes to guide him. So the swain sat with his legs dangling over the cliff, and tootled away plaintively through the weary hours of darkness, while his beloved, reclining on the rock, reposed as comfortably as was compatible with the presence of multitudes of sharp-pointed limpets on her stony couch.

The tide receded at last, and at last the grey of morning creeping up the sky gave sufficient light to guide Everilda's homeward steps. Singleton, feeling somewhat hungry and flatulent after his sixtieth repetition of "The Last Rose of Summer," varied as it had been by the uncertainty about the correct notes, put his flute in his pocket, and turned his face towards Crimpington. During all the long hours of their vigil nobody—not even a coastguard—had come near them.

Of course Everilda's friends had been much alarmed about her absence and were glad to see her back in safety.

That day Everilda consented to reward her Singleton's constancy, and agreed to become his wife in a fortnight's time. Singleton could hardly read the service for agitation, and as for his sermon he made so many blunders in reading it that he enunciated about a dozen heresies without knowing it.

How bright the future looked now. The last button he was ever to shed dropped from its hold unnoticed as he strained his Everilda to his palpitating shirt-front in the first embrace permitted him as her future husband.

He found that button in his Wellington boot that night, and placed it on the mantel-piece with an air of reverence, as if it were the last offering to Venus Coelibum, or whatever deity it is that harasses single men.

Alas, the proverbial slip between cup and lip! The invariable disturbance of the course of true love could not be spared the curate of Crimpington Skateport.

On the very morning after his heart had been gladdened by the whispered consent of his blushing, if not beauteous Everilda, as he was sitting at breakfast wrapped in dreams of bliss, there came a knock at his door, which was immediately opened without waiting for a summons by a ragged and disreputable-looking figure, which brought in with it an odour of spirits and stale tobacco-smoke, as if it were the incarnation of the parlour of the pothouse.

Singleton's face fell, and so bitter was the grief and humiliation it expressed that we will, if you please, let the curtain fall, too, and begin another chapter.

Everilda was sitting on the parapet of the pier, indulging in roseate visions, when she beheld her Singleton approaching in the distance. With the pretty playfulness of girlhood, she hid behind the stock of an anchor. He had not seen her, and she would surprise him.

Digitized by Google

Instead of that, however, he surprised her. As he was passing the Dolphin, one of the lowest and most disreputable beershops in the village, he suddenly paused, and after looking cautiously round to see if he was observed, disappeared through the door whence proceeded loud sounds of boisterous and drunken revelry.

At first Everilda wondered, but upon reflection she began to conjecture that he had entered the house to rebuke the fishermen for their dissipation, in his character as clergyman of the place. She waited for him to come out, but he did not emerge immediately. The noise, which had somewhat abated on his entrance, soon broke out with increased loudness. At last, to her horror and shame, Everilda saw his familiar figure come staggering out at the door. He clutched at the post to steady himself, then took two steps, broke into a sort of shambling run, and fell down on his face.

Everilda fled down a by-street to conceal her humiliation and anger. She was so overcome that she could not venture back to her friends for some time. When she did she found paterfamilias looking very grave. He requested a few words with her in private, and on her acceding to his request told her it was his painful duty to inform her that, a short time before her return, the Rev. Singleton Symes had been carried past the house by some fishermen, shouting, swearing, and singing, and evidently in a dreadful state of intoxication. Miss Docwra at once related what she had seen, and on the completion of her recital was seized with a violent fit of hysterics. For the rest of the day she did not leave her room.

Next morning as she was preparing to go out to do some shopping in a small way, the door opened, and in walked the Rev. Singleton Symes, looking as fresh and clean as a new pin. The hypocrisy was too flagrant. Everilda rushed past him with averted face, and before he could recollect his sentence, paterfamilias had rushed in, and, as it were, blown him off the premises amid a whirlwind of abuse and indignation.

Singleton went home disconsolate and wrote to Everilda to ask for an explanation. His note was returned unopened. He wrote to paterfamilias, and again received back his communication, this time with a verbal message to the effect that if he did not leave off the annoyance, he should be reported to his bishop, and unfrocked! Then he broke down completely. For the next two or three days he was utterly prostrate, and did not stir out of doors.

There were not in all Crimpington and within twenty miles round it two more miserable people than Everilda Docwra and Singleton Symes.

To make matters worse Skateport began to talk, and when Skateport did begin to talk it always gave evidence of its possession of a powerful imagination for which no one would ever have given it the slightest credit. Some oozings of the truth as to the vigil of the lovers, and of Singleton's drunken fit, having trickled through the village, the most extraordinary stories were told. Singleton had decoyed Everilda to the beach and tried to run away with her to America in an open boat. He had harnessed a horse to her bathing-machine and attempted an elopement. He had offered, and been refused, and had therefore taken to drinking.

This last story gathered force in a strange way, for respectable inhabitants, who were superior to a taste for scandal, shook their heads at it and reluctantly said they had seen the curate reeling about the town after dark, though he certainly maintained an appearance of sobriety during the day.

Of course, nobody said a word to Singleton about this; but he found himself strangely avoided, and the next Sunday could not but notice a falling-off in the attendance at church. He went home, and, laying his head on his arms beside his untasted dinner, fairly wept.

"My fate! my cruel fate! Am I to be driven from this dear spot, too? Must I leave the place where my heart is planted?" sighed the curate.

That afternoon, as Everilda was stealing a mouthful of fresh air on the least-frequented portion of the beach, she saw Singleton approaching. There was no shelter at hand, no means of avoiding him. She must do that which is so painful to every well-regulated mind, even when it is absolutely necessary—she must give him the cut direct. He looked at her pleadingly, imploringly, but her eyes were stoney, and fixed. He shed a tear and a wrist-button—in vain!

She had barely passed him six steps when behold, from behind a boat lying beached close by, arose another Singleton Symes—a blear-eyed, red-nosed, dirty and unkempt double of the curate.

She screamed. Singleton rushed back, spoke a few hasty and angry words in his wrath, and then—well then all was over. The whole thing was explained in a minute. The double was his disreputable, drunken brother, who was always hunting the poor curate down, however often he changed his parish. He came ragged and penniless, and simple Singleton had given him his second best suit of clothes and all the money he could spare.

The scapegrace then promised to quit the place, but Singleton, as he passed the Dolphin, had recognised his voice, and had gone in and insisted on his leaving. Had Everilda fled less precipitately she would have seen the curate come out, after having stayed a minute to caution the landlord of the Dolphin about the irregularities he allowed in his house.

But the reprobate knew better than to leave his brother's neighbourhood. He hung about it still, only appearing at dusk, and his sudden appearance from behind the boat, where he had been basking in the sun, meant another raid upon Singleton's slender purse.

It was all cleared up now, and in another week Singleton and his Everilda were married. And the first use she made of her position as a wife was to give her disreputable brother-in-law a free passage to Australia, with a bonus of fifty pounds, deposited with the captain, and not to be given to him till after the ship had sailed.

That was the last of him—and this is the last of our curate of Crimpington Skateport. That cure is now in the charge of the Rev. Diogenes Bilberry, of St. Bridget's College, Cambridge. But elsewhere in the "Clergy List," to which I am indebted for the last bit of information, you will find that the Rev. Singleton Symes, M.A., is vicar of Pippinston-cum-Cheeseby, value £700.

And if you read the most interesting portion of THE TIMES, you will no doubt have noticed announcements to the effect that the wife of the vicar of Pippinston-cum-Cheeseby has presented a son and heir to the ex-curate of Crimpington Skateport.

HERBERT ANGELL.

Digitized by Google

JOHN MURGATROYD'S AWAKENING.

At the news that John Murgatroyd had married, all the world wondered—that is, all John Murgatroyd's world — the world of finance, of the Stock Exchange. And when it was discovered that Mrs. Murgatroyd had been an actress, and was, moreover, twenty years younger than her husband, who was forty-five, the world wondered still more.

For John Murgatroyd was such a practical man, and the pretty butterfly which had fluttered from its most impractical calling into the stockbroker's life, could be of no assistance to him therein, that is to say, from John Murgatroyd's own point of view.

Those who had seen Mrs. Murgatroyd described her as a golden-haired, blue-eyed, fascinating little fairy, with all the vivacity of her calling, and with a taste for dainty confections in the way of dress. That was immediately after her marriage. Others who saw her later spoke of her with less enthusiasm.

She was certainly golden-haired, they said, but instead of that hair hanging in clustering ringlets about her forehead it was unbecomingly dressed and brushed straight back from her face. Her eyes were blue, but they lacked warmth and animation, while her manner was subdued and without charm.

To John Murgatroyd was due the metamorphosis. Though a fit of midsummer madness—one of those lapses which even the most practical men get at times—had caused him to make the pretty actress his wife, in the stockbroker's utilitarian career the beautiful held no place.

He had never yet awakened to its necessity. Creatures only made to flutter in the sunshine, to gladden the eye and refresh the senses, were mere drones in the world's hives. John would have none of them. So ere the honeymoon was well over, he proceeded to change his butterfly into a bee, forgetting always that the bee might have a sting.

Elaine—that was Mrs. Murgatroyd's name—rebelled for a time, then gradually the petrifying process of the stockbroker's system seemed to have its effect. One by one the little arts which she had adopted to make the home beautiful were discontinued, and instead of sitting down to the piano of an evening and endeavouring by song and music to soothe him into forgetfulness of the friction between the nations, the wars and the rumours of wars, and such kindred matters which swing the pendulum of the speculator's hopes and fears, she seemed content to spend the time over his books, puzzling her poor little head with figures and similar duties, which well might have been left to others.

Strange to say, when the metamorphosis was complete, and Elaine had become as undemonstrative and apparently as practical as himself, John was not altogether as pleased with his handiwork as he had anticipated. He would not have admitted the fact for the world. That he had so effectually moulded her nature to his own was pleasing to his vanity, but deep down in his heart there was a feeling of dissatisfaction, why or with whom he was not yet sure.

Clearer ideas upon the subject came to him in time, and for them the trouble in the Far East was accountable. Certain Chinese railway stocks in which he was largely interested suddenly went down with a run. When the International forces had crushed the Boxers and reduced the country once more to order, John thought they would right themselves. In the meantime he had determined to hold on.

As a consequence, for some time money would be very "tight" with him, so "tight" indeed that it would need every penny he could scrape together to tide him over the present crisis.

One evening on his arrival home he mentioned the matter to Elaine.

"So you see we must cut down expenses in every possible way," he concluded, "and as you have plenty of leisure during the day don't you think we could dispense with one of the servants?"

Mrs. Murgatroyd gave rather a bitter smile. For a long time past she had been practically doing work which would have kept a secretary fairly well employed. Still, she did not remind him of the fact, but replied calmly:

"By dismissing a servant the actual saving would be slight, and although I am quite willing to take on the extra work, I think I can suggest a better course."

"What is it?" he asked dubiously. There was something in his wife's manner which made him uneasy.

"Oh, it is perfectly practical," with the slightest suspicion of a sneer in her tones. "This morning I received a letter from Florence Cabourne. You remember her; she was the leading lady who succeeded me in the company in which I was playing when we first met."

Mr. Murgatroyd nodded.

"Well, she has been in the company ever since, but

Digitized by Google

The Old Method and the New

Not without good reason is the present age termed the age of progress. Progress, marked and rapid, is the order of the day in every department of life, including, of course, our domestic and culinary arrangements. For instance, when our grandmothers wished to prepare Jellies for the table, they worked and worried with a multiplicity of materials, and after straining and flavouring and experimenting, the effort frequently ended in failure. To-day the modern housewife with her packet of Chivers' Jelly, produces in a short time, with a minimum expenditure of trouble and money, a dainty and wholesome dessert that is a pleasure both to look upon and to taste. Clear, sparkling, and with the fragrance and exquisitely delicate flavour of fruits, Chivers' Gold Medal Jellies are indeed a delight to the eye and palate. To the purity and freshness of the materials employed in their production, as well as the ideal conditions of cleanliness and economy prevailing in Messrs. Chivers' factory, may be attributed the unique reputation and popularity of these celebrated delicacies. Dr. Gordon Stables, R.N., says: "Messrs. Chivers have come to the front with Jellies which really add to our health and luxury. No home is complete without these pure and excellent Jellies." A Baptist minister writes: "My wife considers your Jellies perfection, and I fully endorse her opinion." A London lady writes: "In trying Chivers' and . . . Jellies last week to see which I would prefer for my stall, I bought a packet of each, and found Chivers' infinitely better, both as to freshness of taste and clearness."

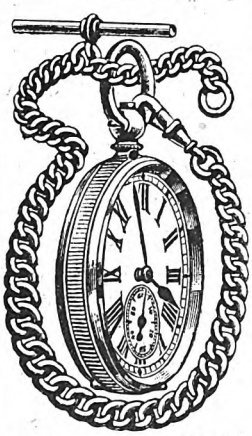
Chivers' Gold Medal Jams and Table Jellies are sold by Grocers and Stores throughout the United Kingdom. Insist on being supplied with Chivers'. A free sample packet of Jelly will be sent on receipt of post-card, S. Chivers and Sons, Histon, Cambridge.

SEND NO MONEY. WE TRUST YOU.

FREE.



£2 10s. £2 10s.
REAL SILVER.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1s. 6d. each. (Regular price 2s. 6d.)

WE DO NOT WANT YOUR MONEY.

Just send us a STAMPED ADDRESSED ENVELOPE, and say that you will either sell the Jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the Jewellery.

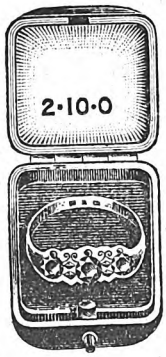
When sold, send us the 13s. 6d. you have received for same, and we will at once send you, Absolutely Free, our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch, with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A Written Guarantee for Ten Years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1s. 6d. each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

SEND NO MONEY. WRITE TO-DAY.

FREE.



REAL GOLD AND REAL DIAMONDS.

BRITISH GOLDSMITHS CO (DEPT. 29), 48 GRAY'S INN RD., LONDON.

A SUM of from 12s. to 25s. per week can be earned in spare hours or evenings by either sex everywhere.—Send addressed envelope for particulars to Box 24, Eclipse Works, 89 Aldersgate Street, E.C.

NOSE Wintry weather makes Red Noses I cure the n. Send 1/- for my book on "Their Cause and Prevention," or 3/9 for Medically approved Cure. Particulars of my Patent Nose Improver and Ear Machine sent for stamp.—C. LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle Street, Liverpool.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.

THE MARSTON CO.,
59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

THE ONLY EFFICACIOUS SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(Really Genuine). In Patent Air-tight Tins.

½-lb., 1/4; 1-lb., 2/4; 2-lb., 4/-, including Tin & Postage.

Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, DEVON.

AND NEURALGIA Cured

by a Simple, Safe, and Speedy Remedy. A Zox Powder can be taken anywhere, at any time, and with any liquid, with wonderful results. Two free Sample Powders to any reader of Short Stories sending stamped addressed envelope for same to

The ZOX Co., 11 Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

SPECIAL OFFER TO READERS OF "SHORT STORIES."

GOLD CLUSTER RING (Stamped)

3/9 Post Free.
Send size of finger.

with a fine imitation Ruby Sapphire, or Emerald centre surrounded by 12 Real Pearls. Orders for these rings sent off by return post. H. E. JONES, Manufacturing Jeweller, The Junction, Hulme, Manchester.

Unsolicited testimonial of this ring.

Lincoln, December, 1900.

Dear Sir,—I received the ring this morning, with thanks to you; it is very pretty.—Yours respectfully, M. P.

Bankers: Williams, Deacon, Manchester and Salford Bank Ltd.

Mention Short Stories.

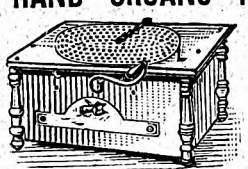
HAND ORGANS FROM 20s.



Made in three sizes, in black and gold case. Full tone. Six metal tunes, plays all songs; hymns, or dance music. Sent on receipt of 4s. P.O., if desired, balance 4s. monthly. Send for list of tunes, prices, &c. ATLAS CO., 185 High Street, Camden Town, London; 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; and 14 High Road, Kilburn.

Don't Cough-use

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves.
Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

Keating's Lozenges

FREE. FREE

Our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch (with chain), or A Real Gold Ring Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

SEND NO MONEY.

NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money.

Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A WRITTEN GUARANTEE for TEN years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents. Send no money. Write to-day.

BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 5). 282 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

Digitized by Google

now writes to say she is relinquishing the engagement, which is rather a good one, as you know. What do you say to my applying for it?"

The stockbroker's face fell. The idea of his wife returning to the profession, with all the temptations connected therewith, filled him with dismay. Still, as a practical man, with a reputation as such to keep up, he could not give voice to it. The salary she had received had been a considerable one, and Elaine was quite as capable of looking after herself now as before, so after a pause, in which unknown to himself she had been watching him closely, he said:

"Although, as you know, I strongly disapprove of your late profession, yet, as the money would be extremely useful just now, it would be absurd to let any personal prejudice stand in the way."

Her eyes flashed.

"Then I may offer myself for the engagement?"

"You may," he said.

The application for the coming vacancy proved successful. "Miss Elaine Trelawny," as she would appear on the bills and programmes, had been a very clever actress, and her old manager was only too pleased to have her back. So it came about that shortly John Murgatroyd resumed his bachelor existence.

The stockbroker never paid money without taking care that he received value in full, consequently his personal comfort was as well looked after and the household duties as well performed as before his wife went away, yet he missed her at every turn.

The house, too, of whose solid, unadorned comfort he had been rather proud, seemed suddenly to have acquired both emptiness and ugliness. So one day, when stocks had taken a favourable turn, he astonished his servants by the introduction of a cartload of artistic furniture, while the piano, which was of ancient make and doubtful tone, was exchanged for a dainty instrument befitting a lady's boudoir.

Even there he did not stop. Other changes equally startling followed. A conservatory was built out from the drawing-room. The monotonous stretch of greensward in front of the house was cut up into flower-beds, and rare and beautiful flowers set therein.

Why he did all this was as inexplicable to John himself as to others. The old lamps were growing dim, but his eyes were not yet accustomed to the brighter radiance of the new. Only vaguely he was beginning to realise that life might hold other interests, other pleasures than in watching the rise and fall of the money market. In the interim, mechanically almost but with a growing pleasure in the doing, he went on beautifying his home. When he had finished he wrote for Elaine to return. Two days later her answer came.

"You ask me to come back to you," she wrote. "Being a practical man, you will forgive me if I decline. When I married you I was young and romantic, and in spite of my calling, which does not, perhaps, foster domestic virtues, with high ideals as to a wife's duties. I am still young, but the romance is dead, killed like my ideals, by you. Before we had been married a month, to my sorrow I discovered it was not a wife you wanted, but an amanuensis. Perhaps in time I might have accepted my fate at least with resignation had you been satisfied with this, but you were not.

"I had a liking for all that was bright and beautiful in life. That was in your eyes a sin, one to be remorselessly purged away. Existence for me must be made as sordid as your own, and yours is very sordid, John. I was, as I have said, romantic; so much so that for a time it even covered your faults with a cloak of love. You taught me that this was folly, that in real life there was no romance. To be brief, you made me as matter-of-fact as yourself.

"Now mark the result. In this company there is a gentleman—a young fellow—much about the same age as myself, good-looking, clever, with tastes similar to my own, and one who, moreover, loves me to distraction. He has been offered an extremely remunerative engagement abroad, which offer will be made a joint one if he has a wife. He has asked me to accompany him, to enable him in fact to say, 'Give me a joint engagement.' After the training I have received from you, to look at all things from a purely practical point of view, can you blame me if I have said 'Yes?' You cannot."

That was all she said. There was no word of regret, no farewell.

John Murgatroyd dropped the letter to the ground with a groan, and as the sheet of perfumed paper fluttered earthwards the scales fell from his eyes. He had changed his butterfly into a bee—for what? Only that it might turn and sting him; and, worse than all, it was the butterfly which he had loved. The letter had reached him by the morning's post. Evening came and found him still shut up with it in his study.

For the first time for twenty-five years, Sundays and holidays excepted, he had not visited his office. Messages, telegraphic and verbal, had come to him requiring immediate attention, but like one in a dream he had sat hour after hour thinking, reflecting, regretting. Towards night out of the chaos of his mind a resolve shaped itself. He would go to the town where she was and try to persuade her to alter her determination.

The decision, once formed, he proceeded with feverish haste to put it into excution, and cramming a few things into a bag, he hurried out of the house. He was crossing the lawn when in the uncertain light he came in contact with someone coming from the opposite direction, someone who uttered a little shriek of alarm, and the next moment was folded in his arms.

"Elaine! Elaine! Is it you?" he cried.

The little figure, which he was clasping tightly to his breast, made no effort to extricate itself.

"You would not think of acting like this to anyone else, I should think, John. But," noticing his bag, "where were you going?"

"I was going to you."

"Why?"

"Need you ask? I was going to beg of you to forgive me—to come home. But you," uneasily, "why have you come, after——"

"After what I said in my letter?" A smile played about her lips. "It's a woman's privilege to change her mind, John."

"Then you have changed it?" he cried eagerly.

"Not so fast, John. I'm not sure that you will wish me to stop when you know all."

"What do you mean?" keen anxiety in his tones.

"I mean that I've deceived you all along. I pretended that I had lost all my romance, all my ideals, and become practical and horrid generally. But you've not altered me a bit, John, and when I pretended you had it was just a ruse, like my letter, to alter you, for you need it sadly. Now, do you want me to stay?"

"More than ever, my darling," he cried passionately. "I never knew how dull and dreary my life was till you showed me what it might have been."

"What it will be, John," she corrected softly.

HUBERT BARTLETT.

Digitized by Google

TO LADIES!

THE LADY'S MAGAZINE, 6d.
PUBLISHED THURSDAY, JANUARY 10th.

A NEW MAGAZINE FOR YOU!

Messrs. C. Arthur Pearson will welcome the opening of the new Century by the Publication of a new Illustrated Magazine devoted entirely to Feminine Interests, entitled:

The Lady's Magazine

It will have a dainty appearance, the illustrations and printing will be above criticism, altogether THE LADY'S MAGAZINE will be worthy in every respect of the distinction of being the first of the new Century's Magazines.

Mr. HALL CAINE'S NEW NOVEL,

"THE ETERNAL CITY,"

will open with a generous instalment in the first issue, and will appear in THE LADY'S MAGAZINE alone in serial form. This story is full of human interest. Rome, the City which has been so intimately connected with the history of Western Civilisation, and is still the centre of the religious life of the greater portion of Christendom, is the scene of Mr. Hall Caine's remarkable novel. It will, we think, be generally acknowledged that of all the good work this popular novelist has done, "THE ETERNAL CITY" is the best.

A Unique Series of Articles will also commence in No. 1, by

The Late Mrs. W. E. GLADSTONE.

Contributions will also appear in the first issue from

MADAME SARAH GRAND. | LADY HODGSON.
MAX PEMBERTON. | MRS. NEISH.

Articles will also appear regularly on Fashion, TOILET, COOKERY, ART, DRAMA, MUSIC, LITERATURE, and those thousand and one things a woman wants to know.

REMEMBER! It is published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON Ltd. No. 1 appears Jan. 10 ORDER IT!

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S WEEKLY

FOOTBALL CLUB PICTURES.

1st Prize - - £50 in Gold.

FIRST LIST.

2nd Prize - - - - £10 Note
3rd, 4th, and 5th Prizes - 3 £5 Notes
6th to 20th Prizes - 15 Sovereigns
21st to 40th Prizes - 20 Half-Sovs.

Below will be found ten pictures; each picture representing the name of a football club.

If you look at the picture in the margin you will see that the name is Blackburn Rovers. What are the other names?

If you cannot find all the names, ask your friends to help you.

All you have to do is to write underneath each picture, in the space provided, the name of the club you believe the picture to represent. The names are those of both Rugby and Association clubs.

Where the names of two clubs embody the same town, but with a different addition, the full title is indicated in the picture.

The prizes will be paid to the competitors from whom we receive the correct, or most nearly correct, solutions.

No more than one prize will go to any competitor.

Example.

Blackburn Rovers.

It must be taken as a condition of the competition that anybody competing therein agrees to abide by the Editor's final decision.

Intending competitors in the above would do well to procure a copy of "The Football Who's Who," which contains the names of most of the big clubs. This book will be found of great service in discovering the names depicted. It only costs a shilling, and may be obtained of all booksellers, and post free for 1s. 3d. from the publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

No. 1..... No. 2..... No. 3..... No. 4..... No. 5.....

No. 6..... No. 7..... No. 8..... No. 9..... No. 10.....

I send in this coupon as a competitor for the prize advertised in this paper, and subject to the conditions printed on this page:

Name and address.....

THINGS TO REMEMBER.

1. Coupons may be sent either from "Pearson's Weekly" or "Short Stories."
2. Do not send in your coupons till we tell you.
3. All coupons are sent at senders' risk, and if they go astray, from whatever cause, we do not accept responsibility.
4. Competitors must attach their private address to their attempts. No prize will be sent to any post-office, refreshment rooms, or other places at which letters are called for. Attempts bearing such addresses will be disqualified.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

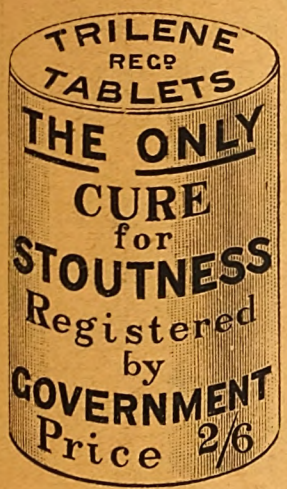
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.
Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.
"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Mrs. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st. and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.
"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 2lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me. "Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholme Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."
West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

Mrs. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced t is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mr. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

Mrs. DREW, of 1 Bellevue Gardens, The Nursery, Devizes, writes: "I took Tablets some years ago; they soon reduced me and I have not got stout since. Send me a box for my mother."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

INDIGESTION, although the most common, is possibly the most distressing ailment that affects humanity.

9 PEOPLE out of every ten suffer from it in its protean forms: Sick Headache, Biliousness, Flatulence, Palpitation of the Heart, Coated Tongue, Nervousness, etc., at different periods of their life.

OF the many remedies that have been introduced during the last fifty years, none have been found to effect such permanent cures as

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

1 DOSE affords relief, and one friend tells another, that Beecham's Pills are really "Worth a Guinea a Box."

Digitized by Google

TART OUR SPLENDID SERIAL STORY TO-DAY.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 628. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 12TH, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

A PIANOFORTE TUNER AND

DR TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

"ACCEPT MY APPRECIATION OF THE MARVELLOUS QUALITIES OF VI-COCOA."

MR. C. BARNARD, Pianoforte Tuner, 49 Shard's Road, Peckham: "After nearly four years' use of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, I cannot refrain from asking you to accept my appreciation of its marvellous qualities. My occupation at times needs the utmost care, the nervous tension being very severe; but I find from experience that your Vi-Cocoa is undoubtedly the finest I have yet met with. The experience of some dozen fellow-workers being the same induces me to write to you."

Indoubted purity and strength."—Medical Magazine. "In the front rank of really valuable foods."—Lancet.

FAVOURED BY THE HOMES AND HOSPITALS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

DAINTY SAMPLE TIN FREE.

ddress: Dr. TIBBLES' VI-COCOA Ltd., 60 BUNHILL ROW, LONDON, E.C

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

KAPUTINE

The Best & Safest Remedy for

HEADACHE.

NURSE HILL, of the London Association of Nurses, writes:

"I have seen Kaputine administered to many patients, and can truly say it is a remedy which should have a place in every household."

All Leading Chemists sell KAPUTINE, 1/-. Samples One Penny.

If your Chemist has not KAPUTINE send his name and address to KAPUTINE, HUDDERSFIELD, and we will send you a SHILLING PACKET FREE.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

CROSSE & BLACKWELL'S

4 PLATES OF SOUP FOR SIXPENCE

SOUP TABLETS

SOLD BY ALL GROCERS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

THE ENGLISH & WELSH COAL Co.,
SHAKESPEARE ST., MANCHESTER.
Deliver in Truck Load. Prices on application.
You will find it to your advantage to buy direct.

THE ONLY EFFICACIOUS SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.
DEVONSHIRE CREAM
(Really Genuine). In Patent Air-tight Tins.
¼-lb., 1/4; 1-lb., 2/4; 2-lb., 4/-, including Tin & Postage.
Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, DEVON.

A SUM of from 12s. to 25s. per week
can be earned in spare hours or evenings by either sex everywhere.—Send addressed envelope for particulars to Box 24, Eclipse Works, 89 Aldersgate Street, E.C.

NEW AUTOMATIC KNITTER
FOR HOME WORK.
"The machine that knitted the hosiery and comforts for the troops in Africa."—See what The Times said.
Knits Socks (a pair in 35 min.), Stockings, Fancy Goods, &c. Easily learned. Lessons Free.

15/- to 30/- Weekly

Cash, hire, and Work Terms from "Scores" dept.: 6 Southwark St., S.E.; 55 Oxford St., W.; 192 Upper St. London, N.; 105 Nicolson St., Edinburgh; 58 Union St., Glasgow; 122 Stephen's Green, Dublin; 62 Great Hampton St., Birmingham; 31 Stokes Croft, Bristol.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 628.] For the Week Ending January 12th, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

UNDER ORDERS

IN a shabby ground-floor room, which contrived to do duty as study, dining-room, nursery, and general sitting-room of a Vicarage in the East End of London, sat, one afternoon in late autumn, a mother and son. That most pathetic form of poverty—the kind which is linked in indissoluble union with gentility—had stamped this nondescript apartment for its own.

The wall paper had seen better days, and had lighted on exceptionally dingy ones; the ceiling was blackened with gas; the carpet had lost all trace of its original pattern; the drugget was copiously darned in places, where a threadbare condition recorded the track of footsteps; the horsehair seats of the mahogany chairs were deplorably worn at the edges, and the position of a railway rug in the very centre of a forbidding-looking sofa suggested the idea that rents or stains probably lurked beneath its friendly shade.

Little folks had left marks of their presence scattered here and there in the room. On the sideboard was a pile of copy-books, dog's-eared primers, and story books, flanked by an atlas; from behind a sofa bolster peeped a scantily-attired doll, with solemn, staring, blue eyes, hectic cheeks, and a battered head, whereon bald patches alternated with flaxen ringlets.

The house stood in a plot of unproductive land—by courtesy called a garden—which apparently furnished a recreation ground for a number of hens, which at the present moment derived a strange enjoyment from occupying holes, which they had scratched for themselves, in the earth beneath some decrepit shrubs. Beyond the garden stretched the streets and lanes of Whitechapel. Ceaseless street cries, mingled with the rattle of wheels, and the jingle of tram-car bells. "Third Edition—ECHO," shouted, in shrill treble, a sharp-looking youngster, with a bundle of papers under his arm; "Six for sixpence—Cau-li-flowers," roared the deep bass of a costermonger; a dustman, a knife-grinder, a shoeblack, a cat's-meat man, a fish-stall keeper, and other members of the itinerant fraternity blended their voices in maddening chorus.

Within the Vicarage, mother and son, heedless of the distracting sounds, were engaged in earnest conversation. The mother, a middle-aged lady, with a careworn, refined face, diligently darned a small sock, which stood greatly in need of her services; the son, a young man of about three and twenty, with a slim, lithe figure, and a boyish, handsome, sensitive face, mechanically watched her flying needle as he listened or replied.

Mrs. Murray was wife of the vicar of St. Stephen's, Whitechapel, an elderly, scholarly, unsuccessful clergyman, whose means were wholly inadequate to meet all the claims made on him by a numerous family.

The son—David by name—had early developed intellectual tastes; his expenses at school and college had been defrayed by a wealthy, eccentric kinsman of his mother. The youth turned out shy, studious, and dreamy, the possessor of an enthusiasm for poetry, but of little practical ability, and of no instinctive knowledge of the world.

When with the attainment of the "Newdigate" and a good degree, his college career came to an end, and the time arrived when aid in the adoption of a calling would have been highly acceptable, the relation's assistance was capriciously withdrawn.

David Murray returned home, and doubt reigned under the paternal roof with regard to his prospects in life. His father shook his head dubiously when the young man bashfully professed himself a wooer of the muse, and expressed a desire to follow the vocation of a poet.

"Poetry doesn't pay, even when the writer is a genius, and—you are not a genius, you know, David," said the clergyman, with sorrowful candour.

Mrs. Murray belonged to a wealthy family who had taken umbrage at her marriage with a poor parson. Her brothers and sisters had consigned her to oblivion, and her name was omitted from her father's will. But a few days before my story opens, a sister, the widow of a fabulously rich East India merchant, named Wilton, held out the golden sceptre of reconciliation, and Mrs. Murray touched it with trembling rapture.

"We are sisters," graciously wrote Mrs. Wilton, from Florence, where she was spending some months, "and it is time to forget our differences."

From this exordium the widow passed to the narration

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

of a family quarrel, which had indirect relation to the Murray interests.

"I am greatly disappointed," she wrote, "in my nephew Tom—poor James' son—who, till lately, managed my estates in Devon and Somerset. He has given me grave cause for displeasure, and I have shut my doors upon him. This being the case, I am anxious to make the acquaintance of your eldest lad, who has received no benefits from me, and from whom, therefore, according to the way of the world"—anger invested the writer's pen with unwonted sarcasm—"I expect the more gratitude. You have not yet, I suppose, seen your way to putting your son into any profession. Well, Tom's empty place, as steward, may in time and after due preparation suit him—who knows? I am resolved to like the lad; I even build castles in the air for him, and have in my head a scheme for his marriage with my husband's ward, Joyce Balfour, who lives with me and is my heiress. Send your son to Florence, to pass the winter here, and to return with us in the spring to Devonshire. Let him spend what time and see what places he likes en route. I inclose a cheque for his travelling expenses."

Consciousness of the pique (aroused by "nephew Tom") which obviously lay at the bottom of this letter, did not disturb the pleasure with which Mrs. Murray received her sister's overtures. She told herself, in her simple piety, that Providence had opened a way for the provision of her son; she called on David to rejoice with her.

But David refused to rejoice. On the afternoon when we find him in the Whitechapel parlour, his aunt's communication was under discussion, and his contribution to the conversation was flavoured with the spice of petulance. He was seated on a low chair, at his mother's feet, his elbows on his knees, his face in his hands, and his eyes fixed gloomily on the fire.

One clause in the letter—that relating to a possible marriage between Joyce Balfour and himself—had aroused his ire. The young man's ideal of marriage was high and pure; to have it rudely broken in upon with mercenary suggestions, and with the threatened interposition of a third person to regulate his choice, was to the last degree distasteful to him.

"Who is this Joyce Balfour, mother?" asked David, tossing aside the momentous letter.

"I know little more of her than your aunt tells us, dear; she was Mr. Wilton's ward, is rather younger than you, I fancy, and I have heard that she has considerable property. When she inherits my sister's estates, in addition to her own, she will be enormously rich. Your aunt"—with a slight pause and a wistful look in David's direction—"was always fond of match-making. If her fancy for an engagement between you two young people should be realised, your fortune would be made, David."

"You are not a genius, you know, David."

"But I don't want my fortune to be made—after that fashion," cried the young man hotly. "What do I know, and what do I care, about Miss Balfour?"

"She will be enormously rich," urged the mother, falling feebly back on her first point.

"I should be glad to know you were saved from a poor man's portion, David, for I have learnt by experience how hard it is to struggle against poverty."

The mother laid down her sock, and glanced appealingly towards the young man, who responded with a frown. David was young, and he had dreams of an affluent position, to be won, not by a mercenary marriage, but by literary achievements. But he could not brag of his spurs before he had won them; he grew silent.

"We have no right to assume, mother," he burst forth at length, his slumbering chivalry awakening to new life, "that Miss Balfour would accept the honour of an alliance with myself, even if I were inclined to offer it."

Mrs. Murray smiled. She took up her work again.

"Miss Balfour is probably aware," she said, as she stooped to re-thread her needle, "of your aunt's plans, and she must know that it might be greatly against her interests to oppose them."

There was another silence.

Digitized by Google

"At least you will not decide in the matter till you have seen Miss Balfour, David?"

"No, I will not decide till I have seen her."

"And you will go to Florence?"

David rose, walked to the window and looked out. But he saw nothing; his thoughts were far away. Florence was a fascinating name to the untravelled lad; he wished that his errand there were not so unwelcome.

"Yes, I will go," he said slowly, "if I can reconcile myself to the thought that I am ousting my unknown cousin Tom from my aunt's favour."

"Nonsense."

The flying needle halted in mid-course.

"You are not ousting him; he has already ousted himself. Don't be quixotic, dear."

David sighed. His last hope of escape seemed dissipated.

Just at this moment the sound of fleet footsteps was heard; the door flew open, and three or four children, who had been passing—as marks of treacle on hands, faces, and pinafore testified—an agreeable half-hour in the kitchen, appeared on the scene.

Their advent was the signal for David's departure to his own room.

A few days later the young man started on his travels.

In the excitement inseparable from a first foreign tour, the object of his wanderings was almost forgotten. He went through the usual vicissitudes of a long journey. The usual important package was left behind, and its absence, as usual, discovered too late for recovery.

The usual countings of hand-bags and wraps were performed, and then the re-countings, to make assurance doubly sure. The usual sprightliness on boarding, and dejectedness on leaving, the packet, were duly experienced.

Then came hurried meals at railway stations, then views of monotonous French landscape, with its inevitable long straight rows of poplars, then glimpses of bolder scenery, of chalets, and of snow peaks, and then Switzerland burst upon David's view.

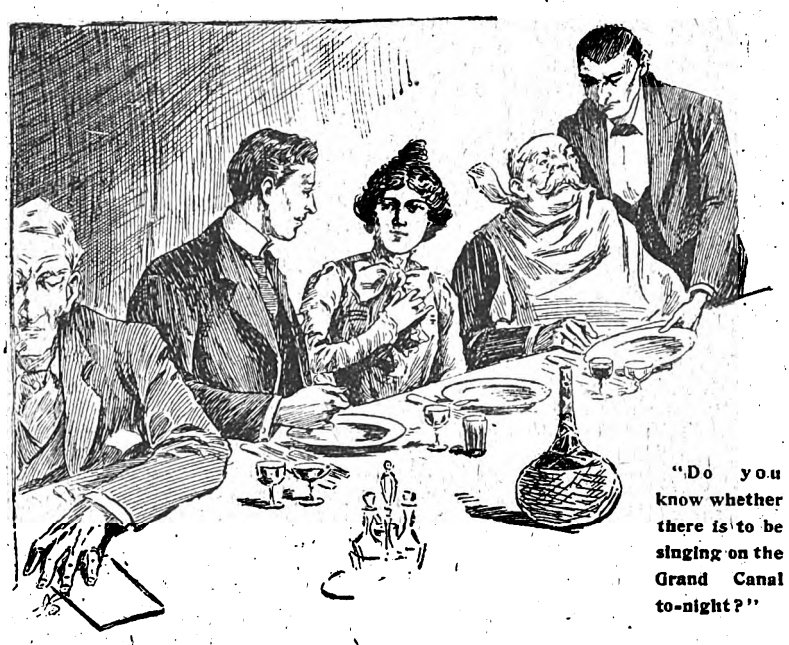
The young man had chosen the St. Gothard route; he had determined to avail himself of his aunt's generosity, and to linger over his journey; in a letter in which he announced his plans to her, he spoke of an intention to spend a couple of days at Lucerne, a few hours at Milan, and a week at Venice, the town which above all others appealed to his poetical fancy.

The lad revelled in his new experiences. His fellow tourists caught something of his enthusiasm; every day he made new friends, who parted from him at night with flattering reluctance.

Not only did the wonderful sights which met his eye delight David; in his young freshness he thoroughly enjoyed the importance of ordering beds and meals, or paying scores, at foreign inns. At last, Italy was reached; at last, Milan lay like a dream behind him, and one early morning found him sleeping fitfully in a railway carriage, and nearing Venice. At five o'clock he awoke, rubbed his eyes, opened the window and looked out.

The edge of a hand-bag, which had very poorly played the part of a pillow during the short night had left proof of its insufficiency in the cramped condition of David's neck. The young man was sleepy and cold; circumstances were not favourable to his first impression of the approach to Venice.

It was with some sense of dreariness that David found himself in a waste of water. Before him, behind him, and on either side, grey water stretched out, to meet a cold grey morning sky; no land was visible. He was on the bridge—nine miles long—which connects Venice with the mainland.



"Do you know whether there is to be singing on the Grand Canal to-night?"

In a short time the forms of towers and clustering houses began to reveal themselves against the horizon; the train whizzed on, and presently the city of the Adriatic lay, broad and clear, before David's eyes. The young man held his breath as he gazed. But a railway-station is the last place for sentimentalism, and before the platform of the Venetian railway-station the train came, in a few minutes, to a standstill.

"Romance hasn't a chance against its arch-enemy, steam," thought David, as he jumped to the ground, mustered a few words of stumbling Italian, embellished with French, and with their aid placed himself under the protection of a porter, a red-haired, well-built fellow, with a face like an old Venetian picture.

The Englishman's registered luggage was quickly collected and placed in a gondola; a herd of loafers—ragged, picturesque men and boys—swooped down upon him as fair prey; one seized his umbrella; another bore off his Murray and his macintosh; a third attempted—in spite of vigorous remonstrance—to relieve him of the light burden of a small paper volume of Howell's "Venetian Life," which he held in his hand. Before the station were a number of gondolas, their proprietors hailing passengers with deafening cries of "Gondoli, signori. Signori, gondoli, gondoli."

"What hotel does the Signore command?" asked, hat in hand, David's gondolier, a weather-beaten old Venetian, with the manners of a duke.

Digitized by Google

"The 'Angleterre,'" returned David with a series of nods; he guessed the meaning of the question.

Mrs. Wilton had furnished him with a list of hotels worthy his patronage in the different towns in which he was to stay.

Soon David was gliding on, along the Grand Canal, under the bridge of the Rialto, past the fruit market, with its wealth of grapes and pumpkins, beside world-famed Gothic or Renaissance palaces. He was in Venice at last—in Venice the city of dreams, and the whole scene had come upon him so suddenly that he failed to grasp the reality of his surroundings.

All that day—after his luggage had been deposited, and a bedroom secured at the "Angleterre," on the Riva degli Schiavoni—David spent in sight-seeing.

He wandered, half-dazed with the magnificence of its beauty, up and down St. Mark's, much pestered by assiduous guides, who, recognising his nationality, addressed him in a counterfeit of his own tongue; he visited the Doge's palace, rambled through the galleries, and crossed the Bridge of Sighs, into the Prisons; he lost himself in the intricate streets about the Merceria, and he strolled along the Piazza of St. Mark, listening to the afternoon band.

It was with a sense of a good day's work well done that he took his seat that evening at table d'hôte, stifled a hungry yawn, stretched his tired legs under the table and looked about him.

There was the usual Italian room, with its ugly wall-paper, its stove, and its painted ceiling; there was the long table, with its stiff central floral decoration; there was a glitter of gas; there was the sound of English predominating over every other tongue. The windows looked full on the Riva; a plaintive little face peeped in through the curtains, and a plaintive little voice solicited alms.

"Excuse me. Do you know whether there is to be singing on the Grand Canal, to-night?" said a voice in English in David's ear, Something in the tone at once arrested and fascinated his attention. He looked quickly down to a face turned to his, and the blood mounted into his own face with a rush.

The propounder of the question was his nearest neighbour, a young girl, the owner of the most attractive face David had ever seen.

From beneath a mass of glorious red-brown hair looked a pair of the merriest, brightest blue eyes in all the world. The nose with its slight tendency to turn saucily upward, the dimpled chin, and the laughing mouth with its sweet red lips, made up a picture which dazzled and bewildered David.

"I—I—don't know," he stammered. "The ways of this place are strange to me; I only came into Venice this morning."

Then he bent over his soup, feeling strangely shy and embarrassed.

"Indeed. Do you intend to remain long?"

The girl's manner was, in its frank friendliness, a broad contrast to David's own. It was hardly, perhaps, the manner usually adopted by ladies in addressing a stranger of the other sex, but its fearless ease had in it nothing deserving the mysterious adjective "fast."

"About a week. I am going to Florence."

"To Florence!" The girl turned on David a rapid enquiring glance. "Why! I believe," she said, suddenly laying down her spoon and laughing an amused little laugh, "that I know who you are."

"Who I am?"

"Yes. How odd that I should have come upon you so soon. You are Mrs. Wilton's nephew, David Murray."

"Did you gain that piece of information from your fellow fairies?"

David had sufficiently overcome his shyness to venture on a tone of mild pleasantry, and some infinitesimal portion of the admiration which he felt found its way into his eyes.

"From no one more fairy-like than Mrs. Wilton herself. I am wintering in Florence with a friend, the lady opposite us."

David glanced across the table towards a pompous-looking dame, in a plum-coloured silk dress and a lace cap.

"And I know your aunt well. My friend and I are in Venice for a short holiday. Mrs. Wilton told us that you were coming to the 'Angleterre,' and I determined to look out for you. You wonder at my interest. Well, Mrs. Wilton told me, too"—in a tone of mock solemnity—"about Miss Balfour, and Miss Balfour and I happen to be great friends."

"What about Miss Balfour?" asked David, huskily.

Joyce had retired into the background of his memory; he was almost angry with this beautiful stranger for bringing her again into prominence. He had sent away his soup plate, half-empty, and he waved an impatient refusal to a waiter who approached with fish.

"Oh, you know," with a gay laugh. "You are going to Florence, in the character of a conquering hero, to carry off our heiress, Joyce Balfour."

The laugh nettled David. He coloured crimson.

"It pleases you," he said, crumbling his bread impatiently, and speaking under his breath, "to make merry at my expense. But you are wrong in your statement. I don't think myself a conquering hero. I am going to Florence at Mrs. Wilton's request, to make her niece's acquaintance—nothing more. Probably I shall not like Miss Balfour, very probably she will not like me. Mrs. Wilton has no right to make schemes for other people, without their consent, and then to proclaim those schemes as certainties to all the world."

"Dear, dear! she doesn't proclaim her schemes to all the world. How fiery you are! I am, as I said, a friend of the family; it's only natural that Mrs. Wilton should be a little confidential to me."

Then the subject of Miss Balfour was allowed to drop. But other subjects presented themselves and conversation was well sustained through the long dinner.

When at last the girl rose, turned to her neighbour with a bright little motion of the head—between a bow and a nod—and passed out of the room, in the company of the lady in the plum-coloured silk, who honoured the young man with a searching glance, David was astonished to remember how voluble he had been.

Now that his exertions were over, he wondered what to do with himself, and when he should see the friendly stranger again.

He hung about the reading-room; she was not there. He toiled up to his bedroom, looked up paper and pencil, and began a sonnet on a pair of blue eyes, left it unfinished and wandered out.

The moon was shining on the open water before the Riva degli Schiavoni; the fishing boats with their picturesque sails stood out in silver light. But David did not linger—as he once would have lingered—to dream over the scene; he hurried on to the frequented Piazza of St. Mark.

There he watched the crowds passing up and down, or seated outside the cafès, the officers with their jingling swords, the flower girls, the artists' models, the ladies, the newspaper vendors, the match boys, and the barefooted searchers for cigar ends. He did not tell himself that it was in search of one face that he scanned each group of promenaders or idlers.

Digitized by Google

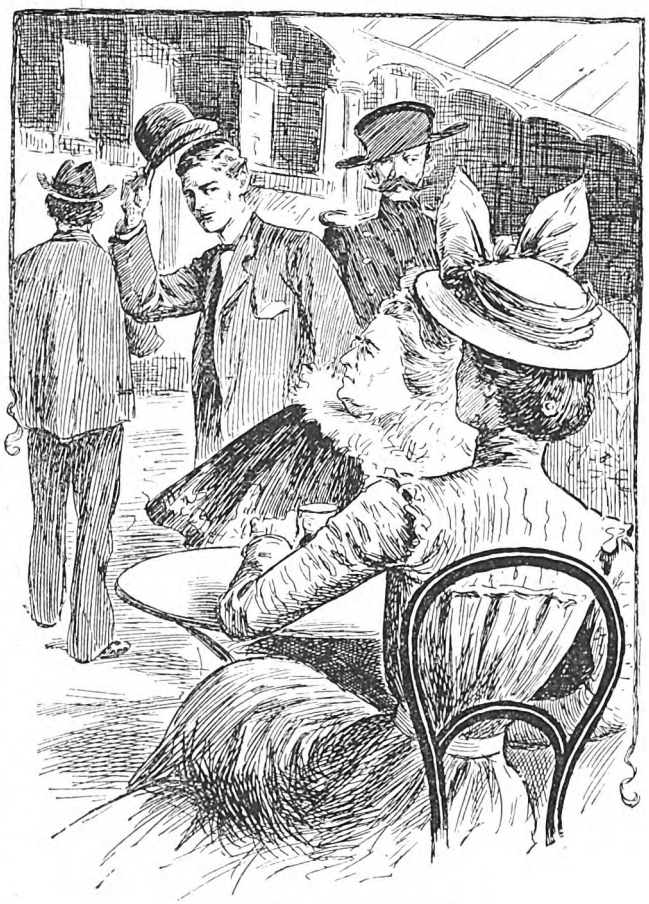
But, as in passing one of the tables before the "Cafè Florian" he caught sight of the lady who had accosted him at table d'hôte, and who was now sipping coffee and talking with her friend, he felt somehow as if a long search had been rewarded. He raised his hat, and passed on, blushing like a girl when he received a responsive bow and smile.

Then he walked slowly back down the Riva to his hotel, sat up late over his sonnet, tore it up in angry discontent and fell asleep to dream of an animated face, and a pair of bewitching, bright blue eyes.

The days passed quickly. It was glorious autumn weather. Every morning David visited, in obedience to directions in his guide-book, some famous churches or palaces, or he made his way to the studio of a modern artist: every afternoon he followed his own sweet will, strayed along the narrow streets, listened to the voluble sellers and the deprecatory buyers at the shops and stalls near the Rialto, and tried his own inexperienced hand at a bargain, or perhaps he took a gondola and was rowed to the Lido, or some other island of the Lagoons, returning at sunset, when the gold and crimson of the sky were reflected in the water.



He raised his hat and passed on.

At table d'hôte he related his adventures to his neighbour, who interrupted him with merry questionings, and who sometimes, if she happened to be in a communicative mood, deigned to respond with narrations of her own doings.

All day long David looked forward to the tête-à-tête of the dinner hour. Every evening he went to the Piazza, and marched up and down in solitary state, his eyes continually travelling in one and the same direction, or he sought a table at the café where he could furtively watch his new friend, who was pretty sure to be in sight.

In his letters to Whitechapel he never once mentioned her. For one thing he did not know her name. Once, in a fit of more than ordinary curiosity, he had cursorily glanced through the list of names in the "Visitors' Book," but among them all how could he distinguish the one in which he was interested?

The ladies were known by the waiter fraternity of the hotel as les dames du numéro vingt-cinq, the number of their sitting-room. When speaking to his neighbour, David had often had at his tongue's tip a downright question concerning her name, but he had hitherto been too shy to utter it. He fully intended to be bolder, one day.

Meanwhile, in his verses—she had found her way into most of his verses written at this period—he chose, for some fanciful reason of his own, to call her "Hera."

It turned out that the length of the girl's stay in Venice was identical with David's; they were both to leave on the same day.

On the last evening in Venice, David and Hera found themselves walking together, and actually unaccompanied, along the Piazza. Mooning along in his usual fashion, the young man had happened to brush against the ladies; as both he and they were bound for the "Angleterre," it was natural that they should walk together.

But the elder lady of the company was presently pounced upon by an Italian countess, who insisted on monopolizing her attention. David moved on with Hera; he could hear a ceaseless stream of foreign-sounding English flowing on behind him.

A strange silence came over the young man. Intently—almost breathlessly—he watched his companion. She had drawn off one of her gloves; on one of her fingers was a ring, with a forget-me-not in turquoises. David wondered, with a touch of utterly unreasonable jealousy, whose hand had placed it there.

The silence seemed oppressive to the girl.

"Let us hurry towards the Riva, and see the moonlight on the water," she said. "Moonlight on water is the most correct of all Venetian beauties."

"Certainly."

David tried to shake off his taciturnity—to emulate his companion's gaiety. But the attempt ended in failure; he was obviously dull and miserable.

"Oh, the beauty of the evening—an evening never to pass from David's memory! How grand and solemn the Ducal palace looked in the moonlight! how still was the water, how sweetly came the sound of singing voices from the Grand Canal!

Digitized by Google

On the top of the steps of one of the many bridges on the Riva both walkers came simultaneously to a standstill.

"So this is our last evening in Venice!" said the girl, resting her arms on the top of the bridge, and looking musingly down into the water.

"Why do you tell me that? surely I know it," burst out David, savagely.

The girl glanced up, startled by the sharpness of his voice.

"What's the matter?"

"Ah me! Sic transit gloria mundi."

"I beg your pardon."

"I beg yours; I was quoting Latin. What I want to say is that—that—the prospect of bidding you good-bye is—well—is the reverse of an enlivening one to me."

"How solemn you are," with a laugh. "And for no reason at all. We shall often meet again."

"Shall we?"

David leant his elbow on the top of the bridge; he bent his head down close to the girl's, her hair almost brushed his cheek.

"Of course," a little impatiently. "My friend and I go to Florence to-morrow, and, as I told you, I am a great friend of Mrs. Wilton's; and I look in upon her every day."

"But I am not going to Mrs. Wilton's."

David spoke in a suppressed voice; he did not raise his head.

"What do you mean?"

"What I say. I cannot go to her now. I had not been a day in Venice before I grew aware of that fact. But I could not—forgive me—resign the pleasure of staying on here with you. My expenses at Venice must be refunded—somehow—" with a grim smile. "You are going to-morrow; then I leave the same day for London."

"Good gracious!"

The girl raised herself from her stooping position.

"How changeable, and how incomprehensible you are! What has happened since you left home to change your plans so suddenly?"

"Everything has happened."

Half-mechanically, Hera had moved on a few paces, and David walked beside her; they descended the bridge steps and made their way slowly along the river.

"You know of—you spoke of—a matrimonial scheme for me which was the cause of Mrs. Wilton's invitation. When I left home I was free; it was at least possible that an introduction to Miss Balfour might, if my advances proved acceptable, end in the accomplishment of my aunt's scheme. Now, all that possibility is over."

"Why over?"

"I am not free now," cried the young man passionately. "Since I have met you I have learnt that Miss Balfour and I could never, at best, be more to each other than good friends."

An inscrutable expression came into the girl's face. She stood still and eyed her companion searchingly.

"Surely," she said, "if you oppose your aunt's plans, you will injure your prospects for life."

"Yes," answered David with simple candour. "My mother will be sorely disappointed; she had hoped so much from my aunt's new interest in me. I am sorry for my mother, but I don't fear the future for myself if ——" David broke off.

"Won't you wait till you see Miss Balfour, before you decide on opposing your aunt's views?"

"Why should I see her?" vehemently, "the very thought of Miss Balfour is hideous to me."

"And how shall you explain your change of plans to Mrs. Wilton?"

"Explain! I shall write and tell her the truth—shall say I have met you."

The girl's lips parted in a curious smile; she stood stock-still, facing David in the moonlight.

"Whom shall you say that you have met?" she asked, lifting her eyes suddenly to her companion's face.

"I—I—don't know; a thousand times I have wanted to ask your name. Will you tell it me now?" faltered David humbly.

"To be sure. I am Joyce Balfour."

"Joyce Balfour!"

If a thunderbolt had fallen at David's feet he could hardly have been more astounded. If ever he were dumbfounded in his life, he was so at this crisis of his fate.

A merry laugh recalled his wandering wits.

"Yes, I am Joyce Balfour and Mrs. Wilton's ward; it is Mrs. Wilton with whom I am staying at the 'Angleterre.' I never expected to remain unknown to you so long; men are slow at guessing; a woman would have found us out long ago. Why, there were a thousand ways of learning our names, and I often wondered why you didn't ask me mine, downright. When we first heard that you were going to stay in Venice, I persuaded Mrs. Wilton to come over here and make your acquaint-

"I am Joyce Balfour."

Digitized by Google

ance under the rose. It was no more pleasant to me than to you, I can tell you, to be under orders in matters matrimonial to Mrs. Wilton. I was no more willing to accept your advances than you were to offer them. At least, I wanted, before we were formally introduced, to know you for myself, in my own way; to see you and talk with you when you were off your guard. It is of course for you to say"—with an arch glance in David's direction—"whether you will abide by your decision to return to England to-morrow. But at least, sir"—with a saucy smile and a bright look in the blue eyes—"you will please apologize very humbly for your assurance in stating before my very face that the thought of Joyce Balfour is hideous to you."

We suppose that David's apology proved an ample one. At any rate we know that a year after the events related in our story, David was not only installed steward of Mrs. Wilton's estates in Devonshire and Somerset, but that he was also married to Miss Balfour. The first volume of poems which he offered to the world had a dedication, "To my wife Joyce."

ANNETTE CALTHROP.

THE TWO BAMBOOS.

BY the side of the Bay of Yedo (as we are telling old stories we like to keep to old names) on a beautiful bank, ablaze with the colours of the azalea, the iris, and the camellia, grew two bamboo trees. The one was tall, lusty, and strong, the other was graceful, drooping and tender.

Said the stronger to the weaker:

"I should like to know what good you are. The smallest breeze makes you bend your head almost double and sigh with pain. Look at me! I don't care what wind blows or what storm comes from the sea. I can face them and feel better for it."

The slender bamboo at his side who was as modest and retiring as she was graceful and beautiful, replied:

"Yes, we are each suited to our vocation in life. You will be a stout coolie pole."

"Coolie pole, forsooth!" snorted her neighbour contemptuously. "Not I."

"And I," continued the slender bamboo, "I shall be used to decorate a house at the New Year festival if I'm to be used at all."

"Don't you count on that," roughly said the big bamboo; "they'll make you into mats, or a coolie's rain coat, or something or other low. Why, look here, you're fit for nothing else."

As he spoke a strong breeze came in from the sea and made the whole hillside quiver and sigh, all but the stout bamboo, who merely bent his head as much as to say:

"Go on, go on, it pleases you and doesn't hurt me!" whilst the poor little one at his side bent and swayed, and groaned heavily to see so many of her tender leaves swept away.

Time went on. The wood-cutters came.

"Orra! Orra!" they cried, "here's a fine fellow for Hinashi's junk; we'll get ten-pence for him!"

"Told you so," whispered the big bamboo to the little one. "Now for life! Hurrah! anything rather than stop on this monotonous old bank, spending the best years of one's life in listening to your groanings."

The axes were plied, and he fell with a thundering crash. Then he was stripped of his branches and shaped, and in a few days was sailing merrily over the blue waters of the bay, as happy as could be.

Meanwhile the slender bamboo grew more graceful and more beautiful every day, and the village children came to play under her shade, for they had learnt to love her, and called her their "Silver Spray."

One day there was a great hullabaloo in the plantation, such a whispering and chattering amongst the azaleas and camellias as had never been heard before, for the azaleas and camellias are enemies and rarely speak to one another.

"They're going to build a house here for the Prince of Tosa," replied the tree, "and we're all to be swept away."

"O, dear! O, dear!" said the bamboo, "that's a bad business; I wish I had been born stout and strong, and I would have been a junk mast instead of being carried away to heat baths."

And the next day the wood-cutters came and the work of destruction commenced. Down upon the sand were thrown the beautiful flowers and the graceful clusters of leaves; the little bamboo trembled as she saw her friends falling around her, and wondered when her turn would come.

At length the destroyers approached her, and one man was swinging his axe in the air to give her the fatal blow, when a chorus of child voices was heard:

"No, don't kill 'Silver Spray'! please don't!"

And the man dropped his arms, and she was saved.

The children dug her out and carried her to a beautiful garden, where they planted her on a bank overlooking the sea.

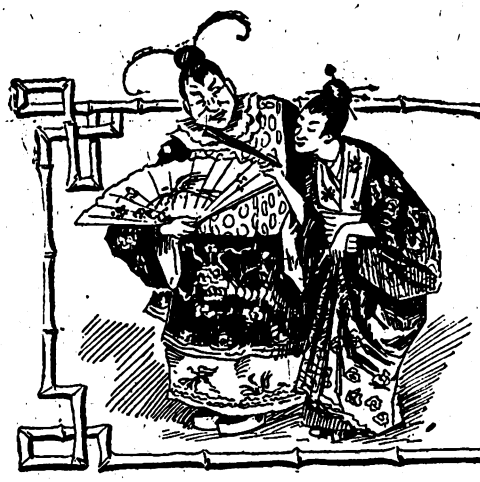
One day a dreadful storm arose. The blue water was churned into dark green mountains of waves capped with white foam; the wind blew furiously, and in all directions junks could be seen flying to the nearest point of shelter. It was a terrible time for all the trees and plants around, but the bamboo was sheltered by a high bank of purple iris.

Next morning the shore presented a woeful appearance, for it was strewn with timbers, and masts, and torn sails, and even dead bodies of men; and amongst the remains the bamboo recognised her big, strong companion of old days, badly bruised and cracked in many places. As the men dragged him up to the foot of the garden, he saw her and said:

"Ah! I wish I had been a coolie pole."

And he was cut up for firewood; but the slender bamboo flourished many years after, and when she heard boasting going on around her would often tell the story of her strong, lusty companion.

Digitized by Google



Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XXXIV.—HE EXPERIMENTS WITH A BOON FOR ALL MANKIND.

AFTER dinner, during which he had seemed much preoccupied, Mr. Bowser had passed through the kitchen into the back yard and poured about two pails of water into an empty barrel. The cook looked at him suspiciously from the half-open door, and Mrs. Bowser wondered what he was up to, but nothing was said until he had taken off his shoes and settled down for the evening. He had been aching for ten minutes to be questioned when Mrs. Bowser observed:

"Are they going to shut the water off from this street to repair the pipes?"

"Not that I know of," he replied. "Look here, now, I want to tell you something, and I don't want you to shout 'fad' over it and call me a silly. I think I've got hold of a big thing. In fact, I believe I am about to produce a boon for all mankind!"

"Going to turn water into champagne?"

"There you go with a sneer in your voice! My goodness, woman, you do provoke me! Why can't you give me a word of encouragement in seeking to win fame and riches?"

"Well, tell me all about it, and I'll give you my opinion."

Mr. Bowser picked up the cat and pulled her tail in an absent-minded way and finally said:

"You know what snow is, of course. It's useful enough out in some foreign countries where they want to draw logs to the saw-mill; but it is a source of expense to the amount of thousands of pounds in the cities. It costs London city alone about £50,000 to get rid of her winter's snow. The snow must be shovelled up and carted off, you see."

"Yes I see."

"Well, suppose the snow could be melted on the streets and in the yards and the water run off into the rivers, suppose it could be done for about a hundredth part of the expense of removal—would there be world-wide fame and any amount of money for the inventor of the process or nothing?"

"It would be a splendid idea," said Mrs. Bowser.

He returned with three bottles and a gallon jug.

"Now you are talking. Now you are offering the encouragement to your husband expected of a wife. I tell you, my dear woman, I wouldn't sell my secret for a million pounds."

"You can melt the snow on the streets, can you?"

"I can melt it as fire melts grease. I can clean a whole city street with one barrel of fluid! I can melt snow for about a farthing a ton. It's a discovery that will knock the world off its feet."

"And how did you discover the process?" asked Mrs. Bowser, as she kept a serious face.

"Partly by means of an old manuscript left by a sailor who died in the hospital, and partly by a man who was out of work and was willing to part with his information for a sovereign. It's a certain thing and within two hours I'll be melting ice to prove it."

"Well, I hope there's something in it."

"Something in it! My dear woman, where I start with one barrel of water I'll end up with ten barrels of gold. Your words of encouragement have done wonders for me. I must now go to the chemist's for a few ingredients."

He went, and returned with three bottles and a gallon jar, the contents of which were poured into the barrel. Mrs. Bowser still further encouraged him by coming down stairs to see him pour and stir and mix, and the cook was kind enough to remark that Mr. Bowser looked like a man who would not knowingly blow up or set fire to his own house in order to kill off a poor girl working for twelve pounds a year. It was an hour before the experiment was ready. The dead sailor's manuscript and the hard-up man's advice were to the effect that the mixture need not stand more than ten minutes, but Mr. Bowser wanted to make a certain thing of it.

The stuff had a rank, acid smell, but he sniffed at it as heartily as if it had been eau de Cologne. A lump of ice was bought from the fish shop and laid on the ground, and with a great deal of solemnity he dipped a stick with a sponge tied to the end of it in the barrel and sopped it over the ice. There was no explosion or sudden outburst of flame. Even the cat tiptoed forward and smelt the lump.

Digitized by Google

Of course, ice won't melt as quickly as snow, and in his own mind Mr. Bowser gave that lump three minutes to vanish off the cold earth. The liquid honeycombed it and threw out a tan-yard odour, but there was no melting.

"What seems to be the matter?" Mrs. Bowser finally queried.

"I—I may not have put enough on," replied Mr. Bowser as he renewed the sop with a liberal hand. "There can't be any mistake in the mixing, and the thing is bound to work. Can't you keep that beastly cat away?"

The cat was chased away, and there was another painful period of waiting. The ice could be heard cracking, but there was no melting.

"Perhaps the discovery only alluded to very soft snow," suggested Mrs. Bowser.

"Soft snow be hanged!" he shouted. "I tell you this thing is all right. The stuff I put in cost five shillings, and it's bound to work."

"Then why doesn't it work? And if it cost five shillings for two pails full how are you going to make it pay? It strikes me——"

"Oh, yes, you are always being struck!" he interrupted. And this very minute you are hoping I will make a failure of this thing. But I won't, though. Perhaps it needs more stirring."

He seized the stick and stirred and swirled and poked, and again the lump of ice was cracked. The smell was ranker, but that was the only result.

"Perhaps the dying sailor left the wrong manuscript?" said Mrs. Bowser by way of breaking the painful silence.

"Why don't he take a teakettle of hot water to melt it?" queried the cook.

"By the living jingo she'll work or bust!" shouted Mr. Bowser as a wave of anger surged over him. "Stand back and gimme room."

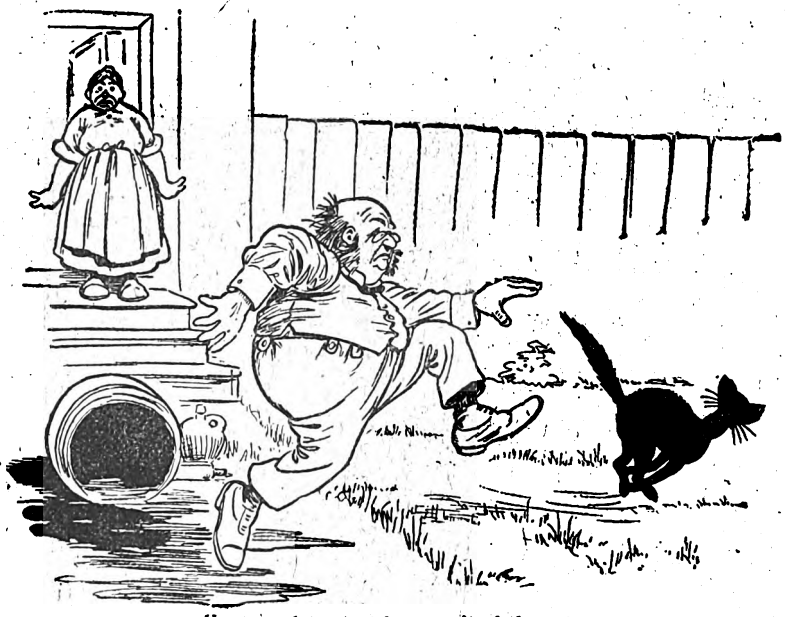
He seized the barrel with a strong grip and up ended it over the lump of ice and then gave it a kick that sent it flying across the yard. Mrs. Bowser and the cook had retreated to a safe distance, but the cat had advanced to satisfy her feline curiosity. As the barrel went rolling the cat screamed out and began jumping up and down, but in half-a-minute changed from jumping to a wild career about the yard.

"You ought to be ashamed to kick a cat!" exclaimed Mrs. Bowser, as the cavorting went on.

"I never kicked her!" he replied. "What in thunder can ail her? Gimme a stick till I drive her over the fence."

He was looking about for a weapon when he gave a sudden start. Then he uttered an exclamation and tried to lift both feet off the ground at once. Then he kicked off his shoes and seemed to start in pursuit of the cat, and he had circled the yard twice before Mrs. Bowser and the cook grabbed him.

"Water—a pail of water—my feet!" he howled, and as soon as the water was drawn he plunged his feet into the pail.



He seemed to start in pursuit of the cat.

"Now then, will you explain this circus?" asked Mrs. Bowser as a look of relief came to his face.

"The acid got to my feet," he replied. "There was a gallon of acid, you know. The cat must have stepped into a puddle of it."

Mrs. Bowser got out the bottle of sweet oil and some rags, and the blistered feet were made comfortable, and their sole owner and proprietor hobbled upstairs and stretched himself out on the sofa. Mrs. Bowser hadn't called him a lunatic or an idiot, but he felt that he had lost prestige and must regain it. She was still soothing him when he sat up and pointed a finger at her and hoarsely whispered:

"Woman, I understand all!"

"All about melting snow?" she innocently asked.

"All about why my experiment was a failure. Don't seek to hide your guilt by looking at me in that bold-faced way. While I was gone to the chemist's you sneaked down and put salt or ashes or vinegar or something into that barrel."

"How foolish of you!"

"That will do! Denials are useless. You can go home to your mother by the 10.20 train to-morrow, and my lawyer will notify you of the legal steps I take. Woman, avaunt and leave your victim to die in peace!"

And, having squared himself and accounted for the failure of his experiment, Mr. Bowser drew up his legs and fell into a peaceful slumber. M. QUAD.

. . The First Number of . .

THE LADY'S MAGAZINE

WILL BE ON SALE

THURSDAY NEXT, JANUARY 10TH.

Price 6d.

Digitized by Google

THE LION'S WARS

The Campaign in the Pyrenees and South of France. 1813—1814.

THE flight of his brother Joseph, and the expulsion of his armies from the Peninsula, stirred the ambitious soul of Napoleon Bonaparte to its profoundest depths. He knew, none better, that successes won by the sword have to be maintained by the sword, so large reinforcements were at once dispatched and the whole of the forces in Spain placed under the command of Soult, the ablest, with the exception perhaps of Bernadotte, afterwards King of Sweden, of all Napoleon's marshals.

On taking command Soult at once proceeded to Pamplona, which we were investing. The folly which had characterised the operations of the French in the Peninsular War was at once made manifest. The French had never been able to strike a really decisive blow, because their generals could never agree in concerting plans of action.

At Pamplona Soult bore down in overwhelming force on the passes of Maya held by the British, and drove us back.

Greatly elated, Soult, a week later, on July 13th, 1813, dispatched the Comte D'Erlon with 18,000 men to eject us from Puerto de Maya, but, bent on retrieving the reverse at Maya, Sir W. Stewart's troops, 4,500 strong, stood their ground, till most of them were either killed or wounded.

At Roncesvalles, fought on the same day, fortune was a little kinder. General Cole and 10,000 men, confronted by General Clausel and 35,000 picked French troops, fought for six hours with such desperate valour, that, when Cole retreated to take up a more advantageous position, the French were too exhausted to follow him.

Pitted against a commander of such acknowledged ability as Soult, the British Army now clamoured for Wellington, who, on July 27th, arrived from San Sebastian.

His return greatly cheered our men, who gave him a most enthusiastic welcome.

Sir William Napier says that such was Wellington's resourcefulness that on this occasion he actually made a strategic use of his soldiers' greeting. Turning to one of his staff whilst his men were hurrahing he said, "Soult is a cautious soldier, and will delay his attack to ascertain the cause of these shouts. This will give time for the Sixth Division to arrive, and I shall beat him."

What followed showed how accurately Wellington had gauged his opponent's character. Soult did notice the cheering, and did pause sufficiently long to allow the Sixth Division under General Pack to arrive.

Then without a moment's delay Wellington seized the heights on the valley of the Lanz, and placed a large force on the edge of the valley to prevent the French from massing their entire army for one grand attack.

Soult, after disengaging a division to watch the force we had posted at the entrance to the valley, burst on the army under Wellington, and was repulsed with great loss. But the Portuguese stationed on our right had been a little shaky, seeing which, a strong column of French came up from Sorauren. The Portuguese, it is declared, did not on this occasion exhibit the white feather. For all this, they were no match for the French, who pressed them back with such vigour that they were thrown upon General Ross's brigade.

Digitized by Google

Re-animated by the calmness displayed by our men, the Portuguese reformed and charged the French so desperately as to force them down the hill. Quite undismayed, the French regained the hill, carrying all before them till, meeting Byng's brigade, they were checked.

At this moment no fewer than three French divisions had made good their footing on the heights, and unless we could dislodge them the battle would be lost. Silently, sternly, our men formed into line, waited till the order to advance was given, and then, spite of a withering fire, began steadily climbing the hill. Arrived at the summit, they rushed at the foe with such headlong valour, that they drove the French to the verge on the other side.

For a moment both the combatants paused hovering on the brink, and then the French were hurled into the valley below, in one inextricable mass.

Although the French suffered severely in the hand to hand fighting which followed, great was the dismay when it was found that the failure of two Portuguese regiments to prevent any further reinforcements arriving from Sorauren had resulted in the heights being silently scaled by the French brigade on one side, whilst we were sweeping their comrades from the other.

Tired as our men were, and fierce as was the tempest of bullets rained on us as we re-ascended the heights, we contrived after three heroic efforts to bundle out the intruders.

On landing in the valley, the French met the Sixth Division returning from pursuing their comrades. Another desperate fight ensued, but repeated doses of cold steel at length decided the day.

Reinforcements poured in at such a rate after this battle that Wellington found himself at the head of an army of 50,000 men, of whom quite half were British. But so many of these had to be sent away for the investment of the frontier towns, that when Soult's reinforcements also arrived the French force was nearly double that of our own.

Soult's great object in the operations which followed was to relieve St. Sebastian and keep open his communications with France. To achieve the former he planted a force between the British and the river Baztan. To retain the road to France he transferred the bulk of his army to Orthez, in order to effect a junction with D'Erlon.

But Wellington noticed the movement towards Orthez and guessed the object. The division he sent under Picton, to prevent the junction, marched so rapidly that they were able to seize Orthez. The French immediately retreated, leaving us in possession.

Soult had hoped that his retreat would have enabled him to raise the siege of St. Sebastian, and he was greatly surprised to find that Wellington had re-occupied Puerto de Maya fortress.

On the night of August 30th, 1813, Wellington carried the town by storm. The resistance we encountered from the French garrison was so aided by the co-operation of the townspeople, that our men became so infuriated that, when they did get inside, they perpetrated the most dreadful excesses. Not only was the town given up to pillage, but bands of soldiers went from house to house murdering every inhabitant they found.

Bad as their conduct was, it must be admitted that they had good cause for indignation, "As we had no quarrel with the townspeople, and as we came to Spain to free their country from the French," said a soldier who had been caught red-handed, and brought to Wellington, "they ought either to have remained neutral or fought for us. We have lost about 2,000 men to-day, and we have killed about the same number. If the punishment the townpeople have received isn't what people call retribution, blow me if I know what the word means."

The inhabitants of St. Sebastian, in not helping the soldiers who were risking their lives to rid Spain of the invaders, showed gross ingratitude. When they supplemented this by also killing us, who shall say that our men were not justified in taking the law into their own hands.

The winter of 1813, even in Southern France was so intensely cold, that operations had now to be suspended. When February arrived Wellington had completed his plans.

He would have liked to have marched straight on to Paris, but Bayonne was in the way. A series of masterly manœuvres compelled Soult to retire from the town, under the shelter of which he had stationed his camp during January, and retreat to Orthez, where, on the 14th February, he again tried conclusion with our invincible soldiers.

That the French after so many defeats should have made so good a fight as they did, shows of what splendid stuff the French soldier of that day was made. They lost of course, but they fought like heroes.

Our men, if they did not believe that they were the best soldiers in the world, were quite sure that Wellington was the best commander. In charging, this confidence made them irresistible. Our men loved getting to close quarters, but it was costly work.

Six times did our dauntless veterans at Orthez, led by the gallant Ross, force their way through the vine-clad cottages and gardens to be, when they reached the open ground at the rear of the village, hurled back again by a battery of French guns which were posted on a hill close by. They could have faced the guns in front, but there was a battery of sixteen guns on the Dax Road on their right which rent great gaps in their ranks.

But the British soldier is never so dangerous as when called on to fulfil an almost impossible task. Picton sent a reinforcement—they were immediately swept away.

Wellington then dispatched assistance. Those who were not annihilated by the guns went down before a wild charge of the French. Still our men persevered although Soult had loudly declared, "At last I have the English."

The moment Wellington, to draw the French from St. Boes, assailed their left, we made a wild rush at the hill which had defied us all through that dreadful day, and the bayonet did the rest. The attack on the left was equally successful.

The road was now open to Paris, but as it would have been dangerous to have allowed Soult, who had retreated eastwards to Toulouse, to escape and thus threaten our communications, Wellington determined to reduce that town.

The fortifications of Toulouse would have been useless against modern ordnance, but Wellington's guns were not only of poor calibre but he found the high wall which ran round the town strongly flanked with towers.

Furthermore, the place derived additional support

Digitized by Google

So murderous was the fire that the leading ranks, unable to face it, sprang into a hollow road twenty-five feet deep.

Digitized by Google

from its position. Except at one point, it was protected by the Garonne, a deep unfordable river, and the canal of Brienne on the north, east and west. The weakness of the south side had been remedied by strong fortifications.

Not daring to defend the city from the inside, which might lead to his forces being shut up for months, Soult took up a strong position on two lofty ridges outside the town, the natural strength of which he increased by redoubts and field works. Between the two ridges the ground sloped to a valley, leading to the town of Toulouse.

Wellington, on reconnoitring, found that the number of forts and redoubts Soult had erected on the first ridge, which was over two miles long, would enable the French to pour in such a deadly fire, that he resolved on risking a night attack. But the distances some of the brigades had to travel was so great, that when the sun rose on the morning of April 10th, the attack had not yet begun.

Whilst our infantry were plodding steadily up the hill Beresford's Dragoons and Somerset's Hussars crept round by the valley in order to take the enemy in flank. But owing to the water-courses travelling was made almost impossible.

When the retreat was sounded, our men had to leave their guns behind them in the marshes. Their safety would have been endangered had not Wellington dispatched Vivian's cavalry brigade to attack the bridge of Bordes.

This division drew off the enemy and enabled Beresford's and Somerset's troops to get clear of the valley higher up, and, on leaving the valley, to storm and capture the bridge of Montandron.

Freyne, acting without instructions, assailed, and marched round the first ridge and, at the head of 9,000 Spanish assaulted the second. Our allies fought well enough for a time although the big guns of the French made huge gaps in their ranks, but when the bridge of Matabiau was reached, so murderous was the fire to which they were exposed, that the leading ranks, unable to face it, sprang into a hollow road twenty-five feet deep.

The whole force at once became panic-stricken; a few sheltered themselves behind a neighbouring bank, but the bulk joined their companions in the road below.

The moment they disappeared from view, the French rushed from their intrenchments, and disposing themselves round the brink, poured volley after volley into the helpless crowd beneath. The exultation of the French knew no bounds, and they showed no quarter.

A battery of guns was brought up from the Matabiau, and the hollow road raked from end to end. The annals of war record nothing more horrible than the butchery of the Spanish at Toulouse.

Strange as it may seem, Wellington's foresight was so great, that the moment he saw the Spanish troops approaching the fatal spot, he turned to an officer and said: "Did you ever see 9,000 soldiers run away?"

"No, sir."

"Wait a moment, and you will."

Wellington at once ordered up a couple of regiments to the rescue of the poor wretches who rushed madly away as soon as the French turned their attention to the new comers. The British silently opened their ranks to let the fugitives pass, and then proceeded to punish the French for their cruelty by endeavouring to drive them into the very death-trap which had proved so fatal to the poor Spaniards. They did not succeed in this, but on getting to close quarters they punished the enemy so severely that they literally bolted back to their intrenchments.

But the tide of battle had not yet turned in our favour. The fiery Picton had been instructed to make a feigned attack on the bridge of Juneaux in order to divert attention from Hill's attack on the ridge. Feigned attacks were so little to Picton's tastes that he endeavoured to rush the bridge in earnest. The works protecting the bridge being too high to scale without a ladder, the French sharpshooters were able to kill and wound some 400 of our gallant fellows before Picton could be prevailed on to retire.

Our position now was anything but hopeful. The dispersion of the Spanish army, and the repulse of Picton, enabled Soult to act on the offensive. Fifteen thousand men were hurled on Beresford's flank at the bridge of Montandron, Vial's cavalry encircling them on the other side.

An iron circle was being slowly drawn round them, when Beresford's men burst through, and before Vial's cavalry could charge, formed squares. At this critical moment Lambart's Brigade, which had reached the summit of the second ridge, seeing the deadly peril of Beresford's Division rushed down the hill with such force as to utterly disorganise Taupin's men, the discomfiture being greatly increased by the death of Taupin himself.

Then the 42nd and 79th Highland regiments came up, and the French had to bear as best they could one of the ugly rushes for which the Scotch soldiers are famous.

From end to end the ridges were now alive with red coats, such of the French as remained on the summit being swept down the hill-side like a torrent. Then we stormed the redoubts.

In capturing these the loss of life was awful. The 42nd having dispersed thrice their number at the bridge of Montandron turned their attention to a neighbouring redoubt. They went into action with 500 men. After the battle only ninety were left.

Towards evening the French so lost heart that to prevent a rout Soult retired into Toulouse. Next day before Wellington could invest the town Soult had retreated to Careassonne. Whilst Wellington was marching into Toulouse the French garrison, on the 14th, made a night attack on the investing force under Sir John Hope. Taken completely by surprise they penetrated our camp, killing General Hay and numerous other officers, besides taking Colonel Townsend and other officers prisoners. Hundreds of our men also were bayoneted in their sleep.

The darkness was so great that it was not till some of the tents caught fire that the British could tell friend from foe. Cheered by their officers, we soon retrieved the position. General Hope, a man of herculean strength, slew, it is said, more men that night than the renowned Shaw is reported to have done at Waterloo. Ultimately the French were driven back with such slaughter that out of the sortie party only one third returned.

The abdication of Napoleon and the Restoration of Louis XVIII. put an end to the war, and the British Army (with the exception of the cavalry who marched to Boulogne and those destined for the colonies) embarked at Bordeaux receiving a hearty welcome on reaching home.

[NEXT WEEK: The Battle of Waterloo (June 18, 1815)]

Digitized by Google

THE SHIP'S DOCTOR.

WHEN first I met him he had long left the sea. Spare, with grizzled hair and moustache, he showed plainly the marks of his old occupation.

There were the rolling gait, the tanned, seamy features, the keenness of eye, which somehow are the almost invariable signs of the men who go down to the sea in ships.

Add to this that he was shabby, woefully so, and that from the moment he had emptied his first glass of "Jamaica" hot, his talk went on without ceasing to the complete drowning of every other voice, and you have a very fair picture of the man as I knew him.

At this time, too, he acted as occasional assistant to a "cheap" doctor in a poor neighbourhood. Two days in the week he came over "West," from the salubrious quarter that has Victoria Park for its centre, and did the dirty work his employer had no fancy for doing himself. As a matter of fact, poor old Burroughs was a far cleverer man in his profession than ever was Peter McGowan, M.D., the employer aforesaid; but he was his own enemy, and a life that might have been lived with the greatest advantage to himself, to those belonging to him, and to society generally, was simply frittered away without being of use to anybody.

His strong point was "tall yarns," so tall, so overpowering in altitude, that his hearers (and he was always the centre of an awe-struck group of listeners on club nights) were carried to heights, the safe descent from which seemed so problematical as to engender grave fears in the minds of timid souls.

Well past sixty, he had not married and settled down until about two years before I came across him.

His wife, so rumour had it, had been a barmaid, with a profound admiration for the ex-salt-water "Æsculapius." Rumour said also that the lady's "little savings" had furnished the home, but as that is a mere detail, and moreover, has about it the elements of scandal, the statement may be taken for what it is worth.

I am to this day quite unacquainted with Mrs. Burroughs, and therefore cannot speak from personal experience, but I should say, from certain plain indications, that she had done much during her short spell of married life to "pull together" her lord and master.

Without doubt he needed considerable application of the process, and although his little failings still cropped up now and again, he distinctly showed that there was a firm hand somewhere in the background steering the ship.

Apart, then, from an undue leaning towards the "convivial" and a spirit of an utter indifference with regard to appearances and his "outer man," Ned Burroughs was undeniably a taking personality. Witty, an accomplished linguist (to my knowledge, he knew and spoke well five languages) a raconteur, than whom I know none better, he was the life and soul of the club to which we both belonged.

I can see him now, in his favourite seat by the window, and surrounded by a group of eager-eared men, discoursing wonderful things, in his own magnetically wonderful manner.

Stories of all kinds, shark stories, "bush" stories; adventures in the "Rockies," and encounters with "Polars" in the Arctic Seas; he was great in all—while there were simple souls among us who scorned to doubt, listened rapt, and accepting with childlike faith poor Ned's "largest order."

I do not suppose that any man, woman, or child who once came in contact with him, failed to love him. A lovable man may be pardoned the committing of many sins; there is a tendency to look at him from your blind side; and so Ned Burroughs held, by virtue of his warm heart, his winsome attractiveness of disposition, a big place in the affectionate regard of all who knew him.

Now, if there was one thing that the "doctor" had an especial fondness for, it was children. Little children, wee toddlers of that fascinating age, when, too old for "worriment," and too young for mischief, they insensibly wind themselves round the heart of every man worthy the name.

It was this predilection that led to his final undoing, or shall I rather say, to the doing of that which will make his name to be known among men for all time, as that of one of earth's true kings and heroes.

He was always reticent upon his home life, and I, for one, ever respected his reserve.

That Burroughs had a child of his own, a little chap of three or thereabouts, everybody knew, as too, everybody could not but see the glistening tenderness in his eyes whenever he referred to his infant son. Then it was that he put aside for a while the weaving of new marvels, and enlarged upon the present precocity and certain future greatness of his little heir.

It was on a bitterly cold night in January, just five years ago now, that the incident I am about to relate had its beginning.

There was an unusually large number of members present, and Burroughs, upon the stroke of eleven, was in the throes of adventurous relation.

The scene of this story was laid in Constantinople, the yarn itself being of such intensely thrilling nature that reason and belief trembled on their respective thrones.

"It was nearly midnight," he was saying in that winningly impressive way of his, that half-compelled, half-persuaded the doubter among his auditors, "it was nearly midnight when I left the ship quietly in a 'cacique,' whispering the boatman to make for a point a little below Damietta. By the light of a small bull's-eye lantern I read again the fair Zuleika's letter. Yes, a quarter after midnight I was to be at the little door in the garden wall, at the top of the river steps. There I was to knock three times, utter the name 'Zuleika,' and the door would be opened by an old negress, the lady's special attendant. After that, implicit trust in what should follow."

"Here! I say, doctor! do you mean to tell us that a beautiful Turkish houri wrote you a letter like that?" interrupted a sceptic.

Digitized by Google

"Let the doctor alone, Bruce, he's getting on splendidly, if you'll only be quiet," remonstrated a believer.

"Wrote me a letter like that—why if I told you, which I don't mean to, all there was in it, you'd be more than surprised, I'm thinking. Well, the boat arrived at the flight of steps leading up to the little door. The moon shone so brightly that it was nearly as light as day. I sprang up the steps, and knocked thrice at the iron-studded wicket. Then speaking the word 'Zuleika' I waited. In less than a moment I saw the door slowly open inwards, in its place appearing a horribly ugly old negress, who——"

"Yes, yes, go on!" cried the now excited circle of listeners, for Burroughs had suddenly stopped.

But he took not the slightest notice of them.

In the doorway stood a tall, good-looking girl of, maybe, sixteen, who simply looked appealingly at the doctor, he being seated exactly facing her.

His response to this mute address was curious.

Clapping his shabby old sombrero-like wide-awake on to his head, he rose quickly from his chair and without a word of apology or explanation to his fellow members, moved as quickly across the room towards the girl, whom he caught hold of by the wrist and hurried out, shutting the door after him.

As to what happened next I am dependent upon the report of one who saw through it all to the end.

Within easy distance of the club was, indeed is, a district notorious for its poverty, its wretchedness, some say its crime.

It is towards this that Burroughs and his young companion make as fast as the slippery state of the pavement will allow them.

Appleton Buildings is their objective point, a block of so-called model dwellings, hidden away behind the more imposing screen of fine shops of the main road.

The doctor knows the place well. Only that afternoon he has been there, leaving with a conviction almost that there would be no need for a re-visit.

Out of the glare and busy brightness of the great thoroughfare, and by way of a narrow bye-street into the dreary region surrounding the "buildings" aforesaid.

What a ghastly mockery is this pretence in the housing of the poor! What a need is there for not only a capitalist and philanthropist, but for a philanthropist with intimate and personal knowledge of the class he would seek to benefit!

In his own queer, restless way, Burroughs had thought much on this question, therein differing greatly from his pompous chief, McGowan, who cared for none of these things, and as he and Nelly Garvy threaded their way through alley-way and court, ultimately emerging on to the paper-strewn yard of Appleton Buildings, he reviled Dives in his heart, for that the rich man was blind in all his works.

Up, up, up to the topmost storey of the very dirtiest of all the dirty blocks of the poor man's barracks.

Burroughs, as a man, was a Bohemian, and, therefore, not particularly keen in the matter of ultra-cleanliness and order, but as a doctor his whole soul revolted at the despite done to every known law of health and decency.

Moreover, his sympathetic spirit had been deeply stirred by the patient endurance of the little sufferer whom he had now come for the third time to visit, and if it might be, to lure back to life.

That the chances in favour of this were but small he knew only too well. There was but one road to follow one only possible thing to do, which thing would be at once unpleasant, and done at the risk of the operator's life.

Poor Susy Garvy, barely nine, and as yet scarce acquaint with a world none too well disposed to such as she, lay gasping for breath, the terrible sound of which, caused by that fatal formation in the throat which is the terror alike of doctor and patient.

Only last year, Susy had participated in one of those wonderful "Fresh Air" excursions, and the memory of that day, the beauty of it is the one thing now that appeals most strongly to her wandering little mind.

A swift glance at the face of the child; a hand touch of wrist and forehead, and Ned Burroughs saw that the moment had come for decisive action.

Risk versus self! It was very simple, and although it is a matter for thankfulness that there exist souls, many, many souls far and away above consideration of self where duty is to be done, the number of God's heroes who will deliberately stake their lives for another's good is, and must be in the very nature of things, limited.

Two hours after the doctor's exit from our midst, I was summoned by the porter.

I found at the door inside a four-wheeler, a transformed man.

All frivolous, laughter-loving expression gone, Ned Burroughs, his hand on the lowered window of the cab, his face set as with a great purpose, addressed me hurriedly:

"Chalmers! I can't come inside; I fear I am going be very ill—I am going at once to the hospital."

"Aren't you going home?" I said.

"Home!—No—not home!—I've written my address on this piece of paper," passing it out to me. "Do me the kindness of writing a line to my wife, and tell her the truth as gently as I know you can. But don't go and see her. I have my reasons. Will you promise me that you won't go and see her?"

"Of course, if you so wish it," I said. "But are you suffering much?"

"No, not yet—not yet—but it will come, and if I should never have the opportunity of speaking to you again, my last word to you is that I do not regret it; no, thank Heaven, I do not regret it."

Could this be the Ned Burroughs of a few hours ago? Transformed, did I say? rather transfigured! for if ever a human being revealed in his face the divinity which is said to belong, howsoever latently, to every child of man, then did I assuredly see the divine that night in the person of Edward Burroughs, ex-ship's doctor.

A day or two later we heard the truth. How that he had performed, by personal inhalement, that terrible operation of withdrawing the cord from the throat of a diptheitic patient.

Signally successful, the child came back to life from that moment.

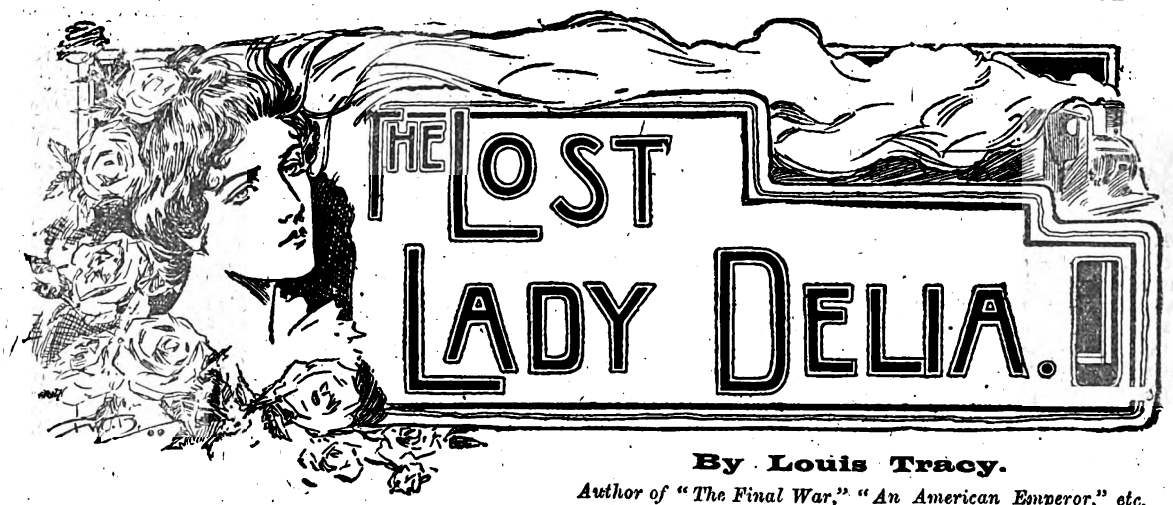
But poor Ned! he died in his wife's arms at St. Mildreds on that night week.

As a friend and club member we shall never replace him; I know I shall not, and when sometimes his memory is strong upon us, as it often is, we drink in sad silence to a name which needs no eulogy, in that each of us has a warm heart-corner for it, that of our dear old comrade the "ship's doctor."

RALPH ENDERBY.

Digitized by Google

GRAND SERIAL STORY. START TO-DAY.



By Louis Tracy.

Author of "The Final War," "An American Emperor," etc.

SUMMARY.

LADY DELIA LYLE leaves her house one foggy November afternoon, and is seen at Victoria Station, on the Underground Railway, by Mr. Reginald Brett, a barrister friend of her husband, who gets her ticket and puts her in the train for Richmond, where she says she is going to see her sister, but from that time she is not heard of.

After some days have passed, without bringing any news of Lady Delia, her husband, Sir Charles Lyle, puts the matter into the hands of detectives, Inspector Winter taking charge of the case.

Brett also promises to do all he can, and he finds out that Lady Delia, on the night of her disappearance, instead of going to Richmond, alighted at Sloane Square, and went to a block of flats called Raleigh Mansions.

Towards the end of the month the body of a woman, evidently murdered, is found wedged beneath a drain-pipe in the Thames at Putney, and, though Sir Charles does not identify the body, Brett imagines it to be that of Lady Delia. Shortly after this discovery Lady Delia's maid, Jane Harding, disappears. She is afterwards found to have gone on the stage.

Brett now starts investigations at Raleigh Mansions, and he fixes on two residents there as being likely to have been connected with Lady Delia. These are a Mr. Sydney H. Pyne, who is not at present in residence, and a Mrs. Hilmer, whom he finds to be Pyne's sister.

It had transpired that Pyne had gone to Monte Carlo, and thither Brett goes, and he discovers that though letters are addressed to Pyne at the Hotel du Cercle, he is not known there.

One afternoon Brett goes to a pigeon-shooting match between a Russian count and an Englishman named Albert Mensmore, in which the latter is just beaten, and apparently feels it very much.

In the evening Mensmore is at the gaming table, and after losing heavily goes out into the grounds, followed by Brett, and commences to pace up and down.

CHAPTER IX.

BREAKING THE BANK.

THERE were not many people in this part of the Casino gardens. A few lovemaking couples and a handful of others who preferred the quietude of Nature to the throng of the promenade, made up the occupants of the winding paths that creep along the steep face of the seaward slope.

At last Mensmore halted. There was no one in front, and he turned to look if the terrace was clear behind him. He caught sight of Brett, but did not recognise him, and leant against a low wall, ostensibly to gaze at the sea until the other had passed.

Brett came up to him and cried cheerily: "Hallo, is that you, Mr. Mensmore? Isn't it a lovely night?"

Mensmore, startled at being thus unexpectedly addressed by name, wheeled about, stared at the newcomer, and said, very stiffly: "Yes; but I felt rather seedy in the Casino, so I came here to be alone."

"Of course," answered the barrister. "You look a little out of sorts. Perhaps got a chill, eh? It's dangerous weather here, particularly on these heavenly evenings Come back with me to the hotel, and have a stiff brandy and soda. It will brace you up."

Mensmore flushed a little at this persistence. "I tell you," he growled, "that I only require to be left in peace, and I shall soon recover from my indisposition. I am awfully obliged to you, but ——"

"But you wish me to walk on and mind my own business?"

"Not exactly that, old chap. Please don't think me rude. I am awfully sorry, but I can't talk much to-night."

"So I understand. That is why I think it is best for you to have company, even such disagreeable companionship as my own."

"Confound it, man," cried the other, now thoroughly irritated; "tell me which way you are going and I will go the other. Why on earth cannot you take a polite hint, and leave me to myself?"

"It is precisely because I am good at taking a hint that I positively refuse to leave you until you are safely landed at your hotel. Indeed, I may stick to you then for some hours."

"The dickens take you! What do you mean?"

"Exactly what I say."

"If you don't quit this instant I will punch your head for you."

"Ah! You are recovering already. But before you start active exercise take your overcoat off. That revolver in the breast pocket might go off accidentally, you know. Besides, as I shall hit back, I might fetch my knuckles against it, and that would be hardly fair. Otherwise, I can do as much in the punching line as you can, any day."

This reply utterly disconcerted Mensmore.

"Look here," he said, avoiding Brett's steadfast gaze, "what are you talking about? What has it got to do with you, anyhow?"

"Oh, lots. My business principally consists in looking after other people's affairs. Just now it is my definite intention to prevent you from blowing out your brains, or what passes for them."

"Then all I can say is that I wish you were in Jericho. It is your own fault if you get into trouble over this matter. Had you gone about your business I would have waited. As it is——"

It so happened that the guard, having nothing better to do, strolled round the terraces by the same path that Mensmore and Brett had followed. The first sight that met his astonished eyes, when, in the flood of moonlight he discovered their identity, was the spectacle of these two springing at each other like a pair of wild cats.

Digitized by Google

"Parbleu," he shouted, "the solitary ones are fighting!"

He ran forward, drawing his short sword ready to stick the weapon into either of the combatants if the majesty of the law in his own person were not at once respected.

In reality, affairs were simple enough. Mensmore had made an ineffectual attempt to draw his revolver, and Brett had pinioned him before he could get his hand up to his pocket. Both men were pretty equally matched, and it was difficult to say how the struggle might have ended had not the sword-brandishing guard appeared on the scene.

Brett, even in this exciting situation, kept his senses; Mensmore, blind with rage and the madness of one who would voluntarily plunge into the Valley of the Shadow, took heed of naught save the effort to rid himself of the restraining clutch.

"Put away your sword. Seize his arms from behind. He is a suicide," shouted the barrister to the gesticulating and shrieking Frenchman.

Fortunately the man grasped his meaning, for Brett was an excellent linguist. He caught Mensmore's arms, put a knee in the small of his back, and doubled him backwards with a force that nearly dislocated his spine. In the same instant Brett secured the revolver which he promptly pocketed.

"It is well," he said to the guard. "Here is a louis. Say nothing, but leave us."

"Monsieur understands that the honour of a French policeman——"

"I understand that if there is any report made of this affair to the authorities you will be dismissed for negligence. Had this lunatic been left to your care he would now have been lying here dead. Do you doubt me?"

The guard hesitated. "Monsieur mentioned a louis," he said, for Brett's finger and thumb had returned the coin to his waistcoat pocket.

This transaction satisfactorily ended, Brett accosted Mensmore, who was awkwardly twisting himself to see if his backbone were all right.

"You are not hurt I hope?"

"It is matterless. Why could you not let me finish the business in my own way?"

"Because the world has some use for a man like you. Because you are a moral coward and require support from a stronger nature. Because I did not want to think of that girl crying her eyes out to-morrow when she read of your death, or heard of it, as she assuredly would have done."

Mensmore, though still furious at Brett's interference, was visibly amazed at this final reference. "What do you know about her?" he said.

"Nothing, save what my eyes tell me."

"They seem to tell you a remarkable lot about my affairs."

"Possibly. Meanwhile I want you to give me your word of honour that you will not make any further attempt on your life for the next seven days."

"My word of honour! Will you accept it?"

"Most certainly."

"You are a queer chap, and no mistake. Very well, I give it. At the same time I cannot help dying of starvation. I lost my last cent to-night at roulette. I am hopelessly involved in debts which I cannot pay. I have no prospects and no friends. You are not doing me a kindness, my dear fellow, in keeping me alive, even for seven days."

"You could have obtained your fare to London from the authorities of the Casino?"

"Hardly. I lost very little at roulette. I am not such a fool. My losses are nearly all in bets over the pigeon-shooting match which I ought to have won. I was backing myself at a game where I was apparently sure to succeed."

"Until you were beaten by a woman's voice."

"Yes, wizard. I am too dazed to wonder at you

He caught Mensmore's arms, put a knee in the small of his back, and doubled him backwards.

sufficiently. Yet I would have lost fifty times for her sake, though it was for her sake that I wanted to win."

"Come, let us smoke. Sit down, and tell me all about it."

They took the nearest seat, lighting cigarettes. The guard, watching them from the shade of a huge palm tree, murmured:

"Holy Virgin, what madmen are these English! They move apart, unknown; they fight; they fraternise; they consume tobacco—all within five minutes." And he lovingly felt for the louis to assure himself that he was not dreaming.

"There is not much to tell," said Mensmore, who had quite recovered his self-control, and was now trying to sum up the man who had so curiously entered his life at the moment when he had decided to do away with it. "I came here, being a poor chap living mostly on his wits, to go in for the pigeon-shooting tournaments. I won several, and was in fair funds. Then I fell in love. The girl is rich, well connected, and all that sort of thing. She is the first good influence that has crossed my life, so I thought that perhaps my luck was now going to turn. I backed myself for all I was worth, and more, to win the championship. If it came off I should have won over £3,000. As it is, I owe £500, which must be paid on Monday. My total assets, after I had settled my hotel bill and sent a cheque to a chum who took some of my bets in his own name, was £20. Now I have nothing. So you will see——"

"Yes," interrupted Brett, "it is a hard case. But death is no settlement. Nobody gets paid and everybody is worried."

Digitized by Google

"My dear fellow, my life is in your keeping for seven days. After that, I presume, I take myself in charge again."

The barrister thought deeply before he inquired: "Why did you go to the Casino to-night, then, if you do not patronise the tables as a rule?"

The other coloured somewhat and laughed sarcastically. "Just a final bit of folly. I dreamt that my luck had turned."

"Dreamt?"

"Yes, last night. Three times did I imagine that I was playing roulette, and that after a certain number—whether thirteen or twenty-three, I was uncertain—turned up, there was a run of seventeen on the red. The funny thing is that I had an impression that the number was twenty-three, but with a doubt that it might be thirteen. I remember, during a sub-conscious state in the third dream, resolving to listen and look more carefully to discover the exact number. But again things got blurred. The only clear point was that the run of seventeen on the red commenced at once."

"Well?"

"Well. I took my last twenty, went to the Casino, became a bit impatient when neither number turned up for quite a while, and then when thirteen appeared I backed the red. But four times it was the black that won."

"So I saw."

"Have you been keeping guard over me?"

"Yes in a sort of a way."

"You are a queer chap. I can't help saying that I am obliged to you. But it won't do any good. I am absolutely dead broke."

"Now listen to me. I will pay your fare back to London and give you something to live on until I return a week hence. Then you must come and see me, and I will help you into some sort of situation. But you must once and for all abandon this suicidal notion."

"What about my debts?"

"Confound your debts. Tell people to wait until you are able to pay them."

"And—and the girl?"

"If she is worth having she will give you a chance of making a living sufficient to enable you to marry her. She is of age, I suppose, and can marry anyone she likes."

Mensmore puffed his cigarette in silence for fully a minute. Then he said:

"You are a very decent sort, Mr.——"

"Brett—Reginald Brett is my name."

"Well, Mr. Brett, you propose to hand me £10 for my railway fare, and, say, £5 for my existence, until we meet again in London, in exchange for which you purchase the rights in my life indefinitely, accidents and reasonable wear and tear excepted."

"Exactly!"

"Make it £20, with a fiver down, and I accept."

"Why the stipulation?"

"I want to back my dream. The number is twenty-three, as it evidently was not thirteen. I want to see that thing through. I will put a fiver on the red after twenty-three turns up, and if I lose I shall be quite satisfied."

"What if I refuse?"

"Then I don't care a bit what happens for the next seven days. After that, au revoir, should we chance to meet across the divide. Please make up your mind quickly, as that run on the red may come and go whilst we are sitting here."

Brett opened his pocket-book. "Here," he said with a smile, "I will give you a ten-pound note. You will reach the maximum more quickly if you are right."

Mensmore's face lit up with excitement. "By Jove, you are a brick," he said. "So you really trust me?"

"Yes."

"Then give me back my revolver."

Without a word Brett handed him the weapon. Mensmore stood up and threw it far out into the deep waters of the Mediterranean.

"Come," he cried; "come with me to the Casino. You will see something. This is not my own luck; it is borrowed. Come, quick!"

They raced off, Brett himself being more fired with the zest of the thing than he cared to admit. Within the Casino all the tables were now crowded, but Mensmore hurried to the centre one.

"It was here that I played in my dream," he whispered, "soon after I came to it."

He edged through the onlookers, closely followed by Brett. Neither cared for the scowls and injured looks cast at them by the people whom they forced out of the way.

The Italian, the winner of half-an-hour ago, had come back like a moth to the candle. Now he was getting his wings singed. At last, with a groan, he hastily rose, but as a final effort flung the maximum, 6,000 francs, on the black.

The disc whirled round, the ball rested in one of the little squares, and the croupier's monotonous words came:

"Vingt-trois, passe, rouge gagne!"

Out bounced the Italian, and Mensmore seized his chair, turning to Brett with white face as he murmured:

"You hear! Twenty-three!"

He lovingly felt for the louis to assure himself he was not dreaming.

Digitized by Google

The barrister nodded, and placed his hands on Mensmore's shoulders as though to steady him.

Mensmore staked his £10 note on the red. It became £20, then £40. Another whirl and it was £80! a fourth made it £160.

Mensmore was now so agitated that the table and the players swam before his eyes. But Brett, under the stress of circumstances, had the gift of remaining preternaturally cool.

At the fifth coup the sum to Mensmore's credit was £320. He would have left it all on the table had not Brett withdrawn £80 in notes, as the maximum is £240.

When Mensmore won the sixth and seventh coups a buzz of animated interest passed around the board. People began to note the run on the red together with the fact that a man was staking the maximum each time. Even the croupier cast a fleeting glance at the newcomer, as for the fourth time his long rake pushed across the table the little printed slip which sets forth that the Casino owes the bearer 6,000 francs.

Thenceforth Mensmore sat in a state of stupor more pronounced now that he was playing and awake than when he dreamt he was playing.

Each time he mechanically pushed forth a maximum slip and received back two, whilst the eager onlookers now burst into cries of wonder that brought others running from all parts of the room.

Each time he mechanically pushed forward a maximum slip.

But Brett did not lose count.

When the red had turned up seventeen times, and the amount to Mensmore's credit was £3,200, he shook the latter violently as he was about to shove forward another maximum, and of his own volition, placed the little slip on the black.

"Douze, impasse noire gagne!" sang out the croupier, and Brett hissed into Mensmore's ear:

"Get up at once."

His strangely-made acquaintance obeyed, gathered up his slips and notes, fastened them securely in an inner pocket, and the pair quitted the Casino amidst extravagant protestations of goodwill and friendship from all the voluble foreigners present.

It was some time before the roulette tables began their orderly round again, for Mensmore's sensational performance was the equivalent to the proceeding at trente et quarante, familiarly known as "breaking the bank."

In the latter game there is the high limit of 300,000f., which, if once won, causes that particular table to cease play for the day.

In roulette, on the other hand, it is a mere question of endurance.

The highest recorded run is twenty-three on the black, but a run of seventeen on the red is sufficiently remarkable to keep Monte Carlo in talk for a week.

Albert Mensmore certainly could not complain that the events of that particular evening were dull. For one hour at least he lived in true fin de siècle style, having stepped back from the porch of death with dishonour, to the possession of a sum more than sufficient for his reasonable requirements.

The pace was rapid and almost fatal.

CHAPTER X.

SOME GOOD RESOLUTIONS.

ONCE safe in the seclusion of Brett's sitting-room his companion almost collapsed. The strain had been a severe one, and now he had to pay the penalty by way of reaction.

The barrister forced him to swallow a stiff brandy and soda, and then wished him to retire to rest, but the other protested with some show of returning animation.

"Let me talk, for goodness' sake," he cried. "I cannot be alone. You have seen me through a lot of trouble tonight. Stick to me for another hour, there's a good fellow."

"With pleasure. Perhaps it is the best thing you can do, after all. Let us see how much you have won."

Brett made a calculation on a sheet of paper and said: "Exclusive of the original stake of £10 you ought to have £3,190."

Mensmore pulled out of his pocket the crumpled up bundle of notes and bills. Brett's £10 note was amongst them, and he tossed it across the table with a smile.

"There's your capital. I will see if the total is all right before we go shares."

Reggie nodded, and Mensmore began to jot down the items of his valuable package. He bothered with the figures for some time but could not get them right. Finally he tossed everything over to Brett, saying:

"No matter how I count, I can't get this calculation straight. Seventeen coups, beginning with £10, work out at £3,190 right enough. But in this lot there is £3,430, and they don't pay twice at the Casino as a rule."

The barrister thought for a moment, and then laughed heartily. "I remember now," he said, "I kept careful count of the series of seventeen, and then, on my own account, as you were too dazed to notice anything, I put a maximum on the black. Your dream turned up trumps, as the series stopped and black won. Hence the odd £240."

Digitized by Google

"Then that is yours," said the other gravely. "I will take £1,190 to square all my debts, and we go shares in the balance, a thousand each, if you think that fair. If not I will gladly hand over the lot, after paying my debts I mean."

Mensmore's seriousness impressed the barrister more than any other incident of that dramatic evening.

"You forget," he replied, "that I told you I had money in plenty for my own needs. You must keep every farthing except my own £10, which you do not now need. No. Please do not argue. I will consent to no other course. This turn of Fortune's wheel should provide you with sufficient capital to branch out earnestly in your career, whatever it be. I will ask my interest in different manner."

"I can never repay you, in gratitude at any rate. And there is another who will be thankful to you when she knows. Ask anything you like. Make any stipulation you please. I agree to it."

"It is a bargain. Sign this."

Brett took a sheet of notepaper, bearing the crest of the Hotel du Cercle, dated it, and wrote:—

"I promise that, for the space of twelve months, I will not make a bet of any sort, nor gamble at any game of chance."

When Mensmore read the document his face fell a little. "Won't you except pigeon-shooting?" he said. "I am sure to beat that Russian next time."

"I can allow no exceptions."

"But why limit me for twelve months?"

"Because if in that time you do not get sense enough to stop risking your happiness, even your life, upon the turn of a card or the flight of a bird, the sooner thereafter you shoot yourself the less trouble you will bring upon those connected with you."

"You are a rum chap," murmured Mensmore, "and you put matters pretty straight, too. However, here goes. You don't bar me from entering for sweepstakes."

He signed the paper, and tossed it over to Brett, whilst the latter did not comment upon the limitation to his intentions imposed by Mensmore's final sentence. The man undoubtedly was a good shot, and during his residence in the Riviera he might pick up some valuable prizes.

"And now," said Brett, "may I ask as a friend to what use you intend to put your newly-found wealth?"

"Oh, that is simple enough. I have to pay £500 which I lost in bets over that beastly unlucky match. Then I have a splendid 'spec,' into which I will now be able to place about £2,000—a thing which I have good reason to believe will bring me in at least ten thou' within the year, and there is over a thousand pounds to go on with. And all thanks to you."

"Never mind thanking me. I am only too glad to have taken such a part in the affair. I will never forget this night as long as I live."

"Nor I. Just think of it. I might be lying in the gardens now, or in some mortuary, with half my head blown off."

"Tell me," said Brett, between the contemplative puffs of a cigar, "what induced you to think of suicide?"

"It was a combination of circumstances," replied the other. "You must understand that I was somewhat worried about financial and family matters when I came to Monte Carlo. It was not to gamble, in a sense, that I stopped here. I have loafed about the world a good deal, but I may honestly say that I never made a fool of myself at cards or backing horses. At most kinds of sport I am fairly proficient, and in pigeon-shooting, which goes on here so extensively, I am undoubtedly an expert. For instance, all this season I have kept myself in funds simply by means of these competitions."

Brett nodded approvingly.

"Well, in the midst of my minor troubles, I must needs go and fall over head and ears in love—a regular bad case. She is the first woman I ever spoke two civil words to. We met at a picnic along the Corniche Road, and she sat upon me so severely that I commenced to defend myself by showing that I was not such a surly brute as I looked. By Jove, in a week we were engaged."

The barrister indulged in a judicial frown.

"No. It's none of your silly, sentimental affairs in which people part and meet months afterwards with polite inquiries after each other's health. I am not made that way; neither is Phil—Phyllis is her name, you know. This is for life. I am just bound up in her, and she would go through fire and water for me. But she is rich, the only daughter of a Midland ironmaster with tons of money. Her people are awfully nice, and I think they approve of me, though they have no idea that Phil and I are engaged."

He paused to gulp down a strong decoction of brandy and soda. The difficult part of his story was coming.

"You can quite believe," he continued, "that I did not want to ask her father, Sir William Browne—he was knighted by the Queen for his distinguished municipal services—to give his daughter to a chap who hadn't a cent. He supposes I am fairly well off, living as I do, and I can't bear acting under false pretences. I hate it like poison, though in this world a man often has to do what he doesn't like. However, this time I determined to act straight and above board. It was a very odd fact, but I just wanted £3,000 to enable me to make a move which, as I tell you, ought to result in a very fair sum of money, sufficient, at any rate, to render it a reasonable proposition for Phil and I to get married."

Brett was an appreciative listener. These love stories of real life are often so much more dramatic than the fictions of the novel or the stage.

"The opportunity came, to my mind, in this big tournament. I had no difficulty in getting odds of six or seven to one to far more than I was able to pay if I lost. Phil came into the scheme with me—she knows all about me, you know—and we both regarded it as a certainty. Then the collapse came. She wanted to get the money from her mother to enable me to pay up, but I would not hear of it. I pretended that I could raise the wind some other way. The fact is I was wild with myself and with my luck generally. Then there was the disgrace of failing to settle on Monday, combined with the general excitement of that dream and a fearfully disturbed night. To make a long story short, I thought the best thing to do was to try a final plunge, and if it failed, to quit. I even took steps to make Phil believe I was a bad lot, so that she might not fret too much after me."

"Just think of it, I might be lying dead in the gardens now or in some mortuary.'

Digitized by Google

Mensmore's voice was a little unsteady in this last sentence. The barrister tried to cheer him by a little bit of raillery:

"I hope you have not succeeded too well?" he laughed.

"Oh, it is all right now. I mean that I left her some papers which would bring things to her knowledge that, unexplained by me, would give anyone a completely false impression."

The subject was evidently a painful one so Brett did not pursue it.

"About this speculation of yours," he said. "Are you sure it's all right and that you will not lose your money?"

"It is as certain as any business can be. It is a matter I thoroughly understand, but I will tell you all about it. If you will pardon me a moment I will bring you the papers, as I should like to have your advice, and it is early yet. You don't want to go to bed, I suppose?"

"Not for hours."

Mensmore rose, but before he reached the door a gentle tap heralded the appearance of a hall-porter.

"There is a letter for the gentleman. Monsieur is not in his room. He is reported to be here, so I bring it."

Mensmore took the note, read it with a smile and a growing flush, and handed it to the barrister, saying: "Under the circumstances I think you ought to see this. Isn't she a brick?"

The tiny missive ran:

DEAREST ONE,—You must forgive me, but we are both so miserable about that wretched money that I told mother everything. She likes you, and though she gave me a blowing-up, she has promised to give me £500 to-morrow. We can never thank her sufficiently. Do come round and see me for a minute. I will be in the verandah until eleven.—Ever yours, PHYLLIS.

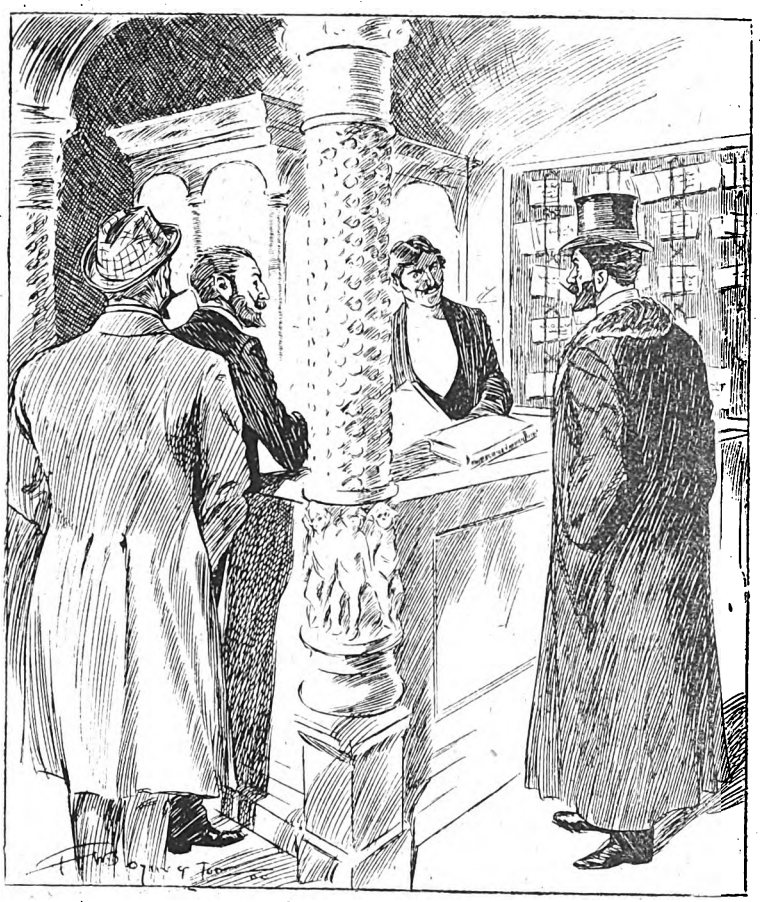
Reggie returned the note. "Luck! you're the luckiest fellow in the South of France. Why, here's the mother plotting with the daughter on your behalf. Sir William hasn't the ghost of a chance. Off you go to that blessed verandah."

When Mensmore had quitted the hotel Brett descended to the bureau to take up the threads of his neglected quest. The letter to Sydney H. Pyne was still unclaimed, and Brett thought he was justified in examining it. On the reverse of the envelope was the embossed stamp of an electric lighting company, so the contents were nothing more important than a bill.

An hour later Mensmore joined him in the billiard-room, radiant and excited:

"Great news," he said. "I squared everything with Lady Browne. Told her I was only chaffing Phil about the five hundred, because she spoilt my aim by shrieking out. Sir William has chartered a steam yacht to go for a three weeks' cruise along the Gulf of Genoa and the Italian coast. They have put him up to ask me in the morning to join the party. Great Scott! what a night I'm having!"

They parted soon after, and next morning Brett was informed that his friend had gone out early, leaving word that he had been summoned to breakfast at the Grand Hotel, where Sir William Browne was staying.



Other men came and asked for Pyne—sharp-featured men with imperials and long moustaches.

During the afternoon Mensmore came to him like a whirlwind. "We're off to-day," he said. "By the way, where shall I find you in London?"

Brett gave him his address, and Mensmore, handing him a card, said, "My permanent address is given here, the Orleans Club, St. James's. But I will look you up first. I shall be in town early in March. And you?"

"Oh, I shall be home much sooner. Good-bye, and don't let your good luck spoil you."

"No fear! Wait until you know Phyllis. She would keep any fellow all right once he got his chance, as I have done. Good-bye, and—and—God bless you!"

During the next three days the barrister devoted himself sedulously to the search for Pyne. He inquired in every possible and impossible place, but the man had utterly vanished.

Nor did he come to claim his letter at the Hotel du Cercle. As a matter of fact, it remained stuck on the baize-covered board until it was covered with dust, and the clerk at the bureau had grown weary of watching people who scrutinised the receptacle for their correspondence.

Others came and asked for Pyne—sharp-featured men with imperials and long moustaches—the interest taken in the man was great, but unrequited. He never appeared.

At last the season ended, the hotel was closed, and the mysterious letter was shot into the dustbin.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT PEOPLE.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "Pirate Gold," by J. R. Hutchinson, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. R. Jenkins, Little Boys' Press, South Darenth, Kent. Attempts this week must deal with Stories about ANY SUBJECT, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, January 14th. Post-cards only, please.

Courting.

AT a certain school, during a lesson in parsing, the sentence, "Man courting in capacity of bliss," was given, and the word "courting" came to a little girl, aged thirteen, to parse.

She commenced hesitatingly, but got on very well until she had to say what it agreed with. There she stopped short. But as the teacher said:

"Come, what does courting agree w th?"

Janet blushed, and held down her head.

"Janet, don't you know what courting agrees with?"

"Ye-ye-yes, ma'am."

"Well, Janet, why don't you tell me?"

Blushing still more, and stammering, Janet at last blurted out:

"It agrees with all the girls, ma'am."

R. J.

Must Prepare for Tourists.

A CERTAIN village, whose ponds and lakes had not been frozen over for many years, was recently visited by a very sharp and severe frost which lasted several weeks.

All the water in the district was thickly covered with ice, which afforded a splendid opportunity for skating. Visitors from all the country round flocked to this spot attracted by the prospect of some good sport.

The majority of them came unprovided with skates, and consequently the sudden demand at the village store was enormous. At last, the store-keeper, who had never before heard of skates, tired of having to turn away intending purchasers, remarked to his wife:

"Mary, we'll have to get in a stock of these 'ere skates, for, if the demand is so great now, what will it be in the summer when the tourists come?"

A. R. H.

"I'll Wrestle wi' It."

A WELL-KNOWN Dean was presiding once at a dinner given to a number of the agriculturists in his parish, among whom were a number with unlimited capacity for the good things of the table.

The Dean had a quarter of a lamb set before him to carve, which he proceeded to do by cutting off the shoulder and placing it on a plate at his left hand.

A farm labourer sitting next to the Dean quietly surveyed the proceedings with a widely-opened mouth and dilated inc edulous eyes.

At last the man pulled closer, and with loud guffaw looked into the Dean's face, saying:

"Well, maister, it's a biggish bit, but I'll wrestle wi' it."

J. G. B.

Sleeping in Church.

SLEEPING in church is sometimes severely dealt with by old-fashioned ministers, but we doubt if any form of rebuke can equal in severity that of an Indian chaplain.

During the sermon his congregation had peacefully slumbered, but they did not know what was before them, for at its close the preacher sternly remarked:

"Brethren, as this sermon has caused me considerable labour to compose, and as scarcely anyone has remained awake to listen to it, I shall read it again!"

And he did.

A. R. S.

Caught in the Act.

ONE afternoon, when a gale of wind was raging, a gentleman in feeble health was struggling to reach his home, aided by his wife.

Just as they reached the corner of a street a huge chimney-pot was torn from the roof of a house by the wind, and dashed to the ground just in front of the gentleman and his wife.

"Good gracious!" cried the gentleman, "that was a narrow escape for us."

The two stopped for a moment to examine the chimney-pot—more dangerous in a high wind than a bombshell; but just as they were scrutinising it, a window near by was opened, a female head was thrust out, and in a shrill voice she shouted:

"You needn't think you're going to carry that off, because it belongs to my house."

R. A.

Why He Was Armed.

AN English resident in Ladysmith, who acknowledged a belief in fatalism, had occasion to take a journey on foot outside the town soon after it was relieved, and to prepare himself for the journey he strapped his rifle to his back.

A friend finding him thus armed when setting out on the journey, expressed surprise, and added:

"I thought you were of opinion that you would have to die when your turn came in spite of all you could do to prevent it. Why, then, carry a rifle?"

"Well, you see, I may meet an armed Boer," was the reply.

"But he will kill you if it is so ordained," urged the other.

"Yes, but don't you see," said the traveller drily, "it may be the Boer's turn to die!"

W. C.

Digitized by Google

The Parson and the Billygoat.

A FEW years ago an old woman from Derbyshire paid a visit to some friends living at a distance, who on the Sunday she was staying with them persuaded her to accompany them to church.

Taking her seat in the gallery a distance from the pulpit, she appeared to listen very attentively to the sermon, when she suddenly began to weep.

At the close of the sermon the minister sent for her into the vestry.

"Now, my good woman, I saw you weeping. May I ask what part of my sermon so affected you?"

The old woman said:

"It wer none o' the sarmon that affected me, for I couldn't hear a word you said, but seeing thy jaws go wag wag, wag, and thy beard wobbling about, it made me think o' my auld billy goat as deid a fornit come Monday."

The interview terminated abruptly. C. S.

The Show was Not Postponed.

As most of our readers will remember, the Royal Agricultural Society's show was held at York during the past summer, the Prince of Wales, as President of the Society, attending.

As a whole, the inhabitants of the district were gratified by the Society's choice of a show-ground, but that there were exceptions, the following little incident proves:

Somebody suddenly discovered that the date of the Royal show clashed with that of another very important event—the village feast, to wit.

The matter was discussed with some warmth in the particular village referred to, and one aged inhabitant even went so far as to move a resolution on the subject.

"I moves," he remarked, "as this meetin' o' intelligent villagers protests agin this 'ere sneakin' of oor dates, an' that a letter be wrote to His R'yal 'Ighness axin' 'im to put off his show till oor feast's ower!"

J. R. T.

He Also Ran.

THE proprietor of a Birmingham restaurant advertised for a cook during the racing season.

The first to apply for the berth appeared to be very suitable. But before engaging him the restaurant keeper inquired if he could give him a tip for the "Derby."

The cook's eyes brightened.

He whispered a "dead cert," and mentioned that he had five shillings on the horse himself.

That was enough.

The proprietor gave him a lecture on the evils of betting, and showed him the door. As he went out he saw another man about to enter.

"Are you going to apply for the job?" he asked. "Well, if you're asked if you know anything about racing, say you can't tell a 'Derby' winner from a coster's donkey."

The man took the advice, was engaged, and commenced his duties.

Presently the proprietor rushed up to the speaking-tube, and yelled to the new cook:

"Calf's head one."

Instantly the reply came back:

"Did he, by George? Who came in second and third?"

L. J. W.

YOUR HEAD AND SHOULDERS ONLY.

IF you have a relative who has passed away either at home in peace or abroad in war, send his photograph—which you probably cherish—and we will enlarge it to a beautiful India ink and crayon portrait, 15in. by 12in., mounted on plate sunk mount 24in. by 19in.

Relatives of soldiers at the front may obtain one of these enlargements for 6s.

Other photographs will be enlarged for 7s.

You will certainly get a genuine bargain by availing yourself of this offer. The enlargements can be made from any photograph, large or small, tin-types, or any kind of glass picture, provided the print is legible. All the enlargements are of the head and shoulders only.

What to do.

Write your name and address plainly in ink on a slip of paper, also on the back of the portrait you are sending us. Get a postal order for 7s. (if the photograph be that of a soldier or sailor get a 6s. postal order). Place all of these in an envelope, or make a securely packed parcel of them and address it to the PORTRAIT EDITOR, Pearson's Weekly, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A Reduction of Threepence

on each enlargement, when the order is for two or more from the same photograph, will be made.

Orders will be treated in rotation.

All photographs—particularly those on glass—should be securely packed. Although all possible care will be taken, we do not hold ourselves responsible for photographs damaged or lost in transit.

Obtainable at all Newsagents' Shops and Bookstalls.

Digitized by Google

MRS. GUM'S ONE FAILING.

I DO not for a minute say that Mrs. Gum, my landlady, has not got good qualities, for she has a charm of manner that is pretty to behold, and her cooking leaves very little to be desired.

But what I do think is that Mrs. Gum might refrain from raking up my past history. She says that I bring back recollections of long ago to her mind; and then she gives me the benefit of them.

Just because Mrs. Gum happened at one period of her life to be my nurse, she believes that the greatest favour she can bestow upon me is to regale me with various anecdotes respecting my early doings, capabilities and attractions.

She will put the beer on the table with the remark that I was brought up on the bottle; or the butter-dish would be put in its place with the giddy information that I always would insist upon playing in the coalbox.

Now highly exciting as these infantile titbits may be at first they soon begin to pall upon one; and I believe that a prolonged course would, in the end, drive one to drink and crime.

Matters reached a climax one day when two lady friends of mine came to take tea with me.

One of the lady friends was young and the other was her aunt.

I had been thinking about this little tea party for some time, for Norah had promised to persuade her aunt to come.

Thinking to give Norah's aunt a treat I had spent a great deal of time finding out from Norah the especial kind of delicacy she liked to assimilate at tea.

After much discussion, which occupied several hours a day for a week beforehand, we decided on a small cup of tea with balanced bread and butter—that is to say a piece of bread and butter balanced on the saucer of the aforesaid cup—for Norah's aunt. Norah said her aunt never could balance her cup and pay any attention to anything else; so we two decided to have strawberries and cream.

The eventful day arrived, my small sitting-room had been purged of tobacco smoke, and looked quite gay and festive with flowers, whilst I was striding quickly up and down the room calmly awaiting my visitors.

Norah's aunt's name was Mrs. Bray, and Mrs. Gum dropped her a curtsy. I felt at the time that I ought to follow Mrs. Gum's example, but I am glad now I didn't.

To tell the truth I felt like dropping on the floor altogether, but, as I said, I'm glad I didn't.

Now everything went on swimmingly until Mrs. Gum began to purr.

I must have seemed very happy and I suppose Mrs. Gum had noticed the fact.

Tears began to come into Mrs. Gum's eyes and I knew that that was a sure sign that she was going to purr.

At first I could hear her purring to herself, "What a dear, fat baby he was, bless him. Brought up on the bottle, too," and so on and so on until Mrs. Gum, carried away by her emotions, uttered aloud the appalling remark: "Eh, but you was always fond of the girls Master Harry, bless your heart!"

Mrs. Bray dropped the cup of tea Mrs. Gum had given to her a couple of minutes before, and I sat upon mine, which I had put down whilst I handed some strawberries to Norah.

Of course I felt I ought to explain and that only made Norah laugh the more.

I don't know how that tea-party finished. I have not the slightest recollection of anything beyond the fact that after my visitors had gone I buried my head in the cushions upon the sofa and kicked for half-an-hour.

The worst of it was that I could not make Mrs. Gum see the enormity of her offence; and the only way I saw of weaning Mrs. Gum from her vice was to set about giving her other things to think of.

So I thereupon determined to give Mrs. Gum food for reflection in the shape of chemistry.

I thought it might do her good, cultivate her intellect, and help her mind from relapsing into ancient history.

Digitized by Google

It was with these good intentions that I one day made the remark in most solemn tones:—

"Mrs. Gum, perhaps you are not aware that this water is an oxide of hydrogen!"

Mrs. Gum dropped a fork in her alarm and stared at the water jug I held.

"Well, sir," she said, "you do surprise me. I only drawed it fresh this morning and put it in the filter, sir, I do assure you."

I put the jug down and she immediately clutched it and held it up to the light.

"You don't understand me, Mrs. Gum. I am not finding fault with the water; but what I wished to tell you was that water is composed of oxygen and hydrogen. That, Mrs. Gum," I continued "is a fact known to all the leading scientists of the day."

"Lor', sir, you don't say so! Well, there's no telling what we eat and drink now-a-days. I suppose it's them water companies as has done it, sir."

"Done what, Mrs. Gum?" I asked.

"Put them things in what you said, sir, for I never heard tell of 'em being in afore."

"I am afraid, Mrs. Gum, that you still misunderstand me. Hydrogen and oxygen are gases, and these gases are in that water there on the table, in a state of combination. Now, do I make myself clear?"

"Well, I never heard the like, sir. I've heard of 'em putting water in the gas to make it burn proper, but as for 'em putting gas in water, it do beat all. Isn't it bad for the innards, sir?"

"You have not grasped it yet, Mrs. Gum," I replied. "There are other gases than coal gas, and the two I have named unite to form water. When either of them, Mrs. Gum, burns in an atmosphere of the other, water is the result. Now, do you understand me?"

Mrs. Gum looked at me and began to smile.

"It's one of your jokes, sir. You always was one for jokes."

I frowned; my whole system revolted at the idea. I looked sternly at Mrs. Gum and said quietly yet distinctly:

"Mrs. Gum, you have made a great mistake. Levity and chemistry are antipodal."

"Oh! it is some of your chemicals is it, sir?" said Mrs. Gum with a sudden look of intelligence.

"What I told you, Mrs. Gum, was a fact discovered by Cavendish and interpreted by Lavoisier, both of whom were eminent chemists."

"I know of a tobacco called Cavendish, it's what my poor husband used to smoke. What was the other gentleman's name, sir?"

"Lavoisier, a Frenchman," I replied.

"I'd a deal rather have English ones myself, sir, as you never knows what them furriners puts in their pills. Not as that I troubles 'em much, sir, never being much poorly and a drop of senna tea last thing sets me as right as never was."

"We are getting farther from the point, Mrs. Gum," said I, returning once more to the attack in the interests of science, "I don't think you quite understand yet that that water on the table——"

"Shall I bring you a bottle of beer, sir, and throw the water away?" interrupted Mrs. Gum. It must have been the heavy rain we have had as has done it."

I looked at Mrs. Gum, sighed and said:

"Bring two bottles of beer Mrs. Gum, I feel I need two at least."

That was my first and last attempt to cultivate Mrs. Gum's mind.

It took me a quarter of an hour explaining to the plumber I found at work next day ripping up sundry boards and pipes, that there was no escape of gas, and that I had never said the gas was escaping into the water.

Although I paid that plumber half-a-crown for loss of time, I still think he looks upon me as a kind of confirmed idiot. I told Norah that I had been trying to lead Mrs. Gum into the paths of rectitude; but she only laughed at me and said that Mrs. Gum was a dear old soul and that I was a silly fellow.

I tried to balance up that statement but couldn't; nor could I understand why Norah and Mrs. Gum kissed each other so much whenever they met.

I often used to wish that Norah would feel what I felt when Mrs. Gum besmirched my fair name with past history.

Happy was the day when that wish was fulfilled.

I remember the day well by reason of an appointment I had that I felt I must keep. I was to be married.

Norah was there and so was Mrs. Gum.

As I went up the aisle I heard Mrs. Gum distinctly remark "Brought up on the bottle he was, bless his little heart!"

But it was when all was over and we were about to set off for the station that Mrs. Gum really became most original.

"It is not you I'll be dandling on my knee next Mister Harry, lor' bless both of you," said Mrs. Gum.

Then we drove off and the last glimpse I had that day of Mrs. Gum showed her to me with tears streaming down her dear old face, but happy and smiling.

W. ST. G. DRENNAN.

A £10 Note for a Single Word.

THE word we want from you is simply the title of a new paper we shall publish in the early spring.

The title of this paper must be expressed in one word. The shorter, the easier, and the more expressive, the better.

It is necessary, of course, in order that you may choose the best title, for you to know something about the proposed paper.

In the first place, it will be a

FIRST-CLASS HUMOROUS PAPER.

It will be filled each week with the work of the very best humorous artists in the United Kingdom, and will, in consequence, be a week's compendium of hearty, wholesome and unrestrained laughter.

The Editor of the BIG BUDGET is going to be responsible for the new paper, and you will find a few more remarks for your guidance concerning it in the Century Number of the BIG BUDGET, now on sale.

JUST OUT.

HOME COOKERY.

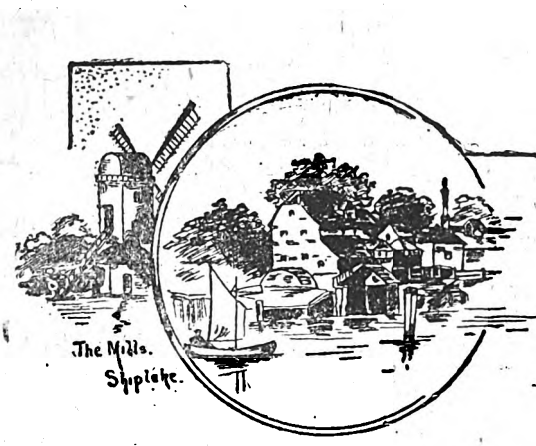
Absolutely necessary to the housewife.

"FOOD FOR THE MONTH" tells just what is in season.

"SIMPLE DINNERS FOR A WEEK," of the greatest assistance to ladies puzzled by the question of providing for their households.

PUBLISHED THE 1st OF EVERY MONTH, 1d.

Digitized by Google



A BONE OF CONTENTION.

THE first baby is not generally supposed to be a bone of contention. On the contrary it is, as a rule, considered a bond of union between its parents. Strange, however, to say, this was not the case with Captain Grant, of the 15th Hussars, and his wife. Indeed it nearly caused an estrangement, and it certainly had to answer for the only quarrel they ever had.

There is no doubt that when the infant first made its appearance, Jack Grant was as fond and proud a father as could be found in the United Kingdom.

He tried to see the numerous likenesses to various relatives which his wife discovered in their son; he persuaded himself he felt highly flattered when she declared she saw in the somewhat plain infant a strong look of himself; and finally wound himself up to such a pitch of enthusiasm, he actually made an awkward attempt to hold the child, and even impressed a fatherly kiss on its small, mottled, red face.

This was a very happy state of affairs so long as it lasted, but unfortunately a change was soon to be observed.

Captain Grant began to wish his wife could find some other subject on which to exercise her conversational powers than "the baby;" he also commenced to wonder if it were necessary to talk to the child in the senseless and extremely odd style which she and the nurse invariably used when they addressed it.

At last he was obliged to confess to himself that unnatural as it seemed, he occasionally found his boy, in spite of his numerous perfections, a decided bore.

"You see," he confided to his chum, Jim Reeves, "a fellow gets so awfully sick of hearing nothing but agoo-and agoo-and-a-bubble-bubble-bubble, which is the way my wife and the nurse always speak to the poor little brat. I can't get the idiotic rubbish out of my head; and upon my word, when some of the fellows the other day at the mess were talking of the new regulations that have just come out, and asked me what I thought of them, I was as near as possible making a consummate ass of myself before them all, by answering; 'Agoo-and agoo-and-a-bubble-bubble-bubble.' I assure you I was within an ace of doing so. If I could have a little sensible conversation with my wife when the child had been put to bed, it would not be so bad, but sleeping or waking 'the baby' occupies all the attention. I am supposed to be violently excited to hear of the 'heavenly, sweet smile' that came over the brat's face when he saw his bottle being brought to him, or that he managed to crawl three more inches on the ground, or something else that appears to me equally uninteresting. It's really awfully rough on a fellow."

"Rather trying," remarked his friend sympathetically.

"Trying," repeated Jack. "That is not the word for it. I declare it makes me so irritable, I sometimes feel inclined to swear at them all round, the baby included."

"Come," answered Jim, reprovingly, "I call that unfair. What! swear at a helpless infant, whose only method of retort and strongest language for some time to come will be 'a-goo' and 'a-bubble.' That is fighting upon unequal terms with a vengeance."

"Oh, if you are going to chaff me I'll shut up," replied Jack testily, "I only wish you were bothered by the same sort of thing, and then I don't think you would find it so amusing," saying which he turned on his heel and walked away in a huff.

It was in this unsatisfactory frame of mind regarding his first-born, that Jack proceeded to wend his way home one cold winter's afternoon a short time after Christmas. He had had a hard day's work, and was looking forward with a feeling of relief to a chat with his wife and a cigar before dinner. True his mind was somewhat disturbed by the thought that it was possible the tête-à-tête he anticipated might be broken into by the presence of a third party. But he resolutely shook off this gloomy foreboding, and walked on briskly towards his destination.

On arriving there and hearing his wife's voice somewhere overhead, he called out to her he was home, and was going to the smoking-room, where he would be glad of her company until it was time to dress for dinner.

"Very well, dear," she answered brightly, "we'll come in a minute."

"We!" said Jack to himself, "who else is she bringing? Surely it can't be the child. She can never mean to turn this room, as well as every other in the house, into a nursery. Hang it all, that would really be unbearable."

If, however, he had any doubts on the subject, they were soon to be dispelled, for he had hardly lit his cigar before his wife made her appearance with the baby in her arms.

"Well," thought Jack, resigned, "I suppose there is nothing for it but to grin and bear it."

"Now, Jack, my dearest," exclaimed his wife gushingly. "I have such a piece of news for you. You will never guess what it is. It is something almost too delightful for words."

"I also have something to tell you," broke in Jack, as his wife paused to take breath, for he felt instinctively that the important news his wife referred to had something to do with his off-spring, and he knew that once that all-absorbing subject was started all other topics of conversation would be inevitably banished for the time being. "I also have something to tell you. I met Chalmers to-day; he is staying here for a few days with his cousin, so I asked him to come and dine with us some time next week, and I think we might invite one or two people to meet him. Now, on what day do you think we had better ask him, and who else shall we have?"

Digitized by Google

"I will think about it in a minute," answered his little wife eagerly, "but I must tell you my news first. Fancy! Baby is getting a tooth, and he is only just four months old!"

"That's capital," said Jack, in a voice intended to express unlimited delight. "There is no doubt that the little fellow is very well on for his age. I should think now he will be trotting about all over the place before we know where we are."

"I don't think I should feel I was doing my duty by him if I allowed him to do such a thing, even if he could," replied his wife severely. "I don't know if you are particularly anxious to see your child grow up bandy legged. I can't say I am."

"Ah, yes, I forgot he is rather weak in the legs at present," remarked Jack in a crestfallen voice. "But, May," he continued, more cheerfully, feeling he had done his duty bravely, and nothing more could be expected of him for the present, "what about having Chalmers?"

"Let me see," said May, thoughtfully. Then appealing to the baby, "What does 'oo think, my pretty? Agoo-and-agoo-and-a-bubble-bubble——"

"Come," said Jack, a little impatiently, "try to arrange something, as Chalmers is only here for a few days, and I want you to write to him to-night."

"Must we tink, my sweet?" continued May, apparently oblivious of everything but the existence of her son, and only half-hearing her husband's last remark. "Must we tink, my beauty? Well, then, agoo-and-agoo-and-a-bub——"

"For Heaven's sake try for one moment to attend to what I am saying," said Jack sharply. "I won't trouble you long, and then you will be at liberty to return to your very intellectual conversation with the child."

This time, May took in what her husband said, but being annoyed at the way he had spoken she determinedly took no notice of his request, but, staring absently into the fire, went on talking to her baby.

"Yes, my own own, does your pretty papa want——"

"Confound it!" exclaimed poor, tired Jack angrily, "do you want to drive me mad with your infernal nonsense? I have never yet been considered pretty, nor have I any wish to be called so at this time of my life. Can't you find a more suitable adjective to apply to me than that."

"Indeed I can," returned May, losing her temper in her turn, "cross, ill-tempered, rude, unnatural, cruel, are all the words which may be applied to you in your present state of mind."

"Well, I am sure I am not surprised," retorted Jack, "the only wonder is I don't go off my head with hearing the flow of absurd nonsense that seems to me to go on, morning, noon and night."

"If you call talking to one's own child absurd nonsense, I don't," said May, with a great assumption of maternal dignity.

"I must say that it never struck me that you intended

IF YOU HAD PLENTY OF MONEY.

"Thanks to your great generosity in sending me that five thousand pounds I now have plenty of money in my pocket; and am free from the worries and trials of poverty, from which I had suffered so long."

There! if you had reason to write to a man in that way what a thing it would be, the money, and your gratitude to him who furnished it in the day of your dire need.

The writer will make no silly pretence of not caring for money. He does care for it, and so do all men and women of sound minds. For money represents about everything in this world worth having, except good health, and in a way money has a deal to do with that.

"Thanks to your wonderful medicine," writes Mr. W. J. Scuffins, of 35 Willow Grove, Burley, Leeds, "I am now enjoying good health after suffering a long time from indigestion.

"In the Spring of 1897 I found my health giving way. My skin turned dull and sallow, and the whites of my eyes actually got as yellow as an old gold coin. Of course you will understand what ailed me; it was biliousness, one of the commonest and meanest of all the ailments that make a man feel like getting down on all fours and doing a crawl.

"My right side, down where the liver is, was so sore I couldn't bear to touch it. When I ate a bit to keep myself from starving, I had such pains in the chest and back I wished I had let food alone; and if there had been a stone weight tied against my chest I couldn't have felt much worse in that region than I did as it was.

"The taste in my mouth was horrible; it almost made me sick. All my strength seemed leaving me, and when I got home at night from work I was so weary and fagged I had to lie down; and now and then I was obliged to leave off work for days.

"Some of my neighbours thought I was going off in a consumption, I got so weak and so thin and used to spit up such a lot of phlegm when I coughed.

"I spent pounds on doctors and their medicines, and but for Mother Seigel's Syrup I don't know what would have become of me. I had been ill fifteen months and am sure I couldn't have stood it much longer.

"The very first bottle of Seigel's Syrup gave me great relief, and the improvement went on until I was strong and well again. Now I have a good appetite and whatever I eat agrees with me.

"I owe my present health to Seigel's Syrup and no amount of money could have given me the comfort and contentment which resulted from the use of that splendid medicine. You are at liberty to publish my statement."—W. J. Scuffins, April 9th, 1900.

Digitized by Google

to talk, I thought it was mere babbling, but of course that may be my ignorance. Perhaps you will be kind enough to enlighten me as to the meaning of that much-used word—agoo."

"I shall do no such thing, for I can see that you are sneering both at me and my child. I must say for a man who sets up to be a gentleman, it is an extremely curious way of behaving. I confess I should never have thought you capable of speaking to me in the way you have."

"For goodness' sake don't preach; I am much too tired to listen."

"Very well, then, if my conversation bores you, I most certainly won't remain here any longer," saying which May walked out of the room looking very injured, and kissing her son as she went, murmuring tenderly, "At any rate, your mother loves you, you darling."

In spite, however, of the satisfaction of having enjoyed the last word, as she carried baby to the nursery May felt a very queer feeling in her throat, and seemed to have developed a cold in her head, in a remarkably short space of time.

Having left baby in Nurse's charge, and much to that worthy woman's astonishment, having parted from him without any of those little endearments she was wont to use to him before doing so, she proceeded straight to her room.

"Well, I never did," exclaimed Nurse, using that phrase so much beloved by the lower orders of society, which says so little, but is intended to convey so much. "I never did! To think she should leave her first-born without so much as a parting blessing! Never mind my sweety, if your mother forsakes you, your old nurse never will. No thank 'eaven, I tries to do my dooty by you, my hangel, and nought shall tempt my soul to go astray," and then having delivered herself of these lofty and truly elevating sentiments, a propos of nothing in particular, she proceeded to undress and bath the infant, feeling in that virtuous frame of mind we all enjoy when we have been saying anything very righteous and moral, whatever our acts may be.

In the meanwhile, the unfortunate object of Nurse's displeasure was sitting in her room, weeping bitterly, all her dignity and temper washed away in tears. It must be acknowledged that it was some time before May arrived at this state of penitence. At first she could think of nothing but the contempt with which she considered Jack had treated her son; it was this, she told herself, that wounded her, even more than the way he had spoken to her.

He had not kissed it when he came in, had expressed no desire to look at its mouth and judge for himself as to whether the tooth would be long in coming (which was what anyone with even a moderate share of fatherly feeling would have done), and, in fact, he had behaved disgracefully.

"Yes, disgracefully," she repeated to herself, as she sat by her window looking out into the winter's gloom, with flushed cheeks and eyes full of angry tears, which she was too proud to let fall, "disgracefully; and so I shall tell him when I see him."

By-and-bye, however, her anger began to vanish, and her reflections with regard to Jack were of a milder description. Had she not been a little hasty with him? After all, might he not, perhaps, have reason to complain?

Of course, it was difficult to understand anyone being bored by Baby, with his funny little ways and odd little chuckle; but still, what had her dear old mother said, when she had told her of her plan of bringing him up from his earliest infancy to be a great companion to his father, so that he should learn as soon as possible to enter into all his parent's plans?

"Take care, my dear," had been her mother's words, "that you don't give Jack too much of a good thing."

Well, she had laughed at the time, but was there not some truth in the advice? Perhaps poor Jack had come home tired, quite worn-out, and in no humour for Baby's company, so no wonder he had been a little impatient. There was no doubt he was really very good-tempered; he could not have been feeling so bright as usual, or he would not have been annoyed. It was all her fault for teasing him with her nonsense, and she ought to be ashamed of herself.

Yes, his health was rapidly being ruined, and it was entirely her own doing; upon which, having arrived at this melancholy conclusion, she could no longer restrain her grief, but burst into a flood of tears.

It was at this stage of the proceedings, and while she was sobbing most vehemently, she felt her husband's strong arms round her, as he said gently:

"Don't cry little woman. I'm awfully sorry for all I said."

Then as she looked up at him with a loving though rather watery smile, he continued regretfully:

"I can't think what made me behave to you as I did. I know I was an awful brute, but I was not feeling very fit; not that that is any excuse for the way I spoke to you. But please forgive me, darling."

May's answer to this somewhat incoherent speech was to throw her arms round Jack's neck and give him a good hug, as she said impulsively:

"Why, Jack, I want you to forgive me. I am so sorry I lost my temper."

"My dear, you have no reason to apologise," he replied. "I am sure I wonder you did not give it to me hot as I deserved, and it is only because you are the dearest little girl that ever lived that you did not do so. But let us forget the unpleasant business and kiss and be friends," saying which he suited the action to the word, and the reconciliation was complete.

The only thing that now remained to be done was to pay a visit to the cause of all the trouble, and this was not forgotten, as after a minute or two May and Jack proceeded to the nursery, and, as baby happened to be enjoying his bottle, he chanced to be in a very good temper.

Accordingly, when he saw his parents, he condescended to look up for a moment from his meal, and give them a most amiable smile—a little rapid, perhaps, but still very well-meaning, so that nothing was wanting to complete the family felicity.

After this little episode everything went considerably more smoothly, May realised that a man of thirty and an infant of four months are not very congenial companions, seeing that they can hardly be said to have many ideas in common, and that the former decidedly objects to be deserted for the latter; whilst Jack on his part began to comprehend what an unfailing source of interest and amusement a baby is to womankind in general, and its mother in particular, and so learnt to make allowances for the raptures with which his wife viewed their child. Having arrived, therefore, at a better understanding on the subject, it never again caused any trouble, and if you were now to ask his parents about him, they would tell you that since that time Baby had never been anything to them but a bond of union.

E. K. H.

Digitized by Google

Height 12ins. Width 7ins. Depth 3ins.

Rye Clock (WITH ALARUM) 18/-

FREE TRIAL, 2/6.

Any reader of Short Stories can have one of these clocks on monthly payments as follows:—

YOU send us 2/6 with your name and address, and we will send you one on approbation.

IF you approve of it you send us 3/- on receipt, and 2/6 each month for five months, making the full 18/-.

BUT OUR NET CASH-WITH-ORDER PRICE IS 16/- ONLY.

If you do not approve of the clock we will refund cash sent if clock is returned within seven days. (Signed) J. N. MASTERS.

FREE TRIAL

CLOCK or PARCEL

FOR 2/6

NO MAN ON EARTH

NEED BE without one of our NICKEL SILVER PUZZLE BOXES. You can use it for a Match-box, a Stamp-box, a Pen-box, or one hundred different uses, and it will amuse and excite you and your friends hours trying to open it. We shall present one ENTIRELY FREE to every customer during January. For further particulars send for our special Bargain Booklet of all the latest goods suitable for presents. Brooches from 1/-, Real Gold Gem Rings from 4/-, and hundreds of other goods at similar low Prices. Shall we send you a copy post FREE? Send us your name and address.

50 Full-Size Table Requisites for 22/6 CASH. 25/-

J.N.MASTERS L^TD "CUTLERS RYE.

WE will supply any reader of Short Stories with one of these 25/- parcels of Cutlery on monthly payments as follows:

YOU send us 2/6 with your name and address, and we will send you one on approval.

IF you approve of it, you send us 2/6 on receipt of parcel, and 5/- each month for four months, making the full 25/-. But

OUR NET-CASH-WITH-ORDER PRICE IS 22/6 ONLY.

And we will refund the Cash sent, if you do not approve of the parcel and you return it at once. (Signed) J. N. MASTERS.

Each Parcel contains 50 Articles.
6 Table Knives.
6 Dessert Knives.
6 Table Forks.
6 Dessert Forks.
2 Table Spoons.
6 Dessert Spoons.
6 Tea Spoons.
1 Pair Sugar Tongs.
1 Sugar Sifter.
6 Egg Spoons.
2 Salt Spoons.
2 Mustard Spoons.

J. N. MASTERS LIMITED, "VERACITY" WATCHMAKERS, RYE, SUSSEX.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.

GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS, 148 Old Street, London, E.C.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

FREE. FREE.

NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

Our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch (with chain), or A Real Gold Ring Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money.

Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A WRITTEN GUARANTEE for TEN years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

SEND NO MONEY. Send no money. Write to-day.

BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 5), 252 CENTRAL CHAMBERS GLASGOW.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 184s High St., Camden Town, London, N.W., 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

HAVE YOU TRIED KEATING'S LOZENGES FOR YOUR COUGH?

ANY DOCTOR WILL TELL YOU "there is no better Cough Medicine."—One gives relief: if you suffer from cough try them but once; they will cure, and they will not injure your health; an increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1s¼d. tins.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.

THE MARSTON CO., 59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Pinsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

Digitized by Google

The Fox Kettle.

On the beautiful shores of the Bay of Odawarra there lived, many years ago, a young couple. The man was out with the boats fishing for the greater part of the week, whilst his wife strove to make some little addition to their precarious income by the sale of fruits and sweetmeats to travellers.

The fisherman was an honest, sober, hard-working fellow enough, but he had one great fault, and that was a rooted disrespect for the gods of his country.

"What good are they to us?" he would say to his wife, "I may kneel until my legs are sore, I may pray until my voice is hoarse, but for all that the gods don't send the fish into my nets, and I don't see that we get any the better off for all my devotions!"

His wife, who was a soft-speaking, gentle-minded woman always reproached him for the contempt with which he treated the gods, and would answer:

"Nay, Kikuchi, we have health and strength, and surely they are of far more worth than all the riches of the world."

They were sitting one evening over the charcoal brasier, the children were playing on the beach outside, and the kettle was boiling merrily. Suddenly the charcoal shifted, the kettle overturned, scalded the woman's hand, and put out the fire. Kikuchi, who had met with but poor sport during the day, and who was not in the best of humours, broke out into a towering passion, seized the kettle, and flung it out on to the beach.

"Ever since I bought this horrid thing," he cried, "it has done nothing but give us trouble, so there it goes, and we'll get a new one," and he ran out and kicked the kettle angrily about until it disappeared in the waves.

When he returned he found his wife in an agony of tears.

"What is the matter, O'Hana?" he asked.

O'Hana did not reply but merely pointed to a dark corner of the room. Kikuchi looked and saw a large fox staring at him with his red, sparkling eyes.

Seizing a wooden wine measure, he hurled it at the intruder, but the animal was too quick, and the missile crashed through the paper window into the street.

"Oh, Kikuchi, Kikuchi! what have you done?" cried O'Hana. "You've driven Kitsune away!"

Here it should be explained that the fox is held in universal reverence by the Japanese people. The god, Inari, patron of rice, fish, and daily food, is especially fond of assuming the guise of the fox, and his appearance is looked upon, according to circumstances, as a good or evil omen.

"Well, what do I care?" retorted Kikuchi, gulping down a cup of wine. "What do I care for an ugly, red-eyed, prying fox? You believe he's a god, but I know better, and I only wish the thing had hit him."

But O'Hana was very sorrowful for the rest of the evening, and retired to bed with her children earlier than usual.

That night Kikuchi had a terrible dream. The kettle appeared in a flame of fire, and out of the spout a huge fox-brush. It remained at the foot of his quilt all the night, and seemed to glare at him with a couple of large red eyes.

During the next day his eldest boy, a bouncing youngster of seven, sickened. The doctor was called in. He examined the patient's eyelids, and asked: "Have you been quarrelling lately?"

Both husband and wife answered: "No."

"Have you been drinking too much?"

"No."

"Has anything out of the way happened lately?"

"Nothing in particular," said Kikuchi, "I was in a bit of a temper last evening with my old kettle, and kicked it away."

"Kicked a kettle away!" said the doctor, "that's a bad thing to do, for Kitsune is very fond of kettles. I thought that the child must have a devil, so if he takes a little Furidashi, and these twelve pills every half-hour with hot water, he will get over it."

The anxious parents tried the Furidashi and the pills, but with no beneficial effect, for the poor little fellow grew worse and worse. The last remedy was tried—the swallowing of the holy picture worn round every child's neck, dissolved in hot water, but with no success, for he died.

Still, Kikuchi was not convinced that he had done wrong, but continued to rail at the gods in general and at Kitsune in particular, in the wildest manner. The weird apparition still haunted him at nights, his fishing produced nothing, no travellers stopped to buy O'Hana's fruit, and everything went to rack and ruin. Then O'Hana resolved that she would go to the shrine of Inari on the hillside. So, when the moon rose behind the tall, black pine trees, she crept softly away unobserved by her husband, and knelt at the shrine of the god.

"O, Kitsune!" she said, with the tears streaming from her eyes, "I am in great distress. Help me!"

A blaze of light appeared in the shrine, and in the midst of it she saw the great fox god. He looked at her for a moment with kindling eyes, and merely said:

"Find the kettle!" and disappeared.

As she descended the rough path she saw a red glare in the heavens. A terrible thought came across her mind, and, alas, when she arrived at the village she beheld her house in flames, Kikuchi and her children standing outside, and in the midst of the flames was the fox, crying out:

"The kettle! The kettle!"

Kind neighbours sheltered the homeless family for the night. O'Hana told Kikuchi all she had seen, and they started out to find the kettle.

Along the shore, through the village, on the high road, even to the great town they went, and at last in an old iron shop they found the kettle, much battered and bruised. Tenderly they wrapped it up and carried it back to the village: there they polished it, mended up the holes which had been made in its sides, and together they went to the shrine of Inari.

The god appeared as he had appeared to O'Hana, and in terrible tones he said:

"Kikuchi learn from this lesson never to mock at the gods, go and sin no more."

And Kikuchi mended his ways, religiously kept the kettle clean and burnished, paid his devotions twice a day at the shrine of Inari, and was rewarded by continual happiness and prosperity.

Frank Abell.

Digitized by Google

MORE ABOUT - -

Mr. HALL CAINE'S

- NEW NOVEL.

In our last issue we made an announcement which has doubtless been received with much satisfaction by the readers of SHORT STORIES. We were in the happy position of being able to announce the fact that we had been fortunate enough to secure the serial rights of Mr. Hall Caine's New Novel, and that it would appear exclusively in the pages of our new Magazine for Ladies which will appear on January 10th next.

"THE ETERNAL CITY" is one of those deeply engrossing stories which seem to hold the attention from first to last. Like most, one might say all, that this popular Novelist has written, this new work is of intense human interest; it is a story which will be much talked about, and doubtless there will be no little controversy on its account, but all will admit that underlying it are problems of vital importance to humanity, problems which have through the ages engaged the earnest thought of all social reformers.

As in "The Christian," there is a romantic side to "THE ETERNAL CITY." We think it will be generally acknowledged when this story is given in full, that it is the finest thing Mr. Hall Caine has yet written, and those who have read any of his works will know that that is saying a good deal.

Remember, there will be a large instalment in the first issue of "THE LADY'S MAGAZINE," which will be on sale on January 10th. Order at once, as there will only be a limited edition.

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S WEEKLY

FOOTBALL CLUB PICTURES.

1st Prize - - £50 in Gold.

SECOND LIST

2nd Prize - - - - £10 Note
3rd, 4th, and 5th Prizes - 3 £5 Notes
6th to 20th Prizes - 15 Sovereigns
21st to 40th Prizes - 20 Half-Sovs.

If you cannot find all the names, ask your friends to help you.

Below will be found ten pictures; each picture representing the name of a football club.

If you look at the picture in the margin you will see that the name is Blackburn Rovers. What are the other names?

All you have to do is to write underneath each picture, in the space provided, the name of the club you believe the picture to represent. The names are those of both Rugby and Association clubs. Keep your list by you till another has appeared.

Where the names of two clubs embody that of the same town, but with a different addition, the full title is indicated in the picture.

The prizes will be paid to the competitors from whom we receive the correct, or most nearly correct, solutions.

No more than one prize will go to any competitor.

Example.

Blackburn Rovers.

It must be taken as a condition of the competition that anybody competing therein agrees to abide by the Editor's final decision.

Intending competitors in the above would do well to procure a copy of "The Football Who's Who," which contains the names of most of the big clubs. This book will be found of great service in discovering the names depicted. It only costs a shilling, and may be obtained of all booksellers, and post free for 1s. 3d. from the publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

No. 11.....

No. 12.....

No. 13.....

No. 14.....

No. 15.....

No. 16.....

No. 17.....

No. 18.....

No. 19.....

No. 20.....

I send in this coupon as a competitor for the prize advertised in this paper, and subject to the conditions printed on this page:

Name and address.....

THINGS TO REMEMBER.

1. Coupons may be sent either from "Pearson's Weekly" or "Short Stories."
2. Do not send in your coupons till we tell you.
3. All coupons are sent at senders' risk, and if they go astray, from whatever cause, we do not accept responsibility.
4. Competitors must attach their private address to their attempts. No prize will be sent to any post-office, refreshment rooms, or other places at which letters are called for. Attempts bearing such addresses will be disqualified.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

RESCUED FROM DRINK

Heroic Work of a Girl in Saving Her Brother from Drunkenness.

Put a Remedy in His Coffee and Without His Knowledge of the Secret Was Completely Cured.

The terrible evil of drunkenness has at last found a conqueror. Miss Mary Roberts, of 1033 Golden Gate Ave., San Francisco, Cal., U.S.A., will gladly tell any lady who will write her how she saved her brother from ruin, and her words burn with a new hope to every woman who would rescue a son, brother, or husband from the scourge of drunkenness.

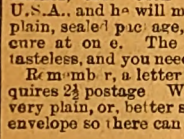
"May every mother, sister, or daughter learn from my experience, is my devout hope, and in thus making public the story of our private misfortune and subsequent blessings it is my earnest desire that every woman read in my words the way to happiness, not only for herself but for the man who is struggling with the curse of liquor upon him. Dr. Haines, who discovered Golden Specific, is deserving of woman's homage, and I am glad to know that he will send a free trial package of the remedy to every woman who writes him.

"Send your name and address to Dr. J. W. Haines, 3243 Glen Bldgs., Cincinnati, Ohio, U.S.A., and he will mail the remedy to you in a plain, sealed package, and thus you can begin the cure at once. The remedy is odorless and tasteless, and you need have no fear of discovery."

Remember, a letter to us from British Isles requires 2½ postage. Write your name and address very plain, or, better still, enclose a self-addressed envelope so there can be no mistake in delivery.

SPECIAL OFFER TO READERS OF "SHORT STORIES."

GOLD CLUSTER RING (Stamped)



3/9 Post Free.
Send size of finger.

with a fine imitation Ruby Sapphire, or Emerald centre surrounded by 12 Real Pearls. Orders for these rings sent off by return post. H. E. JONES, Manufacturing Jeweller, The Junction, Hulme, Manchester.

Unsolicited testimonial of this ring.

Lincoln, December 1900.

Dear Sir,—I received the ring this morning, with thanks to you; it is very pretty.—Yours respectfully, M. P.

Bankers: Williams, Deacon, Manchester and Salford Bank Ltd.

Mention Short Stories.

£50 CASH PRIZE SEND NO MONEY WE TRUST YOU.

FREE.

£2 10s. REAL SILVER

WE GIVE YOU YOUR CHOICE of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1s. 6d. each. (Regular price 2s. 6d.)

WE DO NOT WANT YOUR MONEY.

Just send us a STAMPED ADDRESSED ENVELOPE, and say that you will either sell the Jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the Jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13s. 6d. you have received for same, and we will at once send you (no waiting), Absolutely Free, our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A Written Guarantee for Ten Years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1s. 6d. each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

SEND NO MONEY. WRITE US TO-DAY.

FREE.

REAL GOLD AND REAL DIAMONDS

BRITISH GOLDSMITHS CO (DEPT. 29), 48 GRAY'S INN RD., LONDON.

Mr. Geo. R. Sims' Discovery

"TATCHO."

20,000 LARGE (4/6 SIZE) BOTTLES TO BE DISTRIBUTED

"TATCHO" is a brilliant spirituous tonic, the colour of whisky, free from all grease. A sprinkle of a few drops on the scalp and five minutes with the brush daily works marvels with every head of hair.

"TATCHO" acts as an invigorating tonic. It stops the hair falling, creates a luxuriant growth, and imparts to it a bright and youthful lustre.

"When I discovered the preparation, I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders," said Mr. George R. Sims to the representative of the Daily Mail. "Look at my hair now. Look at the colour. In time people got to know. Then the trouble began.

"Letters in thousands poured in to me from men and women in every quarter of the world, from all parts of the Kingdom, from America, India, Africa, China, and Australia. The work of answering the letters was enormous, and as far as possible the desired information was supplied; but it became quite evident that at the rate at which the demand was increasing I should very soon need a large staff of clerks to attend solely to the Hair renewer department of correspondence.

"In consequence, I said to myself. Why should this thing go on? If the public wants my hair renewer, the public shall have it; but the demand must be met in the ordinary business-like way. So I resolved to place the genuine article within reach of all, and with the assistance of a number of gentlemen, possessing the necessary commercial facilities, that has been accomplished."

THE GEO. R. SIMS' COMPANY HAVE DECIDED TO DISTRIBUTE

20,000 LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES OF TATCHO

to enable those who have not yet profited by Mr. G. R. Sims' discovery, to have the opportunity of doing so. The Company does this in the belief that such distribution will enable the preparation to become more widely known, and will introduce it to every home in a far more satisfactory manner than through unlimited puffing by advertisement.

COUPON.

S.S.

Jan. 12, 1901.

If you are desirous of participating in this distribution cut out this Coupon and send it to the Geo. R. Sims' Co., 81c Great Queen Street, London, W.C., accompanied by a postal order for 1/10. You will receive by return of post a plain package containing which will enable you to give TATCHO a fair trial and to satisfy yourself as to its merits.

A FULL SIZE 4s. 6d. TRIAL BOTTLE OF "TATCHO" POST PAID,

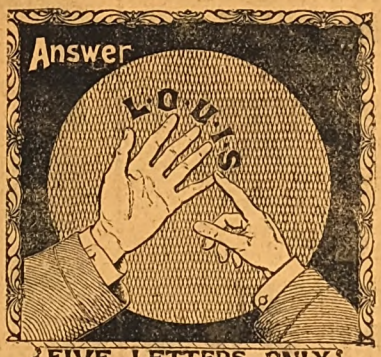
Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

HOW DO YOU SPELL VELVETEEN?



Don't Forget this when You Buy.

Every Yard is Stamped L-O-U-I-S

WHEN BUYING A CHEAP BICYCLE,

look at the tyres. If they are not the machine is not cheap at any price.

DUNLOP TYRES

Trade Mark.

The DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE CO., Ltd.,
FACTORY: Alma Street, Coventry;
160 to 166 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

BRANCHES: Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Nottingham
Manchester, Glasgow, Dublin, &c.

DON'T HAVE CORNS

BUNIONS or ENLARGED TOE JOINTS, when a packet of THOMPSON'S CELEBRATED CORN PLASTER
will cure you. It is thin as silk, and removes the pain at once. Post free, 14 stamps, from the Proprietor. Beware of imitations.

LADIES should take DR. SIMPSON'S ARSENICAL PEARLS. They secure a beautiful clear complexion, free from Blotch, Pimples and Roughness. Post free, 2/9 and 4/6 only, from M. F. THOMPSON'S Homœopathic Chemist, 17 GORDON STREET, GLASGOW.
Ask for Thompson's Pamphlet, "The Woman Beautiful."

OROCO SOX

A New Invention to keep the feet warm and dry yet allowing perfect ventilation
18 pairs post free for 1/-
State size required.
A boon for tender & tired feet

WILL SUIT YOU DOWN TO THE GROUND.

OROCO M'F'G. Co.
WIGAN.

ZEBRA

Grate Polish

No Hard Work.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

FOOTBALL PICTURE COMPETITION. £100 IN PRIZES.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 629. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 19TH, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

A Boon to Dyspeptics.

Quoted from "The Lady."

"In these high pressure days when men and women alike have to work incessantly with brain and hand to hold their own in the great battle of life, it is the exception rather than the rule to find anyone who does not suffer from that insidious and most distressing complaint—Dyspepsia—in one form or another. The most general symptoms of this disease—for it invariably develops into a disease if its progress remains unchecked—are Loss of Appetite on most occasions, varied by craving desires for food which is extremely indigestible; fearful depression of Spirits, together with various aches and pains in nearly every part of the body; the digestive organs refuse to perform their offices in a perfect manner, and, if neglected, the result is too often apparent in the contraction of cancer or tumour in the Stomach, abscess on the Liver, and many serious internal complications. The great remedies for these evils, if taken when Dyspepsia has not yet assumed its later and, in fact, fatal phases, are a really good tonic and a careful diet, combined with sensible health precautions; but hitherto no entirely satisfactory tonic for Dyspeptics has been discovered, as most preparations of the kind contain iron or quinine in some form, which, though valuable preparations in many cases, are devoid of digestive qualities. The preparation known as Guy's Tonic is, however, a wonderfully efficacious remedy. It is entirely free from iron, and therefore does not induce Constipation, a most important consideration. It contains no quinine either, but is composed of Vegetable tinctures from the 'British Pharmacopœia,' and is prepared from the formula of a London physician. It is more than a tonic, as besides strengthening the whole Nervous System and correcting a Sluggish Liver, it assists the process of Digestion in a very great degree; moreover it is pleasant to take."

Flatulence Corrected by Guy's Tonic.

Mr. A. J. Crabb writes from 41 Upper Tulse Hill, London, S.W.,:

"A lady friend of mine, who has been for a long time ineffectually treated by a Physician for Indigestion and Flatulence, wishes you to know that Guy's Tonic has quite cured her. I must say that in all cases where I have recommended Guy's Tonic the effects have been simply marvellous."

Guy's Tonic is a British Preparation of purely Vegetable origin. It is employed with excellent results in Hospital Practice, and is widely recommended by Medical Men. A new size (Six Ounce) Bottle of Guy's Tonic, price 1/1½d., is now on Sale at all Chemists and Stores.

Allen Foster & Co.

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

Buy Direct at First Cost from the Leading Firm of London Manufacturers.

Design No. 2130. 10/6

Design No. 2130. 10/6. The Famous Sacque Back Coat and Skirt Costume can be ordered with the coat made double or single-breasted, and is made in Black, Navy, Brown, Grey, Fawn and Red. It has a velvet collar, and the skirt is cut full with the box-pleated back—grand value for Half-a-Guinea. Securely packed, and sent carriage paid 6d. extra.

Design No. 2131. HALF-A-GUINEA. The Fashionable three-quarter Sacque Jacket, 30in. long. Made in a superior Beaver Cloth, in Black, Fawn, Brown, and Royal. This Jacket has a Chesterfield front and the new side pockets. Price only 10/6; carriage, 6d.

PATTERNS FREE.

Design No. 2131. Half-a-Guinea

WRITE FOR ILLUSTRATED SKETCH BOOK AND CATALOGUE OF BARGAINS. PATTERNS & ORDER FORMS POST FREE

Design No. 2130. 10/6.

Design No. 2720. 1/6½

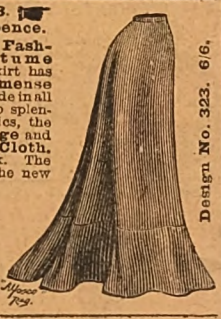
Ladies' Fur Necklet, in Sable, Brown, Black and Blue, Imitation Fox. Price only 1/6½; carriage, 3d.

No. 2720. GOOD 1/6½. VALUE.

Design No. 323. Six-and-Sixpence. The New and Fashionable Costume Skirt. This Skirt has proved an immense success. It is made in all colours of the two splendid wearing fabrics, the Specialite Serge and the Venetian Cloth. All sizes in stock. The Skirt is cut in the new circular shape, and has a 16in. flounce round bottom, which is lined with good linenette. A bargain, 6/6; carriage paid, 5d. extra. Send for one.



Design No. 323. 6/6.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,
THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,
47 Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Shilling packets

Kaputine "the" safe Remedy for Headache

WARNING. Instead of using the common White Headache Powders, which generally consist entirely of a crude drug, which has been condemned as dangerous by the medical papers, insist on having a bona-fide anti-quack remedy, recommended by such eminent medical authorities as Dr. RAMAGE, L.R.C.P., Dr. THURSTIN, L.R.C.P., late Dr. BOYD-WILLIAMS (Liverpool), the Editor of the Medical Journal, "Health," etc., etc. The name of this safe remedy is KAPUTINE.

ALL LEADING CHEMISTS SELL IT, OR CAN GET IT FOR YOU IN A FEW HOURS.

Sold by BOOT'S, TAYLOR'S, DAY'S, WHITE'S and other Stores. Most Co-operative Stores sell it.

PACKETS, 1/-. SAMPLES ONE PENNY,

or KAPUTINE LIMITED, HUDDERSFIELD,
will send it FREE for 12 stamps.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

FREE. FREE

Our £2 10s.

Real Silver Watch
(with chain),
or
A Real Gold Ring

Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

SEND NO MONEY.

NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money.

Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A WRITTEN GUARANTEE for TEN years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

Send no money. Write to-day.

BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 5).
282 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.

GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS,
148 Old Street, London, E.C.

GEO. R. SIMS'

"TATCHO"

4/6
Trial Bottles To-day
1/10

Address—GEO. R. SIMS CO.,
81c Great Queen Street, London, W.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

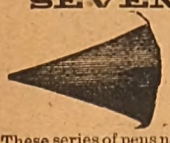
Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 23 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.



C. BRANDAUER & Co's CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. Assorted sample boxes, 6d., to be obtained from all Stationers. If out of stock, send 7 stamps direct to the works, Birmingham.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 629.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending January 19th, 1901.

BALLARAT JEMMY.

"BOY, bring me another cheroot!"

I had breakfasted luxuriously off roast fowl and curries innumerable, and, last but not least, a bottle of beer, cooled and refreshed in wet cloths hung in the wind.

Prefaces are laborious; let me put the matter briefly. Time, about half past twelve; place, on the borders of the district of Kegalle, in Ceylon; dramatis personæ, myself, aged twenty-eight, not troubled with humility, believing myself the most rising member of the Ceylon Civil Service, to which I have the honour to belong, and mightily proud of my district (Kegalle, as aforesaid), to the charge of which I had recently been appointed.

I was now on circuit work, and from six till eleven that morning I had been hard at work settling land claims of the natives; I had ridden fourteen miles, and walked about six, floundering through paddy fields and tramping through low scrub jungle alternately, so that I considered that I had well earned my bottle of beer at breakfast, a luxury which I never allowed myself except when on circuit in the district; for I had due regard for my liver, and intended to give the Service the benefit of all my energies for as many years as possible; good people were scarce, therefore I drank nothing stronger than claret when I was at my head-quarters in the town of Kegalle itself.

"Look sharp with that cheroot, boy!" I call again. And soon I am leaning back in a comfortable chair in the Rest House, with my second cheroot well alight, watching the blue smoke from my manilla with the just satisfaction of a man privileged by toil to be lazy for a while.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Behind me, in the outhouses of the Rest House, I hear the hum of voices from my servants and the peons who are eating their rice and curry placidly, while there is a measured thud, thud, of paddy being pounded for my horses, who neigh little, short, expectant neighs at the welcome sound. Before me a dusty road, white and hot in the noonday tropical sun; a long stretch of paddy field; and away behind them the quiet hills loom up against the cloudless sky, steep rising in verdant splendour of untouched virgin jungle, with here and there a clearing where some coffee estate proclaims civilisation, money-making and vandalism marring the world-old beauty of forest and hill.

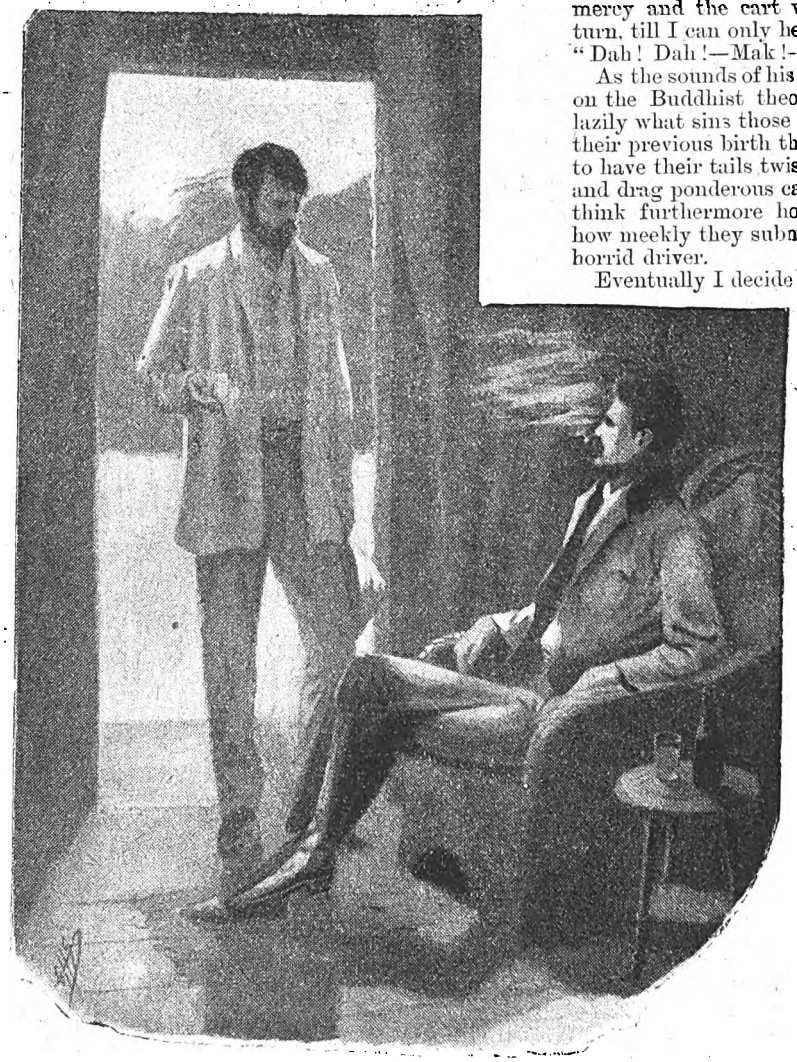
In the cool trees around the Rest House squirrels chirp and call, and gorgeous butterflies float lazily; while just in front of me a woodpecker, rich in crimson and speckled brown and red, hangs and swings and taps the twigs of a great suriya tree with his long beak; and a pretty humming-bird fly-catcher flits backwards and forwards dealing death among the countless flies that hum under the shadow of the trees.

I watch him over my cheroot with his deft curved length of bill; once he has a great fight with a butterfly which he tries to devour; but the butterfly is three times as big as he is, and sails away triumphantly over the trees into the road.

Presently a bullock-cart comes toiling and creaking along the road, the driver shrieking and swearing at his bullocks as only Singhalese bullock-drivers can—"Mak! Mak!—Dah!—Pita!—You sons of seven low-caste dhoby-women!—Mak!—Dah!" he yells in his high nasal voice, twisting the tails of the poor brutes as they struggle painfully up the steep road, with their patient necks bowed down by the heavy yoke. But the man has no mercy and the cart winds slowly out of sight round a turn, till I can only hear the yells of the driver faintly: "Dah! Dah!—Mak!—Mak!—Pita!—Dah!"

As the sounds of his abuse die away I fall to meditating on the Buddhist theory of transmigration. I wonder lazily what sins those poor bullocks had committed in their previous birth that they should be born again now to have their tails twisted more than half off their backs, and drag ponderous carts up heavy, dusty hills. And I think furthermore how patiently they bear it all, and how meekly they submit to the shrill nagging of that horrid driver.

Eventually I decide that their next birth will be in a higher circle and to better things; perhaps their present long-suffering will be rewarded by their being born hereafter as Singhalese drivers themselves, while their driver will be born in his turn as a bullock; and I am considering whether they too would twist tails and yell and swear, when I heard the sharp trotting of a horse down the road, and in another minute an Englishman—a coffee-planter clearly—has drawn rein opposite to the Rest House, and is talking to one of my peons, who is swaggering on the roadside after his breakfast, showing off his belt and badge before some women and large-eyed children, taking a chew of betel condescendingly from the prettiest of the young mothers, in return for some enormous lie which he has been telling them concerning the greatness of his master and by consequence of himself.



The planter comes up looking very hot and tired, and is introducing himself to me.

The peon drops his swagger, and is submissively answering the planter; then I see him direct him to the Rest House, and the planter comes up looking very red and tired, and is introducing himself to me.

"My name is MacFarlane,"

Digitized by Google

he says, "and I am very glad to have met you. I was posting into Kegalle for the District Judge, on a sad business; but you are a Justice of the Peace, are you not? and if you can kindly come with me it will save a great deal of time and a long ride."

"Yes. I am a Justice of the Peace," I answer, "though I don't do the judicial work of the district. I am the Government agent, you know." (We Revenue-officers rather look down on the judicial branch of the Civil Service, be it known.)

"So your peon told me; but if you can come with me I shall be most awfully obliged," and the planter mops his streaming forehead and looks terribly hot, poor fellow.

I take pity on him.

"Come in and have some beer; you seem quite knocked up. You can tell me what is the matter while you are drinking it, and I will see if I can help you."

He accepts gratefully, and empties a bottle of beer at a draught.

"That is a relief to a weary man," he says; "now let me tell you all about it. Well, there has been a poor neighbour of mine who has died last night from an overdose of laudanum. He was a queer, rough, hard-up sort of man—an Australian Yankee—and he and another man of the same cut, whom we always call Ballarat Jemmy, came over from Australia a few years ago, and bought an estate next to mine. We never saw much of them, though; they kept quite to themselves, living on nothing but cheese and brandy, I believe; chiefly brandy; and they got harder up, and less sociable, and less respectable every year, till we hardly knew they existed. But this morning, poor Ballarat Jemmy came rushing over to my bungalow, saying he had murdered Jock—that is Jock Braun, his partner, the dead man. I asked him what he meant, and how he had done it; and he said that Jock had been wild for days with toothache, and at last he had found some laudanum, and made him take it, and he must have taken an over-dose.

"Anyhow, he is dead; and poor Ballarat is drinking himself mad, and vows he is the man's murderer. I got some of the neighbours together, and we talked to Ballarat, and told him it was an accident, and no murder; and he won't let us bury the body, but insists on an inquest, and says a magistrate must be brought, and that he will give himself up as Jock's murderer, and be hanged. So at last I rode off for a magistrate, and I am heartily glad I met you on the road. I do hope you will come with me."

I thought a minute.

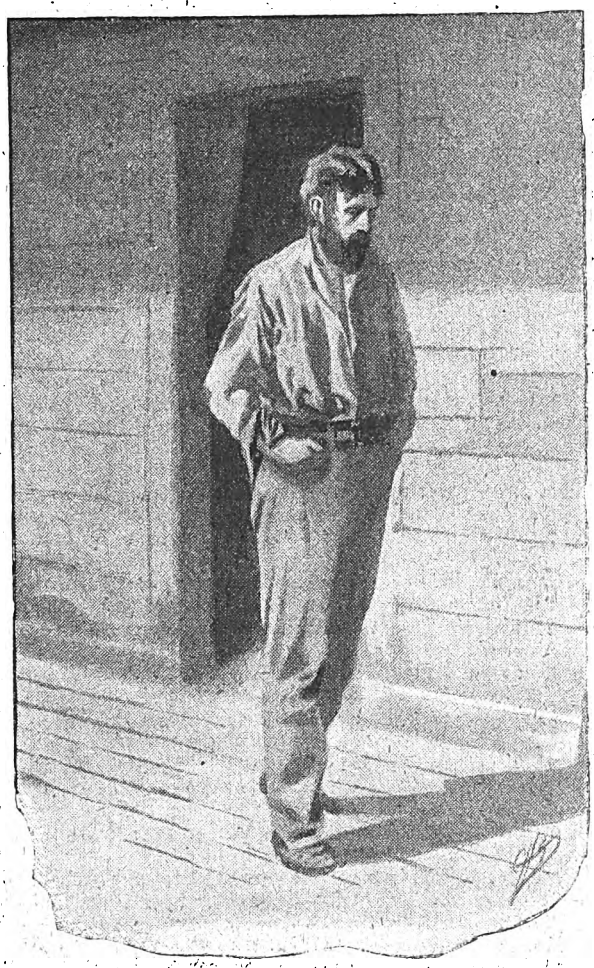
"How far is it?" I ask.

"Sixteen miles. I will gladly give you a bed for the night if you can come."

"Thanks. Yes, I will come and see if I can do any good. It is no murder, of course, if the facts are as you have told me; but I am a coroner among other things, you know, and we can have an inquest and relieve the poor fellow's mind."

A few hasty orders to my servants about bringing on my baggage, and Mr. Macfarlane and I are riding off together up the road, towards the hills which I had been watching so lazily half-an-hour ago, on past the patient bullocks and their driver, steadily cantering up the winding, zig-zag road, until at last Mr. Macfarlane's horse gave in, and the rest of the journey was performed at foot's pace.

Eventually we come to an estate, with its long, regular lines of neatly-kept coffee bushes sloping up from the road, and tidy coolie buildings with laughing, black babies, and baby nurses hardly bigger than themselves, crawling and rolling about on the stamped mud floors, playing with goats and pariah dogs twice their own size, while the fathers and mothers and brothers are away at work.



He kept on walking restlessly up and down the verandah.

When they see Mr. Macfarlane they laugh and call out at him, and some of the bigger ones come running towards him; but they stop when they see my stranger face.

"This is my estate," says he; "we have not far to go now."

Then he throws some small money to the children, and babies and baby nurses and goats and dogs all mix up in a general scramble, the nurses rolling over the babies, and the dogs playing high jinks with the little, black, sprawling legs and arms, while the goats jump and prance with their stiff-looking, stupid legs.

"Happy little beggars, aren't they?" says Mr. Macfarlane. "I always say my coolies are the best in the district. Nothing like looking after them well."

I am still watching a small nurse of some five years old lugging a baby of as many months out of the way of a big pig which has come up to see what the excitement is about, when we turn a sudden corner in the road, and I hear Mr. MacFarlane saying:

Digitized by Google

"There, that is the bungalow we are bound for."

And away on the top of the next hill I see a small single bungalow, and soon we are passing more coolie lines and more children; but such a contrast to those we had just left; ragged, untidy buildings, and squalling, quarrelling children fighting all over the place.

"I see this estate is like its masters," I remark; "I suppose these men don't look after their belongings as you do."

"No; poor Ballarat Jemmy is too fond of the bottle, and the dead man was worse; and they had no money much, poor fellows, and the estate is gone to the dogs, and the coolies, too; they struck work the other day—had not had any pay for six months, I heard."

"I wonder the coolies stopped on the estate so long without their money; how did they manage?" I ask.

"Oh, the coolies trusted them—it is only an odd man in a hundred does not pay up; but then when one man does smash he does no end of harm to the rest of us. But here we are!"

And, as we ride up, I see nine or ten men sitting at one end of the verandah, neighbours who had come in at the news to see what they could do for poor Ballarat Jemmy in his trouble. But they could do nothing. Ballarat would not let them touch the body till a magistrate had come. As each man had arrived, he had come out to meet the new-comer with a bottle of brandy and a pot of tobacco.

"You meant all square in coming, I don't doubt," he said to each, "but you can't do nowt; I ain't a-going to have a thing touched till the beak comes, and he may do as he likes then. So just you sit you down there and leave me alone; I'm kinder dazed; here's brandy and here's baccy; I ain't got no soda water; can't afford it; but the brandy's good, and so's the baccy; so sit you down, and leave me alone; I'm kinder dazed; kinder dazed, I am."

He had said this in a sort of set speech to each arrival, and the men had gradually congregated together and taken refuge in their pipes, whispering and wondering a good deal, but growing gradually comforted with the soothing fumes, and waiting for the magistrate patiently in quiet expectation and subdued excitement of a house of death. Now and again one of them had called to Ballarat Jemmy, advising him to join them and have a pipe himself for comfort's sake. But he would not be talked to.

"Leave me alone, and sit you down, can't you?" he would say. "I'm kinder dazed, I am; kinder dazed."

And all that day he kept on walking restlessly up and down the verandah, with his hands rammed down sullenly in his trousers' pockets, and his head sunk forward on his chest, pacing backwards and forwards unceasingly like a beast in a cage, stopping only at times for a great drink of raw brandy.

When he saw our horses he came out to us.

"You'll be the beak, sir," he says in a queer, submissive way to me.

I hardly know what to answer. I tell him how sorry I am to hear of his trouble, and I ask if I may come in.

"Yes, yes; come in. I give myself up to you—I murdered him—he's in there, he is; poor Jock, you know," and he jerks his thumb over his shoulder to a closed window; "mayhap MacFarlane has told you as how I killed him?" he continues.

"I hope you are distressing yourself very needlessly," I answer encouragingly: "Mr. MacFarlane has told me that your poor friend has died from an overdose of udanum while he had bad toothache. As I understand the matter, all that you did was to advise him to take the laudanum. It was his own fault that killed him. It was all an accident, was it not?"

"Ay, ay; but he wouldn't have took it if I hadn't give it him; and we've been chums together fourteen year—fourteen year, Jock and I—and now I've killed him," and he hiccoughed, and turned unsteadily to lead the way into the bungalow. Mr. MacFarlane looks at me.

"He's more drunk than I ever saw him, poor wretch," he whispers; "as a rule he can drink all day and never show it. I think you had better have the inquest, and get it all over as soon as possible."

As we enter the verandah there is a great introducing of me all round to the batch of men who had been sitting there; some are nice gentlemanly fellows, some rough, very rough indeed. I make up a coroner's jury out of them, and they begin to look very important.

"Has anyone a Bible to take the oaths upon?"

There is a blank look from man to man, and two or three men begin to rummage through the bungalow in search of one.

Ballarat Jemmy is walking up and down the verandah again now, a strange melancholy picture, with his rough shaggy beard and hair, and dirty red flannel shirt, and queer baggy trousers. He mutters incessantly to himself as he walks:

"Fourteen years, fourteen years; we were together fourteen years, Jock and I—down at Ballarat I met him first—fourteen years; and now I've been and murdered him!"

Presently he stops suddenly, and comes up to us.

"I ask your pardon, Mister Magistrate, and yours too, MacFarlane; I clean forgot the liquor; I'm kinder dazed, you see; but here's the brandy; liquor up, gentlemen, liquor up. I ain't got no soda, but the brandy's good."

Then he goes on with his restless walk, up and down, up and down the long verandah. One of the men who has been hunting for a Bible goes up to him.

"I say, Ballarat, have you got such a thing as a Bible in the bungalow? The magistrate wants one to swear us upon."

"Fourteen years, fourteen years," he is muttering, "fourteen years, old Jock and me—eh? What? a Bible? No, there ain't no Bible here, I guess; I ain't seen a Bible for many a day."

In my pocket I have a small prayer-book, which I always carry with me; it was given me by my mother, when I went to school; and I am superstitious about it, and never part from it.

"I have a prayer-book; as we can't get a Bible, I will swear you on the prayer-book," I tell them.

And now my jury is sworn, and we go in to view the body. The dead man is lying grim and ghastly in a squalid, ill-kept room; he is lying over on his stool; on the stool is a nearly empty bottle of laudanum, a bottle of brandy, and a bottle of Bunter's nervine.

"The bottle of nervine looks as if the story about the toothache were true, gentlemen," I remark to the jury. "Now for examining the witnesses."

But there was little in the way of evidence to be taken. The servant was examined, and deposed that the dead man had been mad with toothache for some days. He had drunk a great deal of brandy; because of the pain, he supposed; but he always drank a great deal.

He did not know what time the dead master had gone to bed, but early this morning, when he was boiling the kettle, he heard the other master calling out, and he showed him this master dead.

Digitized by Google

No one else knew anything, except Ballarat Jemmy himself. Was he willing to give evidence?

"Yes, in course he would tell all he knew."

He took the prayer-book in his hand to be sworn; then suddenly he stopped, and turned to me.

"Is this here right, Mister Magistrate? Ought I to be swore? You see as how I'm the prisoner; prisoner at the bar, for murder," he hiccoughed. "They don't swear prisoners, do they?"

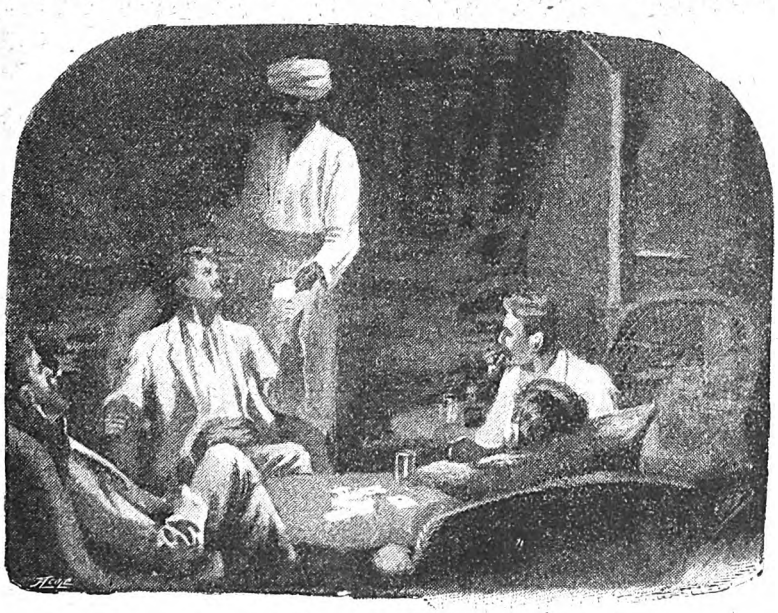
I explain to him that he is not a prisoner at all; that the whole thing is clearly an accident, and that he may be sworn like any other man. But he is obstinate.

"I murdered him! Poor Jock! I'm a prisoner. I'll none be swore."

So we humour him, and take his statement instead.

"We were together fourteen year, Jock and me," he says; "I met him at the diggings, at Ballarat, down in Australia; we smashed up there, we did; digging didn't pay, digging didn't. Well, we were main cleared out, but we had no money to go anywhere else with, and so we held on, digging and digging till one day the luck turned, and we made a good bit. We went on the spree then, and made the money fly fine—lived in first-class hotels, and drove a pair o' spanking horses. Then Jock got D.T. badly, real bad he was. And the money was getting low, and we were wondering what to do next, when we met a chap from Ceylon, and he put us on to coffee planting—Eh? you don't want all this yarn, don't you?—only about poor Jock's death? Well, it was three days ago now, as Jock got toothache awful bad; he got kinder mad, poor fellow, and couldn't get drunk nohow, though he drank and drank all he could to drown the pain. Then we wrote down for some stuff to cure him, and the shop people sent that Bunter's nervine; but it wasn't no good, none at all. It may be rare good stuff for an ordinary man, but nothing would have done poor Jock no good. But last night I was sitting making up some cartridges, and I came across an old bottle of laudanum. So I says to Jock, 'try this, old man, it may put you off to sleep and give you some rest from the darned pain.' And he took it with him and went off to bed. Well, I turned in myself soon after. And in the morning I got up, and went round to see how he was, and he was lying just like that—just like that; and I've been kinder dazed ever since—killed him, my old chum!—and we was together fourteen year, him and me! What do you say to that, gentlemen?"

And he looks round on us half-defiantly.



A servant came in with a note for me.

"There is nothing to say except that it is very sad and very unfortunate," I answer; "and do try and relieve your mind about your having killed the poor fellow; I am sure you may absolve yourself of all blame in the matter."

"No; I killed him sure enough. I give him the laudanum, and I ought to have seen him take it, and not to have left him to himself. It's my fault, clear enough!"

"Well, we will leave it to the jury. What is your verdict, gentlemen?"

"Death from an overdose of laudanum taken accidently while in pain. And we acquit Mr. James Fergusson of all blame," was the ready reply.

Ballarat Jemmy stood looking doubtfully.

"Mr. James Fergusson! Well, that's me right enough, but I ain't heard that name long enough? And so you won't punish me, eh?"

There was a murmur of voices trying to comfort him, but he turned away sullenly.

"I wish that you'd hang me and have done with me!" he burst out passionately once.

It was necessary to arrange about the funeral without delay. A man is dying, dead, and buried, all within twenty-four hours in the tropics.

There was no churchyard or cemetery nearer than Kegalle, and it was impossible to take the poor body so far as that. Ballarat was spoken to about it.

"We want no churchyard, him and me; we shouldn't know where we was, not in a churchyard. Lay him out in the coffee—under them trees, over there, we was always fond of looking at those trees from the verandah of an evening," and he pointed to a clump of tall satin-wood trees, which stood up grandly against the evening sky. I take a turn outside while the men are arranging for the burial. Away under the trees the coolies are already hard at work digging the grave. From the jungle beyond deep voices of birds come weirdly, striking jarringly on my ear. I think of the sweet song of the thrushes and blackbirds at home, so different from this deep "whoop, whoop, whoop," of hoarse-throated jungle birds. And inside the bungalow that dead form, and that poor drunken, miserable Ballarat, and the brandy bottles, and the wretched furniture—Bah! It makes my flesh creep!

Mr. MacFarlane comes up to me shortly.

"We have laid the poor fellow out and wrapped him in a sheet," he says, "there is no coffin or anything; it is very horrid, is it not? I shall be thankful when it is all over!"

Digitized by Google

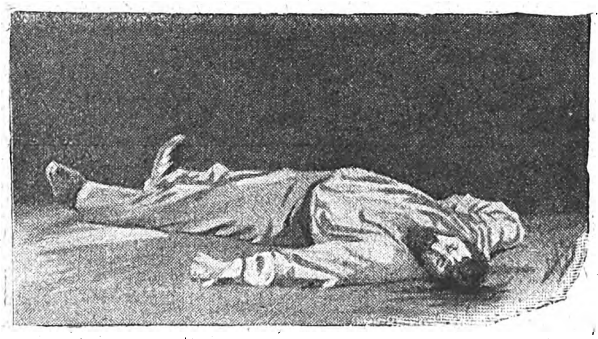
"So shall I!" I ejaculate.

"And there was one thing particularly uncanny," Mr. MacFarlane proceeds, "you remember that one arm was lying over the side of the bed?—well, when we tried to straighten him, this arm kept rising up, time after time; he was so rigid."

I shudder, and pull hard at my cheroot, and say nothing.

Presently, they bring the sheeted figure outside, and a procession is formed silently, Ballarat walking in front, twitching his hands nervously, but not uttering a sound.

As we draw near the grave, bright zodiacal rays shoot up from the sun which has just sunk behind the hills,



He had shot himself through the head.

and the whole sky burns and flames like a sapphire on fire. I am asked to read a few prayers, and I have just finished saying the Lord's Prayer, and two out of the Burial Service, when Ballarat calls out suddenly:

"Hold hard a bit!"

Then he runs off quickly to the bungalow, while a couple of men follow him to see what is the matter.

But in a moment he re-appears, with a bottle of brandy and a tumbler; and, before our wondering disgust had realised the situation, he pours out a great draught.

"I've forgot the water, but never mind, I won't keep you while it comes, gentlemen," he says.

Then he goes on:

"When a man's friend is going a journey, gentlemen, a man always drinks to his luck before he starts, don't he?—well, you see Jock, he's going a long journey now I reckon; and I should not like to let him go without wishing him luck!"

He brushes a great tear from his cheek with his dirty trembling hand, and stands over his dead friend; then he turns down the sheet from the still face and stands looking at it quietly for a few seconds.

At last, raising the glass high over his head, he calls out in a loud voice:

"Good-bye, Jock! Good-bye, old man! We've been together fourteen years, Jock, you and me; and you're going away from me now, Jock, clean away, and I'm main sorry, old man, and it's all my own fault as killed you! But you won't bear me no ill-will, Jock? I never meant no harm—you know that right enough? Good-bye, old man! We'll be meeting again soon, I reckon, somewhere, I don't rightly know where, but here's luck to you, Jock, here's luck to you, old man, wherever you are!"—and he drains the dram at a draught. "Now bury him," he says, and turns away.

But at this moment a cry of horror burst from the coolies. Slowly and weirdly the dead man's arm rises up, thrusting aside all coverings, till it stretches forth grim and ghastly—towards Ballarat.

He had turned sharply back again, hearing the disturbance. For a minute he stands gazing stupidly; then he mutters, "He's a-calling me," and he goes up solemnly and takes the dead hand in his, and stands speechless.

A chill of horror makes me dizzy and faint. We all stand spell-bound, watching the hideous scene. I hear Mr. MacFarlane giving hurried directions to one coolie who had not fled with the others; he is explaining that it is the rigid arm which they had had so much trouble with recently; it has risen up again, and has gone back to its old attitude, as it had lain stretched over the bedside.

Meanwhile Ballarat stands silently holding the dead hand in his own, gazing away to the paling sky in the west with a strange, fixed gaze, quite different to the stupid stare of his face before.

The tears course rapidly down his cheeks for a while. Then he moves suddenly away.

"God bless you, Jock!" he murmurs.

* * * * *

How we finished that hideous funeral I hardly know. My brain was sick with the morbid horror of it all.

But a hospitable and bright dinner with Mr. MacFarlane at his pretty bungalow had somewhat revived me, and we were cheering ourselves with a rubber of whist with a couple of other planters who had come home with Mr. MacFarlane, when a servant came in with a note for me.

I opened it, and with some difficulty spelt it out.

SIR,—I was riting to Mr. MacFarlin, but thort it wood be better to rite to you, being a Magistrat. You all sw as how poor Jock called me to come to him. I made up my mind as I stood holding his hand over the grave. I ni o h's to say that I did myself what I'm a-going to do now. No one can say as I done it from cowardice; bacos you all acquitted me of murder. I'm a-doing it becos Jock called me to come; that is all. Me and him have been to ge her fourteen years, and I reckon he can't do without me, an I wants me with him. He wood a-come after me if I had gone first, so I'm just going after him. I'm sorry to take up so much of your time, sir; but I want you to come when you get this, an I bury me by Jock, so as we may be together.

You will find Brandy on the table. I've only got three bottles left, but I hope you will find it enough,

Your obedent servant,
JAMES FERGUSSON.

"From Ballarat Jemmy," exclaimed Mr. MacFarlane, as I read the letter aloud. "He's going to kill himself! Heaven grant we may be in time to stop it!"

We set off in hot haste through the night for poor Ballarat's bungalow, going the quickest way, but the fellow was quite dead when we arrived. He had sent his servant away with the letter to me, and then he had shot himself through the head. On the table, placed under one of the brandy bottles, was an open sheet of paper.

Please do as I arsked you in my letter.

That was all—all except the poor body on the floor, and the gun that did the deed.

We laid him with poor Jock that very night, lighted by the bright, quiet moon.

The next day I left Mr. MacFarlane, and went on with my regular circuit work; but the memory of that scene haunted me for many a long day, and I never saw the great quiet moon shining over the still hills where the Coffee Estates lay without thinking sadly enough of poor Ballarat Jemmy.

JAMES HARBER.

Digitized by Google

FOR ONE NIGHT ONLY.

THE wind howled and whistled mournfully round the houses, making people involuntarily shiver and edge their chairs nearer to the fire. Seated in a house in the Belvedere Road was a man, young, yet looking prematurely old. The fire in his room had gone completely out, yet, cold though it was, Edward Saxon did not feel it. The chill which he felt was at his heart. Two days ago he had been one of the happiest men in creation—happy in the possession of a lovely wife and a bonny, prattling, three-year-old daughter. Now his home was left to him desolate, his wife and child had gone. He had been away on a visit to a friend. On his return he had found the house silent and deserted.

Dreading he knew not what he rushed from room to room, but all he found was a note addressed to himself.

"Dear Edward," said the letter, "the longing for the old life has overcome me. The life you offered me seemed attractive in its restfulness at first, but now it has grown dull and monotonous. No society, no excitement, nothing but long dissertations on your medical theories. Had you not been so utterly absorbed in these you might have noticed my growing discontent. I have tried to rouse you, but no, you were too deep in those musty tomes. I accepted an offer abroad a month ago. Long before you arrive back from your visit I shall be gone, and Gladys will go with me. With me she will have the pleasures and joys of childhood, whereas, had I left her she would have grown up dull and old-fashioned, even if not neglected, while you were endeavouring to probe the recesses of your fellow creatures' brains. Finally, I loved you, Edward, until you let your studies shut me out of your inmost life. then the love of the old life came back with redoubled force and I am now going to tread the boards again, but under a new name and in a new land. Good-bye, Edward. If there had been more heart in your researches and less brain, you would probably not have suffered this loss.

"ALICIA."

When the young doctor read this missive he groaned in agony. The accusation his wife brought against him was only too true. He was ambitious. He wanted to become famous in his profession as a specialist. Now he recognised how selfish his ambition had made him. After the first few months of wedded bliss—what happy days those were—he had gradually withdrawn himself from the round of social gaieties leaving his wife to go practically her own way, while he buried himself in his books. Had he only studied the heart as well as the brain, just as Alicia said, this catastrophe might have been averted.

"What will fame be to me now?" he muttered. "Oh! if I could only find Alicia, and tell her that we will live the days of our early married life over again," and the young aspirant for fame leant his head on the table and sobbed aloud.

Next morning he went out early and purchased copies of all the dramatic papers. Having secured these he drove round to the house of a friend, who, before his retirement, had been a very successful private detective.

His hasty and violent tug at the door betokened his frame of mind and brought a quick response. It was Arthur Somerset, the ex-detective who opened the door.

"Good gracious, Ned, what on earth's the matter with you? You look positively ill," exclaimed Somerset, as he saw Edward Saxon's face.

"Don't for goodness' sake, stand there asking questions, Somerset, but lead the way indoors and listen to what I have to say," replied the doctor.

"All right, old boy, but you gave me a shock."

So saying, the surprised Somerset ushered his visitor into a drawing-room, and pulling two chairs up to the fire, requested him to proceed.

With much agitation, Saxon told the story of his wife's flight.

"I suppose this means I am desired to get into harness again, eh?" remarked Somerset.

"Will you undertake it?" asked his friend eagerly.

"Certainly I will. Now to get to work. In the first place we must make a list of all the companies which have recently left, or are leaving England, and then I will go round and see the various agents."

"I will come with you."

"You'll do nothing of the kind. You must go home and attend to your patients, but leave those brain studies alone for a day or two."

Edward Saxon took his departure for home in a more hopeful frame of mind. He had great faith in the abilities of his friend, and he also thought if he could only come face to face with Alicia again he would be able to wean her from the glare of the footlights by his assurance of love.

Still his heart was anything but light. He reproached himself that ever his neglectfulness should have been so pronounced as to admit of a rival—though an inanimate one—stealing the affection of his wife from him.

That evening Arthur Somerset came round to the desolate home.

"Any news, Somerset?" was the first hasty inquiry.

"Steady, my boy, steady. Give me a chance."

"Well, what have you done?"

"To begin with, five companies have left our shores within the last month, and two others are leaving this week."

"What are they?"

Somerset enumerated the names of the companies.

"Now," he went on, "it is possible your wife may be going out to join one of those which has already gone, or she may be engaged in either of the two leaving this week."

On the ensuing day Somerset went round to interview

Digitized by Google

the various agents, while the distracted husband went down to a newspaper office to insert the following advertisement in the agony column:

> Alicia—am taking up heart as well as brain. Come and help me.

When Somerset called that evening it was only to report failure. He had been unable to find the slightest trace of either the wife or the child. Edward Saxon looked gloomy.

"There is another chance, Edward," remarked the detective, after a few moments' thought. "Possibly, it is to join a company already out in one of the colonies or the States, that your wife has gone. To-morrow I will commence a tour of the steamship offices. Have you a photograph of your wife?"

"I am afraid that won't be of much assistance if Alicia is determined to veil her identity. She was an adept in the art of making up."

Edward Saxon's dismal prognostications proved only too correct. They were unable to get hold of any information that would yield a clue as to what part of the globe Alicia Saxon had sailed to resume her histrionic career.

Her husband's cup of bitterness was indeed full. Alicia was a woman whose nature demanded something more than a mere passive affection, and in the latter days he had allowed his ambition to make him thoughtless and inattentive—not that he loved her less, only the evidences of his affection were absent.

* * * * *

In a pretty little cottage away down in Surrey two women were seated, engaged in an earnest discussion.

"What if our scheme should have the opposite effect to what I desire, Frances?"

"Have no fear, my dear girl, I have not the slightest hesitation in guaranteeing you that it will turn out a glorious success."

"Oh! I do trust it will. Ned never intended to hurt me, I know, but I was deeply grieved time after time. One of my favourite tricks was to steal up quietly behind his chair and surprise him. In those happy early days he would turn round like a flash. 'Ah! you little witch,' he would exclaim, and then he would kiss me. But recently, whenever I have done this he would not even look up. 'Alicia,' he would say in an impatient tone, 'I wish you wouldn't disturb me. I am engaged upon a very difficult piece of work.' While he was engaged upon problems and theories having for their object the relief of the brains of others, he never realised that my heart was in need of relief."

"Well, I imagine he knows what heartache is now."

"Poor old Ned," murmured Mrs. Saxon, wistfully.

"I wonder if it has hurt him much."

"Serve him right if it has."

"Frances, how can you?"

"There, there, don't get indignant, my dear. But it will do him good to suffer a little."

Frances Claridge left the room shortly to prepare for her daily journey up to town.

She was engaged at the Comedy Theatre, where Alicia had appeared in the days before her marriage. During those days a very warm friendship had sprung up between the two girls, and this friendship had not been allowed to lapse when Alicia Wentworth had allowed the handsome young doctor to persuade her to abandon the profession.

Just prior to the events recorded in this story Alicia, looking thoroughly unhappy, had met her friend in town one afternoon. In answer to Frances Claridge's inquiry Alicia had poured out the story of her griefs, thereby exciting at once her friend's sympathy and indignation.

"Just like a man," she exclaimed. "As soon as he has gained his object he falls off in his attentions. He must have a lesson."

"How, Frances?"

"Meet me again to-morrow and I will by that time have evolved a scheme."

The two friends met again on the following day, and the outcome of that meeting was that, when Edward Saxon went on his visit to his friend, the letter with which we are already acquainted, was written, and Alicia Saxon departed, not to resume her professional career abroad, but to her friend's cottage home in Surrey, where we now find her.

Frances Claridge had seen Edward Saxon's advertisement, but had decided not to show it to her friend, as she deemed it best to carry on the deception long enough to quite shake the would-be brain-specialist out of his selfishness. Hence, she either managed to tear the paper at this particular point, in a seemingly careless way, or she retailed the morning news to her friend, instead of handing her the paper.

For several days the advertisement appeared and then it was withdrawn.

Thus matters had gone on for a fortnight and Alicia was beginning to look very pale and worn. Evidently she was pining for a sight of her husband, and little Gladys' inquiries for "papa" continually loosed the fountains of the mother's tears.

In addition Frances Claridge had seen the doctor in town and had noticed that he was looking far from well.

"Ha! my friend," she muttered, as she observed him from a distance, "there is more heart than brain in your thoughts now."

So she came to the conclusion that it was time to bring the little drama to its last scene.

When she reached the theatre that evening she was greeted with a piece of information that set her capering with delight. Here was just the opportunity for a really dramatic dénouement.

The piece which was running was one in which Alicia had formerly sustained one of the principal characters. It had recently been revived, and the news which had so pleased Miss Claridge was this: The lady who was filling Alicia's old rôle had met with an accident, necessitating several day's rest.

The understudy would, of course, take the lady's place for that evening, but the lively actress decided that it should not be her fault if Alicia did not resume her old character on the following night.

To think with her was to act, so she at once dashed off to the managerial room. To the presiding genius there, she told sufficient of the story to interest him, and after a little hesitation he complied with her request. His only regret was that he was debarred from posting an announcement on the front of the theatre to the effect that Miss Wentworth would appear, for one night only, in her old part.

Never did a train travel so slowly as the one which bore the fair conspirator to her home that night. When she did eventually alight she traversed the ground between the station and the cottage at a speed very much above the average.

"Alicia," she burst out as soon as she got inside, "I've got such news for you."

Digitized by Google

"What is it, dear. Has Ned found me out?"

"Ned, no. Can't you forget that husband of yours sometimes?"

"No, you know I cannot," and Alicia's eyes filled.

"Now I didn't mean to hurt you. If you'll only be a good girl and do as I tell you, you shall be at home to-morrow night."

Alicia brightened at once.

"First of all, you must give me your word to carry out all that I have promised on your behalf."

"You haven't committed me to any impossibilities, I hope?"

"Of course not. Now listen. First I have a confession to make and then a suggestion. The confession is that your husband has been advertising for you," and Frances produced a paper.

Alicia read it and then looked at her friend in reproach.

"Oh, Frances, how could you keep this from me?"

"Because I knew you would have been goose enough to run off at once, and I wanted him to get the lesson thoroughly learnt."

"Now, what is your suggestion?"

Frances explained what she had done.

"But how is that to ensure my going home to-morrow night?"

"Because your worthy husband will be in the stalls. I shall wire Arthur Somerset in the morning to arrange it."

"Edward may be annoyed."

"Rubbish, my dear. He will be only too pleased to see you, judging from what I have heard from time to time. Besides, you have promised."

After some further discussion Alicia consented to go through with the business.

* * * * *

During the course of the following morning Arthur Somerset received a wire, which was worded as follows:

Bring doctor to Comedy to-night, certain.

Arthur Somerset chuckled when he read this. To tell the truth he had been in the plot almost from the very commencement. This had been Frances' suggestion. Knowing of the friendship that existed between the doctor and the detective she had foreseen that Edward Saxon would appeal to Somerset for help, so she had astutely enlisted him as an ally.

The detective strolled round to see his friend during the course of the day, first calling at the theatre to book the seats. On arrival at Belvedere Road he was greeted with the usual inquiry:

"Any news, Somerset?"

The conspirator gravely shook his head.

"Look here, Ned, will you join me at the Comedy to-night?"

"No, I don't care about it."

"I suppose you would rather sit moping here, but you are not going to do it. I have booked the seats, so you may as well come."

"Well, if you must haul me off to a theatre, why select the 'Comedy' of all others. You know it is the thing Alicia used to be in which is running there now."

"Oh! is it?" replied Somerset carelessly. "Well are you going to turn up to-night. If so, I will run round here for you."

"Very well, as you are so persistent."

With this Somerset withdrew.

When he had gone Edward Saxon sat absorbed in thought, and he thought aloud:

"Somerset was unusually lacking in tact and thoughtfulness this morning. Whatever made him suggest that place?"

Then he suddenly started.

"I wonder if he has some object in it," he muttered. The idea grew upon him so strongly that he wired to Somerset.

"Have unexpected engagement to-night. Will join you later at the theatre."

When the shades of evening fell, a closely muffled figure might have been seen standing by the stage-door of the "Comedy." Various members of the company arrived, but not the one Edward Saxon was looking for, and he began to think his idea was a mistaken one.

Just at the last moment a four-wheeler drove up and he drew himself into the shadow to watch the occupants alight. First came Frances Claridge, next his little Gladys, and lastly his wife.

Trembling with excitement he whispered:

"Alicia!"

The ladies turned and Frances jumped forward and caught him by the arm.

"Not here, Mr. Saxon. Come inside with us," she said.

Edward followed, his heart beating tumultuously and his brain in a whirl.

He was quickly put in possession of the facts, and so overjoyed was he at recovering his lost ones that he agreed that Alicia should appear for that one night upon one condition, which was accepted.

This done he left the theatre by the stage-door, entering again in the usual way, all the while smiling to himself at the surprise which was in store for Somerset.

By the time he found the detective he had assumed a more sober expression. Somerset glanced critically at his friend and when the curtain rose Somerset was actually shaking with excitement. He was also anxious as to how Saxon would take his wife's appearance.

At last she came on, resplendent in her robes and looking lovelier than ever.

The detective shot a sharp glance at his friend, which was met by one from Saxon, who remarked, with a smile:

"She looks splendid, doesn't she?"

"What! were you in the plot, too?" interrogated Somerset, with a perplexed look.

"Wait till we get home, and I will explain what I can, and Alicia will fill in the rest."

"Oh, it's like that, is it?"

That night husband, wife and child met under their own roof and they had as guests Miss Claridge and Arthur Somerset.

The next morning the papers in referring to the Comedy had the following as explanation of Mrs. Saxon's appearance, which was the condition the doctor had named:

> The audience at the Comedy last night had the pleasure of renewing their acquaintance with a once great favourite in Mrs. Saxon, better known to playgoers as Miss Alicia Wentworth. Having heard of Miss Madge Anlaby's accident, Mrs. Saxon, with the approval of her husband, generously consented to fill the vacancy. To-night Miss Anlaby will be well enough to resume.

JOHN HENRY PEAT.

Digitized by Google

THE LION'S WARS

The Campaign of 1815 Ending with the Battle of Waterloo.

THE retreat of Napoleon from Moscow, in 1812, caused unbounded satisfaction.

The great Powers saw in the destruction of the grand army of France an opportunity of shaking off the yoke of the oppressor.

The Prussians, who had been in a state of subjection since Jena, in 1806, rushed to arms; the Russian army, which had hung in the rear of Napoleon's vast legions, crossed the frontier. Sweden joined the allies, whilst Belgium and Holland looked wistfully at England, who, as usual, opened her purse-strings.

Napoleon fought several battles, but when Austria, after the battle of Bautzen, also joined the allies, the doom of the Corsican was sealed. He gained some victories it is true: Dresden was in his favour, but at Leipsic, where the odds were three to one, he was beaten and compelled to retreat towards France.

Misfortunes then rained thickly on the falling despot. The Bavarians deserted, and the forces of the allies swelled to upwards of a million of men. Then Paris capitulated to avoid being bombarded by an army, which, eluding Napoleon, had invaded France. The Emperor went to Fontainebleau, April 1814, and awaited the decision of the allied sovereigns. It was soon given: abdication and Elba.

On February 15th, 1815, he escaped, landed in France with a few followers, marched through the country without any opposition, and on March 20th made a triumphal entry into Paris.

The allied sovereigns at once met at Vienna, and declared war. Britain at once joined the confederacy, comprising Austria, Russia, and Prussia. Our ministers declared that they would never lay down their arms till Napoleon was conquered, and they kept their word, although the campaign cost us close on £116,000,000.

The prospect of having to fight United Europe did not dismay France.

The remnants of the disbanded armies living in retirement hastened to rejoin their old general. In a few weeks the Emperor had organised a force of 155,000 men fully equipped, and an ample complement of artillery and cavalry.

Great Britain was equally as energetic. A base of operations had been fixed on in Belgium, and troops soon began to pour in to the Low Countries. Wellington, in whom had been invested the command, foresaw that as Napoleon would rely for success upon the rapidity with which he would strike, the slightest delay would be fatal.

On April 4th, 1815, the hero of the Peninsula arrived in Brussels, and at once took over the command. Although by the end of the first week in June the army had increased to 105,000 men with close on 200 guns, it was tainted with one fatal defect. The nationalities composing it were extremely varied, and not quite satisfactory. Wellington would have liked a larger sprinkling of his Peninsula veterans. He was supremely delighted, however, with the British contingent.

Digitized by Google

For the rest of the force, save perhaps the troops from Hanover, little could be said. Belgium and Holland had sent a most inferior lot, poorly equipped and officered. The Brunswickers professed to be full of courage but they looked anything but reliable, whilst the Nassauers were not only too old to be described as veterans but so feeble and lacking in spirit that they were soon regarded as an incumbrance. But the greatest defect in the British forces was that as few of the soldiers, save our own, knew anything of Wellington, the vast majority never having heard of his name, he was regarded as a mere baby to Napoleon.

The Prussian army under Blucher was much better circumstanced than our own. The 117,000 men composing it were not only all Prussians but they regarded their commander as quite the equal, if not the superior of the great Napoleon himself.

The force Napoleon collected against Wellington consisted of 89,415 foot, 22,302 cavalry, 15,871 artillery, with 344 guns. On June 15th the two forces came into collision. Arrived at the river Sambro, the French seized the bridges and pushed on towards Frasnes.

Wellington then drew in his scattered forces, and on the 16th had concentrated 30,000 men at Quatre Bras, and the rest round Brussels, which was the object of Napoleon's attack.

After planting a force between the British and Prussians, Napoleon fell on Blucher at Ligny with 75,000 men. The Prussians, who greatly outnumbered the enemy, maintained a dogged fight for over six hours, but as evening approached, the brilliant charges of the French began to tell, and by dusk the Prussians were in full retreat.

Although not routed, Blucher's loss was so heavy—it being close on 20,000 men, that of Napoleon being under 11,000—that although he halted at Wavre, only a few miles in the rear of Ligny, two days elapsed before he was able to move. It was to prevent the British from assisting Blucher that the battle of Quatre Bras was fought.

About an hour before the struggle at Ligny commenced, Marshal Ney attacked the division 7,000 strong under the Prince of Orange with a force of 9,000 men, who was compelled, after Kellermann and a brigade of 2,000 French appeared, to retreat. Picton, who had been giving the veterans of Nassau some exercise, now appeared on the scene, and this so encouraged the Prince that he renewed the battle. But Ney advancing in two solid columns swept all before him until he encountered some regiments of British infantry. The work of checking the rushes of the French was intrusted to Picton, and a couple of brigades supported by the aged warriors from Nassau. Picton was no strategist, but he was an indomitable fighter.

After pouring in several deadly volleys on one of Ney's columns his men charged with such force that the column reeled like a drunken man. Shortly after a very serious incident occurred. The Brunswick division, headed by their Duke (who, to animate his men, puffed at his pipe till he was shot dead), after a vain effort to stop the rushes of General Foys, broke and ran to the wood of Quatre Bras for shelter. The French, carried away by their impetuous charge, came into contact with Picton's brigade, who, after hurling back Ney's column, were resting in a hollow. The French had so seldom been able to score off their old foes that they were greatly elated. The French Lancers on this occasion using their weapons with such skill that in a moment the little valley was like a shambles.

After a grand charge by the whole of the cavalry had been repulsed our guns were pushed forward with deadly effect. Had the messenger Ney dispatched to recall D'Erlon's Corps, which he had sent to the assistance of Napoleon when he thought he should win, not lost his way, Quatre Bras might have ended in a victory for the French. They made a great final effort to turn the tide of battle. Kellermann's Cuirassiers performed prodigies of valour, but their success was quite neutralised by the arrival of the Guards, who carried everything before them.

Our losses were heavy, 4,659 killed and wounded, of which 2,480 were British. The French lost 4,375 killed and wounded.

On the night before the 18th of June the Duke of Wellington and his staff attended a ball given by the Duchess of Richmond. The company which had responded to her Grace's invitation was of the most brilliant description. Such was the splendour of the uniforms that the reception rooms seemed literally ablaze with colour, and all the guests were in the highest spirits.

In the streets the people had collected to watch the sturdy British soldier pouring out of Brussels towards Waterloo, fervently praying for their success.

Wellington then sent word to Blucher that he would accept battle on the plains of Waterloo if Blucher would help him with 25,000 men.

On the night of 17th June the French reached La Belle Alliance, and on the 18th the battle of Waterloo was fought.

Making due allowance for the losses he sustained at Ligny, and the corps, under General Gerard, left at Ligny to keep back Blucher, Napoleon mustered 48,950 infantry, 15,785 cavalry, and 7,232 artillerymen, a total of 71,947 men with 246 guns.

Wellington's army was not quite so large. His infantry numbered 49,608, of whom 24,000 were British and 6,000 Germans. He had 12,402 cavalry, and 5,645 artillerymen with 156 guns. Total 67,655. But of these 18,000 were stationed at Hal, ten miles away, to secure his right flank. But for the strength of his left, which was practically invulnerable owing to the presence of 90,000 Prussians at Wavre, he would have been compelled to retreat on account of the inferiority of his troops in fighting quality like the French.

The field of Waterloo might be described as a shallow valley bounded by low hills. Wellington's right was protected by the valley of Merbe Braine, the left being secured by the hamlets of La Haye Papelotte and Houchain, and at the foot of a slope on the right stood the celebrated chateau and grounds of Hougoumont extending half a mile into the plain, occupied by our troops.

Both armies were drawn up in three lines. Napoleon's disposition differed slightly from those of his great rival, who stationed the greater part of his cavalry on his wings, whilst Napoleon's were scattered behind his infantry lines. Napoleon's seemingly was the better plan as his cavalry was at hand to support an attack from any quarter.

As soon as the battle commenced Napoleon stationed himself on an eminence near the farm-house La Belle Alliance. There he remained for the greater part of the day impassively watching the progress of the great struggle till the tide of battle began to flow against him. Then he showed how deeply he was stirred by moving nearer and nearer to the fight. At 3 p.m. he mounted his horse, and when the time arrived

Digitized by Google

Drawn by] [C. Lawson Wood.

As soon as the battle commenced Napoleon stationed himself on an eminence near the farmhouse La Belle Alliance.

Digitized by Google

for the Imperial Guard to make their effort he was close to the farm called La Haye Sainte.

Napoleon's plan of battle was worthy of his great genius. He saw with true instinct that Wellington's left and left centre were his weak points, so after a strong demonstration on the right he made a determined attack on the left. But his scheme was imperfectly carried out. The French carried a portion of Hougoumont, but the desperate valour of our soldiers resisted all attempts to quite dislodge them. Two divisions were sent against them but our wonderful infantry fought as if rooted to the ground. The attack and defence of Hougoumont cost 6,000 lives.

Then the attack shifted and Napoleon, after a terrible cannonade, directed the whole of D'Erlon's corps and a large body of horse against the left. But the onslaught was splendidly repulsed by our infantry, and on their retreat our heavy cavalry rode clear through the columns of the French, and taking them in flank drove them on the enemy's right.

Then a new enemy made its presence known. The vanguard of Bulow's corps was descried far off on the right. This ominous column compelled Napoleon to detach the corps of Laban to prevent their advancing. Naturally, the absence of these men greatly disconcerted Napoleon's plans. Napoleon now resolved to concentrate his attacks on Wellington's centre alone. After a severe struggle the post of La Haye Sainte was won by the French. This success uncovered part of Wellington's line and enabled dense masses of cavalry to mount the slopes in front of the Duke's position. When the cavalry were followed by clouds of skirmishers victory for France appeared certain, especially as our foreign allies began to betray signs of trepidation.

Still the issue depended on Napoleon being able to force back our centre and roll it up, quickly too, for a Prussian prisoner had informed him that instead of being crushed and broken, the whole of Blucher's army was marching against the Emperor's right flank.

But it was to be no sudden rout, if rout at all, for our admirable infantry, forming into squares, resisted every attempt to overwhelm them. As a French historian said, "they seemed glued to their places."

What was to be done? It was now past noon and Napoleon, realising that the moment for a supreme effort had arrived, gave the signal for Ney to make an instant assault. Placing himself at the head of a body of infantry comprising 18,000 men, and moving in four compact columns, Ney strove to retrieve the day at La Haye Sainte, from which they had retreated. Our allies, retreating with great precipitation, were driven against the British left centre with a force so great that any other troops but ours would have lost confidence.

Bringing forward two brigades, scarcely 3,000 strong, Sir Thomas Picton waited till the French reached the crest of the hill only thirty yards away and then gave the command, "a volley and then charge." The moment the smoke cleared the British, after a loud hurrah, charged the huge column confronting them.

Our ranks thinned terribly during this charge. The fate of Europe literally hung in the balance. The noble Picton fell shot through the brain.

His men saw him fall, and with cries of rage increased their pace. At last the intervening ground was covered, and the moment so longed for had arrived.

We had been on the defensive all day. It was now our turn to strike, and strike hard the British infantry did. A terrible shock, and then the French column reeled. Before they could recover, Kempt's brigade struck them heavily on the flank, hurling them down the hill up which a few minutes before they had so proudly mounted.

Ponsonby's Union Horse, like the infantry, had been chafing all day, but the moment Kempt's men had delivered their blow, they burst on the retreating French, cutting them down by hundreds. In this one charge, 3,000 prisoners and two eagles were captured.

Elated with their success, these brave horsemen next rode straight at Ney's guns, paralysing the gunners and cutting them down to a man. They had halted to reform, when Ney's cavalry rode down on them. One of the most terrible fights of the war now took place. The opposing horsemen neither asked nor gave quarter. We were gradually getting the upper hand, when the fate of Ney's horse was settled by a charge of Vandaleurs dragoons which annihilated them.

Napoleon's chances of winning were now growing very faint. Still Wellington's prudence never deserted him. So heavy had his losses been, that to strengthen the weak centre, he drew the remainder of his army closer together, and to prevent the Belgians and others of the allies from running away, he placed them alongside our men. Born strategist that he was, he knew that Napoleon would not quit the field without making a last final effort. And this was true. Bombarding Hougoumont heavily to induce the belief that an attack would follow, the Imperial Guard were hurled against La Haye Sainte, the garrison of which, under Major Baring, had been reduced to 500 men.

Overwhelmed by numbers, with little ammunition which soon ran out, with no chance of reinforcements, Baring held out till nearly all his men were killed and then capitulated. It was the only gleam of success the French had that day. At 5 p.m. the Imperial Guard and its cavalry, 5,000 splendidly attired troopers, were led by Ney against the British squares. Brave as lions these devoted men, the finest soldiers of France, charged them with irresistible fury. But, formidable as their rushes were, they could not shake the stern determination of Britain's devoted soldiers not to budge an inch till the Prussians came up. Four charges and the French recoiled like surf from the storm-beaten rock.

One more charge. Their cavalry, headed by Ney, got within twenty yards and then as if by magic the rush was stayed and as volley after volley rang out horses and riders fell in hundreds. They came again; indeed after our ammunition gave out they charged the squares a score of times, but try as they might they could not pass those barriers of steel. At 6.30 p.m. Bulow's corps of 20,000 men arrived. Napoleon reinforced Laban with 4,000 of his guard to check the advance. If he could only keep them back half-an-hour, he said to his staff.

A tremendous cannonade compelled our men to lie down. Then up came the French. Where was the British army. "Up Guards and make ready." First a volley then a charge. When the smoke cleared, the veterans of France were being pursued by the boys of England.

A signal which was quickly passed, and then the whole British army plunged furiously forward crushing all opposition. Hurled upon the Prussians the French recoiled, and took to flight. The carnage was dreadful. In killed, wounded and missing, the French lost 25,000 men. The losses of the allies were 14,728.

[NEXT WEEK: The War with the Ghurkas, the Pindaris, and the last Mahratta War (1813-1817).]

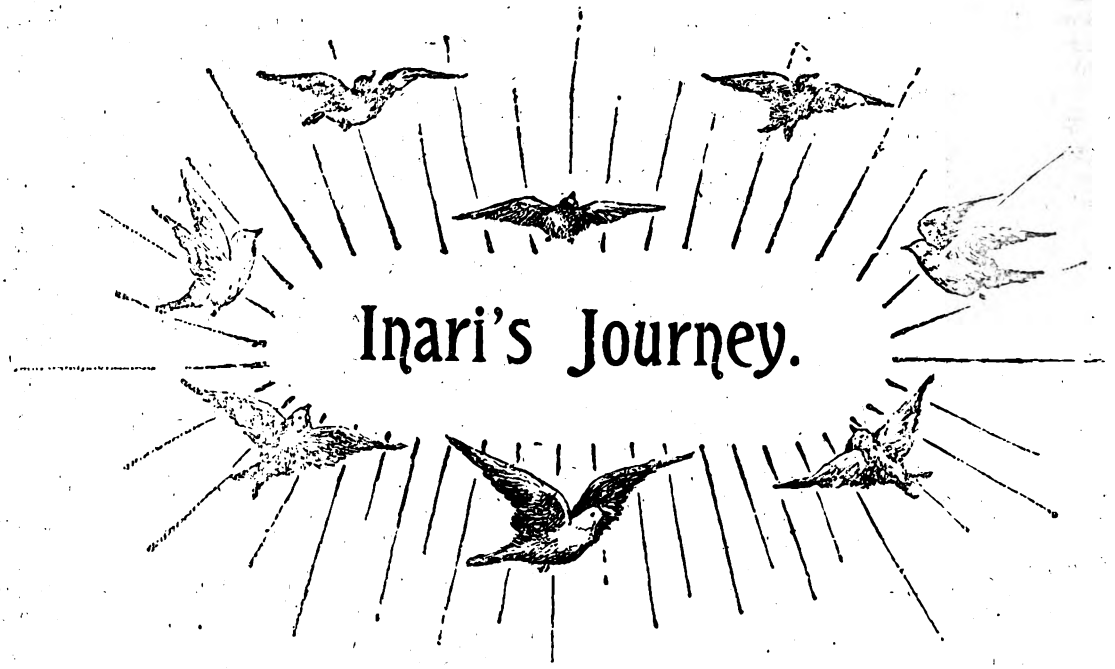
Digitized by Google



Inari's Journey.

THE great fox-god, Inari, once determined that he would make a journey through the city to find out where true honesty and goodness existed. It was a bad age of crime and corruption.

Civil wars tore the heart of the fair island; the rich plundered the poor; the poor could get neither justice nor reparation; men's minds were aflame with avarice, and the sun shone upon as foul a scene of depravity as it had ever seen since the days of the fifth great deluge.

The first place that Inari visited was the counting-house of one of the greatest merchants of the city of Yeddo.

"At any rate," he said, "I shall find fair dealing and honesty here, for this man's junks float on a hundred waters, his word is as good as a bond, and his name is a byeword for uprightness and integrity."

He took up his position in the shape of a cobweb in a corner of the sample room. The tide of customers and merchants flowed in and out; the money rattled into the coffers; the clerks were busy with pen and scroll; but no one saw what Inari saw.

His heart smote him to see the tricks of trade, and the deceptions practised. The chests were filled with coloured leaves and dust sweepings, the bales of silk were weighted with false materials, and their contents dyed with false colours; lacquer and bronze manufactured in the next street were sold as the veritable productions of old times; the very scales used were false, and the stories told to the customers were false.

The next day the whole city was thrown into a state of consternation at the news that the great firm had failed, and that the head partner had gone away, no one knew whither.

The next journey of the god was to the "yashiki," or palace of the great lord of Bizen, one of the haughtiest and proudest of the nobles of the empire. As he seated himself in the guise of a fly on the top of a sword rack in the banqueting chamber he said: "He is too great to be ambitious, he is too rich to be avaricious, he has too great expenses to be extravagant, he has nothing to scheme for, his fame is too bright for him to dare to sully it by dishonesty, he is too familiar with pleasure to be vicious."

The banquet was spread, and the great lord entered in gorgeous apparel. The sweets, with which the meal commenced, were served in dishes of the purest Nagasaki porcelain, the rice was in the finest of old gold lacquer, the wine—that prince of wines, the "Flower in full bloom"—hissed and bubbled in vases of the choicest Bizen ware, whilst the rarest of fish and fowl came up in the quaint dishes brought from China. Merrily the feast proceeded, the wine-cup circled incessantly, cheeks grew flushed, eyes began to sparkle and tongues wagged fast. There was nothing in this with which Inari could find fault, for the prince was wealthy, and it became his dignity to keep a sumptuous table, but he was annoyed and disgusted to observe with what brutality the prince treated his wife, a poor, modest, retiring creature whose only fault seemed to be that she brooked her husband's insolence too meekly.

If she spoke Bizen answered her roughly; if she smiled he frowned, and the poor woman knew not which way to look or how to behave.

When the dancing girls were ushered in, a retainer, humbly prostrating himself as he crawled along the floor, brought the prince a note.

Inari, who of course could see through rough walls, doors, and everything, espied a poor ragged man, evidently half-dead with cold and hunger, sitting in the snow outside.

"Now," said the god to himself, "I shall see the true nature of the prince."

When Bizen opened the note his face grew purple with passion, his brow was puckered into a network of frowns, and his hand stretched to his sword—an act at table which is only tolerated under the most exceptional circumstances.

Digitized by Google

When Bizen had so far collected himself to be able to speak, he roared:

"What does the scamp mean by intruding upon my privacy with his beggarly petitions? Who let him in at the great gate?"

"What is it?" asked his wife cautiously.

The prince turned on her like a wild animal.

"What is it, madam?" he hissed. "Why, it's a letter from an impostor who declares that I have ruined him by forfeiting his tenure last summer; he says he is starving, and has the unheard-of insolence to ask me for the loan of a hundred riyos."

"You can afford to let him have them, can you not?" meekly asked his wife, "so I will go and give them to him."

The prince raised his hand and struck the unhappy woman to the ground.

Inari could stay no longer. Outside, where cowered the beggar, he assumed the guise of a retainer.

"Where do you live?" he asked the poor man.

"At Kawasaki, your noble honour," replied the man, trembling with terror, "and I have walked here through snow some fourteen miles to ask his highness for help, for I am very poor and miserable, and through no fault of my own."

"Are you honest?" asked Inari.

"I try to be, your honour," answered the poor fellow.

"I can easily find out," said the god, "so do not deceive me."

The beggar looked at him.

Inari placed his hand on the man's sleeve and disappeared. The beggar, bewildered, looked around, then felt in his sleeve and pulled out notes to the value of 500 riyos. Then he fell on his knees and cried, "It is the worshipful Inari himself," and went on his way rejoicing.

The next day the Prince of Bizen was murdered, and his palace burnt to the ground by a mob of discontented tenants.

The next journey of Inari was to a hall of justice. "If I don't find honesty here," he said, "I don't know where to look for it."

The day's business began, and Inari took the form of a pen in the hand of one of the clerks.

"Call the first case," said the judge, a big, heavy fellow, with a face which betokened constant acquaintance with the good things of this life.

The first criminal was introduced; he was carried in, for he had lain five days in a noisome cell with weights upon his back and legs, and could not move.

"You are accused of robbery," said the judge.

"Nay, your honour," whispered the poor wretch, "I was starving. I saw a rice cake on a shop shelf, and I could not resist the temptation to seize it."

"Doesn't matter. It's robbery," said the judge. "People's property must be protected. Fifty stripes with the bamboo, a month's hard labour upon rice and water, and think yourself lucky to get off with your head. Next case."

A dissolute-looking young fellow, fashionably dressed, swaggered in between two gaolers.

"Sorry to see you here Mr. Hanaski," said the judge blandly. "Same as before, I suppose?"

"Well, sir," replied the young man, with an air of careless effrontery, "it was at the 'Three Pine Trees'; I suppose I had been drinking a bit; the wench was impudent, and I cut her down. I suppose a couple of hundred riyos for the family will settle it?"

"Oh, as it was justifiable," said the judge, "we'll have it a hundred. Good morning."

The young man paid the money and left the court.

Inari shuddered.

"Here," thought he, "is a poor wretch who is convicted of having stolen a cake worth half-a-tempo to appease the cravings of his hunger, and is condemned to be crippled for life; and a young blackguard who kills a woman gets off with an easy fine!"

On the spot he struck the judge with a dropsy, from which he never recovered; and the young murderer was waylaid by the friends of the girl, and so maltreated that he died of his wounds.

Heart-sick and mortified, Inari said:

"Now for Kawasaki. Possibly, but not probably, I shall find beneath the lowly peasant's roof what I have failed to discover in the gilded palaces of the mighty."

To Kawasaki he went as a pilgrim. He soon espied the beggar cutting wood outside a poor but neat little hut hard by the ferry.

Assuming an air of great weariness the god addressed him:

"I am bound for the holy O Yama, to do my mid-winter penance beneath the cascade at Koyais. I am very poor, and cannot afford to go to one of the great tea-houses; perhaps you will let me rest here and refresh myself, in return for what few tempos I can give."

The peasant took Inari's arm and gently led him in.

"O Kiku," he cried to his wife, "here quick bring some warm water, and something to eat and drink; here is a poor old pilgrim tired and hungry."

A pleasant-looking old woman approached at the summons and saluted Inari. Then the warm water was brought and she bathed the feet of the god, whilst her husband scraped together what little food and wine there was in the house, and set it before him.

"I feel ashamed," said Inari, "at trespassing on the good nature of those who are as poor as myself."

"Do not mention it, sir," said the peasant. "We have to work hard for our living, but we have always something to spare for poor travellers like yourself."

"And how do you get your living, if it is not a rude question?" asked Inari.

"I cut for the great tea-houses," replied the man, "and at busy times I help the ferry man. But I had such great good luck the other day that we are quite comfortable now." And he told Inari about his visit to the Bizen palace.

The god said nothing for a few minutes, and then he asked: "I shall be returning here in a fortnight's time; could you make it convenient to lend me fifty riyos?"

"Willingly, sir," said the peasant, and he counted out the sum from his bamboo stem and placed the paper in the hand of the god.

In a fortnight Inari returned to the peasant's house and said:

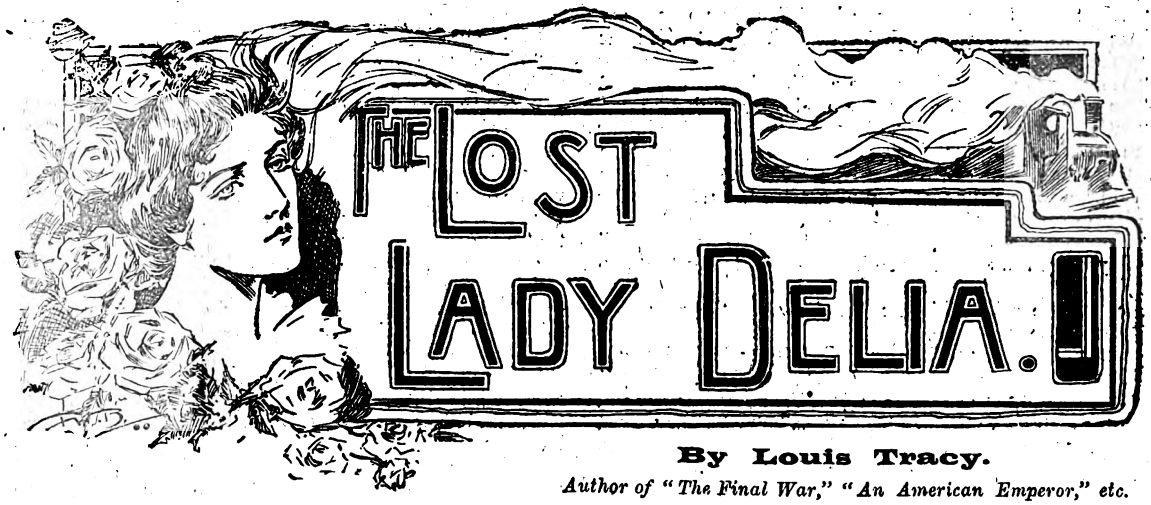
"Here are the fifty riyos you were kind enough to lend me, and," taking from his own pocket a roll of notes, "here are five hundred more. I only borrowed from you to test your heart, and perhaps you can guess who I am."

The astonished and delighted couple fell on their knees, in an ecstacy of joy.

Inari disappeared, and the poor peasant prospered ever after, until he became owner of the largest tea-house in Kawasaki.

FRANK ABELL.

Digitized by Google



By Louis Tracy.

Author of "The Final War," "An American Emperor," etc.

SUMMARY.

Lady Delia Lyle leaves her house one foggy November afternoon, and is seen at Victoria Station, on the Underground Railway, by Mr. Reginald Brett, a barrister friend of her husband, who gets her ticket and puts her in the train for Richmond, where she says she is going to see her sister, but from that time she is not heard of.

After some days have passed, without bringing any news of Lady Delia, her husband, Sir Charles Lyle, puts the matter into the hands of detectives, Inspector Winter taking charge of the case.

Brett also promises to do all he can, and he finds out that Lady Delia, on the night of her disappearance, instead of going to Richmond, alighted at Sloane Square, and went to a block of flats called Raleigh Mansions.

Towards the end of the month the body of a woman, evidently murdered, is found wedged beneath a drain-pipe in the Thames at Putney, and, though Sir Charles does not identify the body, Brett imagines it to be that of Lady Delia. Shortly after this discovery Lady Delia's maid, Jane Harding, disappears. She is afterwards found to have gone on the stage.

Brett now starts investigations at Raleigh Mansions, and he fixes on two residents there as being likely to have been connected with Lady Delia. These are a Mr. Sydney H. Pyne, who is not at present in residence, and a Mrs. Hilmer, whom he finds to be Pyne's sister.

It had transpired that Pyne had gone to Monte Carlo, and thither Brett goes, and he discovers that though letters are addressed to Pyne at the Hotel du Cercle, he is not known there.

During his stay at Monte Carlo Brett becomes acquainted with an Englishman, named Albert Mensmore, whom he helps out of some money difficulties, but he does not discover anything about Pyne.

CHAPTER XI.

Theories.

Brett announced his departure from Monte Carlo by a telegram to his valet.

Nevertheless, he did not expect to find that useful adjunct to his small household—Smith and his wife comprised the barrister's ménage—standing on the platform at Charing Cross when the evening mail from the Continent steamed into the station.

Smith, who had his doubts about this sudden trip to the Riviera, was relieved when he saw that his master was alone. "Sir Charles Lyle called this afternoon, sir," he explained. "I told Sir Charles about your wire, sir, and he is very anxious that you should dine with him to night. You can dress at Portman Square, and if I come with you——"

"Yes; I understand. Bundle everything into a four-wheeler."

"Sir Charles thought you might come, sir, so he has sent his carriage."

London looked dull but familiar as they rolled across Leicester Square and up Regent Street. Your true Cockney knows that he is out of his latitude when the sky is blue overhead. Let him hear the tinkle of the hansoms' bells through a dim, fog-laden atmosphere, and he knows where he is. There is but one London, and Cockneydom is the order of Melchisedek. Brett's heart was glad within him to be home again, even though the band was just at that hour gathering in the Casino gardens, and the lights of Monaco were beginning to gleam over the expanse of the Mediterranean.

At Wensley House the traveller was warmly welcomed by the baronet, who seemed to have somewhat recovered his health and spirits.

It was not until dinner had ended that Brett was clearly able to note the ineffaceable signs of the suffering Sir Charles Lyle had undergone since the disappearance of his wife. He had aged quite ten years in appearance. Deep lines of sorrowful thought had indented his brow, his face was thinner, and had acquired a wistful look; his air was that of a man whose theory of life had been forcibly reversed.

At first both men fought shy of the topic of Lady Delia, but the after-dinner cigar brought the question to Lyle's lips:

"And now, Brett, have you any further news concerning my wife's—death?"

The barrister noticed the struggle before the final word came. The husband had, then, resigned all hope.

"I have none," he answered. "That is to say, I have nothing definite. I promised to tell you everything I did, so I will keep my promise, but you will, of course, differentiate between facts and theories?"

The baronet nodded an agreement.

"In the first place," said Brett, "let me ask you whether or not you have seen Jane Harding, the missing maid?"

"Yes. It seems that she called here twice, before she caught me at home. At first she was very angry about a squabble there had been between Thompson and herself. I refused to listen to it. Then she told me how you had found her at some theatre, and she volunteered an explanation of her extraordinary behaviour. She said that she had unexpectedly come into a large sum of money, and that it had turned her head. She was sorry for the trouble her actions had caused, so, under the circumstances, I allowed her to take away certain clothes and other belongings she had left here."

Digitized by Google

"Did she ask for these things?"

"Yes. Made quite a point of it."

"Did you see them?"

"No."

"So you do not know whether they were of any value, or the usual collection of rubbish found in servant's boxes."

"I have not the slightest notion."

"Have they ever been thoroughly examined by any one?"

"'Pon my honour, I believe not. Now that you remind me of it I think the girl seemed rather anxious on that point. I remember my housekeeper telling me that Harding asked her if her clothes had been ransacked by detectives."

"And what did the housekeeper say?"

"She will tell you herself. Let us have her up."

"Don't trouble her. If I remember aright the police did not examine Jane Harding's room. They simply took your report and the statements of the other servants, whilst the housekeeper was responsible for the partial search made through the girl's boxes for some clue that might lead to her discovery."

"That is so."

The barrister smoked in silence for a few minutes until Sir Charles broke out rather querulously.

"I suppose I did wrong in letting Harding take away her traps?"

"No," said Brett. "It is I who am to blame. There is something underhand about this young woman's conduct. The story about the sudden wealth is all bunkum, in one sense. That she did receive a bequest or gift of a considerable sum cannot be doubted. That she at once decided to go on the stage is obvious. But what is the usual course for a servant to pursue in such cases? Would she not have first sought to glorify herself in the sight of her fellow-servants, and even of her employers? Would there not have been the display of a splendid departure—in a hansom—with voluble directions to the driver, for the benefit of the footman? As it was, Jane Harding acted suddenly, precipitately, under the stress of some powerful emotion. I cannot help believing that her departure from this house had some connection, however remote, with Lady Delia's disappearance."

"Good Heavens, Brett, you never told me this before."

"True, but when we last met I had not the pleasure of Miss Marie le Marchant's acquaintance. I wish to goodness I had rummaged her boxes before she carried them off."

"And I sincerely echo your wish," said Sir Charles testily, "It always seems, somehow, that I am to blame."

"You must not take that view. I really wonder, Lyle, that you have not closed up your town house and gone off to Scotland for the fag-end of the shooting season. You won't hunt, I know, but a quiet life on the moors would bring you right away from associations which must have bitter memories for you."

"I would have done so, but I cannot tear myself away whilst there is the slightest chance of the mystery attending my wife's fate being unravelled. I feel that I must remain here, near you. You are the only man who can solve the riddle, if ever it be solved. By the way, what of Raleigh Mansions?"

The baronet obviously nerved himself to ask the question. The reason was patent. The inexplicable visit of Lady Delia to that locality was in some way connected with her fate, and the commonsense view was that some intrigue lay hidden behind the present impenetrable wall of ignorance that shrouded her final movements.

Brett hesitated for a moment. Was there any need to bring Mrs. Hillmer's name into the business? At any rate, he could fully answer Sir Charles without mentioning her at this juncture.

"The only person in Raleigh Mansions who interests me just now is one who, to use a convenient bull, is not there."

"Yes?"

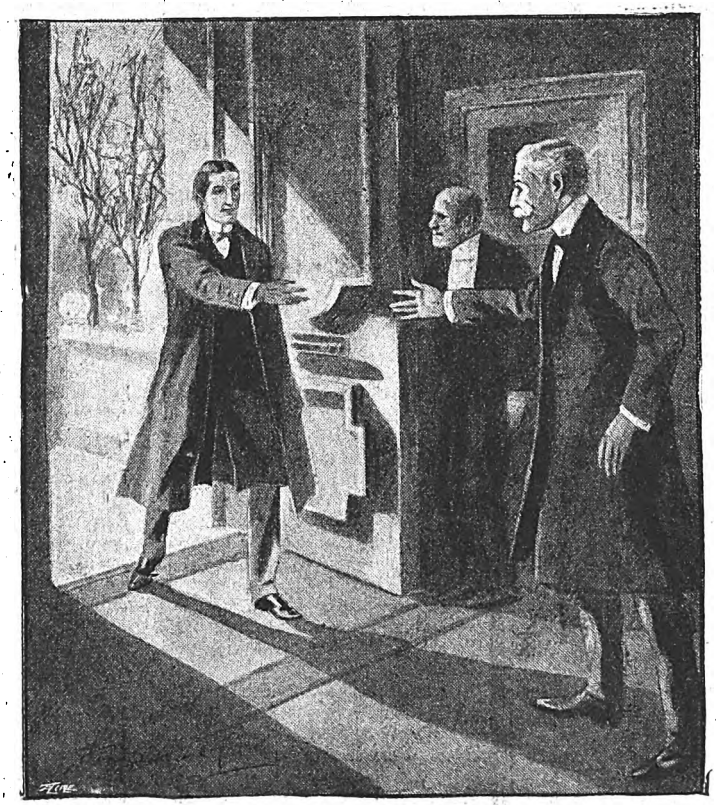
"This person occupies a flat in No. 12, his name is Sydney H. Pyne, and he left his residence for the Riviera two days after your wife was lost."

"Now, who on earth can he be? I am as sure as a man may be of anything that no one of that name was in the remotest way connected with either my wife or myself for the last—let me see—six years, at any rate."

"Possibly. But you cannot say that Lady Delia may not have met him previously?"

The baronet winced at the illusion as though a whip had struck him. "For Heaven's sake, Brett," he cried, "do not harbour suspicions against my wife. I cannot bear it. I tell you my whole soul revolts at the idea. I would rather be suspected of having killed her myself than listen to a word whispered against her good name."

"I sympathise with you, but you must not jump at me in that fashion. One hypothesis is as wildly impossible as the other. I did not say that Lady Delia went to Raleigh Mansions on account of some present or bygone transgression of her own. I would as soon think of my mother



At Wensley House the traveller was warmly welcomed by the baronet.

Digitized by Google

"You didn't know, Brett," he said, "that you vividly described the attempted self-murder of a man I know intimately."

in such a connection. But a pure, good woman will often do on behalf of others what she will not do for herself. Really, Lyle, you must not be unjust to me, especially when you force me to tell you what may prove to be mere theories."

"Others? What others?"

"I cannot say. I wish I could. If I once lay hold of the reason that brought Lady Delia to Raleigh Mansions I will, within twenty-four hours, tell you who murdered her. Of that I am as certain as that the sun will rise to-morrow."

And the barrister poked the fire viciously to give vent to the annoyance that his friend's outburst had provoked.

"Pardon me, Brett. Do not forget how I have suffered—what I am suffering—and try to bear with me. I never valued my wife while she lived. It is only now that I feel the extent of my loss. If my own life would only restore her to me for an instant I would cheerfully give it."

If ever man meant his words Sir Charles Lyle did. His agitation moved the kindly-hearted barrister to rise and place a gentle hand on his shoulder.

"I am sorry, Lyle," he said, "that the conversation has taken this turn. These speculative guesses at potential clues distress you. If you took my advice you would not worry about events until at least something tangible turns up."

"Perhaps it is best so," murmured the other. "In any event, it is of little consequence. I cannot live long."

"Oh, nonsense. You are good for another fifty years. Come, shake off this absurd depression You can do no good by it. I wish now I had taken you with me to Monte Carlo. The fresh air would have braced you up whilst I hunted for Fyne."

"Did you find him?"

"No, but I dropped in for an adventure that would cheer the soul of any depressed author searching vainly for an idea for a short story."

"What was it?"

Reggie, who possessed no mean skill as a raconteur, gave him the history of the Casino incident, and the thrilling denouement so interested the baronet that he lit another cigar.

"Did you ascertain the names of the parties?" he said.

"Oh, yes. You will respect their identity, as the sensational side of the affair had better now be buried in oblivion, though, of course, all the world knows about the way we scooped the bank. The lady is a daughter of Sir William Browne, a worthy knight from Warwickshire, and her rather vapid swain is a youngster named Mensmore."

"Mensmore!" shouted the baronet. "A youngster you say," and Sir Charles bounced upright in his excitement.

"Why, yes, a man of twenty-five. Not more than twenty-eight, I can swear. Do you know him?"

"Albert Mensmore?"

"That's the man beyond doubt."

Lyle hastily poured out some whisky and water and swallowed it. Then he spoke, with a faint smile: "You didn't know, Brett," he said, "that you vividly described the attempted self-murder of a man I know intimately."

"What an extraordinary thing! Yet I never remember hearing you mention his name."

"Probably not. I have hardly seen him since my marriage. We were schoolboys together, though as I was much his senior we did not chum together until later when we met a good deal on the Turf. Then he went off roughing it in the States. It must be he. It is just one of his mad pranks. And he is going to marry, eh? Is she a nice girl?"

The baronet was thoroughly excited. He talked fast, and helped himself liberally to stimulants.

"Yes, unusually so. But I cannot help marvelling at this odd coincidence. It has upset you."

"Not a bit. I was interested in your yarn, but naturally I was unprepared for the startling fact that an old friend of my own filled the chief part. What a fellow you are, Reggie, for always turning up at the right time. I have never been in a tight place personally, but if I were I suppose you would come along and show me the way out. Sit down again and give me all the details. I am full of curiosity."

Brett had never before seen Sir Charles in such hysterical mood. The anguish of the past three months had changed the careless, jovial baronet into a fretful, wayward being, who had lost control of his emotions. Undoubtedly he required some powerful tonic. The barrister resolved to see more of him in the near future, and not to cease urging until he had started on a long sea voyage, or taken up some hobby that would keep his mind from brooding upon the everlasting topic of Lady Delia's strange death.

Lyle's fitful disposition manifested itself later. After he had listened with keen attention to all that Brett had to tell him concerning Mensmore and Phyllis Browne, he suddenly swerved back to the one engrossing thought.

Digitized by Google

"What are you going to do about Pyne?" he asked.

"Find him."

"But how?"

"People are always tied to a centre by a string, and no matter how long the string may be, it contracts sooner or later. Pyne will turn up at Raleigh Mansions, and before very many weeks have passed, if I mistake not."

"And then?"

"Then he will have to answer me a few pertinent questions."

"But suppose he knows nothing whatever about the business?"

"In that case I must confess that the clue is more tangled than ever."

"It would be curious if Pyne and Jane Harding were in any way associated."

"If they were, it would take much to convince me that one or both could not supply at least some important information bearing on my—on our quest. If Mr. Winter even knew as much as I do about them he would arrest them at sight."

"Oh, he's a thick-headed chap is Winter. By the way, that reminds me. He got hold of the maid, it seems, before she bolted, and made her give him some of my wife's clothes. By that means he established some sort of theory about——"

"About a matter on which we differ," put in Brett, quietly. "Let us talk of something else."

Lyle moved restlessly in his chair, but yielded. For the remainder of the evening they discussed questions irrelevant to the course of this narrative.

It was late when they separated, but Brett found Smith sitting up for him at home.

That faithful servitor bustled about, stirring the fire and turning on the lights. Finally he nervously addressed his master:

"Pardon me, sir, but there was a policeman here asking about you to-night, sir."

"A policeman!"

"Well, sir, a detective, Mr. Winter, of Scotland Yard. I knew him, sir, though he didn't think it. He came about ten o'clock, and asked if you was at home and where you were."

"Did you tell him?"

"Well, sir," and Smith shifted from one foot to the other, "I thought it best to let him know the truth, sir."

"Good gracious, Smith, he is not going to handcuff me. You did quite right. What did he say?"

"Nothing, sir; except that he would call again. He wouldn't leave his name, but I know'd him all right."

"Thank you. Good night. It was unnecessary that you should have remained up. But I am obliged to you all the same."

The barrister laughed as he went to his room. "Really," he said to himself, still highly amused, "Winter will cap all his previous feats by trying to arrest me. I expect he has thought of it for a long time."

And Mr. Winter had thought of it.

CHAPTER XII.

WHO PYNE WAS.

"INEXORABLE Fate" is a favourite phrase with the makers of books; but Fate, being feminine according to the best authorities, is also somewhat fickle in disposition. Not only is she not invariably inexorable, but at times she delights to play with her poor subjects, to dazzle them with surprise, as it were, to stupefy them with the sense of their sheer inability to foresee her vagaries.

It was Brett's turn to receive the sharpest lesson in this respect that he ever remembered.

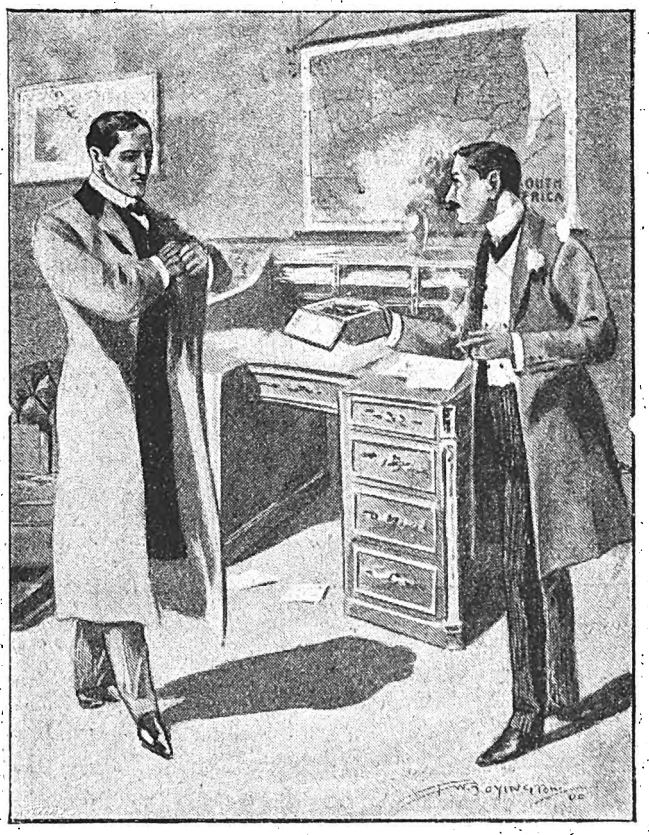
At breakfast the following morning he picked out from a packet of unimportant letters one which required immediate attention. The financial agents to whom he had written in conformity with his implied promise to Mr. Dodge had replied favourably with reference to the re-construction scheme of the Springbok Mine.

They informed Brett confidentially that a thoroughly reliable man in Johannesburg, to whom they had cabled, reported very strongly in favour of the property. They would await his written statement before finally committing themselves. Meanwhile, if Messrs. Dodge, Son, and Co. (Limited) were anxious to get the business advanced a stage, there was no reason why he (Brett) should not see this firm of brokers and assure them that, subject to the first satisfactory report being confirmed, his clients would underwrite the shares. The whole thing would thus go through in about three weeks. As for Brett himself, they proposed to give him a commission of five per cent. in fully-paid shares for the introduction.

"Well, I never!" laughed Brett. "Now who would have thought such a thing possible? Why, if that rascal Dodge is right and this company is really a sound undertaking, my

"Pardon me, sir, but there was a policeman here asking about you to-night, sir."

Digitized by Google



"How stupid of me. I have forgotten my morning smoke. May I light a cigar?"

share of the deal will be £10,000. It seems wildly incredible, yet my friends know what they are writing about as a rule."

An hour later he was in the City.

A smart brougham stood in front of the now thoroughly renovated offices of "Dodge, Son, and Co. (Limited)," and out of it, at the moment the barrister detached himself from the chaos of Leadenhall Street, stepped the head of the firm.

Oblivious of Brett's presence, he was making up the steps when Reggie cried:

"Hullo, Mr. Dodge, how is the junior partner?"

Dodge stopped, focussed Brett with his sharp eyes, and smiled:

"Oh, it is you, is it? The young 'un is all right, thanks. Are you coming in?"

"That was my intention."

"Come along then. I was hoping I should see you again one of these days."

"Has business improved recently?" said Brett, as they entered the inner office.

"Yes, somewhat; but money is very tight still. However, we generally look for a spurt early in the New Year. Why do you ask?"

"No valid reason. A mere hazard."

"Was it because you saw me drive up in a carriage?"

"Mr. Dodge, I never dreamt that self-consciousness was a failing of members of the Stock Exchange."

"Then that was the cause. I guessed it. I have been making inquiries about you, Mr. Brett, and there is no use in trying to fool you, not a bit."

"Have you another Springbok proposition on hand?"

"No, bar chaffing. You were the man who ferreted out the truth about that West Australian combination when everybody else had failed. And, now I think of it, you made me talk a lot the last time you were here. However, I am ready. Fire away! I will tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help me——"

"Sh—s—sh! Do not perjure yourself for the sake of alliteration. Besides, it is I who have come to talk this time."

"About Springboks?"

"Yes. The people I mentioned to you at my previous visit are prepared to underwrite the shares, provided that their agent's report is as favourable in its entirety as a telegraphic summary leads them to believe."

"Eh? That's good news! When will they be in a position to complete?"

"As soon as they hear from South Africa by post. Say, three weeks."

"So long! But suppose I get an offer from some other quarter in the meantime? I cannot keep the proposal open indefinitely."

"I have not asked you to do so, Mr. Dodge. Let me see—3s. per share on, say, two hundred thousand shares is £30,000. It is a good deal of money. If anyone likes to hand you a cheque for that amount without preliminary investigation, take it by all means."

The notion tickled Dodge immensely.

"All right, Mr. Brett. When people of that sort turn up we don't sell 'em Springboks in the City. But there is no harm in your telling me your clients' names."

"Not in the least. They are the Anglo-African Finance Corporation."

Mr. Dodge whistled. "By Jove, they're the best backing I could have. This is a good turn, Mr. Brett, and I sha'n't forget it. You see we're a young firm, and association with well-known houses is good for us in every sense. I'm jolly glad now that Springboks are all right. It would never have done for me to introduce them to a risky piece of business. I am really very much obliged to you. And now, how do we stand?"

"Kindly explain."

"How much 'com.' do you want?"

"Nothing."

Mr. Dodge moved his chair backwards for several feet in sheer amazement. "Nothing, my dear sir! Nonsense. It is a big affair. Shall we say one per cent. in cash, or two in shares. I am not very well off just now, or——"

"Pray don't trouble yourself. I have already got my commission—five per cent. in fully-paid shares."

"But the people who put up the money don't pay for the privilege as a rule!"

"That I know quite well. This case is different. I am not, nor ever have been, a financial go-between."

"Didn't you come to see me about the deal in the first instance?"

It was Brett's turn to hesitate.

"Not exactly," he said. "I really wanted to know something about Mr. Pyne, and the Springbok business arose out of it."

"Ah, that chap Pyne. I have been thinking about him. I wonder who he can be? Anyhow, I owe him my best wishes, as the mention of his name has had such excellent results."

"Well, that is all," said Brett rising.

Digitized by Google

"Yes, thanks. I must now see about raising the money to pay my own call. I am interested in 50,000 shares, you know."

"Then you require some £7,500."

"Yes. But that will be easy when I can say that the Anglo-African Finance people are with me. Besides, I have this morning—queer you should call immediately afterwards—had some wholly unexpected good news."

"Indeed?" Mr. Dodge was in a talkative vein, and Brett was in no hurry.

"The very best!" went on Dodge gleefully. "You see, there is another man in this affair with me. I thought he was as stony-broke as I was myself—speaking confidentially, you know—when he suddenly writes to me saying that he had won a pot of money at Monte Carlo and could spare me £2,000. What's the matter? Beastly trying weather, isn't it? Try a nip of brandy."

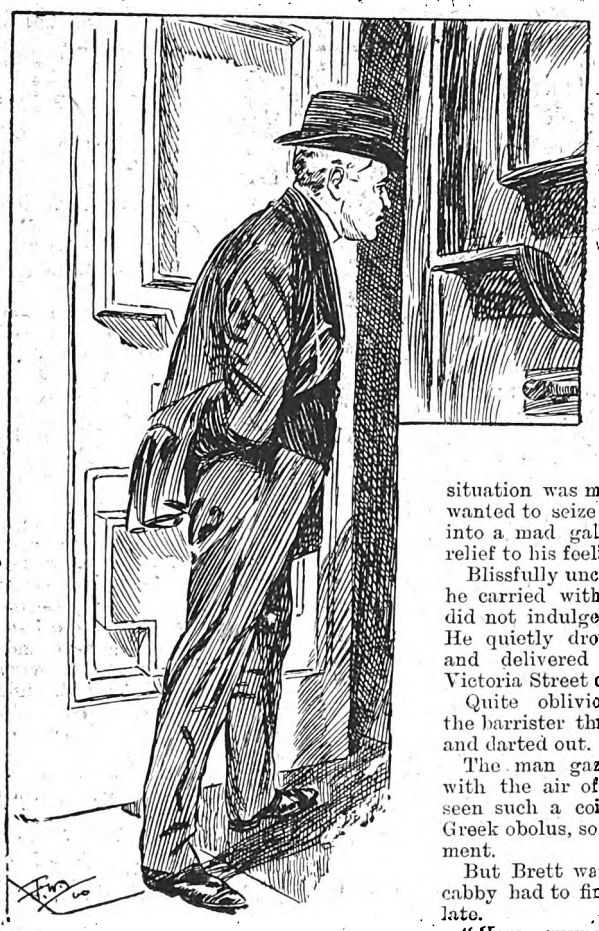
For once in his life the self-possessed barrister had blanched at a sudden revelation. But this was too much. He felt as though a meteorite had fallen on his head. Still he grappled with the situation.

"Ill! No!" he cried. "How stupid of me. I have forgotten my morning smoke. May I light a cigar?"

"With pleasure. You know these. Try one."

"You were saying——"

"That's all. This young fellow, Mensmore his name is, got mixed up with me over a Californian mine. I thought he had lots of coin, so when Springboks came along he and I went shares in underwriting them. The public didn't feed, so we were loaded. I tried all I knew to get him to pay up, but he absolutely couldn't. And now at the very moment affairs look promising he writes offering £2,000. More than that, he says, if necessary, he can get the remainder of his half, £1,750, from somebody. Where is his letter?"



Winter vanished into the interior.

Mr. Dodge looked on his table. "Oh, here it is. Addressed from 'Yacht, White Heather,' if you please. Quite swell, eh? Sir William Browne! That's the covey. I think I will let Sir William have 'em. It's a good, solid sort of name to have on the share register."

"I would if I were you," said Brett, hardly conscious of his surroundings.

"If you think so, I will. By Jove, this has been a good morning for me. Come and have lunch."

"No, thanks. I have a lot to attend to. By the way, where did Mensmore live?"

"I don't know. His address was always at the Orleans Club."

Somehow Brett got into the street and into a hansom. As the vehicle rolled off westward he crouched into the corner and tried to wrestle with the problem that befogged his brain.

Was Albert Mensmore Sydney H. Pyne? Was he Mrs. Hilmer's brother? The "Bertie" she had spoken of meant Albert as well as a hypothetical Herbert. Mensmore was an old schoolfellow of Sir Charles Lyle's. In all probability he knew Lady Lyle as well. He lived in Raleigh Mansions under an assumed name, and quitted his abode two days after Lady Delia was murdered.

Every circumstance pointed to the terrible assumption that at Mensmore's hands the unfortunate lady met her death. And Brett had sworn to avenge her memory!

He laughed with savage mirth as he reflected that he had himself helped this man to escape the punishment of Providence self-inflicted. It was, indeed, pitifully amusing to think how the clever detective had used his powers to befool himself. The very openness of the clue had helped to conceal it the more effectually. Were it not for Dodge and his Springboks he might have gone on indefinitely covering up the criminal's tracks by his own friendly actions. The situation was maddening, intolerable. Brett wanted to seize the reins and flog the horse into a mad gallop through the traffic as a relief to his feelings.

Blissfully unconscious of the living volcano he carried within, the cabby on the perch did not indulge in any such illegal antics. He quietly drove along the Embankment and delivered his seething fare at his Victoria Street chambers.

Quite oblivious of commonplace affairs, the barrister threw a shilling to the driver and darted out.

The man gazed at her Majesty's image with the air of one who had never before seen such a coin. It might have been a Greek obolus, so utter was his blank astonishment.

But Brett was across the pavement, and cabby had to find words, else it would be too late.

"Here, guvnor," he yelled, "what the ballyhooley do you call this?"

"What's the matter?" asked Brett, impatiently.

"Matter!" The cabman looked towards the sky to see if the heavens were falling. "Matter!" in a higher key, as a crowd began to gather. "I tykes him from Leaden'all Street to Victoria. 'E gives me a bob, an' 'e arsks me wot's the matter. I'd been on the ranks four bloomin' hours——"

"Oh, there you are," and Brett threw him half-a-crown before he disappeared up the steps.

Mr. Winter was waiting Brett's arrival. He wondered why the barrister was so perturbed, and resolved to strike whilst the iron was hot. So he, too, vanished into the interior.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT PEOPLE.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "The Zone of Fire," by Headon Hill, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. W. Fowler, 120 Union Street, Torquay. Attempts this week must deal with Stories bout ANY SUBJECT, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, January 21st. Post-cards only, please.

The Sweetest Musical Instrument.

At a National School in the North of England, during a test examination in music, the teacher asked his class, as a last question:

"What is the sweetest musical instrument?"

To sharpen the wits of his pupils he offered a prize of sixpence for the best answer.

Amongst the many eager faces the master particularly noticed one boy, waving his hand, and muttering.

"Please, sir! Please, sir!" as he excitedly endeavoured to attract his attention first.

"Well, Johnny, what is it?" he asked.

"Please, sir, a toffy whistle," he replied.

The master, much amused, awarded Johnny the prize.

W. F.

Before the Ball.

In a Northern town recently an old gentleman was induced to buy a ticket for the local firemen's ball to be held early in the New Year.

As he wanted another ticket he went to the fire-station, but found no one there.

Roaming within the building he found an electric button on the side of the wall, and put his thumb to it.

The effect was electric in every sense of the word, for the next moment, through the ceiling, down the stairs, and from every other direction, firemen came, running and falling, the horses rushed out of their stables, and, in brief, all the machinery of a modern engine-house was suddenly put in motion.

Amid all this commotion stood the innocent old stranger, utterly unaware that he had pressed the fire-alarm.

Then, on one of the men calling to him from the top of the smoking engine for information as to the whereabouts of the fire, he looked up at the expectant flame-fighters, and mildly said:

"If you please, gentlemen, I should like to buy another ticket for the New Year's ball."

A. Y.

An Evasive Answer.

"John," said a clergyman to his factotum, "I shall be very busy this afternoon, and if anyone calls I do not wish to be disturbed."

"All right, sir. Will I tell them you're not in?"

"No, John; that would be a lie."

"An' what'll I say, then?"

"Oh, just put them off with an evasive answer."

At supper time John was asked if anyone had called.

"Yes, there did," he said.

"And what did you tell him?" asked the clergyman.

"I gave him an evasive answer."

"What was that?" queried his reverence.

"He asked me was yer reverence in, an' I sez to him, sez I, 'Was yer grandmother a hoot owl?'"

J. G. B.

An Absent-Minded Beggar.

Jones thought he had left his walking-stick on the previous evening at Brown's house, so on arriving in the City he decided to telephone on to him.

Jones (at the telephone): "Is that you, Brown? Did I leave my stick at your place last night?"

Brown: "Wait a moment, I will have a look."

Three minutes later, holding a stick up at the telephone: "Is this yours?"

Collapse of Jones.

W. T. C.

His Namesake.

At a recent inspection of recruits the German Emperor asked one of the men his name, and was told, "Andrée."

"Are you aware that you have a very famous namesake?" inquired his Majesty.

The recruit replied in the affirmative.

"Who told you that?" asked the Emperor.

"My Captain, your Majesty," replied the recruit.

"And what did your Captain tell you about Andrée?"

"He said, your Majesty, that he only wished Andrée had taken me with him."

G. E. G.

Reason Enough.

One day a half-witted youth was standing on the bank of a river, when he was accosted from the other side with:

"Hi, Jimmy! What is the best place to cross?"

Jimmy, who had a spite against the gentleman, sent him to the deepest part.

In crossing, the gentleman was nearly drowned, and when he came up to where Jimmy was standing, began scolding him for telling him wrongly.

"Well! well!" returned Jimmy, "I've seen the ducks and the geese cross there, and you've longer legs than them!"

F. W.

Digitized by Google

Lavish for Once.

THE child was generous to a fault. Whenever it had anything given, it yearned to share it with other children, but its mother (from whom it had not inherited its instincts) put a strong curb upon its impulsiveness.

"Mammy," said the child one day, lifting a chubby, pleading face to the woman's hard one, "U'cle Tom has gived me a bag of sweeties. Please may I let Mr. Smif's babies join?"

Mammy peered critically into the bag of indigestible sweets, while "Mrs. Smif's babies" and Mrs. Smith herself stood by waiting for the verdict. After awhile, with a smile of rare graciousness, mammy returned the bag.

"Yes, love, you may give them six apiece," she sweetly condescended. "They're not fit for you to eat, my precious!"

R. A. H. G.

This Way Out.

ONE Christmas a man who had leased a skating-pond for the previous two years, with terribly bad results, had his hopes raised by an ever-thickening sheet of ice. Skaters flocked down but the lessee refused their money.

"Can't do it," he said sorrowfully. "Won't bear, you know."

One skater, more determined than the rest, however, managed to slip in, and, gaining the pond, began gyrating about.

"Come off that, will you!" yelled the keeper, catching sight of him.

"Can't! 'Tain't bearing round the edges!" shouted the skater, as he executed a demi-semicircle round some thin ice. Next moment a crack, a splash, and a cry of "Help!" as he quitted the surface for the bottom of the pond.

"Look here," yelled the lessee, scarcely appeased, "you've got to come out of that, or the water won't freeze; but you don't break no more ice, d'ye hear! Crawl underneath to where I am, and I'll knock a hole for you to get out."

C. P. F.

"Done Brown!"

ONE morning a gentleman riding on a "pirate 'bus," after tendering his penny for his usual "lift" in the City, was surprised to learn that the fare was twopence.

"So you're a pirate, eh!" he exclaimed.

"It doesn't matter what I am," retorted the conductor, "you've got to pay another penny or else jump down."

"I shall do neither," said the passenger. "You've got the wrong sort of man to deal with. Here's my card; you can just do what you like."

"Oh, all right," replied the man, "you'll hear some more about this!"

About three weeks afterwards, when the incident had completely passed from his mind, an unstamped letter was delivered at the passenger's residence, with twopence to pay on it. The addressee paid it.

Judge then of his feelings when, on opening the envelope, he found merely a piece of brown paper with the words "Done Brown!" written across it.

W. J. C.

MY IDEAL MAN.

(For Ladies Only.)

What is your idea of a perfect man, embodying all those qualities which you consider to be the best?

Write out in a paragraph of not more than two hundred words a description of your ideal man.

A prize of two guineas will be awarded to the sender of the attempt which the Editor considers to be the best.

All attempts should be addressed to the Editor of Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and should reach this office not later than Tuesday, January 22nd. Envelopes should be marked LADY in the top left-hand corner.

MY IDEAL WOMAN.

(For Gentlemen Only.)

Every man has his idea of a perfect woman. What is yours?

Write out your opinion in a paragraph of not more than two hundred words.

A prize of two guineas will be awarded to the sender of the attempt which the Editor considers to be the best.

All attempts should be addressed to the Editor of Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and should reach this office not later than Tuesday January 22nd. Envelopes should be marked MAN in the top left-hand corner.

PHOTOGRAPHS ENLARGED.

FOR 7s. we will enlarge any photograph, large or small, tintypes, or any kind of glass picture, provided the print is legible, to a beautiful India ink and crayon portrait, 15in. x 12in., mounted on a plate-sunk mount 24in. x 14in. Pictures of soldiers and sailors at the front will be enlarged for 6s.

All enlargements are of head and shoulders only.

What to do.

Write your name and address plainly in ink on a slip of paper, also on the back of the portrait you are sending us. Get a postal order for 7s. (if the photograph be that of a soldier or sailor get a 6s. postal order). Place all of these in an envelope, or make a securely packed parcel of them and address it to the PORTRAIT EDITOR, Pearson's Weekly, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A Reduction of Threepence

on each enlargement, when the order is for two or more from the same photograph, will be made.

Orders will be treated in rotation.

Although all possible care will be taken, we do not hold ourselves responsible for photographs damaged or lost in transit.

Result of "DISCOVERER" COMPETITION.

The solution to this puzzle was "Short Stories," and Stereoscopes have been awarded to the following, whose letters, containing correct solutions, were opened first:—

H. Auliff, 11 Cavendish Villas, Wood Green, N.
G. Kingston, 99 Church Road, Hove.
J. McCaffrey, 15 Crocus Street, Belfast.
A. B. L. Jones, Gower House, Marlborough Road, Newport, Monmouth.
R. Fisher, Canada House, Baldwin Street, Bristol.

Digitized by Google

BURIED ALIVE.

"WELCOME home, Alf, my boy."

My brother grasped my hand as he said these words, and did not release it until he had led me up the time-honoured steps of our ancestral home, and begun to assist me to unfasten my great coat.

"How are you, my lad?" he continued, without giving me time to reply to his hearty reception. "Why you look as brown as a berry, and certainly none the worse for your fifteen years' nabobism."

I had just returned to England, after having endured the trying climate of India for fifteen years, and had hastened at once to the old mansion where I had been born, and which was, at the time of my story, in the possession of my eldest brother, Stephen.

Our family bear the honoured name of Stanley, and are a younger branch of the noble house of that name. They had been settled for many centuries in a wild part of the North-west Riding of Yorkshire, upon an estate that was very beautiful from an artistic point view, but very poor from a pecuniary aspect; and consequently many generations of younger sons had been forced to push their way in the world, as I had.

My half-brother Stephen was twelve years older than I was, and had always regarded me with an affection more fatherly than brotherly, delighting in giving me pet names; and even when years of travel had tanned my originally fair complexion and silvered my hair, I was amused by the way in which, upon this our first meeting after many years, he ignored the present, and kept up the old manners and sayings that had characterised him when I was a boy at Stanley House.

A substantial repast was provided for me in the old dining-room, and after I had done justice to it, and the grey-haired butler (who had officiated in my father's time) had brought in the wine, Stephen and I were soon deep in conversation on topics peculiarly interesting to me.

"So you think the old place is changed?" he said musingly in reply to a remark that had fallen from me. "I've not noticed it; but it may be, it may be."

"Indeed it is, Stephen," I said, "and I think you are allowing the best part of the house to fall into decay. Now, in my father's day the west wing——"

"Hush," he cried, interrupting me with a startled look in his eyes. "Don't mention that, for Heaven's sake. She loved those rooms."

In a moment I had grasped his hand.

"Forgive me, Stephen," I exclaimed, as the terrible past flashed across my mind, and I saw I had opened an old wound.

"There is nothing to forgive, Alf, my boy," he said, looking into the bright fire with an anxious, troubled face. "You could not know all the horror of that terrible time."

Indeed I could not; for I was but a boy when I went to India. Nevertheless, I had heard sufficient whilst I was there of my brother's unfortunate marriage to convince me of the pain which my allusion to it would give to him.

I had heard how he had married a beautiful girl, and how fondly he had loved her, and how, after three months of married life, she had deserted him. With whom or whither she had gone, no one knew; and her name had become almost a forgotten sound at Stanley House.

I changed the subject of conversation, and tried to make him forget the unpleasant recollections which my words had raised, by relating some of the most amusing adventures that had befallen me whilst abroad; but, though he listened with interest, and seemed to try to shake off the gloom that had settled upon his mind, he never quite regained his wonted cheerfulness during the remainder of the evening, and retired early to rest, excusing himself by saying it was his custom.

Amongst the evils of civilisation which my somewhat stormy passage through life had taught me, that of late hours was by no means the smallest; and, knowing it would be useless for me to turn into bed before midnight, I put on my hat, lit another cigar, and strolled into the grounds to get a breath of fresh air.

It was a fine summer night. The moon was shining brightly from a clear starlit sky. I knew every foot of the ground, and visited many of my favourite haunts; and it must have been after eleven o'clock before I began to think of returning.

My cigar had gone out when I reached the bottom of the long avenue of tall trees, and, beginning to feel chilly, I walked somewhat quickly towards the house, crunching the gravel beneath my feet as I went.

As I drew near the front door my attention was attracted by the sudden appearance of a man bearing a lantern, who had evidently heard my footsteps, for he stopped and awaited my approach. At first I thought he was one of the servants; but upon drawing nearer I was surprised to find it was my brother.

I hastened to speak to him, when, to my great astonishment, after glancing at me eagerly, he turned away without any sign of recognition, and hurried rapidly in the direction of the west wing.

My first intention was to call out after him; but, upon second thought, I decided not to do so; for I was persuaded that he had seen and recognised me, and that perhaps my company might not be desired; so I entered the house, and was soon in bed and asleep.

Digitized by Google

The next morning when I came downstairs, I found Stephen already in the breakfast-room awaiting me. He was standing with his back towards the fire.

"Good-morning, Alf," he said smiling in his cheerful manner. "You are an exception to most lovers of late hours, I see."

"Yes," I replied. "I sleep soundly, and therefore rise early."

"You'll find the nights long and dull here, I'm afraid, after the excitement to which you've been accustomed."

"Oh no, not at all," I said, "There are so many old associations about Stanley House that I think I shall never be dull here. Now, last night I strolled through the grounds, and did not return until close upon midnight."

"These late hours seem to me to be a very stupid custom, and one which I could never cultivate. I think, my boy, that you would have been much wiser if you had turned in when I did, and slept until morning."

"Why, I daresay I was in bed before you."

"In bed before me?" he repeated, with a puzzled look. "What do you mean?"

"I mean just what I say—that I was in bed and asleep before you were, unless you finish your rest and rise before twelve at night."

"You must be joking, Alf," he said incredulously. "I was in bed by nine o'clock, and was up this morning by six."

"Surely you must be mistaken, Stephen; for I met you, or your double at the top of the avenue last night as I was returning to the house."

"Impossible!"

"Indeed, I did. I would have spoken to you, but you hurried away, and I thought you had seen me and wished to be alone."

"It could not have been me. I was never out of the house after seven o'clock."

All that day I was haunted by the recollection of what I had seen on the previous night, and my brother's denial. I had heard singular stories of Stephen being a somnambulist, before I had left England, and could not help wondering if he was still addicted to freaks of that kind; but as I had never seen him walk in his sleep, and as I had only half-believed the tales I had been told, I was not inclined to accept this explanation as a solution of the problem. However, I was determined to solve the mystery.

As soon as all were in bed, therefore, on the night following that on which I had arrived at Stanley House, I again went out into the ground, if I met the mysterious person whom I had seen on the previous night, to follow him and discover who he was.

The moon was shining fitfully from behind the stormy clouds that now and again obscured her disc, and a breeze of wind stirred in the branches of the trees. I paced upon the grass beneath the tall elms that pointed their foliaged branches to the sky.

I had taken up my point of observation just in front of the west wing of the house, which had been so long shut up and left to fall into decay. So great had been my brother's horror lest any portion of it should be touched by human foot, that not only had he boarded up every window and door that had communication without, but he had also caused to be built up every door that had given access from it to the main body of the building.

My head was full of thoughts of my boyhood, as I walked to and fro. I remembered many happy days spent in those rooms, for they had been my father's favourites; and it was not without a pang of regret that I looked at them, deserted and ruinous, simply because a false woman had also loved them.

I had waited until past midnight, and had almost given up my quest as hopeless, and was about to return to the house, when I heard a footstep on the damp gravel approaching.

I drew back into the shadow of the trees, and peered forth into the darkness, for at that moment a thick cloud shut out the light of the moon.

Nearer and nearer the footstep came, and at length the glimmering lantern shone out in the darkness. The man bearing the light went up to the principal entrance of the west wing, where he paused, and a moment later I heard a key shoot back the heavy lock; and the next instant the light and man disappeared as the door closed behind them.

Animated and excited, I stepped quickly, but softly, across the gravel walk to the door, where, for a moment I paused and listened. A footstep was ascending the creaking staircase. I waited until I heard it on the second flight before I tried the door. I found it open, and entered softly, closing it behind me. Before proceeding further, I cautiously took off my boots, and then I ascended the cold clammy stairs that smelt of the tomb.

From the second landing there opened a suite of apartments, which I remembered had been called the strong rooms, because they were in the very heart of the building, had few windows, and only one doorway for ingress or egress. The heavy oak door that opened into these rooms I found was ajar, and a bright light streamed out between the opening.

To my great astonishment, when I entered this room, I heard voices in the apartment beyond. At first I was so amazed that I could not distinguish a single word that was spoken; but as I became calm, and after drawing close to the door of the room from which the sound proceeded, I distinctly heard a woman's voice, in tearful accents, saying:

"Oh, if you love me, deliver me from this place! What have I done that I should be forced to bear this punishment? Have I not loved with a true woman's love? Speak to me. Do not look at me with eyes so glassy that they seem to see not. Give me one word, that I may hear you as the same Stephen that you were before this fearful malady overtook you. Let me again see the light of heaven, and the faces of my friends."

I crept softly nearer to the door, and got into a position from which I could partly distinguish the occupants of the room and their surroundings. It was a handsomely furnished apartment, half-boudoir, half-drawing-room.

Every luxury which the heart or brain could desire was scattered about in endless variety. In the centre of the floor stood my brother; but with such a strange, wicked, frenzied expression on his face, that, had I not known his features well, I should have thought it could not be he. Before him knelt a woman whose face was buried in her hands.

"You shall not leave me thus!" she cried as he turned to go. "I must, I will have my liberty!"

She had started to her feet, and ran to the door. But Stephen, still without any change in his fixed, staring countenance, seized her roughly by the arm, and pushed her from him, and walked quickly towards the door

Digitized by Google

I had hardly time to draw back into the shadow of a heavy curtain, when he entered the room where I was, and walked quickly across to the landing, closing this last door after him, and locking it.

Thus I found myself also a prisoner. I heard his footstep descend the stairs, and then the sound died slowly away.

For a few moments I stood puzzled as to what course I should pursue. I knew it would be useless to attempt to force the massive lock, or when morning came to try to attract the outer world; for, as I have said, the rooms were strongly built and situated in the very heart of the west wing, and the few windows which had of yore let in the light of heaven to them had been filled up with strong masonry.

I was roused from my thoughts by a sob from the occupant of the next chamber. Going up to the door which Stephen had closed behind him, I knocked, and then entered.

My tap had evidently not been heard, for I found the graceful form seated in a chair in an attitude which betokened despair, her arms upon the table, her head leaning forward, and her beautiful, dishevelled hair falling in waving folds about her.

"Madam."

I had walked up to her, and placed my hand upon her shoulder.

"Oh!" and she turned towards me her pale, tearful, horror-stricken face, then shrank away in fear, "Who are you? Pray do not hurt me. I know I am helpless."

It was some time before I could convince her that I was really a friend; for so long had she been buried in these rooms that her mind had become almost unhinged, and her sense of perception blunted. By degrees, however, I made her understand who I was, and how I had so come there; and then, in answer to my questions, I gleaned the history of her captivity.

When my brother married her she was a handsome young girl of eighteen, and he was verging on the period of middle age. For three months after their marriage he had been kind and attentive—all, in fact, that a wife could desire of her husband. Just at the end of that time, however, he discovered, accidentally, several letters which had been written by her before her marriage, to a former lover; and for some days afterwards he was moody, jealous, and strange in his conduct.

One night he entered her room with that fixed, frenzied, wicked look upon his face which she had never seen there before, but which had marred his features in all her interviews with him since, and directed her by signs to follow him, a mandate which in her terror she readily obeyed. He conducted her to a gloomy chamber, lighted only by a small oil lamp, and then left her, locking the door behind him. At intervals, for some weeks afterwards, he visited her bringing food and clothing with him; but always coming in the night, and bearing himself in a silent, changed, peculiar manner. At length he led her back again to her own suite of apartments (those in which I had discovered her) where, during her absence, all the windows had been built up, thus cutting off communication with the outer world. Here he had visited her almost every night since, bringing her the necessaries of life, coming like an apparition, and going as he came.

"I think those foolish letters of mine," she said in conclusion, "written before I had learnt to love my husband, have turned his brain. I was warned before I married him that he was affected by a peculiar malady of sleep-walking, and that when under its influence he not only lost complete control of his reason, but also seemed to live a double life. When awake he was generous, frank and good; but when in a somnambulant state, I was told, he was morose, jealous, wicked—in a word, insane; and that in his waking hours he had no recollection of what took place, or what he did when in this latter state."

Fortunately I found I had my powder-flask in my pocket, and thus was able to set myself and my unfortunate brother's wife, at liberty, by exploding the locks.

I took my protégée to the rectory where the rector, who was an old college friend of mine, was not a little surprised to receive such visitors at so early an hour.

Before returning to Stanley House, I rode on the rector's cob to my brother's doctor, who lived about three miles away, and consulted him upon Stephen's sad condition.

He told me that he was quite aware of the facts of the case, but that he had not for a moment thought the malady could have been capable of working so much mischief.

He suggested that in all probability a crisis in the disease would now be reached, brought about by the mental shock which the discovery of the escape of the captive would give when next the somnambulist visited the west wing.

The result of this crisis would either leave him a hopeless maniac or completely cure him.

At the doctor's request I arranged to meet him the same night at twelve o'clock, in order to watch my brother's movements.

I then rode back to the rectory, and from there proceeded at once to Stanley House.

After resting in my room for a short while, I came downstairs, and found Stephen more cheerful and genial than usual, all unconscious, poor fellow, of the fate hanging over him.

At night my brother retired to rest at his usual time, and I went out into the grounds to meet the doctor, about an hour and a half afterwards.

When I met him we proceeded to the west wing together, to watch the effect of the shock of discovery upon the patient. As soon as we reached the door, I saw that Stephen had been there before us, for the door was ajar.

With a heart that beat fast with my fears, I hurried into the house, and was about to run upstairs, when I stumbled over some obstacle at the bottom. The doctor, who was following closely, carried a dark lantern, and its light soon revealed to us the bleeding form of my unhappy brother.

"He is dead," the doctor said, rising from his knees, after making a hasty examination of the body. "In his frenzy he must have dashed himself down the stairs. Poor fellow! we have been too late to save him!"

* * * * *

Five years have fled since that time. Stanley House has been newly painted and renovated, and again holds a happy bride and bridegroom. A fair face looks over my shoulder as I write, and drops a tear upon the paper that contains a history of her sorrows. But a smile flits about her lips as I kiss her; and we look out together upon the beautiful scene, in the midst of which stands our home, and forget the darkness of the past in the brightness of the future.

T. P. BROWNE.

Digitized by Google

THE SAILORS' ANGEL.

THE story of Henrik Brandes and Maria Hansen is still told occasionally by some of the older people of the inland district lying between Christiania and Bergen, although the younger generations do not pay much regard to it. It is a story of simple faith and love that is worthy to be kept in remembrance.

Henrik was a sailor; he came of a sea-faring family and had taken to that kind of life as part of the natural order of things. Although only a young man, he was master of a small craft that traded between Drammen and other ports of Scandinavia and sometimes to a British port. Henrik's father owned one-third part of the vessel, which in some measure accounted for the position occupied by his son, but there was no doubt that Henrik was as capable as many an older man.

Maria was his cousin. Her parents were dead, her mother having died about two years before this story commences; since that time she had acted as housekeeper to her uncle, who was a widower.

It had been a settled thing for years that Henrik and Maria were to become man and wife in due course; the young people themselves had grown up together and were deeply attached to one another. The marriage was to take place on the return of Henrik from his voyage to England.

Before he sailed, they stood at the extremity of a rocky peak that jutted into the sea and had their real parting, for when he sailed there would be so many to say farewell to the crew and the captain that there would be no opportunity for the affectionate leave taking that helped to cheer them during the time of separation. Not that among these simple people there was any false modesty, but a lover's parting is not for public eyes.

There was also another reason. Maria had noticed with some concern that Henrik, probably in consequence of his voyages abroad and his contact with more worldly people, was losing some of the faith so characteristic of his forefathers and his neighbours. She conceived it to be a part of her duty as a woman and his future wife to bring him back to his old belief.

The conversation during this final interview had not been so satisfactory to Maria as she had anticipated. Henrik, although he had listened to her patiently enough, had smiled at her enthusiasm in endeavouring to show him that he was taking a wrong path.

"There is nothing against me; no one can say that Henrik Brandes ever did a wrong act," he said, folding her tenderly in his arms and kissing her, "and I promise you that no one shall ever have the chance of saying so! now, don't grieve because I do not think the same as other people hereabouts. Surely I am no worse because I do not place any confidence in what our neighbours say about that piece of rock out there in the sea, which they call the Sailors' Angel."

"Oh, Henrik, don't scoff at it!" exclaimed Maria, half in tears, "it has not lost its virtue; it is because no woman of recent years has had the courage to face the danger of rowing out to it in a storm, that we have had no proofs of Divine intervention. Do we not know of many instances in olden times when a sailor husband or a sailor lover has been rescued from the fury of the storm because his wife or his sweetheart had the courage and faith to put the Promise to the test?"

Henrik evaded an answer, which he knew would grieve her, by kissing her once more. He knew the legend of the Sailors' Angel quite well; it was to the effect that, as a reward for the holy living of a good woman who had spent her life in the service of God and had met with her death on that very rock in a successful attempt to save the crew of a storm-beaten vessel, a Promise was given that if a believing woman ever risked her life by rowing in a storm to that spot, and there offered up a prayer for the safety of a fellow creature, the prayer should be granted.

"I trust that you will never be in such grave danger," cried Maria fervently, "but if you are, I shall put the Promise to the test! Then you will see who is right!"

"So be it!" exclaimed Henrik solemnly. He was touched by her devotion and his levity vanished. "Now let us go back and spend the last hour or two with my father."

Henrik sailed, and Maria waited hopefully for his return and employed her spare time in the preparation of the humble trousseau and other matters pertaining to the wedding which was now not very far off.

Often and often she looked out to sea in the direction of the Sailors' Angel, and her imagination transformed the pinnacle of the rock into the shape of a woman gazing pityingly on the vast expanse of ocean, as though prepared to take compassion on those for whom her aid might be invoked.

She had been out with her father on one occasion in order to get a closer view of the imaginary statue; it did not lie in the course of vessels coming to the port, but was at some distance out of the usual run and therefore offered no danger to such vessels in a general way. There was nothing particularly noticeable about the rock; it was not altogether unlike a rough hewn figure of a woman —but that was all.

Yet the legend had sunk so deeply into the minds of the people that everyone who looked at it was positive that it presented the outlines of the face and form of an angel.

Henrik's voyage was to last at least a fortnight; he had to touch at other Scandinavian ports before proceeding to the British port which was the limit of his trip. The weather remained fine during the first week, but then there came a change, the winter's storms seemed to commence and each day was signalled by furious gales or heavy snow showers.

Maria felt a little anxious during the first two days of this second week, but her anxiety became more profound as the time passed and the weather grew still more furious. She began to fear for the safety of Henrik, whose craft should now be forcing its way through the turbulent waters homewards.

Henrik was losing the religious faith in which he had been reared, and Maria had misgivings that this falling-off might bring upon him some heavy punishment. She lost her appetite and slept but little, her cheeks became high and her face assumed a haggard look. This alteration in her appearance and manner attracted the attention of her uncle, who rallied her in his hearty and kindly fashion on her lack of fortitude.

Digitized by Google

"You'll never do for a sailor's wife, my lass!" he cried cheerily. "If you are down-hearted at every storm that rises when Henrik is away, what a lively companion you will be for me! come, come! you must cheer up or the lad will be miserable while he is away just because he thinks that you are worrying yourself so much about him. It will be catching; and you will be a most wretched pair."

Maria was grateful to the old man for his attempt to cheer her and she recognised that a sailor is not bound to come to harm every time there is a gale of wind; but her fears this time were based on more than the chances of danger through stress of weather, and although she did her best to be bright when in the presence of the elder Brandes, to whom she could not open her heart, yet she grew more and more troubled until she could scarcely bear the weight of her fears.

The fortnight had passed, but Henrik's ship had not reached port. This was not regarded as extraordinary by his father, as the rough weather would naturally drive the vessel somewhat out of her course and so lengthen the duration of the voyage.

"Bless you, I've been three or four days overdue at this time of the year!" cried the old man. "It's rough work, beating and tacking, but he'll turn up all right, never fear!"

Disquieting news reached them on the following day. An English vessel, apparently driven out of her course, had struck a rock quite close to the Sailors' Angel and had foundered with all hands. Might not a similar fate befall Henrik?

Maria did not close her eyes in sleep that night, but lay listening to the howling of the wind as it drove the thickly falling snow flakes against the windows and shook the houses. The roar of the angry sea sounded in her ears like a condemning voice, foretelling the doom of Henrik, his crew and his vessel. At last she could bear it no longer. Her white face set with grim determination, she arose and dressed herself.

It was early morning and still dark. She went from her room straight to that in which her uncle was sleeping, and entering the chamber and approaching the bed she touched him lightly on the arm that lay outside the coverlet. Brandes was awake in a moment.

"Who's that?" he asked, starting up in bed. "Maria, what is it?" he demanded, as he recognised the girl by the light of the small lamp which she carried.

"Will you help me to get out the boat?" asked Maria, answering his question by another which fairly made him gasp.

"I am going to the Sailors' Angel to save Henrik," continued the girl resolutely. "He is in great danger—I know he is—and I must go there and offer up a prayer that he may be saved."

"The girl's mad!" exclaimed Brandes as soon as he recovered sufficiently from his amazement to use his voice.

He was not entirely uninfluenced by the legend and yet it appeared to him to be the act of a madwoman to attempt such a task as that proposed by Maria.

"You can't go, you will never do it!"

"I can try," responded Maria quietly. "Don't try to keep me from it; I am determined. I must do it; I cannot rest, for Henrik's life is at stake. I have a vision constantly floating before my eyes—a vision of Henrik's ship being beaten this way and that way by the fury of the gale and then dashed against a rock, and Henrik's body being thrown up by the waves, waiting to be grasped by a loving hand. And the hungry waves are trying to reach him again and swallow him up. Oh, I must go, I must go!"

The girl stood erect, with staring eyes as though she were gazing at the actual picture which she had just described in such intense tones to her uncle.

Her voice seemed far away; she had forgotten her surroundings and her whole being was absorbed in the vision.

Uncle Brandes was unable to raise any further objection; he looked upon her as one who had passed from the natural to the supernatural, and told her that he would follow her to the place where the boat was kept.

"Heaven keep her!" murmured the old man devoutly, as he hurriedly dressed himself and went after the girl, who, having put on a rough waterproof cap and an ample cloak, had passed from the little cottage into the wild night.

The boat belonged to Brandes and was kept in a shed from which it could be dragged with tolerable ease by its owner to a tiny inlet, and thence rowed into the open sea.

Brandes found the girl waiting for him at the shed; without a word he unlocked the door and pulled the boat over the ground, Maria voluntarily assisting him.

When it was in the water with the rope wound round a peg, ready for Maria to get into it, the old man made one more attempt to dissuade her.

"Don't go, my girl!" he pleaded. "You will be drowned, the boat won't live in such a sea—your arms aren't strong enough. Think what that will be to Henrik when he comes back!"

He had to place his mouth close to her ear and speak in a high tone in order to make her hear what he said.

The wind blew the sound away so that she only just caught the words.

She shook her head.

"I must go or he won't come back! What will life be to me without Henrik, and I would go anyhow—even if I knew that I should surely lose my life in saving his."

Her face, wet with the snow flakes, touched his. She kissed him and then resolutely took her seat in the boat.

Maria Hansen was of the fisher class and was as strong as many a man in the trading towns. She knew how to handle the oar, too, and she soon had the skiff out of the calm of the inlet, with the stem headed for the Sailors' Angel.

Then began the fierce battle with the waves and the blinding snow. Hither and thither the boat was tossed or driven, despite all Maria's efforts to keep it steady. She could only judge the direction of the rock by a light which was visible from time to time from the port of Drammen, and by the aid of this light she kept the nose of the boat towards her destination.

It was hard work, and the chances of reaching the rock in safety were very narrow; but Maria never wavered in her determination. Time after time it seemed as if the barque would be swamped, but it righted itself each time and rode on the crest of the next wave.

Her hands grew cold and stiff, notwithstanding the hard work, which would, under ordinary conditions have made her life tingle all through her body.

But there is a limit to human endurance, although that limit may be extended by the force of love, and Maria found that her strength was giving out. Her arms ached and refused to do their work properly; her breath came in short, quick gasps.

Digitized by Google

A low moan escaped her and she breathed a prayer for help, as one oar was dragged from her enfeebled grip and the boat was whirled round like a plaything.

The next instant she felt her frail craft grate on the rock, and she was thrown out and some distance from it.

She clutched at a projection against which her hand had struck, and pulled herself up by it. She made a few steps forward and found herself in a kind of recess not more than two feet deep, and she knew that she had reached the Sailors' Angel.

She rested in this alcove for a short time in order to regain her breath and a little more strength, then she faced the storm again and made her way to the front of the legendary statue.

Here, in the midst of the storm and with the angry waves foaming on all sides, she knelt down, clasped her hands and murmured a prayer to Heaven that the Promise might be redeemed in favour of Henrik.

Unmindful of the elements, she prayed with all her soul, never doubting that she would receive the reward of her efforts and her faith.

Then she arose, went back to the alcove and waited. She had taken no thought about the return journey and, strangely enough, she felt no anxiety on that score. She would wait until the storm abated, when someone would come for her—her boat was gone—and when she reached home she would find Henrik safe and well. Or perhaps Henrik would come and fetch her.

She remained in this recess, sheltered from the weather to a considerable extent, until mid-day; two or three times she ventured to the front in order to gaze upon the face of the statue, as if she expected to see some sign of an answer to her supplication.

At noon she made this little journey again, but scarcely had she reached the front than a big wave threw something at her feet that made her start back with a cry of alarm.

She stooped down to examine the object. It was a human form. It was Henrik!

With a cry that was more like an exclamation of gratitude than an expression of fear or grief, she caught her lover's form by the arms, lifting his head from the ground, and dragged it to the alcove.

Here she did her best to restore the unconscious Henrik by every means in her power, and at last had the great joy of seeing him open his eyes and hearing him murmur her name.

At the same moment the fury of the storm began to abate; the wind sank, the air grew calm and the sun began to peep forth in watery rays.

The Promise was redeemed once more—such was the thought that passed through the mind of Maria Hansen.

As soon as it was in any way possible to do so, old Brandes and a friend set out in another boat to the Sailors' Angel in search of Maria; her uncle was convinced that she had gone down in the storm, but he made this little voyage as a forlorn hope. When Brandes returned, he brought with him, to the great joy of the people, his son Henrik, and the girl who had done so much for Henrik's safety.

Such is the story of a girl's faith and the power of love.

Some people there are who call it superstition, but if superstition can effect so much with the aid of love, then let superstition continue.

GEORGE KNIGHT.

On a cold winter night, when the chill seems to penetrate to the bones, "a cup of hot Bovril" will be found to be just what is needed. It is a splendid warming drink, thoroughly agreeable to the taste. Bovril is also peculiarly a nourishing and strengthening beverage; energising, vitalising, sustaining.

If you feel weak or chilly, a cup of hot Bovril will speedily effect a transformation.

BOVRIL

Digitized by Google

A SCOTCH GIRAFFE.

MR. MCGREGOR, of Dumfries, is a man of an original turn of mind. It should be mentioned that his name is not McGregor, and that his foot has never been on the heath of Dumfries. His real name and residence cannot be mentioned without inflicting pain and libel suits on the mentioner. However, the facts in his case cannot be altered by calling him McGregor, and they will remain the same, no matter where he may reside, and it is with these facts alone that the reader is concerned.

Not long ago there was a quiet little masquerade at Dumfries, which Mr. McGregor was invited to attend. He gladly accepted the invitation, and at once began to think of a fitting costume. Mr. McGregor is a man of strong individuality, and he scorned the disguises affected by other men. He refused to be a Mephistopheles, or a Charles II., or a brigand, or a Pierrot. He even refused to be a golden-haired ballet girl, or an aged Hebrew prophet, although the child of Israel who supplied masquerade dresses to the fashionable world of Dumfries insisted that either of those characters would "shoot him like a goat." Mr. McGregor was determined to wear a costume which should be novel and unique, and, as the sequel shows, he successfully carried out his purpose.

At first Mr. McGregor's tastes led him to entertain the idea of illustrating in his own person the peculiar features of his beloved Scotland. He thought of disguising himself either as the Forth Bridge or as Stirling Castle, but the difficulty of obtaining the requisite dresses compelled him to change his mind. A like reason caused him to abandon the idea of assuming the character of Loch Lomond, or that of the Bass Rock. Baffled in these directions, but still strong in his love of nature, he determined to be an attractive and sensational animal, and when the masqueraders were finally assembled he appeared before them in the likeness of a large and beautiful giraffe.

According to the most trustworthy accounts of the masquerade, Mr. McGregor played his part with great ability and success. His hide was beautifully variegated, his neck was fully fifteen feet long, and the grace and elegance of all four of his legs was the theme of universal admiration.

When he waltzed he would take a round turn and a timber hitch (he was an experienced yatchsman), with his neck round the waist of his partner, and when the supper table was ready he would reach that useful neck over the heads of a dozen gentlemen and bite off the top of a mould of vanilla ice in a way that paralysed the waiters and called forth the applauding shrieks of enthusiastic ladies.

It was in the matter of champagne that Mr. McGregor made his first mistake. He claimed that his throat could not be irrigated throughout its entire length without the aid of at least three bottles of wine. Very likely he was right if we regard his conduct from a strictly zoological point of view. An animal that runs so largely to neck as does the giraffe cannot be expected to moisten his throat with the same quantity of fluid that would satisfy a short-necked horse, or even an ordinary man. But Mr. McGregor forgot that, although he was a giraffe, so far as external experiences were concerned, his stomach was purely human.

As might have been expected, it came to pass that when Mr. McGregor had burdened his interior with the contents of at least three bottles of champagne he became nervously excited, and, after creating considerable alarm among the more timid guests, he withdrew from the ball-room, banging his lofty head against the chandelier and the upper part of the door-casing, and breathing forth threatenings and slaughter from a carefully-concealed but practicable mouth, situated near the top of his left foreleg.

Under other circumstances Mr. McGregor would have gone promptly home, but knowing that his landlady would refuse to give admittance to a giraffe at three o'clock in the morning unless he should be provided with the best references from the Royal Zoological Society, Mr. McGregor sought the shelter of a friendly tree on the outskirts of Dumfries, where he lay down to sleep. The night was cold, and therefore Mr. McGregor preferred to keep on his dress, especially as his neck, when folded up, made a smooth pillow.

Thus comfortably couched, he slept the sleep of the just, and would doubtless have awakened sober and refreshed had not an unforeseen accident suddenly impelled him to spring to as many of his feet as he could conveniently manage, and to call on the universe to bear witness that he had been basely and brutally assassinated.

It so happened that the morning after the masquerade a young man from London, who was spending a week at Dumfries, arose at dawn, and went forth with his gun to worship at the shrine of Nature, and to kill, if possible, a pheasant or a haggis. He was wholly unacquainted with the game of Scotland, but he knew that other men had killed birds somewhere north of the Tweed, and he saw no reason why he should not do likewise.

To his vast astonishment he presently beheld a giraffe sleeping peacefully under a spreading oak-tree.

The young man from London was not lacking in decision of character. He merely paused long enough to remark to himself that the capacity of Scotland for producing every kind of rich and gorgeous animal was even greater than he had hitherto imagined it to be, and then opened fire with both barrels.

At the first shot the giraffe moved uneasily, and made a few unintelligible remarks, but the second shot hit him in some sensitive locality, and led him to make that hurried appeal to the universe which has already been mentioned. The young man from London would doubtless have regarded the ability of this particular giraffe to speak intelligibly, or, at all events in the local dialect, as only another proof of the merits of Scotland as a producer of able animals, and would have reloaded his gun and continued to shoot had not Mr. McGregor madly torn his neck from his shoulders, unbuttoned his hide, and emerged in the character of an irate Caledonian.

The young man from London was soon convinced that he had made a mistake. He ceased firing, and, after making an apology to Mr. McGregor, withdrew from the field in search of brown paper and vinegar, while Mr. McGregor limped homeward with a wound in the calf of his right leg and bitterness in his heart, and lost no time in going before a commissioner of deeds, or other person authorised to administer oaths, in whose presence he swore that he would never again attend a masquerade or wear a fancy dress.

W. E. PARSONS.

Digitized by Google

A Village Industry.

TWENTY-FIVE years ago an attempt was made in the village of Histon, near Cambridge, to solve the problem, how to make land pay in the face of foreign competition? The country was then at one of its educational epochs. We were being taught the vast food and health value of fruit. Incidentally, also, we were slowly gaining the knowledge that pure sugar, properly treated, was one of the greatest nutrients, in a small compass, with which man has been blessed. Further, that sugar and fruit in combination—when the latter is fresh, ripe, and luscious—makes a most valuable addition to our daily dietary, especially to that of children. The firm gradually expanded until they are now the largest fruit-cultivating jam and jelly makers in Great Britain. The watchwords have been pure and fresh material, with the most positive cleanliness in the manufacturing processes. And as Chivers' Gold Medal Jellies are prepared from the best obtainable materials, and as their delicious flavours are real fruit juices expressed by the firm themselves from fruit grown under their own care, one cannot wonder that Chivers' Gold Medal Jellies have the largest sale and greatest popularity. The Ladies' Realm, April, 1900, says: "Chivers' Jellies will be found most welcome delicacies, and are thoroughly nutritious, wholesome, and easily digested." A Lady writes: "We use no other Jellies in this household, having found out their superiority to all others." Another Lady says: "Without a fault—simply perfection."

Chivers' Gold Medal Jams and Table Jellies are sold by Grocers and Stores throughout the United Kingdom. Insist on being supplied with Chivers'. A free sample packet of Jelly will be sent on receipt of a post-card. S. Chivers and Sons, Histon, Cambridge.

Don't Cough-use

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves. Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

Keating's Lozenges

£50 CASH PRIZE SEND NO MONEY WE TRUST YOU.

FREE.

£2 10s. £2 10s. REAL SILVER

WE GIVE YOU YOUR CHOICE of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1s. 6d. each. (Regular price 2s. 6d.)

WE DO NOT WANT YOUR MONEY.

Just send us a STAMPED ADDRESSED ENVELOPE, and say that you will either sell the Jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the Jewellery.

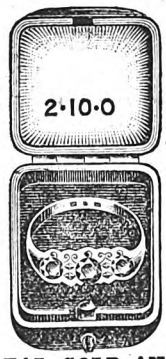
When sold, send us the 13s. 6d. you have received for same, and we will at once send you (no waiting), Absolutely Free, our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A Written Guarantee for Ten Years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1s. 6d. each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

SEND NO MONEY. WRITE US TO-DAY.

FREE.



REAL GOLD AND REAL DIAMONDS

BRITISH GOLDSMITHS CO. (DEPT. 29), 48 GRAY'S INN RD., LONDON

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.

THE MARSTON CO., 59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

A SUM of from 12s. to 25s. per week

can be earned in spare hours or evenings by either sex everywhere.—Send addressed envelope for particulars to Box 24, Eclipse Works, 89 Aldersgate Street, E.C.

THE ENGLISH & WELSH COAL Co.,

SHAKESPEARE ST., MANCHESTER.

Deliver in Truck Load. Prices on application.

You will find it to your advantage to buy direct.

HAIR DESTROYED.

Send me an envelope (stamped and addressed) and I will tell you how to remove all superfluous hair free of charge. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Miss E. V. (Room 3), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

AND NEURALGIA Cured

by a Simple, Safe, and Speedy Remedy. A Zox Powder can be taken anywhere, at any time, and with any liquid, with wonderful results. Two free Sample Powders to any reader of Short Stories sending stamped addressed envelope for same to

The ZOX Co., 11 Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

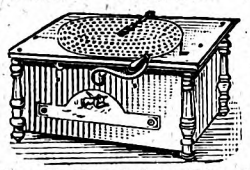
EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

HAND ORGANS FROM 20s.



Made in three sizes, in black and gold case. Full tone. Six metal tunes, plays all songs, hymns, or dance music. Sent on receipt of 4s. P.O., if desired, balance 4s. monthly. Send for list of tunes, prices, &c. ATLAS CO., 182B High Street, Camden Town, London; 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; and 14 High Road, Kilburn.

Free

From the Antexema Co., 83 Castle Road, London, N.W., if this paper is named, a booklet on the Skin and a FREE SAMPLE of "Antexema."

It is absolutely the most wonderful Skin Cure that has ever been discovered. It gives immediate relief from itching and burning and cures all skin diseases and every form of Eczema.

1/1½ bottles of chemists, post free for 1/3.

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S WEEKLY

FOOTBALL CLUB PICTURES.

1st Prize - - £50 in Gold.

LAST LIST.

2nd Prize - - - £10 Note
3rd, 4th, and 5th Prizes - 3 £5 Notes
6th to 20th Prizes - 15 Sovereigns
21st to 40th Prizes - 20 Half-Sovs.

Below will be found ten pictures; each picture representing the name of a football club.

If you look at the picture in the margin you will see that the name is Blackburn Rovers. What are the other names?

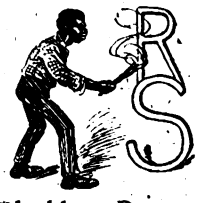
CLOSING DAY, TUESDAY, JANUARY 22nd.

All you have to do is to write underneath each picture, in the space provided, the name of the club you believe the picture to represent. The names are those of both Rugby and Association clubs. Pin your three lists together and send them to the Editor, Pearson's Weekly, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., in an envelope marked "Second."

Where the names of two clubs embody that of the same town, but with a different addition, the full title is indicated in the picture.

The prizes will be paid to the competitors from whom we receive the correct, or most nearly correct, solutions.

Example.



Blackburn Rovers.

No more than one prize will go to any competitor.

It must be taken as a condition of the competition that anybody competing therein agrees to abide by the Editor's final decision.

Intending competitors in the above would do well to procure a copy of "The Football Who's Who," which contains the names of most of the big clubs. This book will be found of great service in discovering the names depicted. It only costs a shilling, and may be obtained of all booksellers, and post free for 1s. 3d. from the publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

No. 21.....

No. 22.....

No. 23.....

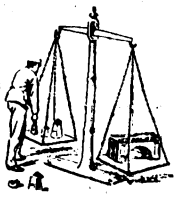
No. 24.....

No. 25.....

No. 26.....

No. 27.....

No. 28.....



No. 29.....

No. 30.....

I send in this coupon as a competitor for the prize advertised in this paper, and subject to the conditions printed on this page:

Name and address.....

THINGS TO REMEMBER.

1. Coupons may be sent either from "Pearson's Weekly" or "Short Stories."
2. Do not send in your coupons till we tell you.
3. All coupons are sent at senders' risk, and if they go astray, from whatever cause, we do not accept responsibility.
4. Competitors must attach their private address to their attempts. No prize will be sent to any post-office, refreshment rooms, or other places at which letters are called for. Attempts bearing such addresses will be disqualified.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

MORE ABOUT

Mr. HALL CAINE'S

NEW NOVEL.

In our last issue we made an announcement which has doubtless been received with much satisfaction by the readers of SHORT STORIES. We were in the happy position of being able to announce the fact that we had been fortunate enough to secure the serial rights of Mr. Hall Caine's New Novel, and that it would appear exclusively in the pages of our new Magazine for Ladies which will appear on January 10th next.

"THE ETERNAL CITY" is one of those deeply engrossing stories which seem to hold the attention from first to last. Like most, one might say all, that this popular Novelist has written, this new work is of intense human interest; it is a story which will be much talked about, and doubtless there will be no little controversy on its account, but all will admit that underlying it are problems of vital importance to humanity, problems which have through the ages engaged the earnest thought of all social reformers.

As in "The Christian," there is a romantic side to "THE ETERNAL CITY." We think it will be generally acknowledged when this story is given in full, that it is the finest thing Mr. Hall Caine has yet written, and those who have read any of his works will know that that is saying a good deal.

Remember, there will be a large instalment in the first issue of "THE LADY'S MAGAZINE," which will be on sale on January 10th. Order at once, as there will only be a limited edition.

Digitized by Google

"No Better Food."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED

300 GOLD MEDALS, &c. Cocoa

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c., lecturing on Foods, says:—"The chief text in the Gospel of Nutrition is that Tea and Coffee are not Foods at all, while Cocoa is an admirable and sustaining diet. Than FRY'S PURE CONCENTRATED COCOA, no better food product of this nature can be obtained or used."

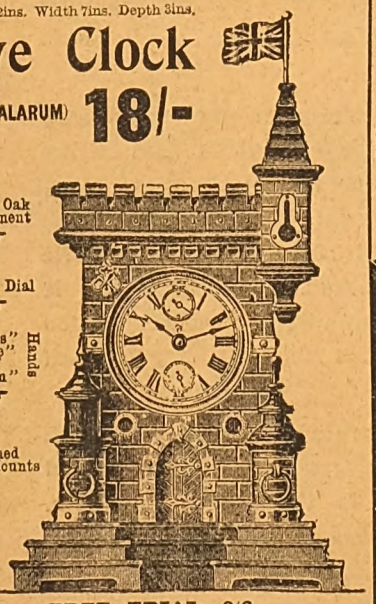
N.B.—Sold only in tins with gilt tops.

Height 12ins. Width 7ins. Depth 3ins.

Rye Clock (WITH ALARUM) 18/-



FREE TRIAL, 2/6.

Any reader of Short Stories can have one of these clocks on monthly payments as follows:—

YOU send us 2/6 with your name and address, and we will send you one on approbation.

IF you approve of it you send us 3/- on receipt, and 2/6 each month for five months, making the full 18/-.

BUT OUR NET CASH-WITH-ORDER PRICE IS 16/- ONLY.

If you do not approve of the clock we will refund cash sent if clock is returned within seven days.

(Signed) J. N. MASTERS.

FREE TRIAL

CLOCK or PARCEL

FOR 2/6

NO MAN ON EARTH

NEED BE without one of our NICKEL SILVER PUZZLE BOXES. You can use it for a Match-box, a Stamp box, a Pen-box, or one hundred different uses, and it will amuse and excite you and your friends as you try to open it. We shall present one ENTIRELY FREE to every customer during January. For further particulars send for our special Bargain Booklet of all the latest goods suitable for presents. Brooches from 1/-, Real Gold Gem Rings from 4/-, and hundreds of other goods at similar low Prices. Shall we send you a copy post FREE? Send us your name and address.

50 Full-Size Table Requisites for 22/6 CASH. 25/-

WE will supply any reader of Short Stories with one of these 25/- parcels of Cutlery on monthly payments as follows:

YOU send us 2/6 with your name and address, and we will send you one on approval.

IF you approve of it, you send us 2/6 on receipt of parcel, and 5/- each month for four months, making the full 25/-. But

OUR NET-CASH-WITH-ORDER PRICE IS 22/6 ONLY.

And we will refund the Cash sent, if you do not approve of the parcel and you return it at once. (Signed) J. N. MASTERS.

Each Parcel contains 50 Articles.
6 Table Knives.
6 Dessert Knives.
6 Table Forks.
6 Dessert Forks.
2 Table Spoons.
6 Dessert Spoons.
6 Tea Spoons.
1 Pair Sugar Tongs.
1 Sugar Sifter.
6 Egg Spoons.
2 Salt Spoons.
2 Mustard Spoons.

J. N. MASTERS LIMITED. "VERACITY" WATCHMAKERS. RYE, SUSSEX.

Digitized by Google

THE BRIGHTEST STORY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 630. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 26TH, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

van Houten's Cocoa

The most nourishing, digestible and delicious of all Cocoas.

Height, 12in.; Depth, 7in.
REAL OAK
CLOCK 18/-
(With Alarm).

THE COURT JOURNAL says:
"The Fortress Clock sold by J. N. Masters Ltd., Rye, is substantial, of original design, and a Loud Alarm, and is really a reliable clock."

FREE TRIAL 2/6

WE will supply any reader of Short Stories with one of these 18/- Alarum Clocks, on Monthly payments, as follows:

YOU send us 2/6 with your name and address, and we will send you one on approval.

IF you do approve of it you send us 3/- on receipt, and 2/6 each month for 5 months, making the full 18/-. BUT OUR NETT-CASH-WITH-ORDER-PRICE is 16/- ONLY. And we will refund the Cash sent, if you do not approve of the Clock, and you return it at once — signed.

J. N. MASTERS

NO MAN ON EARTH

NEED BE without one of our NICKEL SILVER PUZZLE BOXES. You can use it for a Match-box, a Stamp-box, a Pen-box, or one hundred different uses, and it will amuse and excite you and your friends hours trying to open it. We shall present one ENTIRELY FREE to every customer during this month.

Send for our 20th Century Catalogue. Your name and address on a post-card will bring it to you

POST FREE

FREE TRIAL FOR 2/6

WE will supply any reader of Short Stories with one of these 12/6 Melodeons on our Monthly Payments, as follows:

YOU send us 2/6 with your name and address, and we will send you one on approval.

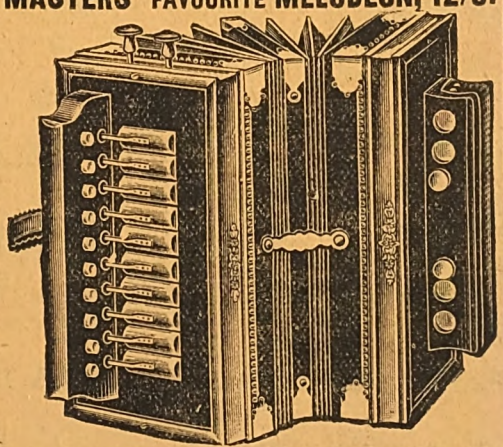
IF you approve of it you send us 2/- on receipt, and 2/- each month for four months, making the full 12/6. BUT OUR NETT-CASH-WITH-ORDER-PRICE is 11/- Only, and we will return the cash sent if you do not approve of the Melodeon, and you return it at once.

(Signed)
J. N. MASTERS

MASTERS' FAVOURITE MELODEON, 12/6.



A charming instrument, with fine polished tops and mouldings, eight-fold double bellows, with nickle mounts and clasps, open nickle valves, flannel lined straps, two stops. Will be sent, carriage paid, to any address, for 11/- cash.

J. N. MASTERS LTD., VERACITY WATCHMAKERS, RYE, SUSSEX.

Digitized by Google

KAPUTINE

The Best & Safest Remedy for

HEADACHE.

NURSE HILL, of the London Association of Nurses, writes:

"I have seen Kaputine administered to many patients, and can truly say it is a remedy which should have a place in every household."

All Leading Chemists sell KAPUTINE, 1/-. Samples One Penny.

If your Chemist has not KAPUTINE send his name and address to

KAPUTINE, HUDDERSFIELD,

and we will send you a SHILLING PACKET FREE.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.

THE MARSTON CO.,
59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

FREE. FREE.

Our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch (with chain), or A Real Gold Ring Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

SEND NO MONEY.

NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money. Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, which-ever you desire.

A WRITTEN GUARANTEE for TEN years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

Send no money. Write to-day.

BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 5).
282 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

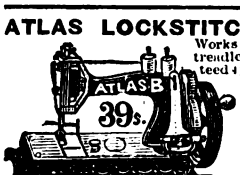
COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

HAIR DESTROYED.

Send me an envelope (stamped and addressed) and I will tell you how to remove all superfluous hair free of charge. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Miss E. V. (Room 3), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
184s High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.,
63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness: it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Wattnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Durnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

NEW AUTOMATIC KNITTER

FOR HOME WORK.

"The machine that knitted the hosiery and comforts for the troops in Africa."—See what The Times said.

Knits Socks (a pair in 35 min.), Stockings, Fancy Goods, &c. Easily learned. Lessons Free.

15/- to 30/- Weekly.

Cash, hire, and Work Terms from "Sorres" dept., 67 Southwark St., S.E.; 55 Oxford St., W.; 192 Upper St., London, N.; 105 Nicolson St., Edinburgh; 58 Union St., Glasgow; 182 Stephen's Green, Dublin; 22 Great Hampton St., Birmingham; 31 Stokes Croft, Bristol.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 630.] For the Week Ending January 26th, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

MY FIRST APPEARANCE ON ANY STAGE.

ALTHOUGH my infancy and earlier childhood was passed in somewhat of a nomad existence, I am not, dear reader, the offspring of strolling players, as the title of my story and this explanation might lead you to suppose, neither was I born in a gipsy's tent.

At the time to which this story refers my father held a captain's commission in a marching regiment. I was the firstborn, and at that time only child of my parents, the apple of their eye, their chief source of joy and satisfaction.

I was duly dandled, and cuddled, and cooed to by fond mother and attentive nurse.

I was—like most other infants—inflicted on all my parent's friends, and even casual visitors. I was magnificently apparelled, and young ladies consulting my mother about a child's stall at a coming bazaar, left our house in confused astonishment at the number and variety of articles absolutely necessary for a baby's wardrobe, and doubtless inwardly and fervently thanked Heaven they had nothing to do with children, as a complete bazaar full of things seemed necessary for the outfit of a single infant.

How could it be that more articles connected with the proper rigging out of "baby" were not sent? and why? oh why! were there not more purchasers of those useful and dainty things?

I had just completed the first year of my existence, had cut several teeth with singular success, having avoided everything in the nature of fits by letting off steam in continuous kicking and screaming, pronounced at the time an excellent sign of a sound constitution and healthy lungs.

I was, what is called, a fine, promising boy, and from a family point of view, satisfied my parents' highest aspirations; had they heard my nurse express herself, as she frequently did, as to "the fractiousness of that screeching baby as has near wore me out," much solemn denunciation of her wicked untruthfulness, and even instant dismissal, would, I feel convinced, have been the immediate result.

At the time, then, that I had travelled about a year along the road towards the grave, my mother was in a very weak state of health, and suffered a perfect martyrdom from neuralgia, that subtle and agonizing tormentor of nervous and delicate women.

The house we lived in, and in fact, the whole town where we were stationed was somewhat low-lying and rather damp; a change to higher ground and a more bracing atmosphere had therefore been recommended by the family physician, and my father, having obtained a short leave, was about to take advantage of a long-standing invitation from some friends in Wales, which would afford my mother the desired change, while my father hoped to get some good shooting over a well-preserved manor.

Part of the plan, which much distressed my poor mother, was that I, the infant prodigy and sole representative of "the family," was to be left behind to the care of my nurse, in order that the "rest and quiet," so essential to the cure of neuralgia, should be insured by my separation from my too fond parent, who doubtless owed much of the suffering she endured to her constant devotion to my refractory self during the noisy term of teething.

The time of departure had been arranged so that the travellers should catch a night express at a junction some five or six miles from the garrison town where we were quartered; this distance was to be accomplished in a roomy, close carriage, hired for the occasion from the nearest livery stable.

The lateness of the start, I verily believe, had been agreed upon, or at all events acceded to, by my mother with a view to my being asleep at the appointed hour, so that my tender attachment to herself should not receive the rude shock of separation at a time when my weeping and wailing would certainly follow my being left alone in the nest, and find an echo in her heart during her whole absence from home. At the last moment, instructions of the most complicated and intricate nature had to be imparted to nurse; a dietary table, list of forbidden fruit, and programme for the day had to be written out and pinned above the nursery mantelshelf, for constant reference and the proper guidance of the guardian of my valuable little person.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Need I say that those documents, and the instructions

I was duly dandled and cooed to by fond mother and attentive nurse.

so clearly set forth therein, were as obstinately ignored and consistently neglected as the most minute direction verbally given by the commander-in-chief of my nursery when at home. My nurse, when the missus had gone, was determined, in military parlance, to "stand at ease," and even "fall out," if so inclined.

Portmanteaux, gun-cases, hat and bonnet boxes, and indeed boxes of all kinds, were piled upon the fly in lofty confusion, long before my dear mother could be induced to leave—torn from, I believe, was her own expression—her darling fast asleep; little did she suspect, under the influence of a favourite soothing syrup, administered shortly before by faithful nurse, "to stop the squalling o' the young brat," as she meant to be "off duty" as soon as the drum-major—as she disrespectfully calls her mistress—turns her back, and not do any "sentry-go" that evening.

She is going to meet her own particular "Tommy Atkins," servant to one of the subalterns of the gallant 15th, and with him enjoy the pleasures of the town, and probably partake of shrimps and ginger beer in his sweet society, or—who knows?—even a glass of port wine and a bath bun, or such like delicacies, at some "restorong" or other.

When the fly, with its load of boxes, had got fairly on its journey, my father soon discovered that the pace somewhat resembled that of a snail with his shell on his back. The horses—regular old stick-in-the-muds at best—seemed much overweighted with the lumbering carriage and its heavy load of luggage; the road, being of clay and wet, was sticky to the last degree; and the driver seemed to have been behaving very differently from what was becoming in the staunch teetotaler of many years' standing he stoutly declared himself to be, to the accompaniment of many a naughty word. My father's peremptory commands to advance, issued with sharp military abruptness, and even his attempted eloquence in language scarcely parliamentary, had a slightly sobering effect on the driver, but failed entirely to stimulate the rigid joints and bare-ribbed frames of the worn-out cattle. The result of the frequent altercations was to drive my poor mother frantic with pain in her head, and the horses and fly into the station some ten minutes after the express had passed through.

More "language" from Jehu, mingled with insulting remarks about "folks keepin' the 'osses waitin' 'alf-an-hour after 'e was all ready to start."

My mother inwardly pleaded guilty to this accusation and, in consequence, tried to soothe the fervour of my father's wrath; she consoled and congratulated herself on her returning to hover once more over the couch of her sleeping and much worshipped cherub.

There was nothing for it but to turn round and make the best of the way back; my mother's head racked by the rattling and jingling of the windows and wheels of the fly, my father much in the condition of a threatening and grumbling volcano.

Arrived at last in front of their so recently quitted home, the luggage was soon returned to the house; and while my father was refusing to contribute anything towards the further refreshment of the driver—on what seemed to be a holiday or off-day from teetotalism—my mother entered the hall, to be confronted by a weeping housemaid, who ran up the kitchen stairs to admit her, having just realised the arrival, and had barely time to push Private Jones through the kitchen door into the area.

The cause of the weeping not being at all apparent, my mother was naturally much astonished and somewhat alarmed; every effort to get at the cause of this manifestation of grief was only rewarded by the girl becoming more thoroughly dissolved in tears than ever, till my father coming in and demanding to know the cause of this extraordinary scene, the lachrymose maid managed to sob forth:

"Oh, if you please, mum, cook 'ave gone out with her sergeant, and though nuss said as she were a-goin' out too, and ast me to listen if baby should cry. I heerd her come in agin, but can't find her nowheres in the 'ouse, and the blessed hinfant, if you please, mum, 'aven't cried a mossel since you left, mum!"

My mother and father both rushed upstairs to the nursery, overcome by the housemaid's story, when, what was their amazement, nay, horror, to find, not only the nurse absent, but the year-old darling of their hearts vanished, cradle and all!

Around lay my little night-clothes, appealing mutely to the rent hearts of my parents; clearly it was no ordinary mischief that the wretched woman—my nurse—was up to, but a premeditated and planned abduction of the vilest kind, and evidently prompted by the most sordid motives.

Further dismay and almost despair overwhelmed my parents, when they discovered drawers and wardrobes thrown wide, the contents in complete confusion and disorder; my best pelisse and other clothes gone, together with some valuable lace belonging to my mother.

Digitized by Google

Apparently, the fiend in human guise meant to sell me as the child of gentle though unfortunate parents, to some doting couple without a child of their own, and who would ask no awkward questions.

"Why, oh why!" cried my mother, "was I ever wicked enough to leave my darling to be stolen away and sold like a slave? I shall go mad! I shall go mad!"

My father seeing a piece of paper covered with writing near the fireplace, ran to pick it up, thinking it might give some clue to the whereabouts of the runaway and his boy.

Alas! it was but the remains of my menu, so tenderly prepared by my mother but a few short hours ago, part of which had already been used in lighting the gas.

Further questioning of the housemaid elicited renewed sobs and tears, but little else; all she knew she had told at first, except that she had seen the nurse talking to a soldier, whose face she did not see, in the street, just before she heard her come in.

The evident distress and fright of this girl at the disappearance of the child convinced my parents that she spoke the truth, and had no connection with, nor knowledge of, the abstraction of my lost self. This was more and more evidence of the sinister designs on my person of the guilty absentee. Was the soldier with whom she had been seen talking an accomplice? Had he levanted with her and her precious burden? The uniform was the only clue, and that would probably not remain long unchanged, for who knew what disguise? Where! oh where, could they have gone?

My mother, weeping and fainting by turns, is left to the care of the almost equally tearfully maid, while my father hurries off first to the barracks, where, with the aid of his soldier servant, hunts every nook and cranny of the quarters of both men and officers; the latter are all absent at an entertainment, given in a hall in the town, hired for the purpose, where proceedings are to wind up with a ball, and to which they have invited a number of residents in the neighbourhood. This entertainment and ball my father remembered when he reached the barracks, as he and my mother were to have taken an active part in the festivities, and, but for my mother's illness, would have been there at that moment. He saw now, that as a large contingent of the men, officers' servants, and others, would be taken down to assist in the arrangements, act as door-keepers, etc., how this night, of all others, would be selected as an opportunity for deserting by a clever villain, especially if he had the assistance of a woman who could procure clothes for purposes of disguise, such, for instance, as his own wardrobe might afford. Home again he rushes, frightening my poor mother afresh, as she runs to the door hoping for tidings of her lost darling, to throw open every drawer and cupboard; nothing is missing, but she must have hunted out some old clothes he had forgotten, or thought he had given away, fearing that newer things might be recognised or more easily remembered and described.

Off again, this time to the railway station, where porters and station-master had seen several women with children during the course of the evening, but not knowing his nurse, had not, of course, recognised her; had not noticed any child exceptionally well dressed, or smothered in valuable lace, of which they were no judges.

Many soldiers had likewise been on the platform, but were not particularly noticed as accompanying females carrying handsome boys; nobody in uniform had gone by rail that evening, or the booking-clerk would have

My father and mother both rushed upstairs to the nursery.

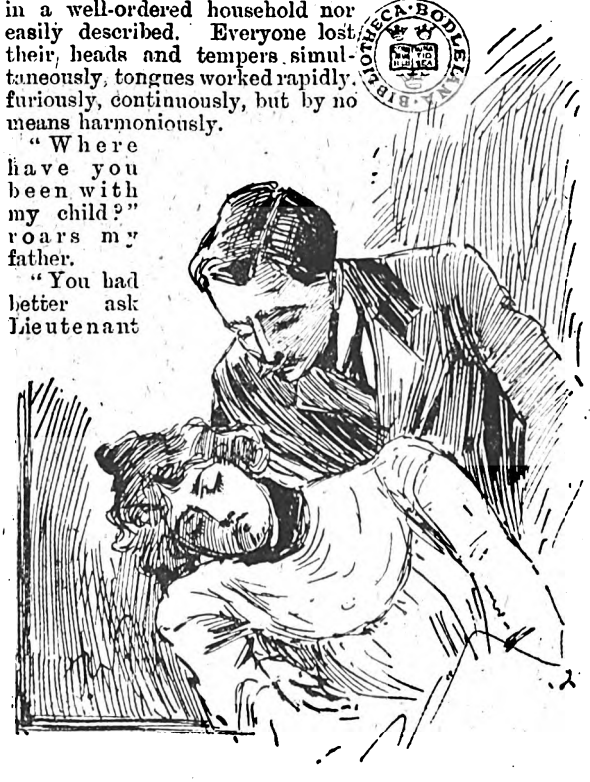
Digitized by Google

observed the fact. He must have been disguised, but inquiry failed to discover whether a man had taken two tickets, and who was accompanied by a woman and child; "woman and child would naturally wait on the platform while tickets were being taken by any man who was with them," the clerk said.

On to the police office, where a full, true, and particular description of the delinquent nurse and her frail charge are duly taken down in writing by the inspector on duty, with the additional information, "probably accompanied by a soldier of the 15th, in or out of uniform; to be confirmed, and name given, after roll-call to-morrow."

The only information gained at the police-station is that the policeman on the beat will probably know the nurse, by sight at all events, and a man shall be sent to cross-question him forthwith.

Back to the house my father wends his weary way, no news of nurse or child. My mother, by this time, being quite hysterical, my father goes sadly out to fetch the doctor. On his return he finds that cook has just come in, and after considerable fencing with the questions my mother has been able to put to her, has begun to sob violently; evidently she is not entirely ignorant as to the whereabouts of baby, and my father is about to open upon her in "real earnest" as our American cousins say, when a peal is heard from the front-door bell, and enter nurse, baby, cradle, and all! My mother made an effort to reach her lost child, but swooned on the way in her husband's arms. Then began, dear reader, such a scene as is neither frequent in a well-ordered household nor easily described. Everyone lost their heads and tempers simultaneously, tongues worked rapidly, furiously, continuously, but by no means harmoniously.



My mother swooned on the way in her husband's arms.

"Where have you been with my child?" roars my father.

"You had better ask Lieutenant Murray. Indeed it weren't my fault, sir; 'e would 'ave the loan of the blessed baby for his show."

"What! are you drunk or mad? What has Lieutenant Murray to do with my son, and at this time of night?"

"Go and ask him, and don't keep a-shouting at me as if you'd got the toothache!" was the impudent rejoinder, prompted, no doubt, by the insinuation about being drunk and the guilty consciousness of several glasses of negus to which she had been treated.

After this, further attempts to get at the cause of my absence from the parental roof-tree, with my nurse, only elicited impertinence from the latter, till she was peremptorily ordered to leave the house.

Where, think you, dear reader, had I been during all this terrible time of anxiety and temporary insanity on the part of my parents?

Why, I had been making my first appearance on the stage, before a very intelligent and appreciative audience, and received rounds of applause and the most flattering sympathy and attention.

I must now explain that the entertainment to be given by the officers of the 15th on this eventful evening, of which I have before made mention, included an amateur performance of a drawing-room drama, in which Lieutenant Murray was to enact the part of an interesting and fascinating widow, mother of a lovely infant, the posthumous offspring and sole heir of the late Sir Giles de Jasper.

At first it was intended that an empty basinette with a bundle of clothing was to do duty in the scene where the mother was occupied in watching the slumbers of the infant baronet.

Difficulties arose about the borrowing of the necessary article of furniture for stage use, and a "happy thought" occurring to Lieutenant Murray that my parents owned a baby, and therefore doubtless a cradle of some sort, quite a "knowing wrinkle" suggested itself to his mind, that as the captain and his wife would be absent from home, why not borrow baby as well, and so give additional reality to the scene and secure an extra share of applause to himself. No sooner had this "rare tip" enlightened the gloom of Lieutenant Murray's thoughts, than he immediately set about putting his plan into action. He distinctly remembered coming upon his servant walking out with my nurse Betsy on a fine Sunday evening some time before, so he forthwith summoned this useful functionary and at once began:

"I believe, Wilkins, you know Captain Dolby's nursemaid?"

"Yessir," was the prompt reply.

"Now, I want you to see if you can persuade her to let us have the loan of the baby's cradle for to-night's performance, and as the baby can scarcely sleep without his cradle, she might as well bring him down to the hall with it, and we could bring him on the stage, just for a minute or two, without disturbing him in the least; if he is asleep so much the better. Now, not a word of all this to anyone—anyone, do you understand, Wilkins?—as it is my own idea, and I want to create a bit of a surprise. None of the 15th must know whose child I have got, or it will get to the captain's ears, and then there will be the dickens to pay. I will give you money for a cab, and you must manage to smuggle the nurse and child into and out of the hall again without any one seeing them."

Wilkins tried to enter a mild protest, urging the difficulties of the task, and the danger of serious consequences to the girl if the escapade should ever reach

Digitized by Google

Captain Dolby's ears. His master, however, calmed his fears, and talked down all opposition to his pet project. Wilkins then betook himself in due time to meet Betsy according to previous arrangement, as I have before indicated, and at once opened on the confidential scheme intrusted to him by his master. At first Betsy uncompromisingly refused to have act or part in the subtle device, declaring loudly:

"That no child as she had ever heerd on was that wushupped, spoilt, and fussed over as that there Dolby hinfant;" and added, to the sympathetic ears of Wilkins: "I do believe as the Prince o' Wales' nuss was not worrited by the Queen o' Hengland in the way as I have been by Mrs. Dolby. Why, I'm treated as if the young brat was the great Nawab himself and I was one o' his niggers; it ain't fit service for a Christian white woman."

Wilkins' arguments and persuasion would probably have met with little success had not Lieutenant Murray at that very moment passed, quite by accident, of course, on his way to the hall and added the weight of a cheerful and encouraging sentence or two, and the even more tangible weight of a golden argument.

From that moment nurse Betsy was one of the conspirators; she hastened home to array me in my best finery, and slipping quietly out of the house, to avoid being seen or heard by the housemaid, was soon in a cab at the end of the terrace with Private Wilkins, on her way to the "halls of dazzling light." By the time we had arrived at our destination I had resumed my rudely disturbed dreams, and was quietly taken to a small back room to await the call boy, and where nurse beguiled her time with the consumption of negus, which Lieutenant Murray sent by Wilkins for her special refreshment, rightly judging that if strong and sweet it would act as a powerful antidote to any qualms of conscience or fears of ulterior consequences.

She was soon as merry as a cricket, and had begun to take a real interest in the success of the evening's exploit.

At length the scene arrived, where the curtain was to rise disclosing Lieutenant Murray as the charming widow, hanging over the cradle containing the young débutant in the part of sleeping innocence.

Nurse was carefully kept in the background as a precaution against my identity being discovered, so Wilkins deposited me in my cradle, very gingerly, on the stage in a position where I should be in view, but protected as much as possible from draughts.

When the footlights were turned on and the curtain rose, I must have felt that the situation was not one in which I could, with due credit to myself and civility to the attentive audience, remain silent, so I began to crow lustily, which had the effect of bringing down the house with a torrent of applause, and likewise of much discomposing the expression suitable to my stage mother in her widowed condition.

She began to rock the cradle violently, as the applause had caused an ominous gloom to overspread my hitherto beaming countenance. The rocking and the frantic applause which followed this very natural effort of the mother to soothe her infant treasure immediately caused the gathering clouds to dissolve themselves in a shower, or rather a downpour of portentous magnitude. I further resented, with stentorian voice and convulsive kicks, the attempt on the part of Lieutenant Murray to lift me, which he did, like all young men, as if I had a tendency to come to pieces on being handled. This complete taking possession of the house by myself resulted in Betsy hastened to array me in my best finery.

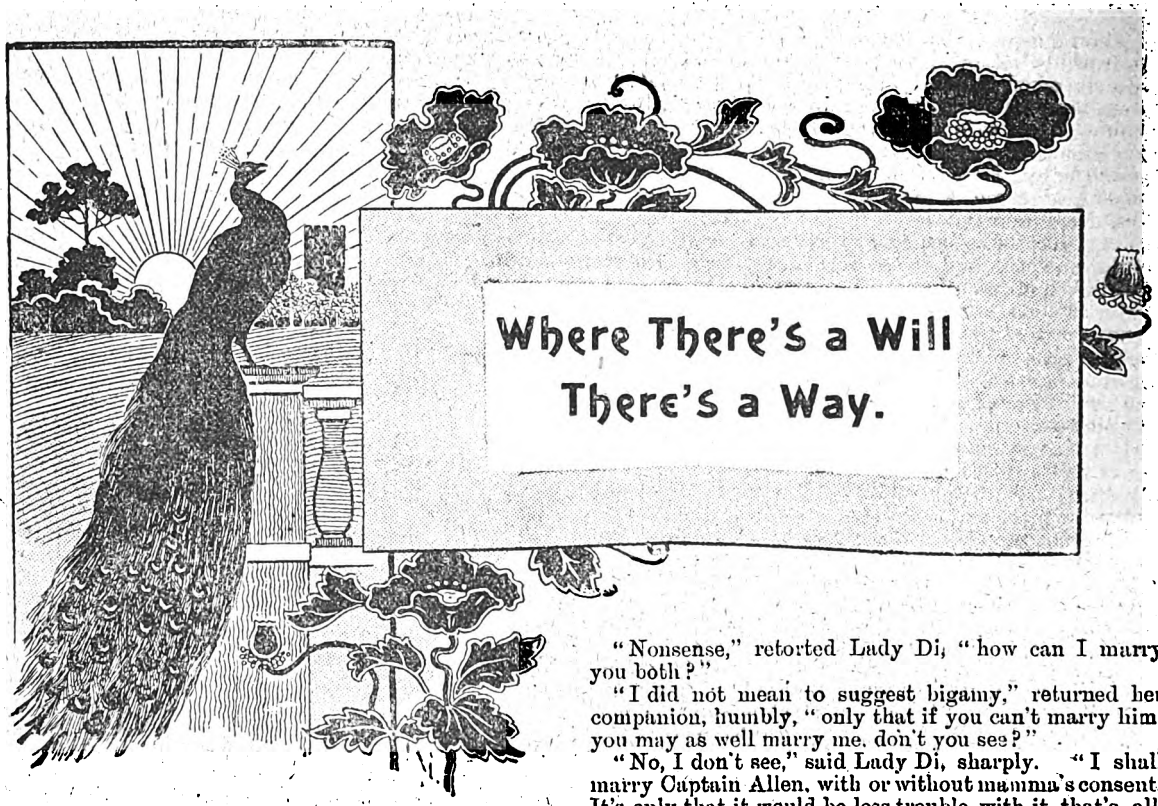
Wilkins being obliged to carry me to the little back room, where my nurse soon silenced and then calmed me to sleep with the aid of another dose of the invaluable soothing syrup. My appearance on the stage, and my performance there, though amusing enough features in themselves, robbed the piece of all interest, and the audience appearing restless, it was decided to curtail this part of the entertainment, and so dancing was commenced sooner than had been intended.

Now that I was fast asleep again, the nurse slipped out and watched the dancing from a side door for several hours, which accounted for her late return home. The consequences of her share in the transaction are already known to the reader, nor could all the pleading of Lieutenant Murray induce my mother to intrust again my precious little carcass to the care of "that thief of a woman," as she insisted on calling the nurse. Lieutenant Murray, although heavily punished by the failure of the play, and the fiasco and ridicule which resulted from his "happy thought," did not escape my mother's scathing accusation of lack of every feeling of humanity supposed to distinguish the conduct of civilized races. I question if she has ever quite forgiven him his share in the suffering and fright my temporary abduction caused, although he has since married her sister and proved himself an excellent husband and fond parent. My father could never be brought to see any humorous side to a stupid freak which had caused so much pain and anxiety. It will be seen from the foregoing narrative that "my first appearance on any stage," though creating a great sensation in more ways than one, was far from a success.

J. D. HUTCHESON.

Digitized by Google



LADY DI CRAMPTON was giving her parents an immense amount of trouble and anxiety in more ways than one. To begin with, it was her third season, and she had not yet taken upon herself the bonds of matrimony, nor even the shackles of a satisfactory engagement. In addition to this, Di's mother had every reason to fear that her daughter had given her heart to a very charming but hopelessly impecunious young officer.

The Cramptons, like many other folk, were hampered by the lack of sufficient gold to carry on their style of living, and therefore had set their hearts on their daughter making a rich marriage, thus saving them from utter extinction in the present, and promising a comfortable security in the future. Now Di by no means lacked admirers, nor suitors for her hand.

Only one short week ago, she had refused a rich pork manufacturer, who with a noble generosity had laid his pigs and their profits at her feet. Of this proposal she had not dared to tell her parents, even begging her would-be lover to continue his visits as frequently as heretofore.

"Because," she told him naïvely, "they would be so angry if they knew that I had refused you."

At which the poor young man hardly knew whether to be offended or not, only that it was next to impossible to be long angry with Lady Di, so he wisely made up his mind to be friends, if he could be nothing nearer, finding out in the course of a few confidential chats upon whom she had set her wayward affections.

"He's so poor," she told him woefully, "They will never allow it."

"Poor little girl," he said tenderly, "it's hard lines. But there is always me to fall back upon you know."

"Nonsense," retorted Lady Di, "how can I marry you both?"

"I did not mean to suggest bigamy," returned her companion, humbly, "only that if you can't marry him, you may as well marry me, don't you see?"

"No, I don't see," said Lady Di, sharply. "I shall marry Captain Allen, with or without mamma's consent. It's only that it would be less trouble with it, that's all. Mr. Armytage, do you really care for me, as much as you tell me?"

"Of course I do," answered the young man earnestly, and the light that sprang from his honest blue eyes convinced Di of the truth of his words.

She placed her hand gently on his arm.

"Then I shall rely on you to help me if necessary," she said, getting up in answer to her mother's call to go and greet some visitors.

The season was drawing to a close.

Both Lady Di and her mother were looking pale and worn, the one with the constant anxiety to press upon her daughter the necessity of a rich marriage, the other from the continual resistance that she had to bring into force.

Just now it was a cotton manufacturer who had come forward with a request for Lady Di's hand, and unfortunately had spoken to her parents on the subject first, so Di had no chance of disposing of him as she had of the pig-owner.

Unluckily, too, he had with great skill discovered the scarcity of the gold coin, making a generous offer to advance the needful, and clear all deficits, should he be fortunate enough to win the young lady's hand. This placed Di very awkwardly, but it did not shake her decision to marry no one but the man she loved.

It merely helped her to make up her mind that what had to be done, had best be done quickly. Captain Allen naturally being of the same opinion, and Di being a young woman of resource, they formed a plan between them, and set about to put it into action as soon as they conveniently could.

So one evening, at a reception at her mother's house, Di electrified Mr. Armytage, by saying suddenly:

"I have promised to marry Captain Allen in a week's time. You must help me as you promised," passing on in the crowd before the astonished young man had time to reply.

Digitized by Google

Later on he had a few moments' talk with her.

"You will help me, Mr. Armytage?" she said.

"My dear Lady Di, I don't see how it can be done," returned the young man, almost gasping in his surprise. "A week is so short a time."

"Quite long enough," returned Di, "for our purpose. Come along, and get me an ice or something, and I will tell you all about it."

For a few minutes there was a low-voiced conversation carried on in a corner, much to the delight of Di's mamma.

Perhaps the pork man had still a chance, she thought.

Suddenly Di's companion broke into a hearty laugh.

"Capital—splendid," he exclaimed. "My sister will be only too charmed," and rising from his seat, he made his way across to Lady Crampton to bid her good-night.

* * * * *

It was a week later. The Cramptons' house was ablaze with lights. Through the down-drawn blinds could be seen the shadows of busy footmen and maids moving to and fro. The hostess and her daughter stood greeting their guests at the top of the staircase.

Di looked brilliantly handsome in her plain satin gown, only a single string of pearls encircling her slender throat. Her dress was perfect in every detail bar one. It was a curious fact that not once during the whole evening did anyone catch a glimpse of even the tip of a shoe peeping beneath the gown.

Perhaps the long dresses of the day partly accounted for it, but even in that case, when a lady has a remarkably pretty foot, she generally manages to let it appear somehow. But Di to-night had a reason for hiding her usually smartly-shod understandings. She had "patent" leather boots on.

A couple of hours passed, and Lady Crampton's guests began to depart. No one noticed that a certain satin-clad figure had disappeared.

"Good-bye, goodbye; so delighted to have seen you." "Delightful evening," and so on were the remarks made, as they thronged down the staircase.

"Where is Di? Oh, downstairs I expect," replied Lady Crampton, as some friend inquired for her. "You are sure to find her there. Goodbye."

All was confusion in the hall, as well as outside, for everyone was waiting for their cab or carriage. In the midst of it, a slim figure in a long ulster and squashy felt hat slipped by from somewhere, springing on to the empty box of a smart-looking hansom cab.

I do not fancy anyone had time to notice what a very smart pair of boots the young cabman wore, for a lady and gentleman umped in almost before he had gathered up the reins, and with a plunge the spirited little mare went off at a quick trot.

"All right there?" questioned a soft voice through the trap door.

"All right," answered Armytage and his sister, and in less than twenty minutes they drew up at the kerb, got out of the cab, and prepared to help the driver from his elevated position.

But someone was before them.

Jack Allen had the slight figure folded tight in his arms, and perhaps it may be forgiven if poor Armytage felt a pang as he mounted his seat and drove slowly round to his own stables.

The next morning, as Lady Crampton was sitting up in bed, eating her breakfast, her maid brought her the following letter:

MY DEAR MOTHER,—I hope my maid gave you my message last night. It was quite true. I had a headache, and I wished to save you all anxiety should you miss me. By the time you get this I shall be Mrs. Jack Allen, as we are to be married at eight o'clock to-morrow, or rather this morning. I am staying the night with Mr. Armytage's sister, who has been most kind.

I am sorry to disappoint you, and hope one day you will forgive, Your affectionate daughter, DI.

GRACE COOMBE.

Digitized by Google

The War with the Ghurkas, the Pindaris and the Last Mahratta War.

(1813-1817.)

ALTHOUGH the year 1813 found our vast Empire in India still undergoing the process of consolidation, the great native feudatory powers were beginning slowly to perceive that a continuance of our rule insured not only the independence, but the prosperity of their respective countries.

Law and order, however, being utterly distasteful to the mountain tribes, who lived by warfare, their subjection became necessary for the pacification of India.

In 1813 the Ghurkas of Nepal were peremptorily called upon to evacuate some lands—of which we were the Suzerain power—they had annexed. On their retirement their places were filled by the police. But the Ghurkas had only retreated to organise their forces, and shortly after, again took possession of the occupied districts, driving out the police.

War was then declared, and Nepal invaded at several points. General Ochterlony with 6,000 native troops was ordered to the hill country.

General Gillespie with 3,500 troops, 1,000 of whom were British, was to push from Meerut, and skirting the mountains to keep in touch with the first column. General Wood was to invade from the east with 3,000 natives and 1,000 British, whilst another force of 3,000 under Major Larter, was to support our ally the Raja of Sikkim against attacks from the Ghurkas.

A few insignificant successes won by General Ochterlony were followed by a grave disaster. General Gillespie, finding his march obstructed by a hill fort called Kalanga, manned by a mere handful of the enemy, tried to capture it and failed. In two assaults we lost over 500 men and General Gillespie was killed.

The force then waited for their artillery. After a breach had been made in the walls the order was given not to load the muskets but to carry the fort by the bayonet alone. This led to another disaster. When we got inside we found our progress checked by the débris. Before we could retire the enemy opened fire killing a great number.

Wiser counsels then prevailed, and we did what we ought to have done at first. The job was handed over to the artillerymen, who quickly laid the fort in ruins. Gillespie's force then attempted to join Ochterlony and passing another fort on the road called Jaitak, again tempted fortune, only to be repulsed with heavy loss. But these were not the only reverses we sustained.

General Wood, after being checked in an attempt to carry a stockade by storm, was induced to believe that the enemy was in such strong force as to render it hazardous for him to advance further.

General Marley's plans, too, were deranged in consequence of two detached posts of 500 men each he had left behind without supports being cut to pieces.

Then Amir Khan, the Pathan Chief, assembled his warriors. Lahore too, began to swarm with the soldiers of the great Sikh ruler Ranjit Singh.

Digitized by Google

The Pindaris, too, a central India tribe of robbers, whose plundering proclivities had been kept in check, threatened hostilities, and Amir Khan, who was only twelve marches from Delhi, was said to have in readiness a force of 30,000 sturdy fighters and 125 guns.

But the Government never quailed. Our statesmen faced the situation, bad as it was, with unshrinking firmness. Reinforcements were sent up without stint, and orders given for an immediate advance on Nepal. The men rejoiced, for they were burning to avenge their defeats, but the officers hung back. They feared the hills.

Then at the very moment when our fortunes seemed at their darkest, the clouds suddenly cleared. The Pindaris instead of fighting us began fighting amongst themselves.

A quarrel broke out between the Amir Kabul and Ranjit Singh, whilst Scindia relinquished his design because his generals could not agree on a plan of campaign.

The danger of an Anti-British combination for a time averted, the war was renewed. A feint was made against the western powers. The Nepalese province of Kumaun drew off so many Ghurkas that Ochterlony, although opposed by the ablest of the Ghurka chiefs, Amir Singh Kapa, was able to capture the fort Nalagarh. He then boldly entered the mountains and stormed Rangari, another fort built on the top of a mountain 4,600 feet above the sea.

The Ghurkas with their long heavy knives were formidable opponents. At the outset of the war they were able, owing to their daring and extraordinary agility, to creep under our bayonets, and once inside the ranks the deadly knife was plied without mercy.

But the British soldier is nothing if not adaptable. He is willing to learn and always profits by experience. As soon as our men had learnt how to stop the wild rushes of their agile little foes, they drove them from point to point.

Whilst Scindia, having healed the differences between his generals, was conspiring again, our brave fellows were carrying everything before them. All the Ghurka villages, Ryla, Deonthal and Malaur, fell in quick succession. The fall of Malaur so disheartened the Nepalese that they sued for peace.

We took over a big slice of hill country, presented the Raja of Sikkim with a large district, and compelled the Nepalese to receive a British resident at Khatmandu. It was from the Ghurkas that we obtained possession of those southern slopes of the Himalayas which provide the civil and military services with the highland resorts of Simla, Landaur and Naini Tal.

The Nepalese treaty signed, we were free to deal with the Mahrattas, but the Governor General, Lord Hastings, deemed it better to crush the Pindaris first before settling scores with the Mahrattas. The Pindaris were robbers pure and simple. Strangers in the land to this extent that they were not connected with other races either by blood or religion, they were especially dangerous on account of the welcome they afforded all the outlaws and criminals of India.

Such ancestry as they had was to be found in the dregs of the Mogul Empire. Their headquarters were at Malwa, the richest part of central India, and though they gained a livelihood by plunder they committed their depredations on such a large scale that their principal chief, Amir Khan, boasted a well-equipped army supported by a powerful artillery.

The force they were able to put in the field when they became aware of our intentions so rapidly increased that our Government sent against them the largest army ever seen in India. It comprised 81,000 infantry, 10,000 cavalry, and 23,000 irregular troops. This large force so over-awed Scindia, who had been secretly promising to come to the aid of the Pindaris as soon as hostilities commenced, that when the Governor General, the Marquis of Hastings, who headed the army, after listening unmoved to the protestations of loyalty, suddenly produced a treaty and called on him to sign it, he dared not refuse.

To be compelled to furnish a contingent for the subjection of the very people he had sworn to support was a bitter pill. He told his officers before they started that they might desert to the enemy if they chose. But we had anticipated this by placing the Mahratta contingent under the command of British officers.

Dismayed by this desertion, Amir Khan at once submitted, offering to disband his freebooters if the British would allow him to retain the land he held from the Prince Holkar.

We agreed to these conditions, gave him five lakhs of rupees for his artillery, and as the security for the disbanding of his robbers took his son and heir as hostage.

But as this treaty only concerned Amir Khan himself, we attacked the other chiefs, stormed their camps, and broke up their organisation. We also forced Scindia to give up a noted chief, Wazil Muhammad, who had fled to Gwalior, and we totally defeated another chieftain, Chitu.

Deserted by his followers, this Chitu, after wandering about the country for twelve months, was killed when nearly dead with hunger by a tiger. The Pindari war was hardly concluded, when we found ourselves again embroiled with the Mahratta Princes.

Had these potentates been wise, they would have waited till the enormous army we had collected had been disbanded, but when we proceeded to insist on the Peshwa (who had never forgiven us for forcing him to sign, in 1802, the treaty of Bassien) signing a new treaty at Poona, which relieved the Gaikwar of Baroda from his control, besides forcing him to refer all disputes with other princes to our arbitration, he refused.

Under pretence of assisting us against the Pindaris he had largely increased his army. Now he proceeded to provision it. Suspecting his purpose, the British resident, Mr. Elphinstone, sent to Bombay for reinforcements and retired to Kirki. Here he was attacked without warning by an army of 18,000 men under Bappo Gokla, the Peshwa's general.

Our force under Colonel Burr only numbered 2,800 men, but they were quite undismayed when the Mahratta force, anticipating an easy victory, rushed on their thin red line which, after recovering from the charge, charged back in return with such vigour that the Mahrattas were sent flying in all directions.

This defeat so crushed the haughty Peshwa that when Colonel Smith, with a strong division of the army Lord Hastings had collected for the subjugation of the Pindaris, appeared off Poona, he found the Prince had left his capital during the night. Some of the soldiers laid down their arms, but a few fiery regiments offered a stout resistance. Those that preferred fighting to surrendering were annihilated. In those days war was war.

When we entered the capital we found eighteen cannon and a large quantity of stores. This defeat spread with lightning rapidity to all parts of India completely restoring our prestige.

Digitized by Google

Drawn by] [C. Lawson Wood.

The Sepoys rushed valiantly forward, stormed the trenches, and drove the Mahrattas down the hill.

Digitized by Google

The Peshwa's kinsman, the Mahratta Raja, instead of taking warning by what had happened, also defied the British. He had succeeded to his position on the death of the late Raja, whom he had poisoned, and he believed that a knowledge of this fact had made us resolve to depose him on the first opportunity.

The insolent manner in which he treated Mr. Jenkins, the Resident, caused that gentleman to fly to Sitabakli Hill in the centre of the city. He had with him two battalions of Sepoy infantry and some detachments of infantry and cavalry amounting altogether to 1,400 men.

The Englishman was not a moment too soon, for the last soldier had scarcely mounted Sitabakli Hill when the Raja, his army comprising 12,000 horse and 8,000 infantry, with 36 guns, appeared.

Mr. Jenkins having refused to capitulate a heavy fire was opened. The British, who were placed at the most vulnerable part of the hill, lost a good many men whilst the bombardment lasted; indeed, their losses were much more severe than the enemy supposed, for presently changing their tactics the bombardment was stayed to permit of the hill being stormed.

Time after time did the Mahrattas reach the crest of the hill only to be hurled back with tremendous loss. Instead of resting when night came the besieged employed the time in making fresh cartridges and intrenchments. Picks and shovels not being available the Sepoys were ordered to creep stealthily into the town and bring away anything likely to prove useful.

The following morning found the garrison stationed behind the most remarkable defences ever seen on a field of battle. Intrenchments composed of sacks of flour and grain, water-barrels, planks, old doors and all sorts of odds and ends affording cover.

At daybreak the attack was renewed with extraordinary fierceness. During the afternoon a tumbrel burst, causing such commotion amongst the Sepoys that the Mahrattas dashed up the hill, stormed the improvised intrenchments, drove out the Sepoys, and being reinforced, opened a heavy fire on our men who were stationed on another spur of the hill.

Our position was now more dangerous than ever. Menaced by the Mahrattas on the hill, and by the swarms encircling the hill on the other side, our men began to fall rapidly. Again the Mahratta Prince summoned us to surrender, and again we refused, although the cartridges made during the night were nearly all gone, and the provisions were running out.

What was to be done? Believing that destruction was only to be averted by some desperate action, Captain Fitzgerald asked permission to charge. It was refused. Later in the day the application was repeated.

"Tell Captain Fitzgerald," said Colonel Smith, "that he charges the enemy at his peril."

"At my peril be it," replied the dauntless Irishman.

Gathering his troopers around him, these splendid fellows cantered down the hill and then dashed headlong at the foe.

"Mad," said Smith, when he heard the news.

But the captain so far from being mad was extremely artful.

Two of the enemy's guns had wrought great havoc in our ranks and he meant to have them. Balaclava pales into insignificance before Fitzgerald's heroic ride.

A handful of men beset on all sides by thousands of foes thirsting for their blood, not only cut their way to where the guns were, but despite all the efforts of the Mahrattas, who at that time were the fiercest fighters in India, actually brought them back and got them to the top of the hill.

The Sepoys who witnessed this daring feat grew so excited, that when a tumbrel exploded amongst the Mahrattas a little later, they rushed valiantly forward, and drove the Mahrattas down the hill.

Resolved not to be outdone, the rest of this wonderful little army declared that the time had arrived for them to do something. Even Colonel Smith was infected by the general enthusiasm.

Regardless of the danger to which they would be exposed by giving up the hill, they charged right down into the serried masses clustering round the base, and although they had no cartridges, the bayonet was plied with such effect that the foe was completely routed.

With characteristic duplicity, the Mahratta Prince disowned all knowledge of the treacherous treatment of the British envoy, but when General Doveton arrived with large reinforcements the Prince was quickly made to understand that he must not only surrender but disband his army. He agreed to surrender, but refusing to disband both sides prepared for another fight.

So far our policy had been crowned with success. Two of the formidable Mahratta Princes had been deposed and only one remained.

Jeswart Holkar, Prince of Indore, who in 1805 was defeated by Lord Lake, died insane, leaving a favourite concubine, Talsi Bai, to rule the country during the minority of his son Mulkar Rao.

As soon as the Mahrattas heard that the British were coming, they abducted the infant Prince, killed Talsi Bai, and taking up a strong position on the banks of the Sipra, at Maidpur, which commanded the only ford for miles, they awaited the approach of Sir John Malcolm and the British.

The Mahrattas knew the daring of the British soldier but they never dreamt that they would risk forcing a passage in the face of seventy pieces of artillery.

The surprise of the artillerymen when one man dashed into the stream was so great as to completely paralyse their aim. To minimise our losses we had extended our lines. Consequently when we closed up to attack the two wings of the Mahrattas closed in too. Cheered by the depth of their columns they fought marvellously well.

Time after time we charged into their ranks killing hundreds. But as they showed no signs of yielding, Sir John Malcolm sent a body of British infantry to their rear. Even then the brave Mahrattas faced about refusing to fly. When the ever-contracting iron circle we had thrown around them crushed out the resistance, we charged into the mass with the bayonet.

The shades of evening were drawing in when the Mahrattas, despairing of victory, burst through the cordon and took to flight.

We lost 778 killed and wounded. The Mahrattas over 4,000. The treaty of Mandassar concluded in 1818 reduced the Princes of the reigning house to the feudatory position the other Mahratta Princes had accepted. The chief of the Gwalior Mahrattas made one more effort to recover the independence of his state before finally tendering his allegiance to the British Crown. In 1843 Sir Hugh Gough, at the head of a small force, so completely routed 18,000 Mahrattas at the battle of Maharipore that, fully convinced of our superiority, the Mahrattas have ever since been as loyal as any of the other feudatory states of India.

(Next week: The Two Great Burmese Wars of 1823-6 and 1854-6.)

Digitized by Google

PHILADELPHIA'S FOLLY.

PHILADELPHIA DACRE was a young woman with just that amount of self-assertiveness that goes to make the capable maiden of to-day.

That she was alone in the world was rather in favour of this peculiarity than otherwise, although it did not render her in any way hard or unsympathetic.

In the neighbourhood where she lived (artistic Chelsea), she contrived to find that indefinite something which almost invariably spells "home." A little flat consisting of a studio, and one other tiny room, in the quiet road that links riverside Chelsea with the more aristocratic South Kensington, had been her bread-winning and domestic refuge ever since the death of her father, her last surviving relative, four years before.

Twenty-three, and possessing a creditable reputation with the "West End" dealer as a reliable producer of pretty little pictures of a certain phase of metropolitan child life, she bid fair, by dint of hard work, and persistent study, to reach in time, if not the top of the tree, at least a modest perching-place amongst the mid-way branches.

The only child of a man of more than average talent as a landscape painter, whom years of continually increasing ill-health had alone served to keep him from realising his ambition, Philadelphia had inherited, in no small measure, her dead father's artistic gift.

Her Christian name, a peculiar one, had originated in the fact of her having been born in the "City of Brotherly Love," U. S., during a long visit of her parents to that place, where lived Mrs. Dacre's relatives, members of an old Pennsylvanian family.

It was owing, more especially, to mother and daughter having both first seen the light in the "Quaker City" that the former called her baby after their mutual birthplace, and certainly the quaintness of the name harmonised more than fairly well with the unconventional oddness of the girl.

Now, in most things Philadelphia was matter-of-fact to a fault, but in one little corner of her heart she had hidden away and cherished a fancy, a sunny dream that made her loneliness no loneliness at all. Her eyes saw, her ears heard things that, shadows though they were deeply contented her and made life endurable, and even worth the living.

This imaginative indulgence had a somewhat strange origin. She had remained long enough in the city of her birth to become acquainted with a boy of her own age; a friend and neighbour of the Philadelphia Dacres. Upon her quitting America for England, both were eleven or thereabouts. Having played together, and made common cause against domestic authority, a mutual feeling of friendship had established itself between them, and although young Olaf Schuster speedily forgot his companion, she, on her part, was faithful, even too worshipping point.

Young Schuster came of the old Pennsylvania Dutch stock, but, truth to say, was but a degenerate specimen of the race. As a boy he had been overbearing, mean, sly, but woman, be she little or big, is ever sadly inconsistent, and Philadelphia, patient, forgiving, blind to all shortcomings, was no better than the majority of her sisters, and grovelled in the dust before the young tyrant.

Thus it was now that in the solitude of her little domain, she weaved a romance, plot, persons, denoument, all so ideally imagined and elaborated, that no one, save the fair author, could possibly have reached to the height necessary for complete belief and understanding.

It is extraordinary what mere imagination will do for some people; with Philadelphia it had the effect of crowning, with a by no means limited halo, a young man absolutely non-angelic, and causing herself to regard this undoubtedly mythical divinity with a love altogether out of proportion to the object upon which it was lavished.

It was thirteen years or more since she had seen Olaf Schuster, and, having had no communication of any kind with him, never having even seen his pictured presentment, it was logically impossible that she could form a just conception of his person or character.

But, as I started out by saying, Philadelphia was no ordinary girl, and being what she was, and because, perhaps, of her isolated position and her surroundings, she had, unwittingly almost, given way to the temptation of creating an ideal, which, though utterly unlike the real, satisfied her heart-craving for something upon which to expend the mother-instinct of her nature; the love which would claim expression, be the object selected never so unsuitable or unworthy.

In Gains orough Studios, where she lived, a certain Gerald Laing, artist, Bohemian, and occasional contributor to journals devoted to the interests of his profession, had his painting-room, and bachelor quarters.

In spite, however, of his vagabond mode of life, he was a thoroughly good fellow, a hard worker, and a tolerably well-known painter of military subjects.

Digitized by Google

For long he had been in the habit of occasionally seeing Philadelphia flitting up and down the dim, bare staircase, although not knowing exactly who she was.

He admired her from the outset, not so much for her trim, natty little figure, nor, indeed, because she was fair to look upon, but for the one mysterious thing which is always so evident to the genuine worshipper of the idol, and which no other than the veritably right person is permitted to see.

One particular year Philadelphia had sent in to the Academy a picture which (wonderful for her) pleased herself, but which failed to evoke responsive sentiments in the hearts of a hard and unsympathetic Hanging Committee.

It was a larger canvas than she ordinarily ventured upon, and the day she fetched it away from Burlington House, she felt so tired and depressed that its weight seemed to her to be increased sevenfold as she toiled with it from the cab and up the stairway to her rooms.

It chanced that as she was going up, Gerald Laing was coming down. Her distress was so evident, that in a moment he had raised his hat, and had proffered his services in assisting her to carry the "rejected" up to the door of No. 17.

Philadelphia looked at him a second, keenly, as if "weighing-up" the offerer of aid.

Then she said, very cordially, and with just the suspicion of a demure little smile:

"Thanks, very much! If you will be so kind. Mr. Gerald Laing, isn't it? My name is——"

"Miss Dacre—Miss Philadelphia Dacre, isn't it?" he laughingly interrupted her.

"Quite correct, Mr. Laing, I am that unfortunate individual. It is a little bit strange, you know, that you and I should have lived on the same floor for more than two years, and yet never exchanged the ordinary greetings of near neighbours until this moment."

He said that it was; and also, it is to be feared, was unduly slow in "portering" the luckless picture to its inceptive source.

Pre-occupied as was Philadelphia she yet recognised and appreciated the young artist's favourable personality, gentle courtesy, and, (as it would be called to-day by the advanced school), his old-fashioned attention to the convenances.

Dismissing her self-appointed helper with a brief expression of thanks, emphasized with a nod and a smile, and safely landed in her own preserves, Philadelphia's proceedings were, to say the least, strangely inconsequent.

Before even taking off her hat and jacket, or making the slightest preparation for a meal, she unearthed from the bottom of a large trunk, a small, very small cash-box.

Sitting down in her basket arm-chair, with the box upon her knees, she opened it and began with nervous haste to count up the contents. It represented her savings for the past two or three years. A pitifully small heap of gold and silver, not more perhaps than forty p unds in all.

"I think it's enough. I do think it's enough," she said, half-aloud, and looking wistfully at the coins as they lay, a metallic medley, in her lap. "I can travel second cabin, and can be very careful about incidental expenses, and odds and ends. I've plenty of clothes, and when I arrive in Philadelphia, I shall be all right, for I can go to Aunt Judith's at once. Yes, I think it's enough, and—I'll chance it."

What was in her mind to do?

Just this—which ninety-nine out of a hundred English girls would vote hare-brained, not respectable unmaidenly.

She was going to cross the Atlantic, alone, unprotected, to see for herself if Olaf Schuster, her ideal, her hero, her dream-love, was ready to play his part in the drama she had created.

Wild-goose chase! fools errand! nay, she would none of it. Did not her whole soul respond ecstatically to Olaf's name?

She would go, whatever the risk, whatever the misunderstanding of motive her proceeding might excite in the minds of others. Other people's opinions troubled her but little, and, as her circle of acquaintance was comparatively small, she anticipated nothing of an unpleasant nature from that quarter.

Had such a thing been at all likely, it would not have deterred her, and so, her purpose being now fixed and unalterable, she dismissed from her mind any probable or possible objections.

Meanwhile, Gerald Laing had to confess to himself that he was conquered, that his heart had gone out, once and for ever, to the little lady of the "picture." The self-confession did not by any means distress him; rather did it result in pr found self-gratulation, and in an abandonment to a delicious and future-building train of thought.

Now and then, during the fortnight following his introductory meeting with her, he and Philadelphia ran up against one another; but the enthusiasm was all upon one side. He thought of no one, and nothing else but her; she, on the other hand, was so all-absorbed in her romantic fancy that poor Gerald and his newborn pass on, were counted as of no value and ignored accordingly. She easily detected the effect her mere presence had upon him, and, snailwise, immediately withdrew into her shell.

Still he hoped that a patient persistence would reap its reward; and he planned out a campaign, which he imagined must, by reason of its very boldness, both of conception and execution, force the other side to capitulate.

He indulged in this pleasant dream right up to a certain morning, when, without warning, his "Castle of Cards" came clattering down about his ears in ruinous fashion.

The old woman, who waited on the residential inmates of the Gainsborough Studios, a garrulous old soul, but honest withal, acquainted him upon bringing up his breakfast, and with many a beck and finger punctuation, that Miss Dacre had left early that morning, with a cab-load of baggage, for Liverpool Street, and that her boxes, were labelled "Passenger to New York."

Mrs. Filliboy will not soon forget the way in which Gerald Laing received the news.

Starting up, rocket-quick, out of his chair, and walking excitedly up and down the room for five minutes, he stopped abruptly in front of the old gossip.

"Where's she gone? Only an hour ago? Look here, Mrs. Filliboy, run up, like a good soul! and see if you can't find any scrap of paper lying about with an American address upon it. Never mind my breakfast, woman! Go! and I'll give you—give you—anything, if you only find something!"

"Lor bless you, Mr. Laing! don't frighten a body so; why, I can't read writin', sir, and besides, I shouldn't like to use my key, seeing as Miss Dacre has locked up her place for four solid months, so she said, and me only to go in once a week to clean up a bit."

Digitized by Google

Nothing was found, and Gerald was at his wit's end to account for this sudden and inexplicable action of Philadelphia's.

Then a bright thought struck him.

It so happened that just about this time he was taking a brief and well-earned rest after a long spell of special work, the painting of a series of large military frescoes in the country house of a retired army-officer of high rank.

This commission had put a large sum of ready money in his pocket, and, determined several weeks before to take a holiday upon the completion of his task, he now decided that he would follow his lady-love across the Western Ocean, trusting to the chapter of accidents, and a due exercise of mother-wit in the way of inquiry, to discover a clue to her whereabouts.

That she might possibly resent such an energetic style of wooing was far from occurring to him, while any idea as to the pre-engagement of her affections never even entered into his head.

Anyway he made up his mind there and then to go, and at once, and forty-eight hours later found him on board the White Star liner Barbaric steaming merrily down the Mersey towards the sea.

Now that he had some definite object in view, and that he was fairly launched on his quest, he was to a certain extent happy. He hated to think of Philadelphia as making this long journey alone and without adequate protection.

He of course was altogether unaware that she possessed relatives or friends in America, and only thought how he might be a shield between her and the dangers his too anxious mind conjured up as strewing her path.

* * * * *

The Barbaric duly arrived at New York and discharged her passengers at the Company's Pier.

Gerald, intent only upon getting ashore as quickly as possible, in order that he might commence his search without delay, shouldered his portmanteau, and impulsively hurried down the gangway.

A perfect stranger to America and its ways, he is jostled hither and thither in his efforts to find an exit into the streets, and a conveyance to some hotel.

He is just upon the point of addressing an official, when his eyes encountered a grey-cloaked little figure, recognisable to him amid ten thousand.

Dropping his portmanteau, and shouting to a coloured boy to stand by it, he elbows his way to where the girl stands.

"Miss Dacre!"

"Mr. Laing!"

"Of course you're surprised!—you couldn't be otherwise. But—er—business—er—sudden and important business—"

She looked him through and through with those keen, grey eyes of hers; but he flinched never a whit, although his heart beat nineteen to the dozen.

"Yes," he continued, a trifle more coherently, and also, it must be confessed, not a little mendaciously, "I wanted a holiday, and thought a month's run through the States would be a splendid experience."

"Mr. Laing," said Philadelphia, knitting her brows, and regarding the big, good-looking criminal with almost legal severity, "you're not speaking the truth. I'm sure you're not! Now, are you?"

"Well—you see—I—er—thought—I mean I—er—imagined that—there! I can't brazen it out, Miss Dacre—Philadelphia. I was so fearful for you, so upset at the idea of your being exposed to insult or annoyance—danger even—that I couldn't help coming after you to—well—offer my services again."

By this time they had drifted away from the press, and were standing in a comparatively quiet corner.

She glanced up at him. His honest eyes, with an eager, pleading look in them, met hers.

"What," she said, "if I decline them?"

"In that case I could have no more to say."

"But you must admit that it is all very presumptuous on your part. You won't deny that."

"I'll admit anything and everything, and confess myself the great culprit you deem me, if you will only——"

"Well?"

"Have mercy upon me—treat me as a first offender, and—give me another chance."

The form of her answer to this appeal is immaterial, inasmuch as the effect was satisfactory. That much, at least, may be placed upon record, without hurting anybody.

Then she told him, with many a word of self-accusation for her unreasonable folly, the whole story, and how it was that she was there that day, preparing to embark for home.

It seems that her disillusionment was so complete as it was commensurate with her arrival in Philadelphia.

Mrs. Judith Dacre, astonished, naturally, at so unexpected a visit from her niece, had things to say, before even a question was asked, of Olaf Schuster, that, once and for ever, awoke the girl from her silly dream.

It is unnecessary to go into details, sufficient that the crooked nature of the boy had developed, in manhood, into absolute evil. An outcast from family and friends, he lived but to be a disreputable burden upon those who should have been able to look to him for comfort and affection in the evening of their days.

This being so, Philadelphia determined at once to return to England and her duties.

Her meeting with Gerald probably gave the right turn to her thoughts at the right moment, and prevented her from indulging in that morbid self-abasement which such a nature as hers would undoubtedly have given way to.

* * * * *

The Gallic is warping slowly into dock.

It is nine p.m., and the lights of Liverpool twinkle a welcome to the home-coming travellers.

In the crowd, waiting the shipping of the gangway, is a young couple, she with her hand upon his arm, in all the pride and trustfulness of love.

"At last!" he says, bending down from his "six feet, one," to whisper in his little companion's ear. "You'll keep to your word as to the day?"

"What day?"

"The wedding-day."

"Oh! I'd forgotten all about it!" and she laughed roguishly.

"Forgotten it?"

"Well, if I had, you would soon have made good my memory."

"Then, my services are still in request."

"I suppose so."

And Philadelphia really meant it.

RALPH ENDERBY.

Digitized by Google

FITTING FACE COMPETITION.

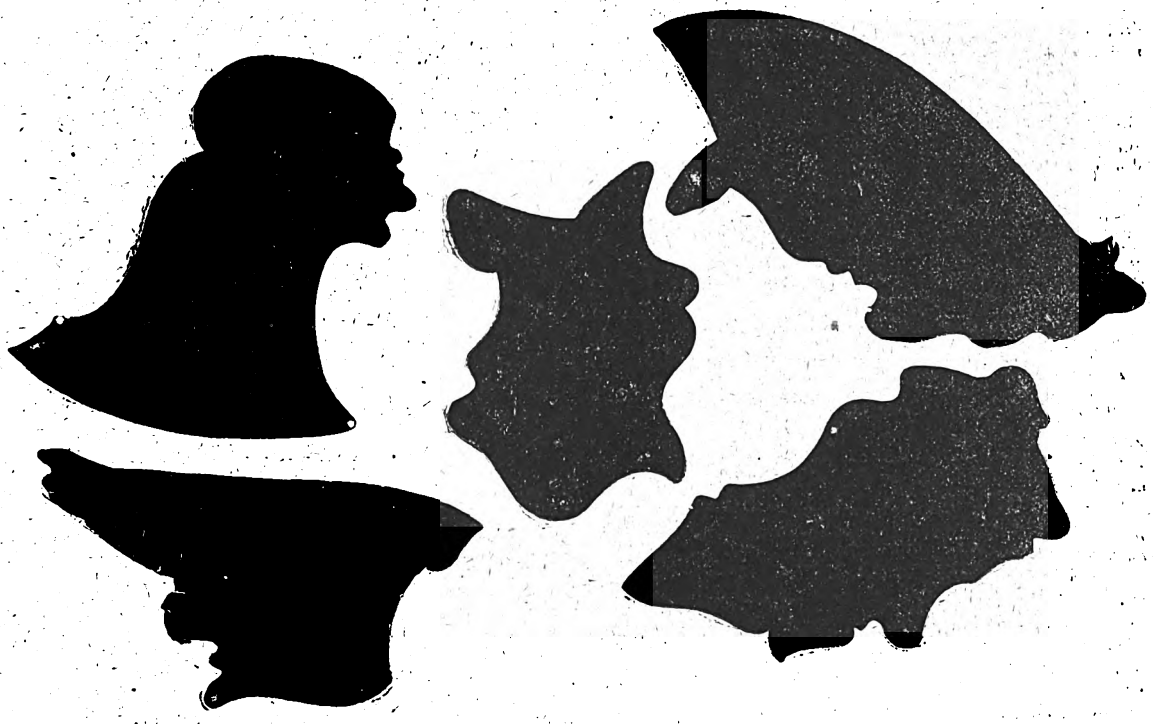
1st PRIZE - - - £1 1s.
2nd to 10th PRIZES - - "A Maori Maid,"
By Harry B. Vogel.

Cut out the five silhouettes below, and then place them together so that they form the head of a man. The portions may overlap each other if necessary.

Send your attemps in an envelope marked "FACE" to the Editor, "Short Stories," Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., to arrive not later than first post on Tuesday, February 5th.

The prizes will be given to the competitors from whom we receive the correct, or most nearly correct, solutions.

The Editor's decision is final, and competitors must only enter on that understanding.



RESULT OF THE "LOST WORD" COMPETITION.

No competitor was fortunate enough to send in a correct attempt in this competition. There were four who sent in lists with fourteen errors, and the first and second prizes have been added together and divided equally among them. The third and fourth prizes were awarded to competitors who had fifteen mistakes:

J. J. Robinson, 60 Sherrard Road, Forest Gate, E.; M. A. Williamson, Verona House, Peterhead; F. J. Carter, 26 Regina Road, Tollington Park, N.; Miss B. Brett, Cleeve, near Cheltenham; T. Nicol, 70 Clova Road, Forest Gate, E.; R. A. N. Smyth, Hillfield, Dorchester Road, Weymouth.

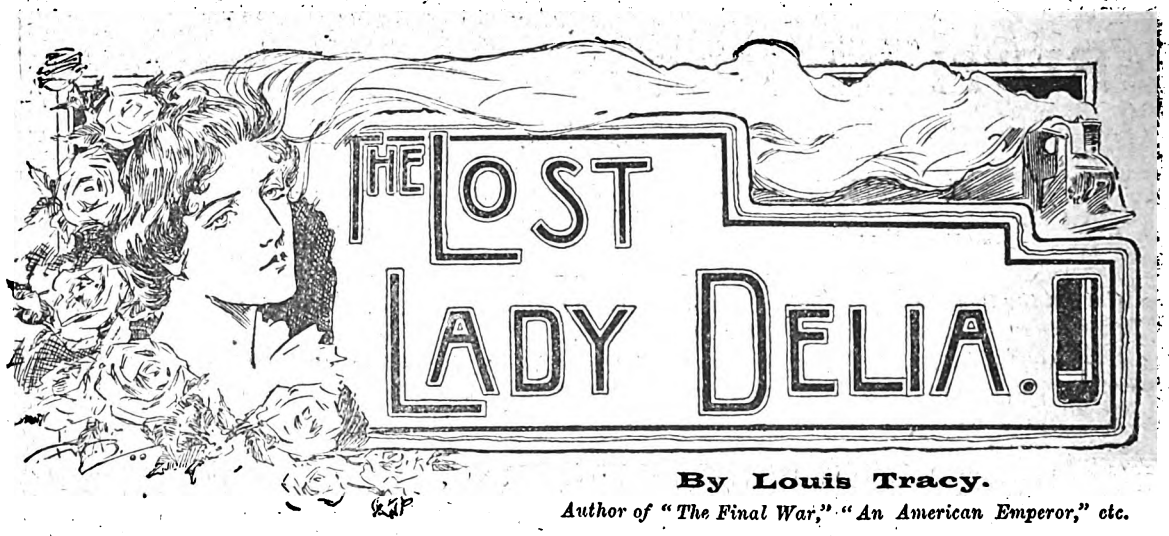
Consolat on gifts have been awarded to the following:

J. W. Rushmore, 86 Foster Hill Road, Bedford; Mrs. F. C. Thomas, 84 St. Helens Road, Swansea; T. C. Williamson, 56 Prince Street, Peterhead; W. Tucker, 15 York Road, Stony Stratford, Bucks; Josh D. Watts, Kildare, Lower Edmonton; G. Loughurst, Ludlow Road, Guildford, Surrey; Miss E. Randall, Bath Road, Swindon; C. H. Poynter, 23 Exmoor Road, Southampton; E. Marshall, Kingston-by-Sea, Brighton; A. W. Adams, 355 Stapleton Road, Bristol.

LIST OF WORDS IN THE "LOST WORD" COMPETITION.

1. Cottage
2. Pond
3. Roses
4. School
5. Children
6. Gate
7. Church
8. School.
9. Sign.
10. Aprons
11. Roses
12. Ivy
13. Dog
14. Spot
15. Two
16. One
17. Roof
18. Shot
19. Shell
20. Doors
21. Walls
22. Leaves
23. Branches
24. Plant
25. Cloud
26. Bark
27. Rose
28. Curtain
29. Window
30. Out-house
31. Chair
32. Steps
33. Arch
34. Flowers
35. Leaves
36. Plants
37. Path
38. Stone
39. Explosion
40. Hands
41. Grass
42. Arms
43. Cottage
44. Prop
45. One
46. Water
47. Sign
48. Saw

Digitized by Google



By Louis Tracy.

Author of "The Final War," "An American Emperor," etc.

READ THIS BEFORE YOU BEGIN.

LADY DELIA LYLE leaves her house one foggy November afternoon, saying she is going to see her sister at Richmond, but from that time she is not heard of.

Her husband, Sir Charles Lyle, puts the matter into the hands of detectives, Inspector Winter taking charge of the case.

Reginald Brett, a barrister friend of the Lyles, also promises to do all he can, and he finds out that Lady Delia, on the night of her disappearance, instead of going to Richmond, alighted at Sloane Square, and went to a block of flats called Raleigh Mansions.

Towards the end of the month the body of a woman, evidently murdered, is found wedged beneath a drain-pipe in the Thames at Putney, and, though Sir Charles does not identify the body, Brett imagines it to be that of Lady Delia. Shortly after this discovery Lady Delia's maid, Jane Harding, disappears. She is afterwards found to have gone on the stage.

Brett now starts investigations at Raleigh Mansions, and he fixes on two residents there as being likely to have been connected with Lady Delia. These are a Mr. Sydney H. Pyne, who is not at present in residence, and a Mrs. Hilmer, whom he finds to be Pyne's sister.

It had transpired that Pyne had gone to Monte Carlo, and thither Brett goes, and he discovers that though letters are addressed to Pyne at the Hotel du Cercle, he is not known there.

During his stay at Monte Carlo Brett becomes acquainted with an Englishman, named Albert Mensmore, whom he helps out of some money difficulties, but he does not discover anything about Pyne.

After his return Brett finds out that Sir Charles Lyle knows Albert Mensmore, but in what connection does not transpire.

A few days later Brett goes into the City, to the office of Dodge and Co., with whom he had had some speculative dealings, and from remarks made by Mr. Dodge, he thinks that Pyne and Mensmore must be one and the same man.

CHAPTER XIII.

A QUESTION OF PRINCIPLE.

"IF anyone calls, I'm out," cried Brett to his factotum, as he crossed the entrance-hall of his well-appointed flat, and flung open the door of his library.

"The guvnor's in a tantrum," observed Smith to his wife, and he settled himself to renew the perusal of Grand National training reports. He had just noticed the interesting fact that last year's winner had "jumped in for the last mile" in a gallop given to a rank outsider, when the electric bell upset his calculations.

"My master is out," he said, as he opened the door to find Mr. Winter standing on the mat.

He was about to close the door again, but the detective planted his foot against the jamb.

"Your master is not out," he answered. "I saw him come in a minute since. Tell him Mr. Winter wants to see him."

Smith's dignity was superb. "My master may be in," he cried, "but he told me to say he was out to callers."

"Tell him what I say at once," and Mr. Winter gave the other his best, "accessory-after-the-crime" glance.

"I don't see why I should," snarled Smith, but the squabble ended when Brett's voice was heard:—

"Show him in, Smith, but admit nobody else."

With an air of armed neutrality Smith ushered the representative of Scotland Yard into the library.

"You're not looking very well, sir," said Winter, his round eyes fixed on Brett with all their power.

"Was it to ask about my health that you came, Winter?"

"No, sir, not exactly. But I haven't seen you for quite a while, and as we are both interested in the same matter I thought I would look you up and compare notes."

Brett was annoyed at the interruption. He wanted to think, not to be bothered by official theories. He looked hard at Mr. Winter, wondering whether he should tell him all he knew and wash his own hands clear of the investigation in future. But there was a second picture before his mental eyes. He saw Phyllis Browne's face, not as it was that day at the Tir aux Pigeons, but with the light of happiness in it, with the joyousness of requited and undisturbed love, with the glow reflected from dancing waves, and the tremulous smile of innocent pleasure.

It was hard to believe that such a woman could place her heartfelt trust in a man who was possibly a cold-blooded murderer. Such a combination was unnatural and horrible. Already Brett was beginning to doubt the evidence of his analytical senses.

Mr. Winter meanwhile flattered himself that the other was trying to read his thoughts by looking at him fixedly.

"I have been away from home," said Brett at last. "I had occasion to go to the South of France."

"I thought so. I was sure of it. How do you manage always to get ahead of us?" Mr. Winter was enthusiastic in his admiring divination.

"You have heard about Sydney H. Pyne?" said the barrister, still keeping that inscrutable, calculating gaze upon the policeman.

"Yes. I am on his track. We may be slow, but we are sure in Scotland Yard. May I ask what luck you have had, sir?"

"In what respect?"

"As if you didn't go to Monte Carlo to find Mr. Pyne yourself! Really, Mr. Brett, the scent is too hot this time. You might as well give a 'View halloa' if you have seen him."

"Seen Sydney H. Pyne, you mean?"

"That's the gentleman."

For an instant Mensmore's future trembled in the balance. Brett almost framed the first words which would have led to his immediate arrest at the next port touched by the White Heather. But the memory of Phyllis Browne, of her agony, of the fearful scandal that must fly through society on the Riviera, restrained him. There was no hurry. He must have time to think.

Digitized by Google

"I certainly went to Monte Carlo to discover the identity of that interesting personage, but I came back, Mr. Winter, as wise as I went. The only trace I found of him was an undelivered letter awaiting him at the Hotel du Cercle."

"A letter! Wasn't he there?" Mr. Winter's face, notwithstanding its official decorum, betrayed its disappointment. This was an unlooked-for check.

"He had been there. Other letters came for him earlier, and he had received them."

"But the hotel people——"

"Did not know him. In fact, there cannot be the slightest doubt that Mr. Pyne concealed his identity at Monte Carlo under another name."

"It doesn't matter much," growled the detective. "We will nab him all the same, if he had fifty names."

"Possibly. But it is wonderful how a man may be under your very nose, and yet you may miss him."

During the next few minutes neither man spoke. Brett smiled cynically at the thought that he was actually shielding Lady Delia's probable slayer from the minions of the law. He marvelled at himself for his irresolution. Nevertheless, he would wait. Mensmore could not escape him now. Perhaps the business might be managed without the dramatic features that would accompany an arrest forthwith. And there were some things that yet required explanation. If his Monte Carlo acquaintance really killed Lady Delia, then he was the strangest criminal that Brett had ever encountered during the course of his varied career.

The policeman misinterpreted his expression.

"You can't laugh at us this time, Mr. Brett," he cried. "Scotland Yard and yourself evolved the same theory, eh, and we can't fly off to the south of France as readily as you."

"Your skill is profound, no doubt. Indeed, I wonder at it, considering the mysterious way in which the missing man left his address at a post office."

The other reddened. "That was simple enough, I know; but we got on his track before that."

"By watching me when I visited his sister."

"You saw me outside the Jollity Theatre, then?"

"Of course. What did you expect?"

Mr. Winter recovered his placidity. "There's no use quarrelling about it, Mr. Brett," he laughed. "I did get that wrinkle from you. But how on earth were we to know what to do, when there were seventy-one flats occupied by respectable people, and one closed for months, the caretaker told us."

"I hope you have ceased your surveillance so far as I am concerned."

"Honour bright, sir. I won't do it again. Besides, we must lay hands on Pyne sooner or later."

"What steps are you taking?"

"The Monte Carlo police are making inquiries. They have his description. It has also gone to America."

"Why America?"

"Because he spent some time there. He only returned from the States early last year. His sister had not seen him for years, and a rare old row they had when he turned up. He had not much money, so she helped him, and he settled down for a time in the same mansions as herself."

"Who told you all this?"

"Mrs. Hilmer, and a precious lot of trouble she gave me. She is a clever woman, that."

"It was rather too bad to pester her about it, poor lady."

"I only followed your lead, sir."

This was so true that Brett changed the conversation.

"What sort of a man is Pyne? Have you his description?"

"Yes. Here it is." Mr. Winter produced a copy of the POLICE GAZETTE, a publication never seen by the public, but of large circulation among the police of the United Kingdom. The details were fairly accurate as to Mensmore's personal appearance, but there was no photograph. Oddly enough, Brett was relieved to note this serious deficiency.

"You did not get his picture?"

"No. Mrs. Hilmer declared that she had not a single photograph of her brother in her possession."

"Did she—tell you his real name?" the barrister had almost said, but he deflected the question. "Did she give you any hint as to a possible cause for this apparently unnecessary crime?"

"Not a word."

"Then you did not mention Lady Delia to her?"

"No. Sir Charles has always implored me to keep his wife's name out of my inquiries until it became absolutely impossible to conceal it in view of a public prosecution. He wants to know definitely when that time comes."

"Why?"

The detective did not reply for a moment. When he spoke he leant forward and subdued his voice. "I am as Smith ushered the representative of Scotland Yard into the library.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Winter produced a copy of the "Police Gazette."

sure as I am sitting here, sir, that Sir Charles will not live if any disgrace should come to be attached to his wife's memory."

"Do you mean that he will kill himself?"

"I do. He has changed a great deal since this affair happened. He is not the same man. He appears to be always mooning about her. And people say that they were not so devoted to one another when she was alive."

Again did the barrister switch off their talk from an unpleasant topic.

"This description of Pyne is not much use," he said. "It applies to every athletic young Englishman of good physique and gentlemanly appearance."

"Quite true. I don't depend on that for his arrest, but it will be valuable for identification. 'Blue eyes, light brown hair, fresh clear complexion, well-modelled nose and chin.' Some of these things can be changed by tricks, but not all. For instance, there would be no use in smoking a man with black eyes and irregular features.

"'Smoking' him?"

"Oh, that's our way of putting it. Following him, it means."

"Suppose the French police don't succeed in catching him?"

"We will get him at Raleigh Mansions. He is sure to think that Lady Delia's fate has never been determined, and he will return when the inquiry has blown over, to all appearance."

"You have quite made up your mind, then, that Sydney H. Pyne is the murderer?"

"It looks uncommonly like it. At any rate, he knows something about it. If not, why did he bolt to France two days after the crime? Why has he concealed his identity? Why does he take pains to get at his correspondence in the manner he has adopted? And, by Jove! suppose he isn't in Monte Carlo at all, but in London all the time!"

Mr. Winter glowed with his sudden inspiration, but Brett drily kept him to the lower level of realities.

"Pyne is, or was, in Monte Carlo. Of that you may be sure. He, and none other, got the letters sent to the Hotel du Cercle. I cannot for the life of me imagine why he did not take the last one. But let us look at what we know. Lady Delia, we will say, went to Pyne's chambers, secretly and of her own accord. That may be taken as fairly established. Hence there is a blank in our intelligence until she appears as a hardly recognisable corpse, stuffed by hands beneath an old drainpipe in the Thames at Putney. How do you fill up that gap, Mr. Winter?"

"Simply enough. Pyne, or some other person, persuaded her to voluntarily accompany him to Putney. She was killed there, and not in London. It would be almost a matter of impossibility for any man to have conveyed her lifeless body from Raleigh Mansions to Putney without attracting some notice. One man could not do it. Several might, but it is madness to imagine that a number of of people would join together for the purpose of killing this poor lady."

"The seemingly impossible is often accomplished."

"Do you really believe, then, that she met her death in London?"

"I have quite an open mind on the question."

"You forget that she had clearly resolved early that day to visit her sister at Richmond, and Putney is in the direct road. What more reasonable than to assume——"

"Beware of assumptions! You are assuming all this time that Pyne was a principal in her murder."

"Very well, Mr. Brett. Then I ask you straight out if you don't agree with me?"

"I do not."

This declaration astounded the barrister himself. Often the mere utterance of one's own thoughts is a surprise. Speech seems to stiffen the wavering outlines of reflection, and the new creation may differ essentially from its embryo. It was so with Brett in this instance.

Ever since Mr. Winter's arrival had aroused him from the positive stupor caused by Mr. Dodge's unwitting revelation, Reginald Brett had been slowly but definitely deciding that Mensmore did not kill Lady Delia. He had seen him, unprepared, facing death as preferable to dishonour. At such moments a man's soul is laid bare. With the shadow of a great crime upon it Mensmore's actions could not have been so genuine and straightforward as they undoubtedly were.

Digitized by Google

Mensmore, of course, might in some way be bound up with the mystery surrounding Lady Delia's movements. His very utterances in Brett's room at the Hotel du Cercle implied as much. That was another matter. It would receive his (Brett's) most earnest attention. But the major hypothesis, so quickly jumped at by the police, needed much more substantiation than it had yet obtained.

That it was plausible was demonstrated by the barrister's readiness to adopt it at the outset. Even now that his impulse to fasten the crime on Mensmore weakened he wondered at his eagerness to defend him.

Mr. Winter was even more surprised.

"I don't see how you can take that view," he cried. "Pyne's behaviour is, to say the least, unaccountable. If he is an innocent man then he must be a foolish one. Besides, why should he necessarily be innocent? This is the first gleam of light we have had in a very dark business, and I mean to follow it up."

The vindictive emphasis of his tone showed that the detective was annoyed at Brett's impassive attitude. He even went so far as to dimly evolve a theory that the barrister wished to throw him off Pyne's trail on account of his sympathy for Mrs. Hillmer, but Reggie rapidly dispelled this notion.

"You are here, I suppose, to ask my advice in pursuance of our understanding that we are working together in the matter, as it were?" he said.

"Well, something of the kind, sir."

"Then I recommend that we see the inside of that closed flat in Raleigh Mansions at the earliest moment."

"Do you mean by a search warrant?"

"Certainly not. Do you want the whole neighbourhood to know of it? You have probably heard of locks being picked before to-day. You and I, and none other, must have a quiet look round the place without anyone being the wiser."

Mr. Winter hesitated, but the prospect was attractive. "I think I can manage it," he said, smiling reflectively. "Will six this evening suit?"

"Admirably."

"Then I will call for you."

After a parting glare at Smith, who returned it, nose in air, Mr. Winter ran down the stairs, murmuring, "Blest if I can understand Mr. Brett. But this is a good move. We might learn something."

CHAPTER XIV.

No. 12, Raleigh Mansions.

When the door of Pyne's or Mensmore's flat swung open before the skilful application of a skeleton key, a gust of cold air swept from out of the interior blackness, and whirled an accumulation of dust down the stairs.

It is curious how a disused house seems to bottle up, as it were, an atmospheric accumulation which always seeks to escape at the first available moment. Emptiness is more than a mere word; it has life and the power of growth. A residence closed for a week is less depressing than if it has not been inhabited for a month. If the period of neglect be lengthened into a year, the sense of dreariness is magnified immeasurably.

In this instance the mysterious abode might have been the ghostly abiding place of disembodied spirits, so cold were its aspects, so uninviting the dim vista that sprung into uncertain vision before the flickering rays of a wax vesta struck by the detective.

But neither the policeman nor his companion was a nervous subject.

They entered at once, closed the door by its latch, and, aided by other matches, found the switch of the electric light.

In this bright radiance the indefinable vanished. The flat became a cosy, fairly well-appointed bachelor's "diggings," neglected and untidy, yet not without a semblance of comfort which only needed the presence of a sturdy housemaid and a fire to be converted into the ordinary chambers with which the locality abounds.

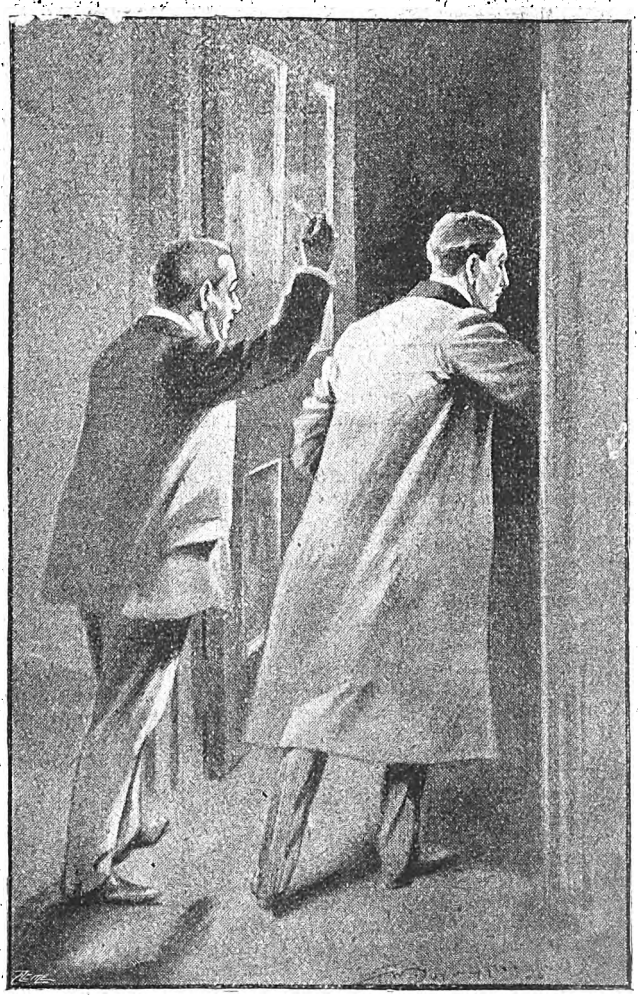
Their first care was to draw down all the blinds, the neglect of which housewifely proceeding argued the careless departure of a mere male when the place was vacated.

A rapid preliminary survey followed, and drew from Brett the remark:—

"Furnished by a woman, but occupied by a man."

Mr. Winter agreed, but he did not know why, so he put a tentative question on the point.

"Don't you see," said Brett, "that the carpets and furniture match, that the beds have vallances, that the spare bedroom for a guest is even more elaborate than that used by the tenant, that care has been taken in fitting up the kitchen, and taste displayed in the selection of pieces of



So uninviting was the dim vista that sprung into uncertain vision before the flickering rays of a wax vesta.

Digitized by Google

"Here's a find!" shouted the detective.

bric-à-brac. Only a woman attends to these things. On the other hand, a card tray has been used as a receptacle for cigar ash, the pictures—no woman ever buys a picture—have been picked up promiscuously from shops where they sell sporting prints, and the sides of the mantelpieces are chipped by having feet propped against them. There are plenty of other signs, but these suffice."

Thenceforth the two men devoted themselves to their task, each after his kind.

The representative of Scotland Yard hunted for documents, photographs, torn envelopes; he looked in the covers of books to see if they were inscribed; he opened every drawer; ransacked every corner, peered into the interior of jars, pots, and ovens; appraised the value of the furniture, noted its age, and was specially zealous in studying the appearance of the only bedroom which had been occupied so far as he could judge.

Brett, having given a casual glance round, entered the sitting-room, selected the most comfortable chair, and proceeded to envelop himself in clouds of smoke.

He had not spent two minutes in Mensmore's flat before he made a striking discovery.

The dwelling consisted of a central passage, dividing two equal portions from each other. That on the right contained a drawing-room and a large bedroom, with dressing-room attached. On the left were another bedroom, a dining-room, a kitchen, and store-room. At the end of the passage, which terminated in the transverse corridor, were the bath-room, a pantry, and a small room, empty now, but apparently designed for a servant's bedroom.

The furniture, as has been stated, was good in quality and sufficient for its purposes. But the fact which immediately impressed Brett was that the arrangement of the sitting-room differed essentially from the other details of the flat.

The same care had not been taken in the disposition of the articles. They had been dumped down anyhow, without taste or regard for suitable position. The carpet had not been bought for this special apartment like the carpets elsewhere. A handsome ebony cabinet stood in the wrong place. The blue china ornaments obviously intended to fill its shelves were littered about the mantelpiece or on small tables, whilst the Satsuma ware meant for the overmantel was stiffly disposed on the cabinet.

Small matters these, but Brett thought them more fruitful of accurate theory than the detective's hunt for a written history of the crime!

So as he smoked, he mused, and examined.

"The drawing-room was left to the last before being furnished," he thought. "The usual course. It was left for some time probably. The rest of the flat was arranged by a woman—Mrs. Hilmer in all likelihood—before the arrival of her brother. Then he came and tackled the vacant room. The history of the place is as plain to me as though I were present. More than that, a woman—Mrs. Hilmer again, let us say—fixed upon these latter purchases, but without measurements. She did not personally see to their adaptability, and she certainly did not supervise their final arrangement. Now, why was that? Again, these things are more worn than those in the other rooms. Were they bought second-hand? If so, why? A woman thinks most of her drawing-room. It is the last place in which she would economise."

Mr. Winter entered, anxious and puzzled.

"Found anything?" said Brett, without looking at him.

"Not a rag, not a piece of old newspaper with a date on it. A lot of papers were burnt in the kitchen grate, but from the remnants I judge that they were mostly bills."

"The place has been systematically cleared, eh?"

"It looks like it."

"Going to hunt here?"

"Yes. You don't seem to take much interest in the premises, Mr. Brett, though you persuaded me to do a bit of housebreaking in order to get here."

"I find the quietude good for thought, Mr. Winter. Be good enough not to make more noise than is absolutely necessary."

The other sniffed. He was disappointed. He hoped for something tangible from this visit, and the outlook was far from promising.

"This room appears to have been lived in a good deal," he growled.

"That is one way of looking at it."

"Is there any other way?" His voice snapped out the question as if he held the barrister personally responsible for his failure to gain a clue.

"No, Mr. Winter, I should have guessed your point of view exactly."

"My point of view, indeed! Do you want me to draw up another chair and light a pipe? Should we be enlightened by tobacco smoke?"

"I cannot trust your tobacco. Try a cigar."

The detective angrily thumped a Chesterfield lounge to see if it betrayed aught suspicious.

At that instant Reggie's glance rested on the fireplace. The grate contained the ashes of a fire, a fire not long lighted. This, combined with the undrawn blinds, argued a departure early in the morning.

"He went to Monte Carlo by the day Channel service," mused Brett. "He may have left a few hours after Lady Delia's death, as Mrs. Hilmer was not certain as to the exact date."

Somehow the few cinders attracted him. They had, perchance, witnessed a tragedy.

Digitized by Google

Suddenly he stopped smoking. He was so startled by something he had seen that Mr. Winter must have noticed his agitation were not the detective at that instant intently screwing his eyes to peer behind the back of the elaborate cabinet.

On the hearth was a handsome Venetian fender. Into each end was loosely socketed a beautifully-moulded piece of ironwork to hold the fire-irons. That on the left was whole, but from that on the right a small spike had been broken off.

By comparison with its fellow the missing portion was identical with the bit of iron found imbedded in Lady Delia's skull. Of this damning fact Brett had no manner of doubt, though the incriminatory article itself was then locked in a drawer in his own residence.

He did not move. He sat as one transfixed.

What a weapon for such a deed. Was ever more outlandish instrument used with murderous intent? The entire bracket could easily be detached from the fender, and would, no doubt, inflict a terrible blow. But why seize this clumsy device when it actually supported a heavy brass poker?

The thing savoured of madness, of the wild vagary of a homicidal maniac. It was incomprehensible, strange beyond belief.

Yet as Brett pictured up the final scene in that tragedy, as he saw his ill-fated friend stagger helplessly to the ground before a treacherous and crushing stroke, a fierce light leapt into his face and his lips set tight with unflinching purpose.

Had Mensmore been within reach that moment he would assuredly have been lodged in a felon's cell forthwith. No excuse, no palliation could be accepted. The man who could so foully slay a gentle, kindly, high-minded lady deserved the utmost rigour of the law, no matter what the circumstances that led to the commission of the deed.

It was not often that Brett allowed impulse to so master reason.

In queer altruistic mood he asked himself why he did not spring from his chair, and, tearing the bracket from its supports, exhibit it to his fellow-worker, whilst he gave, in a few passionate sentences, the information that would set the French police to scour the Mediterranean littoral until they found the White Heather. Of what matter to him was the suffering of a sister or sweetheart? Did the man who killed Lady Delia reck of these things? Yes, he would do it——"

But a cry of triumph from Mr. Winter arrested the fateful words even as they trembled on his lips.

"Here's a find!" shouted the detective. "Thinking is all very well, Mr. Brett, but hard work is better. What do you make of that?"

"That" was a letter, which in the manner known to many a puzzled householder, had slipped down behind a drawer in the cabinet, to be crushed against the wardrobe at the back, and lie there forgotten and unnoticed.

Even in his perturbed state the barrister could not help glancing at the crumpled document, first noting the date, October 15th of the year just closed, with the superscription, "Mountain Butts, Wyoming." There was no envelope.

It was addressed to "Dear Bertie," and ran as follows:

"Your welcome note and its draft for fifty dollars came to hand last week. My sisters and I can never forget your generosity. We know you are hard up, and that you can ill spare these frequent gifts, or loans, as you are pleased to call them. You and I have been in many a tight place, old chap, and I never knew you to fail either with hand or heart. And when we landed into this ranch, on my advice, and nearly starved to death, it was you who were bold enough to cut yourself adrift so that you might make something to keep the pot boiling.

"But the tide is turning. You know my failing; this time I will try not to be too sanguine. There have been big gold discoveries in this country. It is now firmly believed that all our land is auriferous, and the scoundrel who sold us this beggarly ranch has tried to upset our title. Thanks to your foresight, he was knocked out at the first round. So I may soon have big news for you. By Jove, won't it be a change if we both become rich? And won't the girls have a time in Paris? However, I must not say too much this time. I have been taught caution by repeated failures. Write by return, and say if this reaches you all right.—Your faithful friend, SYDNEY H. PYNE."

"What do you think of that?" cried the detective, when Brett had slowly mastered the contents of the letter.

"Think! I am too dazed to think."

"We can now learn all about him from America."

"About whom?"

"About Pyne, of course."

"Then did Pyne come by the same mail as this letter in order to murder Lady Delia? It is dated October 15th, and she was killed on November 6th. It takes twelve days,

Brett sprang forward, fell on his knees, and intently examined the iron rest.

Digitized by Google

at the quickest, for a letter to come here from Wyoming. And Pyne, the writer of it, not the receiver, must have travelled in the same steamer or its immediate successor."

Mr. Winter's face fell, but he stuck to his point: "Anyhow, Pyne was here about that time. I have seen the secretary to the company that owns these flats. Pyne took the room for six months from September 1st. When asked for references he gave his sister's name, and as she banks with the National—and she has always paid her rent for five years—it was good enough. Still, I must confess that Pyne could hardly be in Wyoming in October if he lived here in September and in November."

The barrister answered between his set teeth: "Yes, it is rather puzzling."

"Perhaps the letter was left there as a plant."

"An elaborate one. It must have been conceived a month before the murder."

"But suppose it never came from Wyoming. We have no proof that it was written in America."

"We have proof of nothing at present."

"Well, Mr. Brett, have you a theory? This is the place where you ought to shine, you know."

"I have no theory. I must think for hours, for days, before I see my way clear."

"Clear to what, sir?"

"To telling you how, when, and where to arrest the murderer of Lady Delia."

"So this 'find' of mine is of great importance?"

"Undoubtedly. I remember its contents sufficiently, but you will let me see it again if necessary?"

"With pleasure, sir. And that reminds me. You never returned that small bit of iron to me. You recollect I lent it to you some time since."

"Perfectly. Come with me. I will model it in wax and give it to you."

"All right, sir; but as we are here I may as well continue my search. I may drop on something else of value."

Brett resumed his seat, and did not stir until the detective had completely rummaged the cabinet. The reading of that queer epistle from Pyne to Bertie—from the real Simon Pure to the sham one—from one man to his double—had stopped him at the very threshold of disclosure.

The document impressed him as being genuine. If so, who on earth was Pyne, and why had Mensmore taken his name, if that was the solution of the tangle?

Whatever the explanation, he would not jump to a conclusion. The web had closed too securely round Mensmore to allow of escape. Hence, Brett could bide his time. Another week might solve many elements in the case now indistinct and nebulous. He would wait.

Winter finally satisfied himself there was nothing else in the cabinet. He approached the fireplace, peered into every vase on the overmantel, picked with his penknife at the back of the frame to feel for other letters, and in doing so several times kicked the fender.

The barrister vaguely wondered whether the man of method would note the missing portion of the iron "dog."

"Surely," he thought, "he will see it now," as Mr. Winter bent to examine the ashes, and actually took the poker from off the very support itself in order to rake among the cinders.

The other even scrutinised the fire-irons, but the too obvious fact that, so to speak, stared him in the face, escaped notice. He was quite wrapped up in his theory that Lady Delia had been killed at Putney, and not in Sloane Square.

At last he quitted the room, and walked off to the small apartments at the end of the main corridor.

Instantly Brett sprang forward, fell on his knees, and intently examined the iron rest with a strong lens. It bore no visible signs at the locality of the break. Taking some wax from his pocket, Reggie took a slight impression of the fracture.

When Mr. Winter returned he found the barrister sitting in his chair, still smoking, and with set face and fixed eyes.

Soon afterwards they left the flat, carefully leaving all things as they found them. They said little on their way to Victoria Street, for Brett was trying to explain Mensmore's attitude at Monte Carlo, and the detective was considering the best use to which he could put that all-important letter.

Besides, Mr. Winter attributed his companion's silence to annoyance. Had not he, Winter, laid hands on the only direct piece of evidence yet discovered as to Pyne's identity, and this in defiance of Brett's spoken philosophy? He could afford to be generous and not to worry his amateur colleague with questions.

Thus they reached the barrister's chambers. Brett asked the other to sit down for a moment whilst he obtained a model of the small lump of iron. He took it into his bedroom, fitted it into the wax impression obtained at Raleigh Mansions, and noted that the two coincided perfectly.

Then he crushed the wax into shapelessness again.

He handed the bit of iron to Winter without comment.

The latter said: "It had better remain in my keeping now, sir, but if you want to see it again, of course I will be very glad——"

"I shall never want it again," said Brett, and his voice was harsh and cold, for he had seldom experienced such a strain as the last hour had given him. "It is an accursed thing. It has caused one death already, and may cause others."

"I sincerely hope it will cause a man to be hanged," cried the detective, "for this affair is the warmest I have ever tackled. However, I'll get him as sure as his name's Pyne, if he has forty aliases and as many addresses."

Smith let Mr. Winter out. The latter, halting for a moment at the door, said quietly, "Is your name Pyne?"

"No, it ain't, any more than yours is Summer. See?"

Each man thought he had had his joke, so they were better friends thenceforth, but Mr. Winter was thoughtful as he passed into the street.

"This is a funny business," he communed. "There isn't enough evidence against Pyne to hang a cat, yet I think he's the man. And Brett's a queer chap. Was he cut up about me finding the letter, or has he got some notion in his head. He's as close as an oyster. I wonder if he did dine at Hampstead on the evening of the murder, as he said at the inquest? I must inquire into it."

(To be continued.)

PEARSON'S 2d.
Handbook Series.

No. 2 JUST OUT.

ISOBEL'S UNDERCLOTHING, Crammed with Useful Designs.

Some of the Contents:

Sleeping Suits for Men, Women, and Children.
Special Designs for Flannel and Flannelette.
The Newest Divided Skirts, etc., etc.

OVER 120 ILLUSTRATIONS.

No. 1, ISOBEL'S NEEDLEWORK, is still on sale. 2d. everywhere.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT PEOPLE.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "Guilty Gold," by Headon Hill, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. J. Cunningham, 23 Havelock Street, Lower Broughton, Manchester. Attempts this week may deal with Stories about ANY SUBJECT, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, January 28th. Post-cards only, please.

Consolation.

LATE one evening, as a messenger from a local paper was going home, he heard a person who was struggling in a river close by calling for help.

He shouted:

"Hello there! Are you drowning?"

"I am. Save me, I'm lost," frantically exclaimed the drowning man.

"What a pity," said the messenger consolingly, "you are too late for the last edition to-night, but cheer up, you'll have a whole column to yourself to-morrow morning."

J. C.

Wanted a Cave For Two.

WHEN news came the other day of the French plan to invade England, an Irish militiaman stationed at Halifax was heard to remark that if ever an enemy landed in this country he would certainly bolt, taking a good stock of provisions, and hide away in a cave he knew of.

When the colonel heard of it he called the man out of the ranks on parade, and lectured him severely on his cowardice.

"You're a disgrace to the regiment!" he said. "Fancy a man of the 26th West Riding threatening to run away! But I'd be after you in quick time, my man, never fear."

"Sure, an' you'd be welcome, colonel. But don't forget to bring yer own praties an' things, sor."

J. R. T.

"There's a Language that's Mute."

A GENTLEMAN one Sunday morning was led to watch a young country girl on the high road from the village to the church by observing that she looked hither and thither, this way and that, upon the road, as if she had lost something.

The bells were ceasing to ring, and there was no one visible on the road, except the girl and the gentleman, who recognised in her the errand-maid of a neighbouring farmer.

"What are you looking for, my girl?" asked he as the damsel continued to examine the road.

She answered gravely:

"Sir, I'm looking to see if my master be gone to church."

Now, her master had a wooden leg.

J. I.

He Wasn't Even Murmuring.

A BOER general on his way to camp, hearing groans, proceeded to the spot whence they came, and found a Boer soldier nursing a wounded arm, groaning loudly every now and then.

"For shame!" said the general, "making all that fuss about a scratched arm? Why, there's a man over yonder with his head off and he's not murmuring!"

W. P.

Why He Wanted to Leave.

THE man who did odd jobs in a certain school gave up his place the other day.

When asked what was his reason, he said:

"I'm honest, and I won't stand being suspected. If I find a handkerchief or pencil about the school when I'm sweeping, I give it up.

"Every now and again, however, the teacher, or someone who is too cowardly to face me, will put a slur upon me. Why, a little while ago I saw wrote on the blackboard, 'Find the least common multiple.' Well, I looked from cellar to garret for that multiple, and I wouldn't know the thing if I met it.

"Last night, in big writing on the board, it said, 'Find the greatest common measure.' 'Well,' I said, 'both o' them things are lost now, an' I'll be accused of stealing 'em,' so I chucked the job."

E. C.

Mistook the Verdict.

FOR a grave breach of the football laws, a crack player was brought before the authorities, and put on trial in a room overlooking a busy street. So great indeed was the clatter of the traffic, that many remarks made by those judging his case were quite inaudible to the footballer.

"We have now considered both yours and the referee's version of the affair, my man," mumbled the chairman at last, "and have no hesitation in suspending you till the end of the season. It is entirely your own fault that we have been obliged to cut your wings close for the winter. You can go."

Outside, a friend sympathised with the footballer.

"What's the trouble?" asked the player. "I'm not suspended."

"Yes, you are—till the end of the season. Didn't you hear the chairman say they'd cut your wings close for the winter?"

"No," stammered the player, aghast. "I thought he said, 'oblige me by closing the window, and then you can go!'"

R. A. H. G.

Digitized by Google

Not from Arcadia.

DURING the visit of a travelling pantomime company to Dumfries a very ludicrous contretemps occurred, which, nevertheless, "brought down the house."

Owing to the illness of one of the juvenile members of the company, a local substitute had to be obtained for the purpose of figuring in one of the sylvan scenes.

On being accosted in stage parlance by the hero of the piece with "Sweet child, when camest thou from Arcadia? Tell me! Tell me, prithee!" the youngster cried out shrilly:

"Please, sir, Ah'm no frae 'Cadia'; Ah'm frae Dalbeattie, and Ah've been promised tuppence an' an orange to sit quiet an' haud my tongue."

J. C.

New-fashioned Beef Tea.

I WAS stricken down with fever while serving in Bermuda, and after a critical week or ten days, luckily turned the corner and made slow but steady progress on the road towards recovery.

The doctor ordered me beef tea, made fresh daily, and in obedience to his command the negro cook brought me the nourishing liquid every morning.

One day he brought it in while the doctor was in the room and handed me the cup. I was hungry, and swallowed a mouthful eagerly, but the taste disgusted me, and I spluttered and choked.

The doctor's sharp eye detected something wrong, and he said:

"Hello, sergeant, what's the matter?"

I pointed to the liquid in the cup in eloquent silence.

He took it, smelt it, tasted it, and cried indignantly to the cook:

"What in the name of conscience is this, Sambo? This is not beef tea."

"Oh, yes, sah, dat beef tea, sah," replied the cook. "I not have time fetch de beef from store dis mawnin', so make um sergeant's beef tea out of cow's head!"

W. A.

The Bag Had a Hole In It.

MR. BOWSER, in the midst of a heated argument the other evening, fell over the cat and hurt his nose.

"That's enough!" he shouted. "I'll kill the brute—I've long threatened to," and catching the unfortunate feline as it was about to dive into the coal cellar, he managed, at the expense of a badly scratched hand, to ram it into an old Gladstone-bag, along with a couple of bricks, and he set off then and there in the direction of the canal.

Arriving at the dark towing-path, he felt his way to the edge of the water, then, with a mighty swing, he launched his burden into the middle of the stream. Such power did he put into his arm that he overbalanced himself and fell in himself with a mighty splash, and narrowly escaped a watery grave.

Some hour or so later, Mr. Bowser arrived home dripping wet, cold, and cross, but triumphant, to find the cat waiting on the mat for him.

"Oh, jumping Jerusalem!" he yelled, "why I've drowned the brute."

"I don't think so, my dear," replied Mrs. Bowser sweetly, "if you recollect that old Gladstone-bag had a large hole in it, and——" but Bowser had vanished upstairs.

H. E. L.

THIRD LARGE EDITION.

'BESIEGED WITH B.-P.'

A Complete Record of the Siege of Mafeking.

POST FREE 1s. 3d.

By J. Emerson Neilly.

War - - Correspondent of the - Pall Mall - Gazette - in Mafeking.

"Mr. Neilly tells admirably the thrilling story of the siege."—Scotsman.

"A worthy record of one of the most splendid incidents of our history."—Pall Mall Gazette.

At all Railway Bookstalls and Booksellers.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON Limited, Henrietta Street, W.C.

A £10 Note for a Single Word.

THE word we want from you is simply the title of a new paper we shall publish in the early spring.

It is necessary, of course, in order that you may choose the best title, for you to know something about the proposed paper.

In the first place, it will be a

FIRST-CLASS HUMOROUS PAPER.

It will be filled each week with the work of the very best humorous artists in the United Kingdom, and will, in consequence, be a week's compendium of hearty, wholesome and unrestrained laughter.

Write down the title you select on a post-card, and address it to "Title," C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Have as many attempts as you like, but send only one title on one card.

PHOTOGRAPHS ENLARGED.

FOR 7s. we will enlarge any photograph, large or small, tintypes, or any kind of glass picture, provided the print is legible, to a beautiful India ink and crayon portrait, 15in. x 12in., mounted on a plate-sunk mount 24in. x 14in. Pictures of soldiers and sailors at the front will be enlarged for 6s.

All enlargements are of head and shoulders only.

What to do.

Write your name and address plainly in ink on a slip of paper, also on the back of the portrait you are sending us. Get a postal order for 7s. (if the photograph be that of a soldier or sailor get a 6s. postal order). Place all of these in an envelope, or make a securely packed parcel of them and address it to the PORTRAIT EDITOR, Pearson's Weekly, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A Reduction of Threepence

on each enlargement, when the order is for two or more from the same photograph, will be made.

Orders will be treated in rotation.

Although all possible care will be taken, we do not hold ourselves responsible for photographs damaged or lost in transit.

Digitized by Google

Man-Afraid-of-the Sun's Bear.

SEVERAL years ago, when No Man s Land was overrun with roving bands of Indians and cattlemen, who fought each other with equal vigour and cheerfulness, I was sent to locate a ranch site in Texas near the north boundary of the Pan-handle, for a Mexican cattle company.

At Santa Fé I looked up an old ex-boss of my father's ranch, a Mexican and Indian half-breed, who, if he could be induced to keep from loving to an exaggerated extent his potent enemy, mescal, was the best all-round cow-hand I ever saw; probably an inheritance from his father, who had been an old time California cattle-driver.

In a wretched little saloon in the Mexican quarter I found José sitting at a bullet-scarred table and fondly caressing a glass of his old enemy. His eyes were a bit watery, and as I entered he was saying to the bar-keeper:

"Yes, Miguel, they staked my poor padre alive over a red ants' nest, and who knows what tortures he endured?" —with an expressive shrug and shiver—"We found his bones years after, and I swore everlasting vengeance on every Apache."

José always told his story when the mescal was getting in its fine work; later he would be looking for six-shooter victims.

"Oh yes, Beltran," he cried, catching sight of me. "Hail friend, how glad I am to see thee; thou art no longer a coward and afraid of big José, eh? How is thy father, thy lady mother, and everything at Las Cruces?"

After answering the many questions, I managed to get José outside the saloon and explain my errand, asking him to let mescal alone and be my guide to Texas.

"Si! si!" of course he would for the sake of his dear old patron, Don Luis, and his son as well. Besides his mother was of the Arapahoe tribe; we could go to No Man's Land or the reservation and see her, too.

In the course of two or three days José and I bought a couple of stout ponies, and as we had our own saddle accoutrements, some bacon, flour, coffee, sugar and meat, coffee-pot and skillet were the only things needed.

So one bright clear morning in September, we saddled our ponies, tied on our blankets and provisions, and rode out from the famous old town, taking the direction of the historical Santa Fé trail, which we were to follow as far as Round Mound, then striking eastward to the Pan-Handle.

The weather was perfect and the horses in fine condition. In the course of several uneventful days we rode up to the circle L. S. ranch and put up for the night.

Making the ranch our general headquarters, we took trips into the surrounding country and in a couple of weeks managed to find about what was wanted—good pasturage, water, timber and a fine location for the home ranch and main corra's. After writing up my report I was ready to accede to José's desire of visiting his Indian relations.

From one of the circle L. S. punchers we learnt that a band of Arapahoes was encamped near Beaver Creek, and accordingly we set our faces in that direction. Early one morning three days later we rode over a ridge and there before us, in a little hollow, nestled the Indian village. From the smoke holes in the tepees thin columns of smoke lazily curled heavenwards and, here and there, travois ponies came in loaded down with fire-wood.

Only a few Indians were moving about, and a few saddled ponies stood before the owners' tepees. The village seemed unusually quiet, but when we were finally spied by a couple of wolfish-looking dogs, they raised such a row that in a moment we were surrounded by innumerable dogs, whooping children and questioning squaws.

On asking for his mother José learnt that she had died the spring previous and that she had intrusted to Grey Wolf a gold and silver bracelet for him. It was one that his father had given her for a wedding present, and originally came from Spain.

Pressing our ponies through the crowd we came to Grey Wolf's tepee, dismounted and crawled within.

Grey Wolf's squaw was pounding some dried meat, but when we entered she brought us water from a stone jar without, and José and I washed our faces and hands of the dust that had accumulated during our journey. Meanwhile our saddles were brought in and the ponies led to graze.

After our ablutions the squaw brought out a plug of tobacco, a cutting board, and a stone pipe, which, according to Indian etiquette, we smoked alternately.

It seemed strange to see the squaw doing the honours of host, but we finally learnt that most of the men and young bucks had gone on a hunting and horse-stealing expedition and would not return for a week or more.

Digitized by Google

The squaw cooked some meat, which, with our provisions, made a very acceptable meal.

During our after-dinner smoke José informed me that he would have to put in his time during our stay in mourning for his mother, and forthwith went to his uncle Eagle Feather's tepee and seemed quite inconsolable.

In order to pass time, I struck up the acquaintance of some boys and spent the afternoon watching them run races, shoot their bows and arrows, and swim in a creek near by.

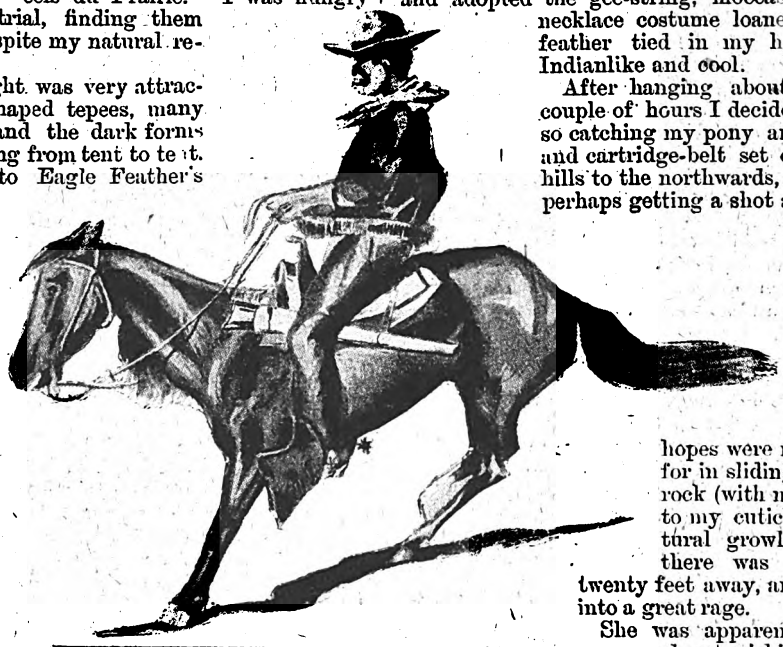
For supper we had fried rattle-snake on our menu, or, as José called them, "eels du Prairie." I was hungry and gave them a trial, finding them really very good despite my natural repugnance.

The village at night was very attractive, with its cone-shaped tepees, many bright little fires and the dark forms of the Indians gliding from tent to tent.

I strolled over to Eagle Feather's tepee and found José droning a plaintive little mourning song. Eagle Feather greeted me hospitably, and finally when I got to the subject of bear he told me through José, that he had killed a cub of the medicine bear a week previous.

"Ask him what he means by medicine bear?" I said to José.

The old man loaded his long red stone pipe, lighted it with a glowing coal that his squaw handed to him in her bare hand, took a puff or two, and began.



We slid down into the dry creek bed.

Finally after ten minutes of guttural mumblings he stopped, and José interpreted.

"He says that many years ago an Arapahoe brave took refuge from a band of pursuing Comanches in a bear's cave. The she-bear was there, but made no effort to molest him, and he, in his thanks to the Great Spirit, asked that the bear might be saved from the hunter's bullet, and in answer to his prayer, the Great Spirit painted a white turtle on the bear's throat."

Eagle Feather passed the pipe to me and took up the story again, to which I listened attentively, but could not make out a word.

He stoped at last and José translated again.

"He says that a couple of miles from camp in a rock cave there lives a big she-bear with a white spot on its throat, and as a turtle is the totem of this clan the beast is called the medicine bear and is sacred. The Indians kill her cubs but never molest the old one. She kills their dogs and colts, yet for fear of incurring bad luck they tolerate it."

As Eagle Feather looked a bit droopy and his head nodded I concluded not to keep him up, so took my departure.

On our way to Grey Wolf's tepee José said that the mourning was beginning to pall on him already, but it would show disrespect to break off too soon.

Arriving at our tepee we crawled under our blankets, and in spite of the barking of dogs and coyotes, the snoring of the squaw and her children, to say nothing of the mosquitoes, we slept.

At sunrise we were out and ready for our breakfast, which was almost purely Indian, as José had too generously distributed the bacon and sugar among his relatives.

The day promised to be unusually hot, and at the suggestion of my boy friends I got out of my clothes and adopted the gee-string, moccasins, and deer toe necklace costume loaned me, and with a feather tied in my hair, I felt quite Indianlike and cool.

After hanging about the camp for a couple of hours I decided to take a ride, so catching my pony and taking my rifle and cartridge-belt set out to explore the hills to the northwards, in hope of seeing, perhaps getting a shot at, an antelope.

I had ridden an hour or more when I came to a group of rocky hills, and, dismounting, began to poke around, hoping I would run across the medicine bear or a cub. My hopes were more than realised, for in sliding down a slanting rock (with no small detriment to my cuticle) I heard a guttural growl to one side, and there was her ladyship, not twenty feet away, and working herself into a great rage.

She was apparently as big as my pony, and not wishing to either submit to an embrace or start a shooting match and incur complications with the Indians, I fled, and to my dismay found that the bear was hustling after me. When my pony saw this queer apparition coming breakneck down the hill he jumped against the light tie-rope, snapping it of course, and galloped off across the prairie, turning his head from side to side, evidently to gauge his gait to the bear's and my own.

A tall, slim tree at the bottom of the hill invited me to ascend, and hugging my rifle under my chin I scrambled up out of reach of the big claws fanning the air beneath me. The bear sniffed around the tree and finally sat down on its haunches and combed its side. Truly this seemed ludicrous; a man treed with a good gun and a belt full of cartridges; but Indians' superstitions will not stand trifling with.

In wriggling to get a better hold, my rifle slipped to the ground and the bear left off scratching to chew the sights off the gun. I was getting thirsty and the sun was cruelly hot. I yelled until I was hoarse and then settled down to broil in silence. A couple of times when I started to descend the bear would leisurely lumber over to greet me and I climbed a trifle higher instead.

About four o'clock or so I was almost crazy from the terrible sun burning, and my body was very sore. My tongue was as dry as a stone, and my limbs were so numb that I could scarcely keep my hold.

Digitized by Google

When it seemed as if I could hang on no longer and was really deliberating on coming down to take the chances, the bear came over to my tree, sniffed a bit, and then, as if she were tired of the vigil, turned and slowly walked up the hill, stopping at the top of the hill to take a last look, and then disappeared.

I fairly dropped from my perch. Ah! it seemed so good to stretch my numbed arms and legs. Picking up my slightly chewed gun I started for the camp.

About dusk I found my pony in a dry creek bed, pawing for water, and by careful manœuvring caught the short trail rope and was galloping to camp.

José looked a bit worried when I dismounted in front of the tepee, but when he heard my story he laughed until the tears streamed down his cheeks.

My sun-burning was no joke, however, for my body was covered with blisters, as I had not taken the precaution to rub myself well with grease on starting out. I did so now, though, and after dusting what little flour there was left over it, I felt a bit easier, my stomach having been attended to meanwhile.

The next day I was so swollen that my eyes were almost shut, and one glance at the bright sunshine drove me back to the darkest side of the tepee.

"Ugh!" grunted Grey Wolf's squaw, "white men afraid of sun, stay in dark, see heap, one, two tree day."

I felt as if I needed at least a month.

In the course of the day, Eagle Feather came over to see me, but as neither could understand the other, we smoked in silence, thoroughly appreciating the situation.

The fourth day after my adventure I came out dressed again as civilisation intended I should be, and was hailed on all sides as "Man-afraid-of-the-sun."

This was adding insult to injury, and I swore revenge on that bear.

That night José and I talked over the advisability of shooting the beast, and finally concluded that it would be all right if we could sweeten up the medicine man with a few dollars, and a sun-glass that I had, and then leave him to appease the wrath of his people.

Accordingly the next morning José presented the old fellow with a handful of silver dollars, the coveted sun-glass and a plug of tobacco for good measure, meanwhile explaining the sacrilege we wished to commit.

The medicine man thought deeply for a few moments to give the matter due consideration, but I could foretell what it would be by the way he eyed our offerings, and when he picked them up and walked away the bear's doom was sealed, i.e., if we could kill her. José had an after-mourning feast to give his relatives, and, as it would not interest me, I tinkered my gun into serviceability. About two o' clock I started out, leaving José to follow when his entertainment was over.

I rode, slowly, the pony carefully picking his way, as he had lost a shoe and was tenderfoot. We slid down into the dry creek bed and clambered up the opposite side, every moment expecting José to catch up. Finally I perceived a bobbing speck in the distance and pulled up to wait, but instead of José it proved to be Little Elk, the medicine man's son.

"Where's José?" I asked when he came up.

"Ugh, José, he say he stay eat, send me same him."

This certainly seemed queer, for José rarely changed his mind.

"Well, I suppose it's all right," although I had many doubts, as I heard that this Little Elk was somewhat of a "lar" as well as dandy and drone. His painted face and

FREE

QUAKER OATS COOKER

OUR OFFER, READ IT

2-Pint Cooker Free. For 25 white squares like this from front of 2-lb. packet.

2-Pint Cooker Free. For 50 white squares like this from front of 1-lb. packet.

3-Pint Cooker Free. For 40 white squares like this from front of 2-lb. packet.

3-pint Cooker Free. For 75 white squares like this from front of 1-lb. packet.

Required number of White Squares must be sent in at one time.

On receipt by us, POSTAGE PAID, of, required number of WHITE SQUARES, or price mentioned below, before Sept. 1, 1901, a Quaker Oats Cooker will be sent at once, carriage paid, to any address in Great Britain or Ireland.

If you want the Cooker at once, and have not the required number of WHITE SQUARES, send 2/- for 2-pint size, or 2/6 for 3-pint size. The amount you pay will be refunded immediately correct number of WHITE SQUARES is sent us postage paid, if received by us before Sept. 1st, 1901. Write your address plainly and mention this Paper.

ADDRESS: DEPT -W 3

QUAKER OATS, LTD., EASTCHEAP, LONDON, E.C.

QUAKER OATS, sold in 1-lb. and 2-lb. Packets only. Beware of substitution. Quaker name and Quaker Figure on every Packet.

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt tops.

Digitized by Google

immaculate clothes seemed proof of part of the tale. He was very chatty and wanted to know what my plans were, was I afraid, and a dozen other questions.

On reaching the hills I dismounted, and, after examining my gun and revolver, climbed the very hill I had retreated down so precipitately a few days before. I had asked my companion to come along, but he still bestrode his pony and seemed satisfied where he was. I reviled him sweetly, but it had no effect, he wouldn't move. Prowling around till almost sun down, I stumbled fairly on Mrs. Bear. She was very much at home and shuffled forward to greet me. I retreated, hoping to get her down hill, where, if there was any trouble, Little Elk could help me out.

My trot broke into a run, and after much slipping and sliding I reached the bottom of the hill to find that the brave (?) had fled, leaving me to conduct matters alone.

I cocked my rifle and waited for a good chance to present itself. The bear in crossing a slippery rock, lost her foothold and stumbled, giving me time to get in a good rib shot, which I followed up with a couple more, trying for the shoulder. The bear reared straight up and bit at the wounds.

Jose crept out for the bear's hide.

The white mark at her throat showed for an instant, and my foresight bore on it like to a bull's eye, and with the crack of the rifle the bear trembled and then fell limp, rolling down hill almost to my feet.

A loud "Huy! Huy!" back of me, announced that my noble associate had returned. He came galloping up, hair and feathers flying, waving his gun, and spying the dead bear, and before I could remonstrate, poured in a couple of shots. A squint over my gun stopped that performance, but he was still much excited.

I finally managed to calm him down enough to have his assistance in skinning the bear, but by this time it had grown quite dark. My pony, smelling the blood, refused to carry the skin, so we loaded it on to Little Elk's, and after piling rocks over the carcase to keep out coyotes started for the village.

When the lights appeared I spurred on ahead to tell José the good news, and on arriving there I found him much excited and worried. He wanted to know where I had been, and so forth.

Finally I found that Little Elk had told him that I had decided to wait until the next day, as I was still too sore to move about much.

When he came to Grey Wolf's tepee and found that I had been gone all the afternoon he was mad all through, which did not go down any sooner when I told him I had killed the bear, and he swore vengeance on Little Elk.

"Where's that Indian?" he asked.

"Gone to his tepee, I presume. You go over and see him and get someone to bring the skin here while I get a bite to eat."

My supper over, and Grey Wolf's big pipe before me, I waited for José.

Presently he appeared, looking madder than ever.

"What's up?" I asked.

"It's all up," he replied, then added, "Listen to this: When I got to Little Elk's tepee all his relations were standing about looking at the bear skin and the old man was doing a song and dance about it. He invited them all inside and the Little Elk told them how he dreamt last night that the Great Spirit came and told him the medicine bear was an impostor and as he had never proved himself to be a brave, he must kill the beast and prove his bravery. Then he described how the white man who had gone with him fired several shots, and then he walked up close to the bear and killed it with one shot. What do you think of that?"

Now I was mad, and told my story, which José believed; but it did not get us the skin, and at my suggestion to go over and take it, José said that it would only make trouble, but that we could wait until midnight and then could steal it and "dig out."

Shortly after midnight Grey Wolf's squaw stole out to where our ponies were, saddled them up and put some dried meat in the saddle pockets.

José crept out and returned shortly, nearly bent double with the heavy bear hide. He had cut a split in Little Elk's tepee and dragged the bear skin almost from under them. We loaded it on José's big bay, and after giving the squaw some silver dollars, struck for the circle L.S.

We rode all night and at daylight camped in a dry creek bed.

I was almost dead for sleep, so took some forty winks or so while José kept guard. Late in the afternoon we struck camp and took up the trail again.

Passing some low hills we saw what looked like an Indian against the sky line.

José took a chance shot at it, and the thing disappeared. In all probability it was Little Elk looking over the ridge, hoping for a chance to steal the bear skin again.

We rode all night and camped at daylight as before, and in three days we reached the ranch, where I gave the hide to an old hunter to tan for me.

The punchers thought it a rare joke—stealing what belonged to us.

We never saw the Indians again, José remarking that he did not care for his mother's side of the house, anyhow.

When the hide was tanned we set out for Santa Fé, where I parted with José, and taking my precious bear skin with me, left for home.

B. C. BROOME.

Digitized by Google

PEOPLE WHO ARE DEAF.

DEAFNESS, as we know, is nearly always the result of a disease of the ear. Defects of hearing may vary from a very slight decrease of the hearing powers to total deafness. With a good many people the hearing is far from being normal, although they may be unaware of this fact, and it is only when the defect increases that they begin to notice it. The majority of those who are deaf have both ears affected; when, as is often the case, deafness is more pronounced on one side than on the other, they usually believe that the hearing of only one ear, the worse, is impaired. It is always very difficult to know, when questioning a patient, for how long the infirmity has been present. Very often he will answer that he has only been deaf for the last ten or twelve months—that is to say, since the hardness of hearing became more marked; but further inquiries will generally elicit the fact that the ear trouble began years before.

As a rule, a deaf man does not like to acknowledge his infirmity, and he will take great pains to conceal it. By concentrating all his attention, he may be able to gather the sense of the speaker's words; or, if he has had a good deal of practice, he may succeed in reading, so to speak, the words on the lips of the person who is addressing him. This explains the peculiarity sometimes mentioned by deaf people who are surprised that they should be better able to understand during the day than at night, and who also want to know why they cannot understand, so well, people with a beard or a heavy moustache.

Only those who have lost, even partially, the sense of hearing know what amount of discomfort that sad infirmity entails. Social intercourse becomes an impossibility; people don't like conversing when they have to shout at the top of their voice to make themselves understood.

Some twenty or thirty years ago, to be deaf meant to be incurable. Medical men, as a rule, were little acquainted with ear diseases, and held it was better not to meddle with an organ of which so little was known. The method of non-interference was, as it were, the only treatment recognised, not only in ordinary cases of deafness, but also when there existed a discharge from the ears. When it is remembered that purulent diseases of the ear are the most frequent causes of cerebral abscess, and often give rise to decay of the ossicles, facial paralysis, meningitis, and even embolism, it may be wondered how many lives have thus been lost by lack of proper treatment. The popular prejudice still existing, that a discharge must not be interfered with, must be uprooted at any cost, as also the belief that deafness cannot be cured. Ear diseases are nowadays no more incurable than any other organic affection.

To realise this fact, all who are interested in the matter should read the January issue of the "Journal for the Deaf," which contains most useful information on the curative treatment of deafness. The publication is issued by the Drouet Institute, and is forwarded under cover, free of charge, to any person who applies for it to the secretary, 72 Regent's Park Road, London, N.W. This medical establishment, since it was first opened twelve years ago in Paris by the late Dr. Drouet, then in Brussels, and lastly, in 1896, in London, has effected the cure of several thousands of deaf people. In contradistinction with all others, the Drouet method of treatment is based on the sole employment of medicines; no instruments or apparatus whatever are used. The principal of these medicines is a crescent-shaped plaster, which is applied every night, and during the night only, behind the ears.

The preparation does not "draw," but, on the contrary, acts by gradual absorption, and in this way reaches the diseased parts, which could not possibly be touched otherwise, and this is the whole secret of the success of the treatment. This also explains how people who had previously followed many treatments without avail have ultimately been able to recover their hearing. The "Journal for the Deaf" records several such cases, and altogether gives an account of nearly two hundred recent cures.

It may be interesting to mention here a few of these cures, to better illustrate the remarkable curative powers of the method.

Miss Gertie F., a shop-assistant, of Victoria Street, Wolverhampton, had been affected for the last four years with chronic deafness, at first in the right ear and then in the left. The right ear was the worst; the tick of a watch could only be heard at a distance of two inches, and the lady experienced distressing buzzing noises. Miss G. F. had already followed three different treatments before applying to the Drouet Institute, but to no purpose.

"In each treatment," she stated when submitting her case, "I have been given a medicine for the throat, and at the hospital a white powder to inhale."

Deafness, however, could not possibly yield to such methods, the seat of the disease being the internal ear; but the Drouet treatment was rapidly successful, a cure being obtained in eight weeks.

Extracts are given hereafter of a letter written by the lady a short time ago:

"Victoria Street, Wolverhampton,
"November 7th, 1900.

"I am writing to thank you for the treatment I have had from your Institute. I feel I am all right, and the noises in my ear have quite gone, so I really think there is no need for me to have any more. I shall certainly recommend your valuable Institute to anybody I know who are deaf. "MISS GERTIE F."

(The full name and address will be given to any applicant.)

Miss Annie M., a matron, of Berkhamsted, Herts,

Digitized by Google

had for the last eight years gradually grown deaf, on account of a disease of the nose and throat. Influenza had aggravated the condition, leaving the patient, as is often the case, with a running of the ears; buzzing noises and pains in the ears were also experienced.

The disease assuming such a complicated turn, Miss A. M. saw a physician, who prescribed painting with glycerine and tannin, and gave a gargle; but no relief being obtained, and the lady hearing of the remarkable results given by the Drouet treatment, decided to have a trial.

The case was submitted to the Drouet Institute towards the end of August, and less than a month afterwards a complete cure was reported, as may be seen from the following letter:

"Berkhamsted, Herts, September 24th, 1900.

"I have used the antiseptic treatment, which has entirely stopped the discharge. I can hear all right now.—Yours faithfully, MISS A. M."

(The full address will be gladly given by the Drouet Institute.)

A reverend gentleman, Mr. A. W. A., suffering from the same complaint, after only a fortnight's treatment could write:

"September 24th, 1900.

"I am glad to say your treatment has been very successful, and I can hear quite well now. I do not wish my name put in the paper, as I know how much inconvenience and annoyance it causes; but I am much obliged for your advice, and shall be glad to recommend your treatment whenever I can.

"A. W. A."

(The letter is on view at the Drouet Institute.)

James E. Owen, twenty-eight, a turner, of 13 Carbrook Street, Attercliffe Common, Sheffield. Deafness of twenty-four years' standing, following scarlet-fever, very pronounced on the left side. Intermittent noises in the head, and also offensive discharge from the ears. Cold aggravates the affection.

Treatment was prescribed, and three weeks later Mr. J. Owen reported his cure, which he confirmed in the following letter:

"I am distributing your papers to those that I know are suffering from deafness, with the hope that they will place themselves under your treatment, as it has done me good. I have not had a relapse since, so I think I am about cured altogether.—Yours, etc.,

"E. OWEN."

Mr. James Shaw, fifty-six, a bank-messenger, of 59, Meadow Street, Moss Side, Manchester. Deafness was sudden, affecting first the left ear then the right ear. The patient could only hear the ticking of a watch when held quite close to the ear. Noises were experienced, and an offensive discharge was running from the left ear.

Treatment was prescribed, and sixteen days afterwards the patient reported a complete recovery:

"I am glad to state that my hearing is now as well as it has been for some years past. I was afraid I should suffer permanently, but under your treatment, for which I am deeply grateful, my hearing is now very distinct.

"You have perfect liberty to use this as seems best.—Believe me, &c., J. SHAW."

Mr. T. Elliott, of Consett, had suffered for the last five years from a very grave ear disease. Deafness was almost complete, and attended by a distressing discharge of the left ear. Noises in the head were also experienced. Mr. Elliott saw a short time ago an account of the Drouet treatment in the paper, and decided to have a trial. By means of the pathological report form, which is sent by the Drouet Institute to patients unable to leave home, he was enabled to submit his case very clearly for examination, and commenced treatment towards the beginning of September last. On the 22nd of the same month—that is to say, in less than three weeks—a complete cure was reported, and this was confirmed in the following letter:

22, Alexandra Street, Consett,
17th November, 1900.

"I am proud to say that my hearing continues to keep splendid, also that the discharge has entirely stopped. My opinion, which I have told many that have asked me about my hearing, is that yours is the most marvellous cure of the age. I am doing my best to make it known to those who are troubled with what is mentioned in your journal.

"T. ELLIOTT."

Neglected or badly-treated nose and throat affections are liable to extend to the ear, and to cause deafness of a more or less grave character. In fact, practically all auricular affections known as catarrh of the mid-ear are the consequence of a disease of the nose and throat, and it is, therefore, of the greatest importance that these diseases should be treated from the start to prevent any possible complication. The Drouet Institute, as a matter of course, treats nose and throat affections, and that it is no less successful in dealing with them may be seen from the numerous reports given in the "Journal for the Deaf."

Let us state again that a copy of this publication will be forwarded gratis to any applicant. All persons affected with a disease of the ear, nose, or throat, should read it; and also ask for the report form, which will allow them to submit their case to the Drouet Institute. This form is sent free of charge, and the advice given is always gratuitous. For all additional information, write to the Secretary of the Drouet Institute, 72 Regent's Park Road, London, N.W.

Personal consultations are held daily, except Sunday, from two to four p.m. In this case a fee is charged for examination. Special consultations may also be had at any time by making an appointment with the consulting physician.

The letters, of which extracts have been given in this article, are on view, amongst hundreds of others, at the Drouet Institute, where they may be inspected every day, except Sunday, from ten a.m. till five p.m.

Digitized by Google

THAT DIAMOND RING.

THE disappearance of that diamond ring was a great puzzle at the time, and the whole affair remained a mystery to my uncle till the day of his death; but the key to the enigma was given to me some time afterwards.

My uncle was an old bachelor. He had very kindly taken charge of me when, quite a boy, I was left an orphan. He was not without his faults, and I can't say that he was particularly generous in the way he paid his servants, but to me he was certainly good, and I really loved the old chap.

I was about twenty-one and was studying for the law. I was to be a barrister, but if I had had my way I should have been a detective, for the unravelling of intricate problems connected with crime always had a fascination for me.

But my uncle laughed at the idea; if it had been possible for me to pass an examination and gain a degree that would have made me at once chief of the Criminal Investigation Department, I might have had my wish, but as it was, my uncle declined to listen to my proposals. I was willing to serve in the ranks, but that did not suit him.

"You'll do better as a barrister, my boy!" he cried, on the last occasion that the question came up for discussion.

And the tone of his voice was sufficient to indicate that he had said the last word on the subject.

My uncle was having his house done up and the electric light was being installed. It was one afternoon, while his private bedroom and dressing-room were under operation for the introduction of the new illuminant, that my uncle came home rather unexpectedly and declared that he must dress and be off to an important meeting.

His dressing-room was simply destitute of furniture, and two men were at work in his bedroom, just giving some finishing touches to it. But the old gentleman said that their presence would not matter and they might go on with their work, for he only had to change his coat and waistcoat, and put on another collar and tie—or something of that sort, I don't quite remember now. Anyhow, he proceeded with his toilet, aided by his valet, and took no notice of the men. He had his peculiarities as well as his failings had my uncle.

My uncle—by the way, his name was John Hudson—had a diamond ring to which he was much attached because it had been given to him in recognition of his services to some society or institution; I believe it was valued at £60. He took this ring off his finger and laid it on the small dressing-table which stood in his bedroom temporarily; when he looked for it, in order to put it on his finger again, it was gone.

The first intimation I had of the occurrence was the arrival of the maid to summon me from the small chamber which we called a library to my uncle's room.

"I don't know what's the matter, sir," she said, with a very scared expression on her face, "but the master is in his bedroom with the door locked, and he shouted to me to fetch you and would not open the door. And he was very cross because I didn't understand him at first—you know the door is thick, Mr. James, and the master didn't speak quite plain, he seemed upset."

Much puzzled by this information, I made my way immediately to my uncle's room, the door was unlocked to allow me to enter, and then locked again. In a few words my uncle made me acquainted with the facts.

"As soon as I missed the ring, James," he concluded, "I locked this door and the one leading to the empty dressing-room, and sent for you. That ring is gone, but it must be found before these men are permitted to go out of this room."

"What do you propose to do, uncle?" I asked, looking from one to another of the occupants of the room.

"Search them!" snorted my uncle. "They won't object—if they are honest, and a search will prove their innocence and clear away the suspicion which rests on all three at the present moment. That ring has not gone out of this room—I can swear to that—and I intend to find it."

I thought of suggesting that we should hunt about the room before we proceeded to subject the three men to the indignity of a search, but my uncle anticipated me.

"While you were coming here," he explained, "Jackson (the valet) looked round about the table to see if it had dropped on the floor, but he could not find it. Here's a chance for your detective skill, my boy!".

I thought that was rather an unkind remark, but I looked over it because I knew that the old gentleman was in a bad temper.

Still, perhaps there was a chance for me after all.

I made a quick survey of the room without moving from the spot on which I stood.

I was bound to confess that there was no earthly chance of that ring getting out of the room except by being carried out; it could not have been thrown out of the window, for that was shut and fastened. From where I stood I could see that window of the dressing-room was also shut and fastened.

There was no other possible outlet.

That ring was either in the possession of one of the occupants of the room or it was hidden away in some crevice.

The first thing to be done was to make sure that it was not concealed on the person of either of the three men—the valet and the two workmen, and then we must ransack the whole room to find the place of concealment.

As each man was searched, he would pass into the dressing-room so that there should be no possibility of the ring being handed to him by the remaining two or one, as the case might be.

Well, we began the search. The men protested, but complied. My uncle did not go in for half-measures; each man had to take off his waistcoat, trousers, boots and socks, and the valet would have to take off his coat in addition, he being the only one of the three who was wearing a coat. The garments were handed to me, and I searched and felt along linings, and in short thoroughly overhauled everything. I actually went so far as to make each man open his mouth and cough, in case he might be practising the old Hindoo trick of holding the ring somewhere in his throat. While I was operating, my uncle kept his eyes on the suspects.

Digitized by Google

It seemed rather an extravagant proceeding, but it was carried out. I took the workmen first, and each one passed into the dressing-room and was let out by another door by myself. Then came the turn of the valet.

"I am sorry to do it, Jackson," said my uncle in an apologetic tone, "but I must serve you the same as the others. It will at least clear you of suspicion."

"I shall not resist, Mr. Hudson, but I submit under protest," returned the valet. He spoke in a dignified manner, and I felt really sorry for him. His face was very pale, but he showed no emotion; he was not the kind of man to show his feelings; he always had them wonderfully under control.

He took off his coat and held it out to me, but it was not quite within my reach. I stepped forward to take it from him, and at the same time—with a hasty apology for his rudeness—he advanced to hand it to me. The result was a slight collision and the coat nearly dropped to the floor, but he deftly caught it as it fell and handed it to me.

There was nothing in the coat, except, of course, the man's own property. The waistcoat and trousers, boots and socks followed—in a word, I discovered nothing. Jackson in his turn passed into the dressing-room and out through the other door.

"I'll turn the room inside out! I will find it!" shouted my uncle, more annoyed than ever. "Let us begin at once!"

"But what about your meeting?" I asked.

"The meeting be—adjourned!" growled the old gentleman, angrily. "Let's get to work!"

We turned that room upside down; we shifted everything, turned up the carpet, looked on every ledge and in every nook; we even lifted up the trap of the register stove and swept down the soot; but in the end we were forced to own ourselves beaten.

"Oh!" I exclaimed, as an idea struck me. "Perhaps it isn't missing after all—perhaps you slipped it into your own waistcoat pocket!"

I felt quite relieved as I made this suggestion.

"Perhaps I didn't," snarled my uncle. "Do you think that I'm such an idiot to imitate the man who pushed his spectacles up to the top of his head and then went hunting for them all over the house? That was the first thing I thought of, and it doesn't say much for your detective skill that the idea did not occur to you before we began the search."

I felt rather sat on, and contented myself with the remark that, as there was nothing more to be done, we might as well get rid of our sweeps' disguise and make ourselves presentable.

I left my uncle to his own devices, while I went to my room to wash and change my clothes. I did not feel like any more study, and went out for a walk.

As I passed out of the house I met Jackson in the hall.

"No, it isn't fair," I replied to his inquiry. "It's most mysterious. My uncle will no doubt salve your wounded feelings, Jackson; it was rather too bad. And those workmen, tell them to come to me to-morrow and I'll make it right with them. Dashed if I don't think that he lost it before he came in, and only fancied that he took it off!"

"That appears to me the most probable," remarked Jackson deferentially. "Shall I go up and help him to dress, sir, do you think?"

"You might go and make the offer, Jackson," I suggested. "We made ourselves in a beastly mess, and I have had to change my clothes."

I never inquired whether Jackson followed my suggestion or not. The ring was never found, and I settled down to the conviction that my uncle had lost it outside; but I did not open the subject to him—I preferred to let matters rest.

I had thought that one of the men had swallowed the ring, but I dismissed this notion as altogether improbable; I doubt whether either of them could have done such a thing, and had the ring passed into the throat, it is safe to say that the swallower would have required a surgical operation very soon afterwards. As I had previously learnt, Jackson was one of those who have a small swallow, so the hypothesis was out of the question so far as he was concerned. I found out some time later that my uncle had caused all three men to be "shadowed" for several days, but without discovering anything.

Jackson never got over the indignity, and he gave notice to leave before a month had elapsed. He said that he would refer his next employer to my uncle for a reference, and the reference was taken up in a few days. Thus Jackson passed out of our sight.

About a year afterwards I received a letter, bearing the London postmark and written by an unknown hand. I opened it and read it. There was no address and it was signed "T. Jackson."

I am certain that you will be interested to know something about that diamond ring. I took it. I was hard pressed, and I could not resist the temptation, but I was not prepared for the rigorous measures which Mr. Hudson took to discover it. What a pity he did not find it! I am writing this to you, Mr. James, because it may help you in any other detective work which you may undertake!

I had the ring in my waistcoat pocket, and I had to hit upon some desperate expedient in order to get rid of it. I wanted to hide it where I might have the chance of finding it again, but in any case I was bound to get rid of it. Your uncle did not give me the chance to hide it anywhere about the room. And there I was with the ring in my possession when you began to search me!

I had it in by left hand while I was holding out my coat with my right hand. I purposely made you step forward and then did the same myself, so as to bring about a collision. When I caught the coat, I brushed against you, and I put the ring into the little ticket pocket on the outside of your coat. I knew that it was a peculiarity of yours to have that little pocket made deep, and to carry odd things in it, so I concluded that if you felt anything in that pocket without actually putting your finger into it—you would not notice it. These pockets are now made inside the coat; let me advise you to adopt that fashion. It looks bad to have a little pocket bulging out on the outside!

I was afraid that the ring might fall out while you were stooping about the floor, lifting up the carpet, but it didn't; so when I found you had changed your things, I went to your room, took the ring and hid it in a safe place.

I purposely applied for a situation and got my employer to write for a reference, but I never took up the situation. I thought it best to clear out of the country—I owed too much money to feel comfortable. I am doing very well, and you will never know where I am, for this letter will be posted in London for me. Why do I write? Because I can't resist the temptation of having a laugh at you!

I thought it best to destroy this letter, and my uncle never knew that I had received it. GEORGE KNIGHT.

Digitized by Google

AN INSTRUCTIVE BOOK.

"The Mistakes we Make."

Compiled by C. E. CLARK.

Foolscap 8vo, cloth, with Index.

Post Free, 1s. 9d.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD.,
17 HENRIETTA STREET, LONDON, W.C.

COLDS CURED IN ONE DAY!

NAZALENE will positively CURE a COLD in ONE DAY, and a HEADACHE in Three Minutes. NO NOXIOUS DRUGS TO TAKE. One drop applied to each nostril acts like a charm. By post, 1/6. Particulars of this wonderful discovery will be sent FREE on receipt of stamped envelope. CITY DRUG COMPANY, 76 Finsbury Pavement, E.C.

PAINTING, POLISHING, AND PLUMBING

NEW BOOK, 2,000 Practical Trade Recipes and Instructions for Mixing, Making, Using All Paints, Oils, Colours, Graining, Marbling, French Polishing, Varnishing, Enamelling, Plumbing, Soldering, Cycle Brazing, Plating, Illustrated with Colours and Tools, Free, 2s.
C. TOMLIN, Eldon Street, Barnsley, Yorkshire.

THE ENGLISH & WELSH COAL Co.,

SHAKESPEARE ST., MANCHESTER.

Deliver in Truck Load. Prices on application.
You will find it to your advantage to buy direct.

A SUM of from 12s. to 25s. per week

can be earned in spare hours or evenings by either sex everywhere.—Send addressed envelope for particulars to Box 24, Eclipse Works, 89 Aldersgate Street, E.C.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.
GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS,
148 Old Street, London, E.C.

HAVE YOU TRIED KEATING'S LOZENGES FOR YOUR COUGH?

ANY DOCTOR WILL TELL YOU "there is no better Cough Medicine."—One gives relief: if you suffer from cough try them but once; they will cure, and they will not injure your health; an increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1½d. tins.

£50 CASH PRIZE SEND NO MONEY WE TRUST YOU.

FREE.

£2 10s. £2 10s. REAL SILVER

WE GIVE YOU YOUR CHOICE of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1s. 6d. each. (Regular price, 2s. 6d.)

WE DO NOT WANT YOUR MONEY.

JUST WRITE US A POST-CARD

saying that you will either sell the Jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it with your name and address clearly written. On receiving your post card we will at once post you the Jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13s. 6d. you have received for same, and we will at once send you (no waiting), Absolutely Free, our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A Written Guarantee for Ten Years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1s. 6d. each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

FREE.

REAL GOLD AND REAL DIAMONDS

SEND NO MONEY. SEND NO STAMPS.

WRITE US TO-DAY. ONLY A POST-CARD.

WHAT THE PUBLIC SAYS:—

KNOCKING OTHERS IN THE SHADE ALTOGETHER.

100 High Street,
Mountain Ash, South Wales,

Dear Sir,—Just a line to acknowledge having received the beautiful present; it was beyond expectation. There are a lot of goods from a Glasgow firm but nothing compared with the British Goldsmiths Company's goods. We are knocking them in the shade altogether. Everyone who has bought our goods speak very well of them. I will do my best for your Company in little Wales.—Yours fraternally,
WILLIAM WILLIAMS.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS:—

"We have received some samples of the jewellery now being sold by the British Goldsmiths Co., the value of which is really wonderful considering the low prices asked for the goods. The British Goldsmiths Co. send out their goods to be sold by those who wish to put their spare time to good advantage. We should think there would be little difficulty about selling the goods we have before us. They are substantial, well finished, and cheap. The company offers a handsome present free to all persons selling a certain number of these articles."—HOME SWEET HOME, Jan. 5th, 1901.

BRITISH GOLDSMITHS CO. (DEPT. 29), 48 GRAY'S INN RD., LONDON.

Mr. Geo. R. Sims' Discovery "TATCHO."

20,000 LARGE (4/6 SIZE) BOTTLES TO BE DISTRIBUTED.

"TATCHO" is a brilliant spirituous tonic, the colour of whisky, free from all grease. A sprinkle of a few drops on the scalp and five minutes with the brush daily works marvels with every head of hair.

"TATCHO" acts as an invigorating tonic. It stops the hair falling, creates a luxuriant growth, and imparts to it a bright and youthful lustre.

"When I discovered the preparation, I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders," said Mr. George R. Sims to the representative of the Daily Mail. "Look at my hair now. Look at the colour. In time people got to know. Then the trouble began.

"Letters in thousands poured in to me from men and women in every quarter of the world, from all parts of the Kingdom, from America, India, Africa, China, and Australia. The work of answering the letters was enormous, and as far as possible the desired information was supplied; but it became quite evident that at the rate at which the demand was increasing I should very soon need a large staff of clerks to attend solely to the Hair renewer department of correspondence.

"In consequence, I said to myself. Why should this thing go on? If the public wants my hair renewer, the public shall have it; but the demand must be met in the ordinary business-like way. So I resolved to place the genuine article within reach of all, and with the assistance of a number of gentlemen, possessing the necessary commercial facilities, that has been accomplished."

THE GEO. R. SIMS' COMPANY HAVE DECIDED TO DISTRIBUTE 20,000 LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES OF TATCHO

to enable those who have not yet profited by Mr. G. R. Sims' discovery, to have the opportunity of doing so. The Company does this in the belief that such distribution will enable the preparation to become more widely known, and will introduce it to every home in a far more satisfactory manner than through unlimited puffing by advertisement.

COUPON.
S.S.
Jan. 26, 1901.

If you are desirous of participating in this distribution cut out this Coupon and send it to the Geo. R. Sims' Co., 81c Great Queen Street, London, W.C., accompanied by a postal order for 1/10. You will receive by return of post a plain package containing which will enable you to give TATCHO a fair trial and to satisfy yourself as to its merits.

A FULL SIZE 4s. 6d. TRIAL BOTTLE OF "TATCHO" POST PAID,

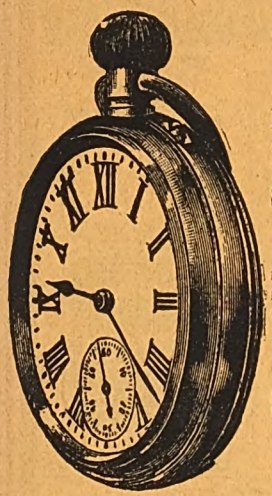
Digitized by Google

YOU PAY ONE SHILLING

to start with and one shilling per week until article is paid for. We do not make any enquiries nor do we require any guarantees.



SPECIAL PRICES:

Watch, as illustrated, in metal cases . . . 6/-

Best nickel silver cases 10/-

Black Oxydised ,, 14/-

Silver Watches . . 15/-

Ladies sizes also supplied.

All watches warranted and guaranteed good timekeepers. Cash refunded on goods not approved of if returned in good condition within 7 days.

SPECIAL LINE:

LADIES' CURB BRACELETS

With Padlock,

Best Gilt, 2/6; H. M. Silver, 6/6; 14c. Rolled Gold, 8/-.

AGENTS WANTED.

Send stamp for price lists and particulars.

KING & CO., Wholesale Jewellers,

Baldwin Street, Bristol.

WHEN BUYING A CHEAP BICYCLE,

look at the tyres. If they are not the machine is not cheap at any price.

DUNLOP TYRES

Trade Mark.

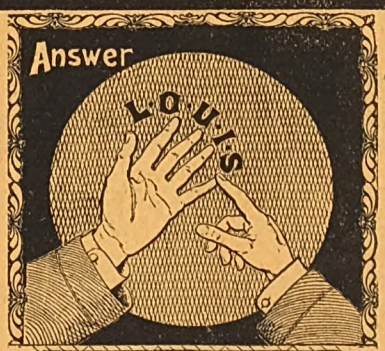
The DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE CO., Lt d.,

Factory: Alma Street, Coventry;

160 Clerkenwell Road, E.C., London.

Branches: Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Nottingham, Manchester, Glasgow, Dublin, &c.

HOW DO YOU SPELL VELVETEEN?



Don't Forget this when you buy.

EVERY YARD IS STAMPED

L-O-U-I-S.

Reckitt's PARIS Blue.

The Best is the Cheapest.

Digitized by Google

THE VERY STORY PAPER YOU WANT.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 631. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 2ND, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

"Absolutely Pure therefore Best."

CADBURY'S

"The standard of highest purity."—THE LANCET.

COCOA

CADBURY'S Cocoa contains no added starch, alkalies, or colouring matter, which are often used to disguise poor and inferior cocoas. It is entirely free from all foreign substances, such as Kola, Malt, Hops, etc.

CADBURY'S Cocoa is highly nourishing and easily digested—repairing waste and preserving health. It can be taken with the greatest benefit at all times and seasons—in Childhood, in Youth, or in Old Age.

The Lancet (August 11th, 1900) says:

"Whatever definition may be adopted as to what "is pure cocoa, CADBURY'S Cocoa will be certain
"to be placed well within the mark."

CADBURY'S Cocoa is a Perfect Food

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Shilling packets

Kaputine "the" safe Remedy for Headache

WARNING. Instead of using the common White Headache Powders, which generally consist entirely of a crude drug, which has been condemned as dangerous by the medical papers, insist on having a bona-fide anti-quack remedy, recommended by such eminent medical authorities as Dr. RAMAGE, L.R.C.P., Dr. THURSTN, L.R.C.P., late Dr. BOYD-WILLIAMS (Liverpool), the Editor of the Medical Journal, "Health," etc., etc. The name of this safe remedy is KAPUTINE.

ALL LEADING CHEMISTS SELL IT, OR CAN GET IT FOR YOU IN A FEW HOURS.

Sold by BOOT'S, TAYLOR'S, DAY'S, WHITE'S and other Stores. Most Co-operative Stores sell it.

PACKETS, 1/-. SAMPLES ONE PENNY,

or KAPUTINE LIMITED, HUDDERSFIELD,
will send it FREE for 12 stamps.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

THE ENGLISH & WELSH COAL Co.,

SHAKESPEARE ST., MANCHESTER.

Deliver in Truck Load. Prices on application.
You will find it to your advantage to buy direct.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

COLDS CURED

IN ONE DAY!

NAZALENE will positively CURE a COLD in ONE DAY, and a HEADACHE in Three Minutes. NO NOXIOUS DRUGS TO TAKE. One drop applied to each nostril acts like a charm. By post, 1/6. Particulars of this wonderful discovery will be sent FREE on receipt of stamped envelope. CITY DRUG COMPANY, 76 Fi sbury Pavement, E.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

Don't Cough-use

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves.
Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

Keating's Lozenges

FREE. FREE.

Our £2 10s.

Real Silver Watch
(with chain),
or
A Real Gold Ring
Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

SEND NO MONEY.

NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money.

Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A WRITTEN GUARANTEE for TEN years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

Send no money. Write to-day.

BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 5).
282 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 631.] For the Week Ending February 2nd, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

THE MASKED BALL.

A DETECTIVE is well used to the unusual and to meeting as cold facts what, when told, seems a tissue of the wildest improbabilities. During my experience I have had one case which for certain strange features I have never had surpassed.

It occurred years ago, on the evening of the masked ball. I was free and attended it. It was the usual thing. The Conservatoire of Music was filled with gay women and young fellows about town. By twelve o'clock the hilarity was beginning to get well under way. My attention had been particularly drawn to one young woman. She was not very tall, but had a lovely figure. She was dressed like a columbine.

I noticed her because she was such an exquisitely graceful dancer. Her small feet, cased in gold shoes with high heels, twinkled as prettily as possible as they lightly touched the waxed floor. The dancing was an intense pleasure to her evidently. She could hardly keep her feet still during any pause in which she had not to move.

As I was standing near the door looking at her, a party of several young men came into the room. They stood and looked about and passed remarks on the scene as if they had not yet become acquainted with its features. They had been to a theatre, probably, and came to the ball after it. The eyes and cheeks of two or three of them were bright, as if they had been drinking. One young fellow seemed to be the object of much attention from the others.

He was a German, of medium height, with blue eyes and very fair hair, while a rich colour mantled in his cheeks. The others addressed him in German or French, and called him "Graf." From his manner and appearance it did not require much astuteness to conclude that he was a young German of rank who was visiting the country.

One of his companions turned to him with a broad smile and made some remark, pointing out one of the dancers.

I looked in the direction and saw my pretty Columbine pirouetting gracefully around, with her arms stretched out to her partner, a big fellow who was a little muddled with wine, and who has strayed out of the orbit of the girl in a turn in the dance. She was not going to be baulked of her share in the measure, and tripped about by herself quite contentedly till he should come back.

I glanced at the group of fellows to see if it was she they were observing.

A change had come over the German. His face was as white as death, and his eyes were dilated and fixed. He had fallen a little back from the others, as if he did not wish to be observed. This was interesting, and I felt my professional instincts aroused. A moment after he made some proposal or said something that seemed to be a surprise to them, and I saw them shake hands with him. He left the hall in a hurried way.

I slipped after him. I wished to see what he did. He stood for a moment in the entrance hall, and I saw his hands clench fiercely. Then, in a distraught sort of way, he walked round to one of the other entrances to the ball-room, and looked about among the dancers. He tried to get where he could not be seen, and there was a fierce scowl on his face.

All at once he walked into the saloon, with an attempt at careless ease, and approached a masker who wore the costume of a Franciscan friar—a roomy brown suit, with a rope knotted at his waist for a girdle, and a large hood to it which he had pulled up over his head.

The young German spoke to him, and then drew him out of the room. In the corridor he spoke more earnestly to him. The man seemed to be declining some invitation or request. But after a few moments of earnest speech from the German, the two walked away, and, keeping them in view, I saw the two leave the place.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

I was at first tempted to follow them. But having no more definite purpose than to see what would come of their movements, I decided to remain, and witness the fun at the ball, which always grew fast and furious in the small hours of the morning.

So I resumed my old post and amused myself by watching the reckless extravagance of the mob of revellers.

While Columbine was resting after an especially lively dance, I saw the Franciscan monk enter the room and seat himself at her side.

He made some remarks to her. She coquettishly

The young German spoke to him, and then drew him out of the room.

answered them. Then to another she shook her head with playful determination. The monk pressed the point, for he bent forward, though I noticed that when she turned towards him he seemed to shrink back.

Finally Columbine sprang to her feet, took his arm, and, with a half-regretful glance at the merry dancers, left the room with him.

The next day the evening papers had a startling story. I have kept the newspaper account. It was this:

"A Sequel to the Masked Ball."

"People who were at the masked ball last night in the Conservatoire of Music may have remarked a young woman dressed as Columbine, who excited a good deal of attention by her graceful dancing. She is lying at the mortuary to-day, dead, waiting to be identified. It seems a cruel mockery, after her last night's gaiety, to behold her now, in her ball dress of black and yellow velvet, lying till someone shall tell who she is.

"The young girl was strangled to death last night in a carriage. She left the ball with someone dressed like a Franciscan monk at two o'clock. The monk gave to the driver a card, on which he had written an address. He also gave the driver a sovereign. All this without a word. He was closely masked. The driver had only remarked that his hand was very white and smooth, and that he wore a heavy plain gold ring.

"The two got in and he drove off. While he was driving along he heard a sound which attracted his attention. On looking round he saw that the door of the carriage was open. He stopped, reached back with his whip, and banged it to. He supposed the couple inside were probably the worse for the wine they had taken at the ball, and had either failed to shut the door, which had worked open, or that the handle of the door had been fiddled with till it opened, and they were too far gone to notice it.

"When he reached his destination, he got off the box and opened the carriage door.

"A lamp-post in front of the house lit up the carriage. The curtains of the carriage windows had been drawn. They were not drawn when the couple got in. What he saw terrified him. Columbine was lying, with her white wraps fallen about her, between the seats, and a monk's frock and a girdle of rope, together with a mask, were tossed on a seat. The monk had disappeared!

"The driver shook the girl and tried to rouse her, but could not. He pulled her forward, then saw that her face was frightfully red and that the eyes were puffed. On the throat were the marks of fingers where a terrible grip had been taken of her neck.

"The story was clear enough. The monk, whoever he was, had strangled the girl in the vehicle, and had then thrown off his disguise and let himself out of the door while the carriage was still in motion.

"The cabman drove at once to the nearest police-station and told his story. The body was taken to the mortuary. The detectives are at work on the case, which promises to be a very exciting one. Known: A man dressed as a monk who was at the masked ball, and who had a smooth, white hand, on which he wears, or wore, a plain gold ring. Unknown: The murderer. Who is the detective that will run down the game?"

"Here he is," I said to myself as I finished reading the account. I had more points than the paper gave. The scenes at the ball came back to me vividly now.—the sudden deathly paleness of the German stranger and his departure with the Franciscan friar! There was a connection here that was too evident to be passed over.

I determined to find out who had murdered the pretty Columbine, who had won me so by her graceful dancing and smiling good-humour. Early next morning I went to the mortuary. There she lay, the dainty figure stretched out so stiff and cold in the big gloomy room. What a contrast to the scene in which I had seen her last!

Digitized by Google

I found that a beautiful emerald which I noticed pinned in her corsage on the night of the ball was gone. It had been rudely plucked away, for the lace about the edge of her dress was torn and hanging. But a large ring of rubies and diamonds had been left on her finger and was kept at the station. I had noticed the emerald because it had an old-fashioned setting in gold, and impressed me as a family jewel.

I made a tour of all the swell hotels in the city and examined their registers. In one near Charing Cross I found the entry, "Count Hermann Stolzberger and servant." He had arrived three days before.

I engaged a room at the hotel, for I felt I must watch this man. I had inquired if Count Stolzberger had left town, and the clerk had told me no. Was he in now? No. He had gone out with friends and would not be back for dinner.

That evening I lounged round the office, sitting in the long corridor into which the door from the street opened. I waited until twelve. No count! I prolonged my guard for an hour more, and he had not appeared. I wished above all to get a look at Count Hermann Stolzberger. He might, perhaps, remain out all night. On the other hand, he possibly had been detained by friends and would yet return. I waited!

My patience was rewarded. At half-past one a cab rolled up to the door, and a young man in a large overcoat, somewhat foreign in its style, sprang out and walked with a quick, nervous tread along the corridor. He walked rapidly past, but my eye had taken him in from the moment he opened the door. My memory for faces is excellent. I recognised the fair hair and complexion of the Count at once, though there was not much colour in his cheeks, and his face looked worn and thin. Count Hermann Stolzberger was the young German who had entered the Masked Ball, and turned pale at the sight of the Columbine.

I have said that this case almost seemed to unroll itself for me; but there were two or three connections to be made to constitute proof, and not leave me with a distinct suspicion only. The body was identified as that of Marie Colombe; she had been in London about a fortnight and was engaged at a costumier's, but nothing more was known of her antecedents.

A costumier had claimed the Franciscan's robe. I fancy he did this more through curiosity to find if it was the one he had let, than on the account of the value of it, for it must have been very cheap. I got the address of this man and called on him. I asked him if he remembered the man who had hired it.

He said he did. It was a smooth-faced, dark-complexioned man of about forty. He remembered, because he had made some joke with him about his being clean-shaven enough for a monk.

The man had given no address, and he did not know who he was. This was a slight hitch in the proceedings. I was convinced that the murderer in the garb of the Franciscan friar was not the man who had engaged it of the costumier, but the German. He was of much the same size and build as the original monk, and so he had assumed the loose brown habit without exciting my attention. But the fact of the German's turning so pale and calling the monk out from the dance had made me feel that he was the one who had strangled the gay Columbine in the carriage that night.

The Count tore open the envelope and read the note.

The Count seemed to grow visibly thinner. There was a drawn look on his face, and during the time that the dead girl lay at the mortuary he seemed to be held by some terrible thought.

The colour had became faint in his cheeks, and his eyes had a haggard look. When he was with others he would affect a gaiety that drove much of this distressing expression from his face; but when he came home alone it was very marked.

Something had to be done if I was to secure the proof that would convict the Count. It was the third day since I had come to the hotel and busied myself in studying him. He had gone to the reading-room, contrary to his usual habit, after finishing his breakfast.

While he was there two of his friends came in, and they began conversing together. I slipped across the way and hastily wrote a message, sealed it, and charged a messenger-boy to deliver it, saying that he was to wait and see if any answer would be given.

I hurried back to the reading-room of the hotel again. The Count and his friends were still there. If they only remained till the messenger arrived! I had seated myself in a corner behind some one, but with my eyes commanding a full view of the three. The message did come before they left. The Count tore open the envelope and read the note. I could not but admire his self-control. The nostrils expanded and hardened, and a stolid look crept into his eyes for a moment; but that was all.

What he read was this: "You know and I know whose hands left those marks on the throat. Why do you not wear your gold ring?"

Digitized by Google

He remained in thought for a moment. Then he lightly excused himself to his friends and went out, having asked something of the servant. He was not gone very long. When he returned he talked easily to his two friends, and after a little while they went out together.

When he came in that night a letter was waiting for him which had come by post. "What good did it do to kill Columbine?" was all there was in it.

The next morning when he awoke he found a note under his door. Its contents were these words: "Is it harder to be choked to death by ten fingers or by a rope?"

The evening of the following day he received another message. It ran: "Leave London at once if you would save your neck."

The Count was too sharp for me. He did not go; but he did not go out so much in the daytime.

One morning he went out about the hour he generally left the hotel. It was the fourth day after the note which advised him to leave London. He went directly to a station and took train for Manchester. I was prepared for this emergency, and went by the same train.

When it arrived in Manchester, he went to an hotel and registered as Karl Schlechter. He had not been in his room half an hour when a note was given him. It had been sent by a messenger-boy. "Karl Schlechter is Count Herman Stolzberger, and the halter is as near him here as in London," ran the note.

He left the place that night after sending a telegram. Probably, it was to his man in London. He went to Glasgow. A note was handed to him in the same way as soon as he had got well settled at his hotel: "The ghost of a strangled girl does not care for place."

He remained here only a day, sending another telegram. Before the train started which carried him away, he walked along the platform deliberately looking at the passengers in the carriages.

He came back to Liverpool, where the old story was repeated, "Eyes sharper than your own are still on you. You cannot escape the hold of your murdered victim."

The next step was to Cardiff.

He went through the same tactics on the platform and his sharp eye took me in.

A new note reached him in Cardiff.

"It may not be long before we meet again, and then my fingers will be at your throat."

In the evening after dinner he was in the billiard-room of the hotel.

He saw me there and finally came and seated himself by my side. He engaged me in conversation. He spoke English in a broken way which there is no need to reproduce.

"Was I from London?" he began.

"Yes."

"Are you travelling for pleasure or business?" he asked next.

"For pleasure," I answered.

"A foreigner is a little surprised when he sees an Englishman travelling in his own country. It seems as if he must be familiar with it. Where are you going from here?"

"Oh, I am not settled. I drift where the humour takes me."

I saw I had become a subject of his suspicions. But he did not yet know me as the author of the notes.

He did not remain long in Cardiff. I went from the place when he did. He had noticed me once or twice and felt certain I was following him. He went to Chester. When we arrived there, he gave some order to a cabman, before stepping into the cab. I engaged another cabman.

"Follow that cab until the man gets out, but only keep close enough to know where it goes."

The cab in which the Count was seated travelled about without any definite termination apparently. He wished to know if anyone were following him, and had told the cabman to see if another cab were after him. He soon found there was, and then he drove at once to the hotel, and hurried into the office.

I got there a few minutes later. I made inquiries. His name was not on the book at all. I looked about the place and found him sitting not far off. He had begun to watch me. I went downstairs and gave a note to one of the boys and arranged for it to be delivered to Count Stolzberger. I had prepared it beforehand, so I was only gone a moment. He kept me well in view as much as he could. When he finally entered his name, he signed his right name, Count Stolzberger, and the clerk gave him the message which had been brought in.

He seemed puzzled. He had kept me in view ever since I arrived, and I had had no time to write a note. So for a moment he did not know what to think. The note had said:

"The man who lent you the costume of the friar has been found. There are not many more turns for you now. This man will recognise you when he sees you. Other witnesses will prove that you spoke to Columbine, drove off with her, and that the poor girl was found dead after your disappearance. What is wanting to fit the rope to your neck?"

He engaged his room, and soon after he had gone to it a boy came to me and asked me to go to the Count's room for a few moments.

Count Stolzberger was sitting in an easy-chair near a table, on which there were writing-materials. He rose, greeted me with dignity, and motioned me to a chair, asking me to sit down.

"You remember that we both came from Cardiff?"

"We may have done so," I answered.

"I have been doing a little detective business with you for its object, and my investigation has shown me that you are a detective, and that you are engaged in working up the case of the girl who was murdered after the Masked Ball. I am right, am I not?" he inquired, all in the same calm, measured way.

"Yes," I replied. "I have been keeping you in sight, Count, until the necessary proofs were obtained that would convict the murderer."

"You fancy that I am the one who did the deed?" he asked, in the same measured tones.

"I know it," I answered quietly, but with an air of conviction.

"The several notes I have received were from you, I suppose," he continued, in his easy, careless tones.

"Yes."

"And you have the proof that I am the murderer?" he inquired, turning his eyes unflinchingly on me.

I smiled.

"Count, I fear that everything is against you!"

"You would be sadly mortified to find you were mistaken, I presume?"

"I should be much surprised," I returned again, with a quiet smile.

"What time did the conveyance drive off with the monk and the girl?" he asked me.

Digitized by Google

"At ten minutes past two. The driver noted the time."

"Well, let me tell you something that may modify your search in the business. I had made arrangements to leave with the girl. I did not wish in any way to be connected with her departure. So just when we were ready to go down to the vehicle I told her to wait for me at the entrance for five minutes. So she said she would and went down.

"I had put on the monk's garb over my evening dress. I threw it off and left it in one of the dressing-rooms. I hurried back to the ball and made it a point to show myself to several persons who knew me. I feared that possibly some one had seen me talk to the monk, and would connect this with the disappearance of Columbine afterwards with a monk. This was my reason for conspicuously showing myself after she had gone out with me in the monk's dress.

"I was not away more than six or seven minutes, when I went back to the dressing-room to put on the disguise again. It was gone! I searched in the neighbouring rooms, thinking someone might have moved it to some other place. I could not find it. I then hastened down to the entrance to go with the Columbine in my dress-suit, with a mask on, for I had slipped that in my breast.

"The girl was not there! I inquired of some of the bystanders, and they told me that a monk had got into a carriage with her not five minutes before. Who that monk was I am as ignorant as yourself. You have followed a false clue. I did not go with the girl, and can prove an alibi for the next two hours after she drove off. Several of my friends were with me from then till I went to my hotel, and my man knows the hour when I came home with them. I was terribly shocked the next day when I heard of her death."

I felt considerably taken back and very foolish. The Count's accents were those of truth, and afterwards his assertions were fully borne out by witnesses.

"But what were your relations to the girl?" I asked, unwilling to acknowledge defeat, and yet convinced that the Count was speaking the truth. "Why were you so anxious to give people the idea that you were not going with the girl in the guise of a monk, and why did you not face the matter out in London instead of travelling all over the country?"

"I will tell you as well as I can," replied the Count, after a pause. "I must go back a little.

"My father was a captain of Uhlans, and took part in the war between Germany and France in 1870. At Amiens he ordered a Frenchman to be shot for having brutally murdered one of the Uhlans.

"Years passed, and my father died. My mother advertised for a French maid—it was against my wish, for I do not understand why we Germans should adopt the ways of other people. The girl who obtained the situation was the girl who was killed the other night. She was the daughter of that Frenchman and was but a baby at that time, but she seems to have been imbued with a desire to avenge her father's death on my father or on some member of his family. She watched for her opportunity, and it came when she obtained the position of maid to my mother. Of course, we did not know that until afterwards."

"Of course not," I assented.

"In the end she administered poison to my mother, which narrowly resulted in the death of my parent. She fled, taking with her an emerald which had been in our family for generations, and was regarded by all of us with superstitious awe—even I have a half-belief in it.

"The superstition is that, if the emerald is lost to the family, every member of the family alive at the time of its loss will meet with a violent death. My mother and I were the only two alive at the time the girl took it, and my mother recovered from the poison, only to be thrown out of her carriage and killed."

"How long was that ago?" I asked, feeling much interested.

"Nearly a year. I tried to find the girl and to trace

I made it my business to scrape acquaintance with him, and give him plenty to drink.

the emerald, but without success. Imagine my surprise when I saw both at the ball. I resolved to regain possession of the gem, so I had speech with the girl, and threatened to hand her over to justice for attempted murder if she did not give me the emerald. She was a daring, revengeful, and hardened creature, and she refused. Finally, seeing that I was in earnest, she asked me to drive away with her, and she would give it up to me in the vehicle; she pretended that she could not give it to me at once without exciting suspicion.

"I have now no doubt that it was a scheme to get away from me, but I fell in with it because I was anxious to get back the emerald. I meant to have it, even if I took it from her by force; hence my showing myself in evening dress and so on.

"I was enraged when I found that she had eluded me, after all; but I was horrified when, on the following day, I heard that she had been strangled and that my emerald had been taken. I believe that the reason that I tried to escape from the man who was tracking me instead of facing the matter, was my belief in the superstition about dying a violent death after losing the stone."

Digitized by Google

That was all the Count could tell me, and I had to give up further research for the time; but later on I made inquiries in Amiens, and gradually solved the mystery of the murder. I found that Marie Colombe, as I will continue to call her, had boldly returned to her native place after her flight from the Count's mansion. There she had deliberately plotted the ruin of a young fellow upon whom her affections had been fixed, but who by no means entertained similar feelings towards her. She had succeeded in bringing about his disgrace by a trumped-up charge of a particularly heinous character—at least, both the young fellow and his relatives said the charge was false; but the unfortunate man was obliged to leave the country and go to America.

His fiancée left Amiens shortly afterwards, suddenly and without giving her parents the least notice of her intention. It was about three months afterwards when her parents received a letter from America which told them that their daughter had married the man of her choice, whom she believed to be innocent.

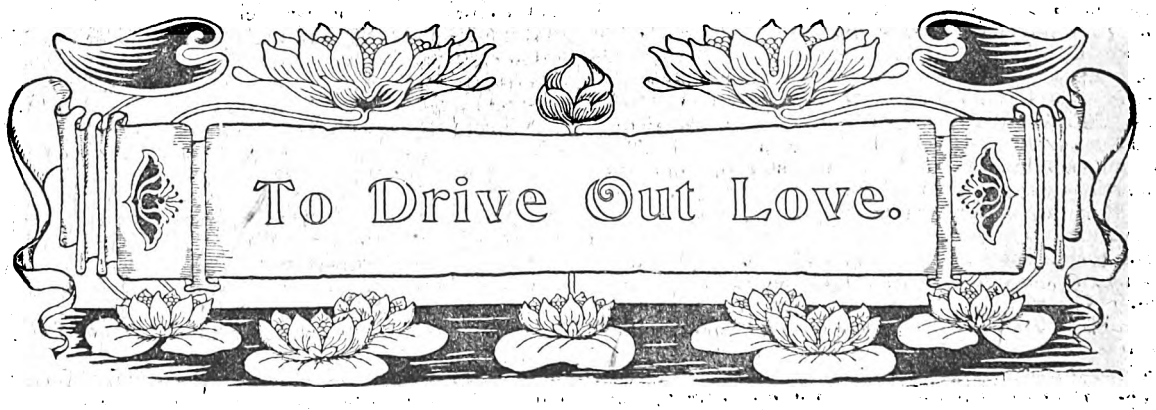
"A woman will do everything for the man she loves," the letter concluded, "and before travelling to America, I was able to avenge the wrong done to my husband. The chance came while I was in London, where I stayed with old Barbette, who helped me to get across the Atlantic—I chose to go that way to avoid being overtaken.

"I went to a masked ball and I saw the woman who had wrought the mischief. She was going away with a man dressed as a monk. I am tall for a woman, and it is easy to give an address which you have seen written. Marie Colombe will do no more mischief and her emerald is at the bottom of the ocean."

I admit having done a very mean thing in order to get a sight of that letter. Her parents, although they knew nothing of the exact circumstances, were cute enough to understand that it compromised their daughter and had never shown it to anyone or revealed the full contents. But having heard that the father had let slip one or two significant remarks after having partaken a little too freely of liquor, I made it my business to scrape acquaintance with him and give him plenty to drink. The result was that, under a pledge of secrecy, I was permitted to read the letter.

I fathomed the mystery during a holiday and just to satisfy my professional pride, but I never made professional use of my knowledge. In fact, I never knew in what part of America the young people resided.

Lawrence Boyne.



"Hist! Oh, go quickly, someone is coming!"

The girl fancied that she had detected a sound near them and she freed herself from her lover's embrace; but he clasped her again in his arms and their lips met in the first kiss.

"I love you," he exclaimed with intense feeling. "It is nothing, don't be alarmed. Tell me that you love me!"

The girl, reassured, yielded to his embrace. "I will never marry anyone but you!" she whispered softly.

"We love each other, and yet we do not know one another's names," he said caressingly. "Such is the power of love! Now you must tell me your name. I can guess it is sweet, as befits——"

Again that sound, and nearer! There was no doubt about it this time: with a suppressed cry of fear the girl tore herself away and darted swiftly along the narrow path by the convent wall and disappeared.

The man, knowing that he was trespassing and anxious to avoid a meeting that might lead to disagreeable consequences to the girl, ran in the opposite direction till he came to the point where he could scale the wall more easily, and then clambered up and dropped into the open thoroughfare on the other side.

"If I had been caught," he murmured as he hurried along, "they might have connected me with her, although I don't see how. Otherwise I would not have minded the adventure—Fancy Moran on the wrong side of a convent wall! Poor girl, I hope she has escaped!"

Victor Moran was an actor, a member of the Comédie Française, and neither better nor worse than most men of his time (the first half of the eighteenth century). He had seen this sweet-faced girl of seventeen by accident one day; he knew that she was a scholar in the Carmelite Convent and, animated by the reckless, adventurous spirit of the day, he had resolved to pay court to her.

He had succeeded in attracting her attention and in sending a note to her; he was a distinctly handsome man and the girl fell in love with him, returning an answer to his notes and finally agreeing to a meeting. Victor Moran fixed the trysting place—under the shadow of the wall; it would be easy for him to scale the mass of stone and cement, while she would merely have to leave the convent building and make her way through the spacious grounds. The meeting took place and we have seen the result.

Digitized by Google

Victor Moran had begun this adventure with the simple idea of gratifying his vanity of making a conquest, but as he wended his way back to his lodgings he had to confess to himself that he had been caught in his own trap. He was in love, deeply in love, with a girl who was unknown to him and to whom he was unknown—a pretty, artless girl, capable of intense feeling, for whom a man would be willing to give up his life. He had discovered this by intuition rather than by experience, although even in her letters there was a spirit of goodness which, unrecognised by him at first, now forced itself clearly upon his mind.

He succeeded in passing another note to the object of his new born affection, and at the time he had appointed he once more scaled the Convent wall. But he was doomed to disappointment; he waited for nearly an hour, but she did not appear, and he returned with a sorrowful heart.

Two months went by without his seeing her, but his love for her increased. It was a novel experience for Victor Moran to be consumed by this strange passion; he would have laughed at it only a short time previously. Her image was constantly before him and he was ever on the watch for the sweet unknown.

He was cast for the part of a Turkish nobleman in a new play by Voltaire; the character was that of a man noble in name and in nature, and Moran, rising to the occasion, played it with consummate skill. The first performance was a grand success, and the second representation of the play was looked forward to by all the high personages who patronised the theatre.

Moran was in the midst of one of his lofty and soul-stirring monologues when his eyes wandered to a particular box.

The flow of language suddenly ceased and Moran remained mute. In that box he saw the girl he loved.

The prompter, thinking that Moran's memory had failed him for the moment gave him the cue; recalled to himself by the voices of the prompter and by the murmur which arose from the audience, Moran made an effort and went on with his lines.

But now he was playing for her; there was no one else in the theatre, so far as he was concerned, and he cared nothing for the approval of others.—He knew nothing of it—he wanted her approbation, and hers only.

When the play was finished she left the box in the company of the elderly gentleman who was its other occupant.

Moran wanted to run after her, but he was still in Eastern garb and dared not venture in the street in that guise. Voltaire had just introduced the novelty of actors dressing in a costume suitable for the part—it had up till then been the common usage to speak one's lines attired in ordinary everyday clothes, without regard to the character, and to have ventured into the open in that dress would have been an invitation to the roughs to fall foul of him. He was obliged to wait until he had changed his clothes but by that time the unknown had disappeared.

He wanted to ask who this girl was, but he was afraid to make inquiries concerning the name of the gentleman who had hired the box for that evening.

Afraid? Yes, it might almost be said that he was ashamed; it was an entirely new sensation, but it arose from the certainty that if he made the enquiry it would come to the ears of some of his companions and would give them an opportunity to make jests in which his name would be coupled with that of the girl. And he would not subject her, even unconsciously on her part, to such disparagement.

About a week later she was again at the theatre with the elderly gentleman.

Moran again forgot the whole house and played for her, watching her for any sign that would tell him she still loved him.

He saw how sympathetic she was, how much his eloquent periods moved her, how constantly her eyes followed him and he was happy. He was good at heart, and this love was bringing out all his finer qualities and suppressing the bad ones.

Once more he tried to overtake her after she had left the theatre, but the change of costume took so long. He might have engaged someone to find out what he wished to know, but he shrank from so doing.

"She loves me! She loves me!" he said to himself many times each day.

He looked for her at each performance, but another week elapsed before he saw her in the box. He had made up his mind that he would follow her this time, and had so arranged that he could change his attire without the slightest delay; he was out in the street in time to see a carriage disappear at the end of the street, but after following it for some distance he was grievously disappointed to find that he had been following someone else.

The run of that piece was soon over, and Moran saw no more of his loved one. He was seated in his little sitting room one day about two months after the last visit of the girl to the theatre, when he was informed that a gentleman wished to see him. He told the porter to show the visitor in, and the invitation was quickly followed by the entrance of a man of noble demeanour whom Moran immediately recognised as the other occupant of the stage box.

"I have come to ask your assistance in a difficult matter, Monsieur Moran," said the new comer, without troubling to introduce himself. "I know you are in a position to help me, and the object of this visit is to induce you to do so."

"Pray be seated, monsieur," returned Moran politely, offering his visitor a chair. "I shall be delighted if I can be of service."

"The matter of which I speak is this: A young lady belonging to one of the noblest families of France is asked to marry a man of equal rank. The marriage has the approval of his Majesty the King—nay, it is his Majesty's desire that this union should be consummated. But the young lady flatly refuses. Why? Because, so she says and I believe it to be true, she is irrevocably in love with another man."

The visitor paused for breath, for he had spoken quickly and in a manner that denoted anxiety. Moran waited in silence for him to continue.

"What would you do in such a case, Monsieur Moran?"

"I?" stammered Moran, surprised at the question.

"Yes; I ask your advice."

Digitized by Google

"I should allow her to marry the man she loves!"

"But that is impossible!" exclaimed the visitor in decisive tones. "The man with whom she is in love is far below her in position. He is a man of honour, I doubt not; but he is only an actor. I mean no offence, but if you consider that her father is one of the noblest of the peers of France, you will understand how great is the difference between them and you will recognise that she cannot marry him."

"But if she loves him, how can she marry the other man?" objected Moran.

"I will tell you how it can be done," said the visitor, rising and placing his hand on Moran's shoulder.

The latter rose and faced him.

"Monsieur Moran, I am the Duke of Antin, the young lady is my daughter, and the man whom she says she loves is—you!"

Moran turned pale and trembled.

"You see what an immense gulf lies between you." pursued the Duke, more firmly now. "The way to make my daughter willing to contract this marriage which is so suitable, so desirable in every respect, is to drive out love by inspiring disgust. You can do this, and you will be rendering her a service. You must see that it is utterly impossible for her to marry you, and if you really love her you will not attempt to drag her down to your level. Then, if she can't marry you, why not make it possible for her to marry the peer who desires to possess her. You are an actor and can play a part with skill; it will be a sacrifice worthy of a great love, to kill her affection for you by playing a part that will cause her to loathe you."

Moran stood like one stunned; his thoughts chased one another through his mind with the rapidity of lightning. He recognised the truth of it all, but—oh! —how hard and cruel fate was to him!

"What do you wish me to do?" he asked, in a strange voice, after a long pause.

The next day Moran presented himself at the mansion of the Duke of Antin as a guest invited to dinner. He was not unaccustomed to the aspect of luxury, but the magnificence which confronted him at the very entrance of the Duke's residence was sufficient to abash him. A gorgeously-attired lackey announced his arrival, and he saw the Duke, leading his daughter by the hand, approaching to greet him.

"My dear, this is Monsieur Moran, the distinguished actor, who has consented to honour our table by his presence at dinner."

The Duke spoke in his courtliest manner; he could not have done more honour to a peer of equal rank with himself.

Mademoiselle Marie de Voudrin acknowledged Moran's salute with the utmost grace. Their eyes met for a moment and then they avoided each other's gaze. Both were extremely pale.

Moran thought of his own position in comparison with that of the girl he loved, and the reflection strengthened his determination to play the part which her father had asked him.

It was for her, he thought, and he nerved himself for the effort.

It was a family dinner party, so there were only those three at the table.

Having overcome his repugnance at playing the part that was to drive out love and inspire loathing, Moran lent himself to his task with all the skill of which he was capable.

He partook freely of the wine, and pretended that this beverage had its effect upon him. He behaved at the table like an ill-bred and vulgar member of the proletariat rather than like the gentleman he really was.

As the wine gradually muddled his brain, he sang snatches of vulgar songs, related coarse jokes and made himself in every way an object of disgust.

By the time the dinner was at an end he was to all appearances in such a disreputable condition that he was certainly not fit to dine with lackeys, to say nothing of the company in which he found himself.

As a climax, he slipped off his chair in the very midst of a drunken song, dragging the cloth with him and falling under the table to the sound of breaking plates and glass.

The girl left the table, her eyes distended with an expression which her father translated as one of ineffable disgust. When Moran heard the door shut he picked himself up and stood erect, tears falling from his eyes down his cheeks.

"Superb! Magnificent!" ejaculated the Duke, unable to find words to fittingly express his admiration. "You are a grand actor; you played that part with a skill beyond comparison. I believe my daughter simply hates the sight of you now. How can I ever repay you? Here, take this purse of gold, and I will send you ten times as much more! You refuse? But such skill ought to be well paid! Why, you have acted so admirably that there are actually real tears coming from your eyes! You must——"

But Moran cut him short by rushing from the room, his grief finding vent in a flood of tears which he could not repress.

The bells of the church were ringing, carriages were driving up to the door one after another, and people were standing in crowds to watch and satisfy their idle curiosity. Moran felt a pang at his heart. He heard one of the crowd utter the names of the Duke of Antin and his daughter, so he turned his steps in another direction and hurried away.

"Yes, I have succeeded! To-day she is to be married to a man of equal rank. A man whom she will be able to love now that she despises me!"

It was a bitter thought; he would not have altered the circumstances even if he could, for it was for the best. He had argued it out with himself many times, and each time he ended with the same decision, yet the argument was gone through on each successive day just as though it had never arisen before.

What was life to him now? He had, at first, thought of putting an end to his existence, but such a course would have been dishonourable alike to her and to himself. He must live it out.

In this frame of mind he arrived at his lodgings, and the first thing he saw was an envelope addressed to himself, in a handwriting that sent a thrill through and through him. He tore it open and read these lines:

"It was a noble sacrifice, worthy of a great love. It was only a part which you played, it was not real; the eyes of love are keen, and I saw through the plot. As it is decreed by fate that I cannot marry you, I will marry no other man; I vowed it that night under the convent wall, and I meant what I said. As I cannot enjoy the love of the man of my choice, the light is gone from this world for me, and I am about to take the veil. By the time this letter reaches you, the name of Marie de Voudrin will be a thing of the past, and she who bore it will be known as Sister Martha."

G. E. LINGEN.

Digitized by Google

THE LION'S WARS

The Two Great Burmese Wars of 1823-6 and 1854-6

HOW WE ACQUIRED BRITISH BURMAH.

OUR wars in India have been so numerous that at one time there existed a pretty general belief that the majority might have been averted, had we adopted a less masterful policy with the native rulers. For instance, in the war with Burmah it was held that the Bengal government had acted with great precipitancy; and we thought so too, till a thorough examination of the events which preceded the conflict, convinced us that the ceaseless intrigues of the Burmese with the native Princes of India rendered hostilities sooner or later inevitable.

Burmah lies on the eastern shore of the Bay of Bengal, and its lands extend along the valley of the Irrawady. At the time of its conquest by Britain, Burmah was peopled by a race with a Thibet-Chinese origin, the original dynasty being known as the Sovereignity of Ava. The kingdom of Ava came to an end in 1750.

A warlike chief, Alungpaya, installed himself as ruler, bequeathing to his successors a policy of expansion which they dutifully endeavoured to carry out. One of them in 1784 annexed Arrakan, and another in 1808 added Assam to his dominions.

The extending policy of their rulers was highly pleasing to the Burmese.

Afflicted with a colossal vanity, they regarded themselves as quite the foremost nation in the world.

Consequently, when they learnt that their traditional policy would not be tolerated by the authorities in Calcutta, they gave the envoy we sent them to understand that they looked upon us as interlopers and that if we attempted to prevent them from enlarging their dominions they should drive us out of the country.

Our statesmen, feeling that India required a period of repose after so many wars, sent two embassies to Ava to try and arrange matters amicably; but, as usual with Oriental races who believe only in force, our remonstrances were treated as signs of fear, and as they were densely ignorant of our power and resources, the members of the second mission were treated in the most insolent fashion.

The resources of diplomacy being exhausted, war was formally declared on February 24th, 1824.

From the first it became apparent that, apart from the warlike character of the people, Lower Burmah was not an ideal country for military operations. A region of forest and morass, the country, even when not inundated, was covered with so many pestilential swamps as to make a prolonged stay extremely dangerous. Little, too, was known of the country, save in the neighbourhood of the rivers. Indeed, the greater part may be said to have been quite unexplored.

To march an army several hundred miles through an enemy's country is always a hazardous operation, but when the population is hostile, and maps are not to be had, the risks are vastly increased.

The defensive methods of the Burmese in war were admirably adapted to the country. In the old days, when hostile tribes warred with each other, they retarded, if indeed they did not prevent, the progress of the adversary by series of stockades over twenty feet high, of enormous strength, and intrenchments. Inside these stockades high platforms carried numerous guns discharging balls of about twelve ounces.

Digitized by Google

The army sent consisted of 11,000 men under General Sir Archibald Campbell. On May 11th, 1824, the troops ascended the Irrawady and blockaded Rangoon. Then came the rains, the damp heat causing so much sickness that in a short time almost the entire army was unfit for duty. Enough men were left, however, to attack Kamainet, which boasted of a stockade believed by the Burmese to be impregnable.

It was no doubt a formidable specimen of native fortification, and was, moreover, defended by thirty pieces of artillery; but our men soon stormed it, one result of the victory being that Synam, the ancient capital of Pegu, fell into our hands. This reverse somewhat lowered the belief of the Burmese in their invincibility, but their arrogance temporarily revived after the defeat of Colonel Smith and a brigade of native infantry at Kaiklu, October 7th, 1824. Then a crushing defeat at Kokein on December 15th again discouraged them. The resistance offered was so feeble that we had little difficulty in capturing Assam.

A couple of victories led to this province being formally annexed January 25th, 1825. These successes encouraged Calcutta to make a fresh effort to subjugate the Burmese, so two more expeditions were got ready, the main object being to capture Ava. One of 11,000 men under General Morrison was to proceed by way of Chittagong across the mountains to Ava.

The other, 7,000 strong, under Colonel Smith was to traverse Kachar and then march along the valley of the Ningti till a union was effected. The plan miscarried, the forests, rivers, and swamps encountered were so numerous, that after struggling for two months Colonel Smith returned.

The army of General Morrison fared but little better. The Burmese proved on acquaintance to be a deal more cunning than courageous. They made no effort to prevent us conquering Arakan, their plan being to lure us into the interior, where the unhealthiness of the climate might be trusted to decimate our numbers. After struggling for four months to defeat Generals Fever and Dysentery, the army was withdrawn to the coast.

In the following year, 1825, General Campbell renewed the attempt to penetrate the unknown fastnesses and pestilential jungles of Chittagong at a point the Burmese least expected. This time the force was divided into three expeditions under the respective commands of Generals Campbell, Cotton, and Major (afterwards Sir Robert) Sale. On the last named officer reaching Bassien the Burmese fired the town and retired. Not knowing what to do next, in fact greatly perplexed, Sale returned to Rangoon.

General Cotton fared even worse. Ascending the Irrawady his men made a most gallant attempt to storm Donabem. But the stockade which surrounded the town was so strong, and the 140 guns protecting it so ably served, that the losses increased with such rapidity that 12,000 picked men of the Burmese army were induced to leave the stockade and attack us in the open.

The qualities they exhibited were not quite so phenomenal as one had been led to believe, but they fought so well that it took our men two hours to drive them back.

From the 3rd to the 23rd of April we fought a series of pitched battles, in which, although vastly outnumbered, we drove them from every position they took up.

On the 25th of April we entered Prome.

After this the enemy so lost heart that it was seldom they could be got to make a stand.

When their forces—swelled by reinforcements—reached a total of 30,000 men they would carefully select a position and wait for us to attack them, but the result was always the same.

They were good soldiers, more than a match probably for any native troops, but they could not stand the determined rushes of the red-coats.

In February, 1826, we had penetrated to Vandabu, sixty miles from Ava.

With no prospect of staying our advance the now humbled Burmese concluded a treaty, making over to us Arrakan and and Tenasserim.

In addition they paid us a crore of rupees, not so much to defray the expenses of the war but as a proof of their submission.

The Burmese, however, did not long retain their kindly sentiments for us. Besides exacting land and money, we had compelled them to accept the presence of a British Resident at Ava. The Burmese emperor, who called himself the Elder Brother of China and "the Lord which is the greatest of Kings," naturally regarded with intense hatred the civilian gentleman who kept such a watchful eye over the interests of the British traders, and grew so stern when the detested treaty was infringed—detested chiefly because the emperor knew that it was entered into by the predecessor whom he had got rid of.

It was not pleasant, after killing off all the reigning family in order to render his own dynasty secure, to have his supremacy disputed by a barbarian envoy. The Burmese sovereign having resolved to be master in his own dominions, proceeded to treat our representative with such marked discourtesy that in 1840 the Resident retired to Rangoon.

During the next twelve years diplomatic relations were suspended. Twelve years is so long a time that the emperor at last began to think that the British lion had gone to sleep. He presently became so convinced of this that he seized the property of the British traders at Rangoon, besides subjecting the persons of two of them to the greatest indignity.

The Government now acted with promptitude. The emperor was not only called on to compensate the merchants for their losses, apologise to the British crown, and pay a fine of one million rupees; but to bring home to this Buddhist potentate the dangers attaching to waking up the royal beast, we dispatched several war vessels to Rangoon and demanded its surrender. The Governor of that place, however, modelling his deportment upon that of his royal master grossly insulted out naval officers. Being deficient in artillery, we had to be content with blockading the port.

Without an instant's delay, an expedition was fitted out. The land forces consisted of 4,500 men of all ranks and were placed under the command of General Godwin, whose plans seemed to have been characterised by commendable foresight, for he at once proceeded to blockade the Irrawady. A prudent move this, for as Ava drew all its foodstuffs by way of this river, the pinch of hunger was soon felt.

Digitized by Google

Drawn by] [C. Lawson Wood.

When some of the storming parties broke in a city gate some of the gunners fastened to the guns fainted.

Digitized by Google

Then a night march gave us the town of Martaban. The enemy were permitted to see us start in the direction of Bassien and of course concluded that was our destination. At nightfall, the route was suddenly changed, and before Martaban could set its defence in order, our men were in the town beating down all opposition.

Admiral Austin, who commanded the fleet, then captured Bassien, which gave us command of the whole of the sea coast. The most brilliant achievement of this war, however, was the storming of Rangoon, especially noteworthy being the capture of the world-famed Golden Pagoda, a Buddhist temple held in the deepest veneration by the Burmese.

Standing in the middle of a plain, this towering edifice, 350ft. high, was visited yearly by over ten million pilgrims.

Its defences were of the most formidable description. A stockade lined with guns which surrounded the Pagoda, was of such enormous strength that even resident European merchants believed that it was impossible to capture.

In anticipation of hostilities, the government of Rangoon had further strengthened the Golden Pagoda by distributing twenty-five guns of large calibre in various parts of the building. To crown all, a wall fifteen feet high and twelve feet thick, had been built behind the stockade.

On the 12th April the H. E. I. Company's steamers and H. M. gunboats opened fire on the Golden Pagoda.

The greatest importance was attached to the capture of the Pagoda, as it was thought that its fall would convince every Buddhist in India of the hopelessness of opposing the British.

Although the Burmese had not forgotten the thrashing they had previously incurred at our hands, they had not the slightest anticipation of a fresh defeat, for was not the celebrated Burmese guard known as the "Immortals of the Golden Country," with them. How could they lose when the discipline of these redoubtable warriors compelled them to die at their posts?

To further equalise matters and to increase the courage of his other soldiers, the Burmese king had seized the wives of the married men and publicly announced that he should hold them as hostages for their husbands doing their duty. The single men were either chained by the artful monarch to the guns at the fort or tied to their married companions.

Long before our troops arrived we learnt how formidable were the preparations for our reception. But our men prepared to accomplish the task set before them with their usual dogged thoroughness. In fact, they were so little dismayed that to get what they call their hand in they first took the forts, rushing them one after the other in the coolest possible manner.

After the coast defences had all been blown up these indomitable fighters then turned their attention to Rangoon.

Whether it was the fierce cheering or the deadly rushes, the courage of the Burmese sank to so low an ebb that when one of the storming parties broke in a city gate some of the gunners fastened to the guns fainted. The rest of the garrison scampered out on the opposite side of the town and made straight for the Golden Pagoda, where by this time an enormous force had collected to prevent the ruins of their beloved Temple from being desecrated by the barbarian.

As soon as we arrived at the famous shrine we set about destroying the great wall in order to get at the force behind, but the débris was so great that but for a timely supply of scaling ladders we should never have succeeded in getting to the other side.

To drop from the summit of a lofty wall into the midst of dense masses of infuriated natives filled with the hope of killing, before they died, those sacrilegious dogs, the British, was not a pleasant prospect. But our men recked nothing of the danger. They mounted the wall and jumped into the seething mass below as if it were an ordinary every day occurrence. But once down they took good care to keep the enemy back till they were joined by more.

What the British cannot accomplish in war has yet to be discovered. At one time on that eventful day 20 of them kept 500 Burmese at bay. "The Immortals of the Golden Country," true to their traditions, fought when confronted by our red-coats and died at their posts; in fact the carnage was so dreadful that had not the Elder Brother of China been lulled into security by the flatteries of his wives he would have hastened to make peace.

After we had killed all the "Immortals of the Golden Country," the army, being supremely contented with itself, rested.

In the autumn of 1852 they started afresh, their next achievement being the capture of the city of Prome. This gave us the command of the river to the royal capital which had, for a long time, been on short commons on account of our blockade of the Irrawady.

Pegu was the next town that fell into our hands. The garrison evinced the greatest boldness till Mr. Atkins was seen to be marching steadily, not to say stolidly, on the city, when they fled. As the infatuated Emperor still refused to treat, and as the inhabitants of Ava were terribly afraid of their city being desecrated by the presence of a barbarian army, they deposed their ruler and placed his brother on the throne, and he at once proceeded to make terms with the conquerors.

On April 4th, 1853, the Burmese Commissioners and our representative met at Prome and concluded a treaty, the terms of which, it is safe to say, are already shaping the course of events in China. Lord Dalhousie must have been a statesman of the most extraordinary foresight, for his sole aim when drawing up the treaty seems to have been a desire to secure us against covetous designs the French might harbour in the future against Southern China.

Our representatives were instructed to insist on the cession of the whole of the coast line with Pegu and Martaban. The Burmese were aghast, Pegu alone comprised an area of 40,000 square miles and a population of three million persons. Sir Arthur Phayre gave the king forty-eight hours to consider, and next day held a review of the troops, the quality of our men so impressing the king that he agreed, providing he was allowed to cede the land by letter and not by treaty. This was agreed to, and peace was restored on June 30th, 1853.

We now held four provinces. In 1862 these were all welded into British Burmah. The existence of British Burmah has brought so much of the surrounding country within the sphere of British influence that when the increasing decay of France has weakened her Colonial policy there will be no competition to share with us free access to the richest districts of Southern China.

[Next Week: The British Legion in Spain, 1835-1837.]

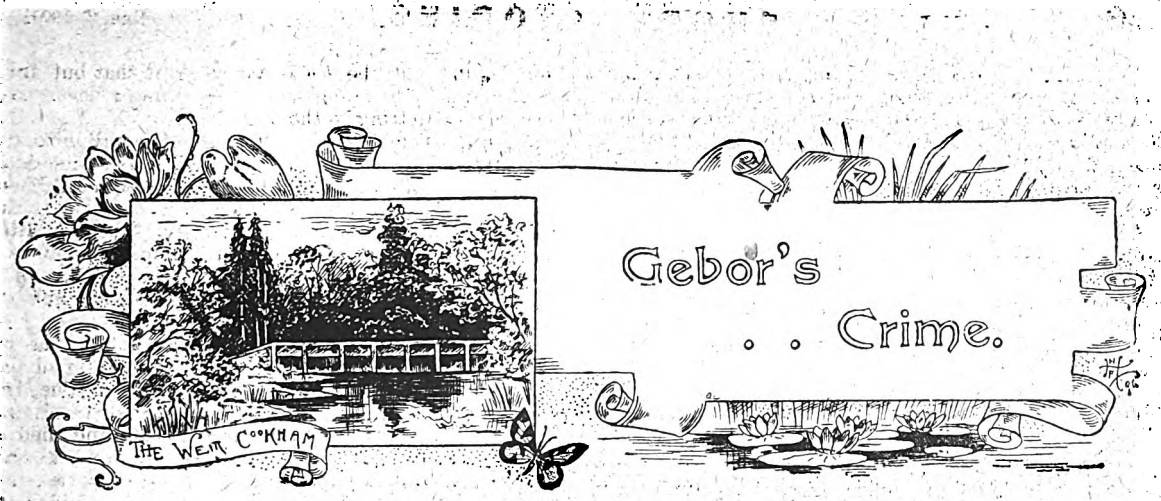
Digitized by Google



"I COULD kill him!"

The words were uttered in a fierce, hoarse whisper. The speaker was a short man, whose form indicated great strength; his countenance did not betoken any great intelligence, but gave evidence of a violent temper—a man who might be led into wrong-doing or crime out of sheer defiance or obstinacy, a man who regarded every little cross in life as an act expressly directed by fate against himself.

He was a Hungarian with a dash of Italian blood. He lived in a small village in the south of Austria, where he carried on the not very lucrative business of a shoemaker. He rented a small cottage from the chief man of the village, an individual whose character was by no means good and who seemed to be gifted with that peculiar quality which delights in making things hard for other people.

Nicolas Gebor, the shoe-maker, had suffered from this peculiarity of his landlord; it was not an easy task to make both ends meet, so Gebor was usually behind with his rent, and he never had any rest until it was paid. Gebor noticed, or fancied that he noticed, that his landlord seized every opportunity of making life harder for him—and everyone who knows anything of rural life, even in our own country, will understand what this means.

Gebor had a daughter, Minna, a girl of about nineteen, whose youthful affections had been set upon a promising young man of the same village—a young fellow who was working his way up steadily to the position of a small proprietor; but here again the hand of Nadar made itself felt. The promised husband of Minna found it impossible to realise his ambition, owing to the opposition of Nadar, and had to leave the village for another part of the country in order to try his luck.

But that was not quite all. Morai went away from his native village under a cloud; a robbery had been committed at the house of Nadar and Morai was accused of the crime. However, in spite of the influence of Nadar, the theft could not be proved against the young fellow; all the evidence that could be adduced amounted to little more than the fact that the stolen article had been missed immediately after a visit paid by Morai to Nadar on the subject of the farm which the former wished to acquire.

But Nadar's influence, although it could not secure the conviction, was sufficient to induce people to point the finger of scorn at both Morai and the shoe-maker's daughter. This was not a difficult task, for both the young people appeared to be above the ordinary run of the villagers, and small minded people usually resent that kind of thing; however much you may be above them in reality and however modest you may be, your natural difference excites their envy and malice.

As a matter of fact, Nadar had set his eye upon Minna and wanted her for himself, but this proposition had been rejected by Minna and her father with a unanimity that was surprising so far as Gebor himself was concerned, considering what a good match it would have been and how easily his own difficulties would have been smoothed away thereby.

Gebor was led to give utterance to the words just quoted by the desperate position in which he found himself. Morai had been driven from the village with a stain on his character, the stain of a charge that could be neither proved nor disproved; Gebor himself, having spent all he possessed and having pledged some of his goods and his credit, in order to provide for the defence of Morai, whose own savings had also been swallowed up, was unable to pay his rent and was threatened with eviction; while during the past day or two, a rumour had been circulated concerning Minna which had nearly driven the old man mad.

"It is all his doing! I could kill him!"

This time Gebor's words came more fiercely. He would probably have continued his audible mutterings had not a hand been placed on his shoulder and a voice said:

"Hush, father!"

Gebor turned with a start, his face distorted with rage and fear; he heaved a sigh of relief when he found that it was his daughter who confronted him. So deep had been his meditation that he had not recognised the voice or understood the words.

"Don't say such wicked things, father!" cried Minna, clasping her hands and looking appealingly at him. "You make me frightened. It will all come right some day, God will see that everything is made clear."

"Yes, yes, yes!" muttered the old man in a shame-faced manner, avoiding her gaze. "Don't take any notice of what I say, Minna, it's only my—joking."

"Then don't joke any more like that, father, but come and have some dinner," said the girl, trying to assume a bright aspect in order to cheer her father. "It isn't much, but it tastes very nice and it will do you good. Come along!" And, taking him by the arm, she led him into the little kitchen where the poor repast was ready.

Digitized by Google

Gebor was silent during the first part of the meal, but became more cheerful, apparently, towards the finish. But he did not eat much and retired to his little workshop as soon as he could.

There was no work for him to do just then and this gave him another opportunity of following the unpleasant train of thought which had been interrupted by his daughter.

Why should this man have it in his power to do so much mischief? Why should any man have such power? Nations had from time to time thrown off the yoke of the one who was ruling them with too severe a hand, and this as often as regarded as a meritorious action and as patriotism; the people of a country submitted to such a yoke only so long as they were too weak to strike a blow against it. Was it not just to say that what was good for a whole nation was good for one village also? Would not their own village be better if Nadar were removed? It was not possible to depose this man as a king would be deposed, but—in some countries the ruler had paid for his misdeeds with his life! With his life!

The words seemed to sink into the mind of Gebor and to haunt him. He could not get rid of them; he saw them in letters of fire all round his workshop, no matter which way he looked, and as the darkness came on, so they shone more brightly.

Was it wicked to rid the world of such a monster? Surely not. It was not right that this man should make life miserable for everyone else; he could not believe that to rid the world of Nadar would be to incur the penalty meted out to ordinary criminals who took life in order to rob. No, no! Such an act as that which something was now whispering to him to commit was a different thing entirely, a justifiable deed.

He brooded over this until darkness enveloped him. He had a vague idea that his daughter had looked in during the afternoon to remind him that she was going to the next village on an errand—to take home some work which she had been doing—and that she would not be home till late; she had said something about his not forgetting his tea. But Gebor had not thought of tea; he had thought of nothing except Nadar.

Then there seemed to be a blank, and after this interval his thoughts became active again and stirred him to deeds. Suppose he killed Nadar? How quiet it was! His cottage was in a lonely part—suppose Nadar were to call on him and badger him for the rent, as he had done before, just out of pure devilment? No one would know; the hated landlord would disappear!

Again there was a blank, and then a knock at the door. Before Gebor could rise to open it, the head and shoulders of Nadar appeared.

"Remember, if I don't have it by to-morrow mid-day, out you go—you and that daughter of yours and all your sticks!"

Gebor restrained his rising anger and asked Nadar to come in.

"I have a word to say to you, respected sir," he explained in his humblest tones. "It is about the rent. Come in and shut the door, it is cold outside."

There was just enough light from the moon to enable the two men to see each other dimly. Nadar came in and shut the door.

"Sitting without a light so as to save your money to pay me, eh?" asked Nadar with a sneer. "What is it? Be quick, for I have no time to waste!"

Gebor approached him with a deferential attitude, but Nadar waved him back.

"Get a light. I don't care to stand in this infernal place without a lamp. Be quick or I won't wait. Do ——"

That was his last word, for Gebor sprang at him and gripped him by the throat. Without a sound Nadar went down with a crash, Gebor still digging his fingers into the throat of the tyrant, the man who had injured him so deeply. Nadar struggled strongly, but he was no match for his opponent, who held him until the struggling ceased. The deed was done and the village was free of the oppressor.

Gebor rose and lighted a candle. He was full of exultation; he would not be turned out of his home, for some time must elapse before anything could be done by the heir, whoever he might be, and that would give Gebor a chance of raking the money together. How everyone would rejoice!

He bent over the body and surveyed the face by the light of his candle; then there came a gradual change of feeling and exultation began to give place to remorse and fear.

What right had he to usurp the functions of the law or the prerogative of the Almighty? All the glamour that had filled him when thinking of national rebellions had now disappeared, and he saw his crime in its true light. He was a murderer, one who had taken life to evade the payment of a just debt. It was a just debt, for he owed the money and admitted the fact, and although his landlord had threatened him with harsh treatment, yet that was no excuse for so horrible a crime.

Two blacks do not make a white; hard dealing on the part of Nadar was by no means a sufficient reason for the committal of a murder.

Now Gebor began to realise the full consequences of what he had done.

"They will drag me away to prison and hang me!" he muttered, clenching his hands in terror. "Minna will be laughed at, she will be pointed at as the daughter of a murderer. Minna's heart will be broken when she learns that her father, whom she loves so dearly, is to go to the gallows! My dead wife is looking down upon me from above with horror. I can never expect that, or the punishment that will come hereafter, but—yes, yes!—there may be a chance of escaping the hangman and avoiding the disgrace for Minna. I must hide the body; I must get rid of it at once. I must carry it far away from here, so as to avoid suspicion. The gallows! I can feel—No, no! Anything but that; I cannot go through that!"

His voice rose to a shriek with the last word; his whole body trembled with fear so that he could scarcely keep upright.

Every time the window shook as the wind blew against it, Gebor started and uttered a cry of terror. He stood in the middle of the room and dared not make a step in any direction lest he should find himself in the grasp of someone who had come to denounce him, and hand him over to the representatives of justice.

He knew that he must act promptly in order to hide what he had done, yet he had not the strength to move. Although he tried to keep his eyes averted from the ghastly thing that lay on the floor, he was obliged to look at it; the distorted face seemed to be still alive, and to be leering at him.

His eyes were riveted to that face until his agony of terror nearly overturned his reason; with a cry more like that of a savage beast than of a human being, he at last made a desperate plunge at the body, lifted it in his strong arms, threw it across his shoulder and staggered with his burden into the open.

Digitized by Google

He must take it away without being seen—anywhere, anywhere! His strength came back to him now that he was outside, for he understood that he might be seen and that in order to avoid such a catastrophe he must be quick to fulfil his mission.

He hurried along almost at a run, taxing his strength to the utmost, until his breath came thick and fast and the perspiration stood on his forehead in spite of the keen cold air of the autumn night. On, on! he could not go fast enough to outstrip his own fears; at frequent intervals he looked back to make sure he was not being followed, but although he could see nothing, he was not convinced.

He chose the loneliest paths leading to the open country, but he started and occasionally almost stumbled at the ordinary night sounds. At last, quite exhausted, he reached a stream and into the calm water he threw his burden.

He was home again without being seen and just a few minutes before his daughter returned. She reproached him gently for not having had his tea, and prepared a supper for him, of which he ate but little, and did not enjoy in the least.

The next morning there was a sensation in the village, for Nadar had vanished—gone without leaving a trace behind him. All that was known was that he had set out in the afternoon for a walk across country—a favourite form of recreation with him—and had not been seen since. Inquiries were made, and it was discovered that he had left the town eight miles off, in order to return home, just after nightfall. But all else remained shrouded in mystery.

Gebor's idea, that he would be allowed to rest in peace, was not realised; the order had been given by Nadar, and as the money was not forthcoming, the shoemaker and his daughter were turned out. They succeeded in getting one of the villagers to take them in for the time, while their few belongings were stored in the yard. So far as he was concerned, therefore, Gebor's crime was no benefit.

But this failure had scarcely any effect upon him, he was too absorbed by the fear of detection, and by remorse. Nadar haunted him not only in his waking hours, but also in his sleep. He scarcely dared go out by himself; he insisted on his daughter accompanying him. He dreamt that awful scene over and over again, starting up in his sleep with a shriek as he fancied that the face of Nadar, with that leer upon it, was looking at him from the end of his bed.

Everywhere he saw that dread object which he had carried from his workshop to the stream; whenever he passed by a ditch or any hollow place that figure appeared to bob into sight and point an accusing finger at him.

He grew pale and thin; he wasted at an incredibly fast rate, and he himself recognised that he could not live long under such conditions. Truly, the vengeance of Heaven was overtaking him.

Three days after, there came the intelligence which he had expected—Nadar's body was discovered, half on the banks and half in the stream. Nadar had risen from the grave, so to speak, in order to accuse him. And on the body, so the report ran, was found something that must lead to the detection of the murderer.

"My time has come!" exclaimed Gebor to himself when this rumour reached him. "In an hour or two they will be here to drag me to prison and to the gallows! I cannot face it; I cannot face my daughter's grief and her abhorrence! I must kill myself before they come!"

He looked about the little room which had been set apart for the accommodation of himself and his daughter; there was a beam and he might hang himself. He recognised that it was a just punishment; it was the death he had dealt out to his victim. Even as he looked at the beam he heard footsteps coming up the rickety stairs—they were coming for him! He glared about him like a wild beast seeking a way of escape; there was no time to carry out his intention of destroying himself.

He hastened to the little window and threw it open. If he could drop to the ground he might evade the officers of the law for just long enough to check them. He knelt upon the sill, but a hand grasped him and shook him. He screamed in his terror, then——

"Father, what is the matter?" He heard the voice of his daughter as though from a long distance. "What ails you? You have fallen asleep, and had a bad dream, is that it? Poor dear, I ought not to have left you, but I am back now, and we will have supper. I see you have had no tea."

"Nadar?" gasped the shoemaker, clutching his daughter. "Tell me, is he alive? I thought—Oh, thank Heaven it is not real!" and he sank back again on his stool and wept like a child.

Minna wanted to know all about it, and when her father had thoroughly realized that he had fallen asleep while brooding over his misfortunes and wrongs, and that this awful experience was but a dream, he told her briefly what he had gone through.

"I am glad for your sake, dear father," said Minna with tears in her eyes, "that Heaven has been pleased to teach you this lesson in such a way. I have been afraid for you, I dreaded that you might do something for which we should all be sorry, and ever since I heard you utter those wicked words this morning I have been uneasy. We are in great trouble, but a wicked action of any kind will not help us—sooner or later we shall suffer for it. We must bear our troubles bravely, and all will be well one day."

It is not an uncommon experience in life that light comes just when we are giving up hope that the darkness will ever vanish, and thus it was with Gebor.

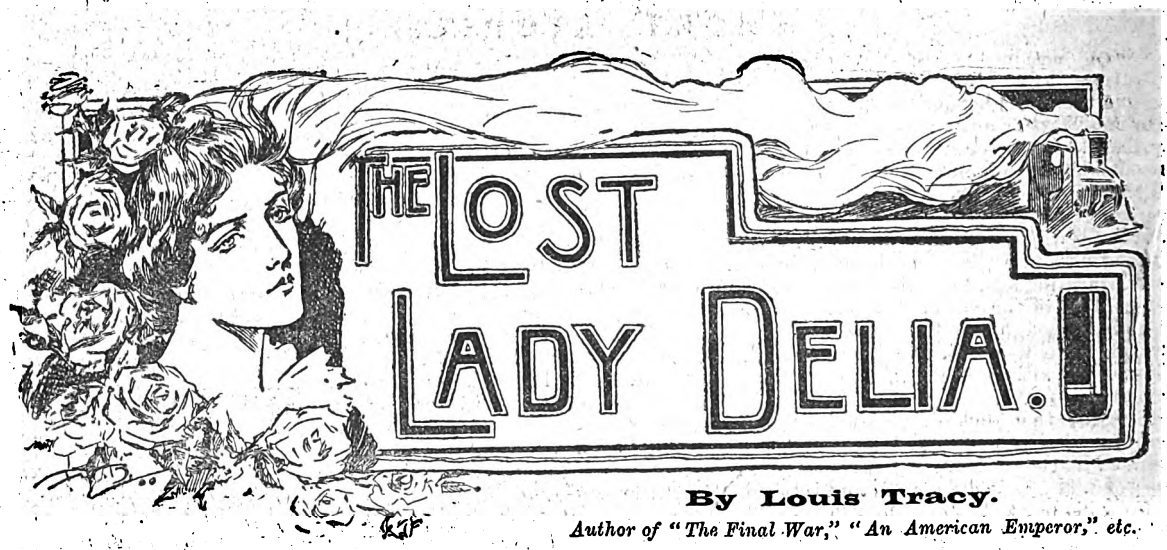
On the following day the villagers heard that Nadar was ill. Gebor was left undisturbed in his little home for several weeks, as his landlord's illness proved to be of such a serious nature that his life was despaired of for a time, and he was kept to his bed and his room for more than two months. Work came in more briskly to the old shoemaker, while Minna and the banished Moria were able to earn and save a little, thus it happened that the rent was ready when Nadar was sufficiently recovered to make applications for it. But to the surprise of Gebor, he was sent for by Nadar and his money returned to him.

"Gebor, I have been to the very gate of death, and when a man is face to face with death his opinions undergo a change," said Nadar gravely, not noticing that Gebor shivered. "I have not dealt fairly by you and yours; let me make it up to you now. You may tell it where you please that I have wronged you, and that I have found the missing article which Morai was thought to have stolen. Tell him to come back and he shall have a farm as a present from me!"

Gebor stammered a few words of thanks, then fell on his knees and raised a prayer to Heaven that he himself had been saved from a great sin.

GEORGE DAY.

Digitized by Google



By Louis Tracy.

Author of "The Final War," "An American Emperor," etc.

READ THIS BEFORE YOU BEGIN.

LADY DELIA LYLE leaves her house one foggy November afternoon, saying she is going to see her sister at Richmond, but from that time she is not heard of.

Her husband, Sir Charles Lyle, puts the matter into the hands of detectives, Inspector Winter taking charge of the case.

Reginald Brett, a barrister friend of the Lyles, also promises to do all he can, and he finds out that Lady Delia, on the night of her disappearance, instead of going to Richmond, alighted at Sloane Square, and went to a block of flats called Raleigh Mansions.

Towards the end of the month the body of a woman, evidently murdered, is found wedged beneath a drain-pipe in the Thames at Putney, and, though Sir Charles does not identify the body, Brett imagines it to be that of Lady Delia. Shortly after this discovery Lady Delia's maid, Jane Harding, disappears. She is afterwards found to have gone on the stage.

Brett now starts investigations at Raleigh Mansions, and he fixes on two residents there as being likely to have been connected with Lady Delia. These are a Mr. Sydney H. Pyne, who is not at present in residence, and a Mrs. Hillmer, whom he finds to be Pyne's sister.

It had transpired that Pyne had gone to Monte Carlo, and thither Brett goes, and he discovers that though letters are addressed to Pyne at the Hotel du Cercle, he is not known there.

During his stay at Monte Carlo Brett becomes acquainted with an Englishman, named Albert Mensmore, whom he helps out of some money difficulties, but he does not discover anything about Pyne.

After his return Brett finds out that Sir Charles Lyle knows Albert Mensmore, but in what connection does not transpire.

A few days later Brett goes into the City, to the office of Dodge and Co., with whom he had had some speculative dealings, and from remarks made by Mr. Dodge, he thinks that Pyne and Mensmore must be one and the same man. In the evening Brett and Winter go to Raleigh Mansions and search the flat occupied by Pyne. Brett finds that a piece of one of the fire-dogs is missing, and that it exactly corresponds with the piece of iron which was found imbedded in the head of the body found at Putney.

CHAPTER XV.

MRS. HILLMER HESITATES.

"I WONDER if I shall have such exciting times to-day as I had yesterday," said Brett to himself, as he unfolded his Times next morning at breakfast.

Affairs had so jumbled themselves together in his brain the previous evening that he had abandoned all effort to elucidate them. He retired to rest earlier than usual, to sleep soundly, save for a vivid dream in which he was being tried for his life, the chief witnesses against him being Mrs. Hillmer, Phyllis Browne, and Jane Harding, the latter varying her evidence by entertaining the Court with a song and dance.

The weather, too, had improved. It was clear, frosty, and sunlit—one of those delightful days of winter that serve as cheerful remembrances during periods of seemingly interminable fog overhead and slush beneath.

During a quiet meal he read the news, and, with the invaluable morning smoke, settled himself cosily into an armchair to consider procedure.

In the first place, he carefully weighed those utterances of Mensmore at Monte Carlo, which he could recall, and which seemed, by the light of later knowledge, to bear upon the case.

Mensmore had alluded to "family troubles," to "worries," and "anxieties," that practically drove him from England. Some of these, no doubt, referred to the Springbok speculation. Others, again, might have meant Mrs. Hillmer or some presently unknown relative. But in Mensmore's manner there was nothing that savoured of greater secrecy than the natural reticence a gentleman has in discussing domestic affairs with a stranger.

This man had practically been snatched from death. At such a moment it was inconceivable that he could cloak the remorse of a murderer by the simulation of more honourable motives, in themselves sufficiently distressing to cause him to deliberately choose suicide as the best way of ending his difficulties.

The policeman had summarised the testimony against Pyne as insufficient to curtail the remarkable powers of endurance of a cat. But to Brett the case against Mensmore, alias Pyne, stood in clearer outline. Now that he could calmly reason the matter he felt that the balance of probabilities swung away from the hypothesis that Mensmore was the actual slayer of Lady Delia, and towards the theory that he was in some way bound up with her death, whether knowingly or unknowingly it was at present impossible to say.

The new terror to Brett was Mr. Winter.

"Why, if that animated truncheon knew all that I know of this business he would arrest Mensmore forthwith! If he did, what would result? A scandal, a thorough exposure, possibly the ruin of Mensmore's love-making if he be an innocent man. That must be stopped. But how? Without forewarning Mensmore himself—and he may be guilty. Chance may favour Winter, as it favoured me, in disclosing the identity of the missing Pyne. And what of the real Pyne? What on earth has he got to do with it, and why has Mensmore taken his name? If ever I get to the bottom of this business I may well congratulate myself. The sole result of all my labour thus far may be summed up in a sentence—I have not yet come face to face with the man whom I can honestly suspect as Lady Delia's murderer. Not much, my boy!"

Reggie uttered the last sentence aloud, startling Smith, who was clearing the table.

"Beg pardon, sir," cried Smith.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, nothing. I was only expressing an opinion."

"I thought, perhaps, sir, you was thinkin' of Mr. Winter."

"What of him?"

"Your remark, sir, hexactly hexpresses my hopinion of 'im."

Smith was not a badly educated man, but the least excitement produced an appalling derangement of the letter "h" in his vocabulary.

"Mr. Winter is all right in his own way, Smith."

"Maybe, but why should he come pokin' round 'ere pryin' into your little affairs, deecur?"

"My what?"

"Sorry, sir, but that's what a French maid I once knew called 'em. Flirtations, sir. Mashes."

"Smith, have you been drinking?"

"Me, sir?"

"Well, explain yourself. I never flirted with a woman in my life."

"That's what I told 'im, sir. 'My master's a regular saint,' says I, 'a sort of middle-aged ankyrite.' But Mr. Winter 'e wouldn't 'ave it at no price. 'Come now, Smith,' says 'e, 'your guv'nor's pretty deep. 'E's a toff, 'e is, an' knows lots of lydies—titled lydies.' 'Very like,' says I, 'but 'e doesn't mash 'em.' 'Then what price that lydy who called for 'im in a keb afore 'e went away? An' who's 'e gone to Monte Carlo with?' This was during your habsence, sir."

"Go on, Smith. Anything else?"

"Well, sir, that rather flung me out of my stride, as the sayin' is, as I 'ad seen the lydy in question. An' Mr. Winter 'as a nasty way of putting you on your oath, so to speak. But I never owned up."

Brett laughed.

"Excellent. Mr. Winter has a keen nose for false scents. I have already told him to leave my affairs alone. He means no harm."

"Not much, my boy!" Reggie uttered the last sentence aloud, startling Smith, who was clearing the table.

But the reference to a "lydy in a keb" had suggested an immediate plan of action to the barrister. He would call and see Mrs. Hillmer. He wrote a note asking her if he might come to tea that afternoon, and sent it by a boy messenger.

In return he received this answer:

"Mrs. Hillmer will be at home at four o'clock if Mr. Brett cares to call then."

"Phew!" whistled Reggie. "What's in the wind there? This is an uncommonly stiff invitation. That rascal Winter has upset her, I'll be bound. I must choke him off somehow. Suppose he were to find that damaged bracket! He would have Mensmore under trial at the Old Bailey in double-quick time. After I leave Mrs. Hillmer I must visit No. 12 again and carry off the pair of brackets before Winter discovers them, as he will haunt the place in future."

Brett had a set of skeleton keys in his possession.

They were in his pocket when he approached Raleigh Mansions at the appointed hour.

The same trim maid opened the door for him and ushered him into the drawing-room. On the occasion of his first visit he was taken to the dining-room. It was a small matter, but Brett paid heed to such.

Mrs. Hillmer appeared, very stately and undemonstrative. She greeted Brett coldly, seated herself at a distance, and said, in a cold, well-controlled voice:—

"I did not expect the honour of another visit from you, Mr. Brett."

"Why not?" There was a fight brewing, and he would let the enemy open fire, for the glitter in her eyes showed that the batteries were ready to be unmasked. He was not mistaken.

"Why not? Because I believed you to be a gentleman. Once you had stooped to sending your myrmidons to pester me I imagined that you would yourself keep in the background."

There was an indignant ring in her words as she concluded. When a woman is angry her own speech acts as a trumpet-call and fires her blood. Mrs. Hillmer began, as she intended, in icy disdain. She ended in tremulous anger.

"You allude to Mr. Winter," said the barrister, looking steadily at her.

"Yes, that is the man. Some hireling from Scotland Yard. How could you so meanly induce my confidence at our first meeting? I have never been so deceived in a man in my life, and I have had a surfeit of bitter experience already."

"Brother and sister are alike. They have led queer lives," mused Brett. Aloud he said:

"Your experience, Mrs. Hillmer, should at least lead you not to condemn any one unheard. May I explain that which is to you incomprehensible at this moment?—justly so, I must admit."

"Explanations! I am a child in the hands of such as you. How can I hope to fathom your real intent? Presumably, if I accept your apologies now, it will be a prelude to further visits by impudent police officers."

Digitized by Google

"I am not here to apologise, Mrs. Hilmer."

"What then, pray?"

"To plead with you. For Heaven's sake do not distrust me. It may ruin those whom you hold dear. Listen to me first, and try to believe me afterwards."

Brett was so thoroughly in earnest, so impressive in manner, that the other did not know what to make of him. In her despair she adopted a woman's chief resource—her eyes filled with tears.

But Brett anticipated her. "Now, Mrs. Hillmer," he cried, "let us act like sensible people. Compose yourself, order in some tea, and after an interlude I will tell you all about it. Candour is an indispensable element of confidence."

Mrs. Hillmer rose, made an effort to choke back her agitation, went out, and called to the maid for tea. She returned in a few moments. When they were alone Brett said, with a smile:

"A little poudre de riz is an excellent corrective for signs of grief."

The lady blushed, and there was a perceptible return to her former peasant manner.

"You are incorrigible, I fear, Mr. Brett," she cried.

"Now, Mrr. Hillmer," he began; but she broke in vehemently, running to him and clutching him by the arm.

"Not a bit. Impressionable, rather. Now, I am going to startle you considerably, so be prepared. And do not jump at conclusions. Though startling, my news is not alarming. All may yet end well."

Mrs. Hillmer was manifestly anxious, but she promised to try and understand him fully before she formed any judgment.

"Then," said Brett, "I can clear the air a good deal by a simple statement. Mr. Winter is no agent of mine, and I have seen your brother, Albert Mensmore, at Monte Carlo."

Mrs. Hillmer gave a little gasp of surprise. "You have seen Bertie?"

"Yes; your brother, is he not?"

"My half-brother, to be exact. My father was married twice. I—I am the elder of the two by four years."

"Apart from the compliment, you do not look it. But what you say explains the almost total absence of likeness between you."

"Possibly. People said we each resembled our mother. And Bertie, you know, has led a somewhat adventurous career. He roughed it a good deal in America. But what has all this got to do with detectives, and recent inquiries, and that sort of thing?"

"Much. The last time we met I told you that your brother was mixed up in some affair with a lady."

Mrs. Hillmer laughed, a trifle constrainedly. "If you knew Bertie as well as I do, you would not harbour suspicions concerning him. He never had a love affair in his life. Indeed, he is something of a woman-hater."

"No doubt he was. But he has changed his opinions. He is in love, and is engaged to be married to a very charming girl. So far, his beliefs and his good fortune have pulled against each other."

"Bertie engaged to be married! Good gracious! Who is she? And how can he support a wife? He is poor, and in debt, and he won't even let me help him."

"I have stated the facts, nevertheless. The lady is a daughter of Sir William Browne, and they are now yachting with a large party in the Mediterranean."

"Are her people against the match? Is that why this Scotland Yard man——?"

"No. Mensmore is on board Sir William's yacht. But there is another lady, who is missing from her home for nearly three months, who is believed to be dead—murdered, the police say—and with whom your brother was in some indefinable way associated."

"Do they dare to say that Bertie killed her?" Mrs. Hillmer's colour rose and her eyes flashed fire again.

"They say nothing. They are simply doing their duty in trying to discover the truth. And you may take it from me, as an undoubted fact, that the last place this lady visited before her death was one of the flats in these mansions. All present indications point to your brother's residence as being that place. Now, I pray you, be calm, and try to help me, for I have acted in this matter as your friend and as your brother's friend. At this very moment I am concealing his identity and his whereabouts from the police, who are searching for him under his assumed name of Pyne. If he is guilty of this crime, then I must hand him over to justice, for the murdered woman was a dear and good friend of mine. If he is innocent, as, indeed, I believe him to be, I will strive to help him and save his good name from the tarnish of being arrested on such an odious charge."

Digitized by Google

During this recital Mrs. Hillmer became deathly pale. Her agitation was the greater inasmuch as she forcibly controlled herself. But she could not remain seated. She sprang to the window and looked out, in the vain effort to seek inspiration from the gathering gloom of the street. Then she turned, and spoke very slowly:

"I think I understand. I must have faith in you, Mr. Brett. Who—was—the lady?"

The barrister thought deeply before replying. He had previously decided upon this supreme step, but he hesitated now that it was imminent. There was no help for it.

"Her name," he said, "is one which is well known to the world. Lady Delia Lyle, wife of Sir Charles Lyle, is missing from her home since the evening of Nov. 6 last. She met with a violent death that night, and I—not the police—have good reason to believe that she was killed in your brother's residence."

Mrs. Hillmer flung herself on a lounge, buried her white face in her hands and moaned, in a perfect agony of terror: "Oh, my God; what shall I do? What shall I do?"

This outburst astounded Brett. He did not know what to make of it. His intelligence had certainly taken his hearer completely by surprise. What interpretation was he to place upon her words and her unrestrained actions?

Two or three assailants flung themselves upon him.

"Now, Mrs. Hillmer," he began; but she broke in vehemently, running to him and clutching him by the arm:

"He is innocent, Mr. Brett. He must be innocent. He could not lift his hand to any woman. You must save him—do you hear?—save him, or you will have his blood on your soul. It was true, then, that you came here to hunt for him. Save him, if you hope for mercy yourself when you are dying."

In her passion she shook him violently, and for an instant they looked intently at each other—the woman eager, entreating; the man amazed and questioning.

"Do you not see," Reggie said at last, "that your vehemence reveals your thoughts? For anything that you know to the contrary, your brother may have committed this crime. Nay, it requires but slight knowledge of human nature to read your suspicion lest it be true. At this moment I am convinced that you are, in your heart, less sceptical than I of his guilt."

Mrs. Hillmer flung herself again upon the lounge, silent, tearful, torn with violent emotion, which she vainly endeavoured to suppress.

Brett tried to reason with her. "It will, perhaps, serve to clear up a mystery that deepens each moment if you place your trust in me," he said. "Tell me fully and openly any cause you may have for fearing that your brother is implicated in this terrible business. I ask you to adopt this course in all good faith. I have seen your brother under most trying circumstances; I have been with him at an hour when it would be impossible for him to conceal his burden if the weight of Lady Delia's death lay upon him. Yet I think him innocent. I think that chance has contributed to gather evidence against him. If I can learn even a portion of the truth it will enable me to quickly dispel the barrier of uncertainty that now hinders progress."

"What is it you want to know?" Mrs. Hillmer's voice was hollow and broken. The barrister was shocked at the effect of his revelation, but he was forced to go on with the disagreeable task he had undertaken.

"Do you mean," he said, "that you will answer my questions?"

"So far as I can."

"Would it not be better to tell me in your own words what you have to say?"

Mrs. Hillmer looked up, and the agony in her face filled him with keen pity.

"Oh, Heaven help me to do what is right!" she cried.

"Your prayer will surely be answered. I am certain of that. A great wrong has been committed by some one, and the innocent must not suffer to shield the guilty."

Mrs. Hillmer bowed her head and did not utter a word for some minutes. She appeared to be reasoning out some plan of action in a dazed fashion. When decision came she said in low tones:

"You must leave me now, Mr. Brett. I must have time. When I am ready I shall send for you."

Brett instinctively knew that it was hopeless to plead with her. Frivolous, volatile women of her stamp often betray unusual strength of character at a supreme crisis.

Digitized by Google

"You are adopting an unwise course," he said sadly.

"Maybe. But I must go alone. I am not deceiving you. When I have determined something which is not now clear to me, I will send for you. It may be that I shall speak. It may be that I shall be silent. In either case I only can judge—and suffer."

"Tell me one thing at least, Mrs. Hillmer, before we part. Did you know of Lady Delia's death before to-day?"

She came to him again, looked him straight in the face, and said: "I did not. On my soul, I did not."

Then Brett passed into the hall; and even the shock of this painful interview did not prevent him from noting the flitting of a shadow past a distant doorway, as some one hurried into the interior of a room

In their excitement they forgot that their voices might attract attention, and lady's maids are proverbially inquisitive.

CHAPTER XVI.

Foxey.

The keen, cold air of the streets soon restored Reggie to his habitual calm. He felt that a quiet stroll would do him good.

As he walked he pondered, and the more critically he examined Mrs. Hillmer's change of attitude the less he understood it.

"For some ridiculous reason," he communed, "the woman believes her brother guilty. Now I shall have endless trouble at getting at the truth. She will not be candid. She will only tell me that which she thinks will help him, and conceal that which she considers damaging. That is a woman's way all the world over. And a desperately annoying way it is. Perhaps I was to blame in springing this business too hastily upon her. But there! I like Mrs. Hillmer, and I hate using her as one juggles with a self-conceited witness. In future I will trouble her no more."

A casual glance into the interior of Sloane-square Station gave him a glimpse of the barrier, and he recognised the collector who had taken Lady Delia's ticket on that fatal night when she quitted the Richmond train.

Rather as a relief than for other cause Brett entered into conversation with the man:

"Do you remember me?" he said.

"Can't say as I do, sir." The man examined his questioner with quick suspicion. The forgotten "season" dodge would not work with him.

"Maybe you remember these?" said Brett, producing his cigar case.

"Now, wot's the gyme?" said the collector to himself. But he smiled, and answered: "Do you mean by the look of 'em, sir?"

"Good," laughed Brett. "Take three or four home with you. Meanwhile, I am sure you remember me coming to see you last November concerning a lady who alighted here from Victoria one foggy evening and handed you a ticket to Richmond?"

"Of course I does, sir. And the cigars are all right. There was a lot of fuss about that lydy. Did she ever turn up?"

"Not exactly. That is to say, she died shortly after you saw her."

"No! Well, of all the rummy goes! She was a fine looking woman, too, as well as I rec'llect. Looked fit for another fifty year. Wot 'appened to her?"

"I don't know. I wish I did."

"An' 'ave you been on the hunt ever since, gov'nor?"

"Yes, ever since."

"She's dead, you s'y?"

"Yes."

"But 'ow d'you know she's dead, if you ain't seen her since?"

"I have seen her. I saw her dead body at Putney."

"At Putney! Well, I'm blowed!"

A roar from beneath, the slamming of many doors, and the quick rush of a crowd up the steps, announced the arrival of a train. "Pardon, sir," said the man, "this is the 5.41 Mansion House. But don't go aw'y. There's somethin'—Tickets, if you please."

In a minute the collector had ended his task. While sorting his bundle of pasteboards he said:—

"Nobody ever tell'd me that before. An' you ain't the only one on her track. Are you in the police?"

"No."

"I thought not. But some other chaps who kem 'ere was. None of 'em ever said the lydy was dead."

"Why; what matter?"

"Oh, nothin', but two heads is better'n one, if they're only sheep's heads."

"Undoubtedly. The rule is all the more reliable when one of them belongs to a shrewd chap like you."

The collector grinned. He understood that he was being flattered for a purpose, yet he liked it.

"That's one w'y of lookin' at it," he said; "but if this affair's pertickler, why, all I can s'y is it's worth somethin' to somebody."

"Certainly. Here's a sovereign for a start. If you can tell me anything really worth knowing I will add four more to it."

"Now, that's talkin'. I'm off duty at eight o'clock, an' I can't have a chat now because I expect the inspector any moment."

"Suppose you call and see me in Victoria Street at nine?"

"Right you are, sir."

Brett gave the man his address and recrossed the square. No one was about, so he walked straight to the first door of Raleigh Mansions and made his way to the fourth floor.

Had he been a moment later he must have seen Mrs. Hillmer, closely wrapped up, leave her residence unattended. Her carriage was not in waiting. She walked to the cabstand in the square and called a hansom, driving back up Sloane-street.

Her actions indicated a desire to be unobserved even by her servants, as in the usual course of events the housemaid would have brought a cab to the door.

But the barrister, steadily climbing up the stairs, could not guess what was happening in the street.

He soon opened Mensmore's door, and noted, as an idle fact, that the expected gust of cold air was absent.

There was no light on this landing, so he was in pitch darkness once he had passed the doorway. There was no need to strike a match, however, as he remembered the exact position of the electric switch-board—on the left beyond the dining-room door.

He stepped cautiously forward, put out his hand to grope for the lever; but, with a quick rush, some two or three assailants flung themselves upon him, and after a fierce, gasping struggle—for Brett was a strong man—he was borne to the ground face downwards, with one arm beneath him, and the other pinioned behind his back.

"Look sharp, Jim," shouted a breathless voice. "Turn on the light and close the door. We've got him safe enough."

They had. Two large hands closed round his neck, a knee was firmly embedded in the small of his back, another hand gripped his left wrist like a vice, whilst some one sat on his legs.

Brett could not have been collared more effectually by a Rugby International team.

The third man found the electric light and turned it on.

"Now, get up," said some one to Brett, "and don't give us any more trouble. It's no use."

The barrister, who had had his wind knocked out of him, rose to his knees. Then, as the light fell upon the horrified face of Mr. Winter, he vainly essayed to keep up the pretence of indignation. Once fairly on his feet again he nearly collapsed with laughter. He leaned against the wall and, as his breath came again, he laughed until his sides ached.

Digitized by Google

Meanwhile the detective was crimson with rage and annoyance. His two assistants did not know what to make of the affair.

"What's wrong, Jim?" said one at last. "Isn't this Pyne?"

"No; of course it's not," was his angry growl.

"Then who the —— is it?"

"Oh, ask me another! How on earth could I guess, Mr. Brett, that you'd come letting yourself in here with a latchkey?"

Reggie was still holding his sore ribs and could not answer; but the policeman who had questioned Winter caught the name. He knew it, and grinned at his companion.

"What did you want here, anyhow?" snarled the infuriated Winter, as he realised that his great coup would be retailed with embellishments through every police station in the metropolis.

"I w-wanted you to ar-r-rest me, W-Winter," roared Reggie. "I s-said you would, and you have."

"Confound it, how could you know I was here?"

"You were sure to wait here for a man who probably will not return for months."

"Was I, indeed? Well, you have got yourself to blame if you have been hurt. I hope these gentlemen did not treat you too badly?"

"What?" cried one who had not yet spoken. "He gave me such a punch in the bread-basket that I've only just recovered my speech."

"I think we're about quits," said the other, surveying a torn waistcoat and broken watch-chain.

"I shall be black and blue all over to-morrow," said Brett; "but if you are satisfied I am. Come, Mr. Winter, bring your friends and we will open a bottle of wine. We all want it. Pyne won't be here to-night. Just now he is in Wyoming."

"How do you know?"

"By intuition. I am seldom mistaken."

"But why didn't you call out just now when you came in?"

"I hadn't a chance. You were on me like a thousand of bricks. I must confess that if Pyne had been in my shoes he would be a doomed man."

Winter did not know whether to believe Brett or not. He was genuinely angry at the incident, but the barrister did not want to convert him into an enemy, as he vaguely felt that a catastrophe was imminent, and a false move by the police might do irretrievable mischief.

"Well, Winter," he said, "I must confess that this time you have got the better of me. I did not know you were here. I looked in for the purpose of quietly studying the ground, as it were, and I was never more taken by surprise in my life. Moreover, your plan was a very clever one in view of the fact that Pyne might return at any moment."

The detective became a little more amiable at this praise from the famous amateur, for Brett's achievements were well known to his two colleagues.

"I suppose you wondered what had happened," he said with a smile.

"I thought my last hour had come. I am only sorry that Pyne himself did not have the experience."

"Do you really believe he is in the States, sir?"

"I am sure of it."

"Then he must have returned there since he wrote that letter."

"That is the only solution of the difficulty."

"Hum. It's a pity."

"Why?"

"I would sooner have arrested him on this side. To get him by extradition is a slow affair, and probably means a winter trip across the Atlantic for me."

"It means a Winter trip for you at any time of the year, Jim," laughed one of his companions.

Good humour being now restored, the party quitted the flat and adjourned to a neighbouring hotel, where the barrister started Winter on the full, true, and particular account of his pursuit and capture of the Winchmore Hill burglars.

At the end of a bottle of champagne and a cigar they all parted excellent friends, but Brett did not attempt to revisit No. 12, Raleigh Mansions, that night.

Instead, he partook of a quiet meal at a restaurant, and hurried to his chambers to await the advent of the ticket-collector.

Punctual to the hour named this new witness arrived, and was admitted by Smith in obedience with previous instructions. The man was somewhat awed by the palatial

"Come, sit near the fire. Do you drink whisky and soda?"

Digitized by Google

surroundings and the appearance of a servant in livery, but Brett quickly put him at his ease.

"Come, sit near the fire. Do you drink whisky and soda? That box contains your favourite cigars. Now, tell me all you know about this business."

"I can't s'y as I know anythiink about it, sir, but by puttin' two and two together it makes four sometimes—not always."

"Quite right. You're a philosopher. Let me hear the two twos. We will see about the addition afterwards."

"Well, sir, this yer lydy was a-missin' early in November. she tykes a ticket at Victoria Station on the District for Richmond; she gives it up to me at Sloane-square, arsks a newsboy the w'y to Raleigh Mansion, for he tell'd me so after you'd bin to see me, an' from what you s'y, 'as bin swallered up ever since."

"The Lord Chief couldn't state the case more simply."

"That's the first two. Now, for the second two, an' you won't forgit as I knew nothink about the lydy bein' dead, or I should 'ave opened my mouth long afore this."

"Go on. No one can blame you."

"There's an old chap—Foxey they calls 'im, but I don't know his right nyme—who drives a four-wheeler around Chelsea, an' 'e 'ad tyken a fare from the Square to the City. It might be four o'clock or it might be five, but he was on his w'y back from Cornhill when a gent, a tall, good-looking gent, a young-ish, military chap, 'ails him and says: 'Cabby, drive me to Sloane-square. There's no 'urry, but tyke care, because it's foggy.' Old Foxey nearly jumped out of his skin at this bit of good luck. He was pretty full then, for 'e's a regular beer-barrel, 'e is, but 'e made up 'is mind to 'ave a fair old skinful that night. Well, Foxey drives him all right so the Square. The gent gives him five bob and says: 'Wite here for me, cabby. You can drive me 'ome in about an hour's time.' This was at 5.30. Foxey drew up near the stytion, tells me all about it' an' stands me two beers, he was that pleased with hisself. 'E goes to give his 'orse the nose-bag, in comes the Richmond train, and out pops the lydy with the Richmond ticket. D'ye follow me?"

"Every word."

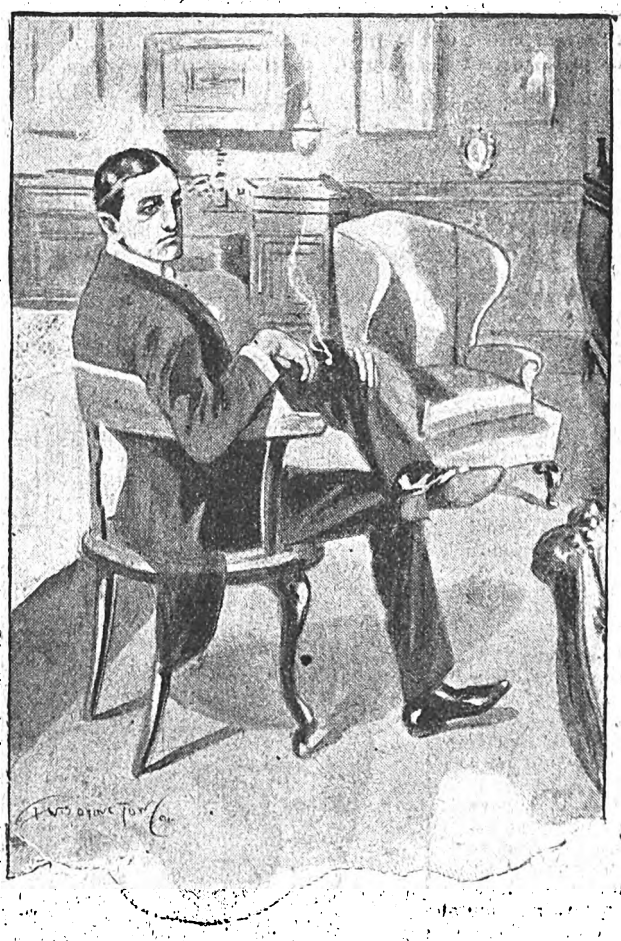
"An' you see now 'ow it is I can fix the d'y?"

"Perfectly."

"Well, I sees no more of Foxey. I missed him about the Square, so one d'y I axes at the rank, 'Where's Foxey?' An' where d'ye think 'e was?"

"I cannot tell."

"In quod!"



"Upon my word, things look very black against Mensmere. Yet I can't believe it."

"In jail. Why?"

"That's hit. That's number two of the two twos. Pardon me, but I am getting a bit mixed. Well, it seems that that very night, comin' back from Putney as drunk as a lord, old Foxey runs over a barrer. 'E an' the coster 'as a fight. The police come, an' Foxey dots one bobby in the blinker and another on the boko. You wouldn't think it was in 'im. 'E must 'ave bin paralytic."

"So he was locked up?"

"Locked up! He was dragged there by the 'eels. Next mornin' 'e comes before the beak. 'We was all drunk together, your wusup,' 'e says. 'I took a fare from the City to Sloane Square, an' 'e left me for more'n an hour. 'E comes back excited like—bin boozin' 'ard, I suppose—brings my keb up to a house, carries in a lydy who was that 'toxicated she couldn't stand, an' tells me to drive to Putney. We gits there, an' I says 'You've nearly killed my 'oss, guv'nor.' With that 'e tips me a fiver—a five-pun note, your wushup.' 'What has that got to do with the charge?' says the beak. 'Wot?' says Foxey. 'If a chap gev you a fiver for drivin' 'im to Putney wouldn't you get drunk?' With that the magistrates gives 'im three months for assaultin' the police, an' fines 'im the balance of the fiver for bein' drunk in charge of a 'oss and keb."

The ticket collector took a long drink after this recital.

"I hope you will not follow Foxey's example," said Brett, rising.

"How do you mean, sir?"

"Because I am going to keep my word. Here are the four sovereigns I owe you. In your case your two and two have made five."

"Thank you, sir. You're a brick. No fear of me meltin' this little lot. The missus will be on 'em like a bird when I tells her." And the man spat upon the coins with evident relish as he handled them.

"One word more," said Brett. "Where was this man tried?"

"At the West London Police Court."

"You can get me his real name and post it to me?"

"Sure, sir. Any way, I'll try."

"I am greatly obliged to you."

"An' has my yarn bin of any use to you, sir?"

"The greatest. It has solved a puzzle. However, I will see you again. Good-bye. Don't forget to write."

"Cornhill is in the direct line from Leadenhall-street," mused Brett, when he was alone. "Anyone coming to Sloane Square from Dodge and Co.'s office would pass through it. Upon my word, things look very black against Mensmore. Yet I can't believe it."

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT PEOPLE.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "The Dregs of Wrath," by W. E. Grogan, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. H. Wigley, 5 Sutherland Street, Sheffield. Attempts this week may deal with Stories about ANY SUBJECT, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, February 4th. Post-cards only, please.

Smart.

IN the High Street of a certain northern town there lived two drapers, who were determined rivals, and who were always trying to undersell or overreach each other in every possible way.

Both were shrewd, smart men, but one had slightly the advantage of the other in this respect.

The smarter of the two had his shop always open first in the morning, and his brother tradesman had to pass it on the way to his own.

Every morning he was in the habit of marking down most of the goods displayed in his windows, and after his rival had passed and noted the reductions, he withdrew the low-priced tickets and resumed his former prices.

He repeated this ruse morning after morning for several days, until the other, not to be out done in cheapness, was selling for elevenpence stockings which cost him fifteenpence wholesale.

This was the opportunity for which the smart man had been scheming all along.

He hired a lot of boys and girls to buy the stockings of his rival at the greatly-reduced rate, and, before his unsuspecting rival was aware of the fact, his entire stock of hosiery was transferred to the counter of his wide-awake opponent at elevenpence per pair, and were sold by him, as a "bankrupt lot, at a terrible sacrifice," at eighteenpence per pair.

H. W.

One Way of Getting Information.

A CANVASSER for one of the large railway companies running into Hull tells of the following incident:

One morning recently he received a communication from the head office informing him that a farmer in the district had applied for information regarding routes, rates, &c., and he had better wait upon him with a view of obtaining any traffic there might be.

On making inquiries, he found to his annoyance the address given was about six miles from the nearest station; but duty was duty, and one morning he trudged away to his destination. On arrival he found an old man pottering about a small farmstead, and made known his business. Picture his surprise when the old man said:

"Oh, yes, you're from the railway, Ah see. Well, mah dowter is a teacher, and in her examination has to know a lot aboot railways, so Ah thowt Ah would rite to'd headquarters; that's mah way."

A. R. H.

From the Gallery.

SCENE: Monday night in a small East End theatre. The auditorium packed with a hot, uncomfortable crowd. Upon the stage, which is in darkness, a death-struggle between two shadowy figures is being enacted with much gasping and shuffling, accompanied by appropriately weird music from the band.

The struggle waxes fiercer, and at last reaches its culmination by one of the antagonists crashing heavily to the stage. The other starts back, gasps harder than ever, and in an agonised stage-whisper, says:

"Great Heaven! what have I done?"

But a voice from the gallery fairly knocked the bottom out of the effect by shouting:

"Strike a bloomin' match, and 'ave a look!"

A. A. W.

Shirking the Work.

ONE may have a very good ear for a tune without knowing much about harmony, or being in any sense an educated musician.

Several years ago, during a St. Patrick's Day procession, a certain official was observed listening intently to the playing of one of the bands, the cloud on his face increasing as he listened. Finally he went to the leader and broke out:

"Whin we pay good money to a band we want thim to all play. Now, here's wan or two of yez playing 'Sint Pathrick's Day,' and the rest of yez goin' 'toot, toot!' Why don't all of yez play the chune and airn your money?"

W. I.

Room For Expansion.

A LINE of ragged little boys were ranged down the centre of a Birmingham Board School the other day for exercise.

"Toe the line!" demanded the master.

A shuffling indicated obedience. The master inspected the line approvingly, until his eye rested on an urchin so far behind the others as to be almost out of sight.

"Smith," he cried, "why don't you toe the line?"

"Please, sir, I am toeing it," said the boy; "but I've got father's boots on."

The boots were toeing the line, but the wearer stood a good six inches back.

J. R. T.

Digitized by Google

His Word was Law.

The majesty of the law has, no doubt, a certain fascination for the multitudes of raw young countrymen who seek to enter the constabulary service, and when they have passed muster and are dressed "in a little brief authority" and the regulation blue suit, "Robert" feels keenly that he must uphold the dignity of his new position.

It must surely have been one such who laid down the law in such unmistakable terms as the following:

Two acquaintances having met at the corner of a street, stood to have a chat. They had not been there long when a policeman coming up, addressed them with:

"Come, now, be movin' on and not be makin' a crowd there."

"Two don't make a crowd," replied one of them, and to his astonishment the policeman remarked:

"One's a crowd if I say it."

They were too much surprised to protest, and without a word they "moved on." A. H.

A Willing Deputy.

A cab stopped at the corner of a road where the well-to-do people lived.

A stylish young lady alighted, and looked puzzled over the numbers of the houses.

They seemed jumbled together anyhow. She wished to find 14, but they seemed all 40 and 50.

Seeing a smart looking policeman coming down the road, she said:

"Please can you tell me where 14 is?"

"He's off duty to-day, miss," replied the smart officer, "but if you don't mind waiting—I shall be off duty in twenty minutes—I can come instead!" J. J. McC.

Never Again.

"Serves some women right," said Mrs. Gadabout, when the conversation began to lag.

"What does?" asked her neighbour, who stood with her apron over her head, waiting to hear the latest gossip.

"Trying to beat the rest of the world. You've heard about Mrs. Bargain and the auction, haven't you? No? Well, it's good.

"They were going to have an auction at Cheap and Co.'s, right across the street from where Sarah Bargain lives, and Sarah asked if she couldn't put in a sofa and a looking-glass and a lamp—things she had been trying to get rid of for a long time. Cost her ninepence to get the things taken over to Cheap's.

"When the auctioneer put up the mirror, somebody bought it for 2s. 3d. Then the lamp brought 5d., that's 2s. 8d.

"An old maid in the crowd bid half-a-crown for the sofa. Sarah thought she would raise the bid in the hopes that the old maid would go higher.

"Well, they see-sawed until the old maid bid 10s. Then Sarah bid 12s. 6d., and when no more bids were coming the auctioneer knocked it down to her.

"When she came to square up with the auctioneer—oh, well, pay his commission, if you want it that way—he charged her 2s. 1d.

"Wasn't she just mad! It cost her 6d. to get her old sofa back again home. There she was, without her mirror and lamp, and still had her sofa on her hands, and was out 8d. I tell you one thing—Mrs. Bargain will never try to sell anything at auction again."

F. W. F.

A Bet.

Jack was a jolly old bachelor. One afternoon one of his guests commented on the beauty of the new dining-table which Jack had recently purchased.

"There is only one fault with it—it's just a trifle too high. A table shouldn't exceed twenty-nine inches high, and this is an inch higher," said a guest.

"I'll bet you it is only twenty-nine inches high," returned Jack.

"Don't bet, Jack, I'm sure of it—for my eye is always correct."

"I'll bet you a fiver it's only twenty-nine inches high," said Jack.

"Well," answered the guest, "if you're willing I'll bet you; but I tell you beforehand I'll win."

"If you're right," said Jack, "I'll pay."

"Well, then, pay your debt. I measured it this morning, and it's just thirty inches high!" And Jack's guest burst into laughter.

"I know it," replied Jack, "for I saw you do it; and, knowing what a liking you have for joking I suspected your object. As soon as you went out for a stroll, I had an inch sawed off every leg; so you see the biter has been bitten. Hand over the cash!"

The guest paid amid the laughter of the company.

G. D.

A SPLENDID NOVEL.

The Invisible Man

By H. G. WELLS,

Author of "The Time Machine," "The War of the Worlds," etc.

Price 6d. Post Free 8d.

"The story is told with that fertility of imaginative resource which has made Wells conspicuous in this domain of fiction."—Daily Chronicle.

"Written in the author's merriest and most provoking mood."—Sunday Times.

At all Bookstalls and Booksellers, and of

C. ARTHUR PEARSON Ltd., HENRIETTA STREET.

PHOTOGRAPHS ENLARGED.

For 7s. we will enlarge any photograph, large or small, tintypes, or any kind of glass picture, provided the print is legible, to a beautiful India ink and crayon portrait, 15in. x 12in., mounted on a plate-sunk mount 24in. x 14in. Pictures of soldiers and sailors at the front will be enlarged for 6s.

All enlargements are of head and shoulders only.

What to do.

Write your name and address plainly in ink on a slip of paper, also on the back of the portrait you are sending us. Get a postal order for 7s. (if the photograph be that of a soldier or sailor get a 6s. postal order). Place all of these in an envelope, or make a securely packed parcel of them and address it to the PORTRAIT EDITOR, Pearson's Weekly, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A Reduction of Threepence

on each enlargement, when the order is for two or more from the same photograph, will be made.

Orders will be treated in rotation.

Although all possible care will be taken, we do not hold ourselves responsible for photographs damaged or lost in transit.

Digitized by Google

An Odd Predicament.

"COME on, James, I'm sure we shall lose that train," cried Mrs. Tuttle impatiently.

"I can't help it if we do," snarled her husband. "Besides, we shan't do anything of the sort," he added. "You go on and get the train and leave me to look after myself. I'm more than six and quite able to I hope."

Tuttle was ruffled over a lost collar-stud, and when in that frame of mind a man is seldom courteous or even consistent. But Mrs. Tuttle had had twenty years' experience of James and she was hardened. She didn't even trouble to reply but gathered her skirts round her, raised her umbrella, for it was raining with a steady persistency, and set out.

About the time she reached the station, her husband came downstairs, putting on his hat and coat as he ran. He grabbed up his umbrella and stood on the step while he made a rapid calculation of his effects and duties to see if by any chance he had neglected anything.

"Raining again," he grumbled. "It's always raining in this infernal hole. Anyway, I don't think I have forgotten anything — yes, there's my latch-key — I shall want that. Cuss!"

Tuttle turned to close his umbrella preparatory to diving into the house again, and, as he turned for that purpose, a gust of wind, whistled down from a window on the upper landing and banged the door in his face. The wind put in a little overtime as it passed Tuttle in shifting his umbrella inside out, and occupied with that he failed to notice that his left leg was fastened up in a strange and unaccountable manner.

Finding his umbrella difficult to manage in the constricted space at his disposal, Tuttle took a step outwards and was fetched up with a sudden jerk that speedily broke the tidings of great comfort and joy to him. He was hitched to the door unmistakably, and being already irritable this discovery tended towards a flow of eloquence not suitable for publication, however satisfactory it may have been to the orator.

Of course, Tuttle didn't recognise anything serious in the situation; it was just a trifling addition to the cussedness of inanimate things which that evening had been more than normally cussed. When, after a serious tug at his garment he found himself still tethered, Tuttle grew thoughtful, and about the time his wife had ensconced herself comfortably in a carriage and the train was on the move he was in a state of frantic anger and alarm.

Tuttle took a step outwards and fetched up with a sudden jerk.

The Tuttles, I should explain, had accepted an invitation to leave their little Essex retreat and try a day or two of giddy excitement in the whirl of the great metropolis under the auspices of an old friend of the family. Tuttle was quite willing, but as this story makes clear, his trousers were not sufficiently weak, and he simply didn't.

Tuttle heard the train go out—indeed, he could the lights of it streaming past the bottom of his own garden, and his feelings during the ordeal were not to be analised.

Neither for that matter were his remarks. He let his umbrella go whereso-ever it listed, and knelt down painfully to try and discover the exact nature of his anchorage.

It was simple—painfully simple, but effective! A fold of his trousers had been neatly gathered up and wedged in the closed door. Another fraction of an inch would have taken up a fold of his skin as well, but Tuttle didn't return any thanks for his escape from that, though he might have done had he given it reasonable thought.

Digitized by Google

Tuttle hopped about on the doorstep in fluttering shirt-tails.

Bad as his position undoubtedly was, it was devoid of physical pain—just then, but the nip he would have got had he been a trifle more unlucky, would have put him in a position to sympathise with the ancient Christians and others who have had practical experience of how painful pinching can be when done at all effectively.

Tuttle had tried tugging but he tugged a bit more at first with care and consideration lest he should tear his bags and render them unfitting for decent society, and then with more and more abandon and reckless disregard for "the blooming things"—I think he must have meant "bloomer" things—until he was leaning outwards and straining on them all he knew.

He needn't have been so careful. It was good sound cloth well wedged to a good sound bit of timber, and neither door nor trousers would budge the fraction of an inch. And there Tuttle stood, the picture of an ass, fastened up to his own doorway and unable to stir beyond it. He only wanted a nose-bag to render the illusion perfect.

Solitude is a perfect craze with Tuttle. That is why he inhabited a house just outside the suburban radius down a side street which led nowhere in particular and where nobody ever dreamt of walking if it could be avoided.

His own grounds ran a hundred yards up to his nearest neighbours, who were biggish people and had their house further separated from Tuttle's by a quarter of a mile or so of landed estate.

Tuttle had lots of time and plenty of opportunity for singing, "Wait till a man goes by, Jamy; wait till a man goes by." But he didn't sing it. He didn't sing anything. His brain was busy mapping out schemes of self-help which would have raised smiles from any thought-reader who chanced to be in the vicinity that night.

For instance, he had a pearl-handled pocket-knife and a box of matches. and he was exercised in his mind, whether to use the first in whittling away the front door just sufficiently to allow him to take the rest of his garment with him, or to rely on the second and sacrifice the burnt offering on the altar of liberty.

He was very much afraid that the garment would not be the only burnt offering made, supposing that the dampened cloth would have lit, or I really think he would have tried. The first idea was of course absurd. Even Tuttle saw that when he came to consider it seriously. Three-inch doors of solid oak won't yield like match sticks when attacked by toy cutlery of that sort, and Tuttle knew it.

After an hour of deep mental stress, the sorrowful victim of dire mischance got another sort of stress to suffer under. This was a painful and deep-seated cramp, brought on by his constrained position, and developing speedily from a vague sense of discomfort to a clear and well-defined agony. The position too was irksome, wedged up in a corner and forced for hours to scrutinise a door-post which was just visible in the pitch blackness of the night.

The chilliness of the late autumn air induced a numbness that added to the awful cramp, produced a feeling of reckless despair in the hapless Tuttle.

He heard nine, ten, half past and eleven chime in successive stages from the village church-tower, and by that time he was ripe for any desperate deed that suggested itself as being likely to effect his liberation. He had dwelt rather hopefully at first on the chance of his wife returning when she found that he was not in the train, but the passage of time speedily dispersed this casual bit of optimism and set him longing for a pickaxe or something solid wherewith to batter down the door. He would have paid for the damage cheerfully just to get possession of an inch or two of cloth, which shows how easily extravagance may be born in a man.

He could have longed just as easily for his latch-key; but I suppose he didn't think of that. Desperate situations require desperate remedies, and a mere latch-key would have been too prosaic and small altogether.

All idea of going up to London had of course been abandoned by this time. Tuttle had heard the last train go through an hour before, but he wasn't interested. What he wanted to do was to get free, after that he might trouble to break into the house and get to bed; but it was the getting free that really appealed to him. He had an inspiration shortly before twelve o'clock struck, and as he proceeded to put his idea into operation, he kicked himself mentally for not having thought of it before,

It was so very simple and obvious that it really was a marvel that he had overlooked it. Since he could not get his garments out of the door why not get out of his garments? It would be chilly and undignified; but it was retired and quiet and there was no earthly reason why he couldn't run round to the back of the house in his shirt-tails, force an entrance and obtain as many pairs of trousers as he required—and that particular pair into the bargain.

Digitized by Google

With numbed and shaky fingers Tuttle fumbled at his braces, and two minutes afterwards he discovered one little obstacle that stood in the way of a speedy realisation of his purpose. He couldn't get his foot through the aperture, so closely was the garment drawn round his leg, and in a state of hysterical grief and anger Tuttle hopped about on the doorstep in fluttering shirt-tails and said all the wicked things he could think of.

It wasn't very satisfactory, and it was decidedly parky, and with greater difficulty than he had experienced in getting out of them, Tuttle once more donned his trousers, and wished vaguely that he was dead or drunk or something. Then he said he didn't care a simple solitary hang about anything or anybody, and he found his pipe and lit it and smoked in sullen sorrow for nearly two hours.

In giving an account of his experiences later at the police-station Tuttle said he supposed he must have fallen asleep, cold and cramp notwithstanding. He didn't remember doing so; but all of a sudden he came to a recollection of where he was, and at the same moment he heard a whispered consultation and then a stealthy creeping in the bushes below the drawing-room window.

"Hi! is anyone there?" he yelled excitedly.

No answer came, and he paused and listened again. The whispering had ceased; but he was certain of a stealthy footfall somewhere in his own front-garden, and he made another despairing appeal for assistance.

"Come and give me a hand. I'm fixed up in the door and can't get out," he called desperately.

This time there was a very decided and pronounced footfall in response, and a slim respectable-looking figure in a cricket-cap and other things came round the corner within range of Tuttle's vision.

"What's up, guv'nor," said a voice belonging to it.

Tuttle plunged into the history of his misery and woe and implored assistance at any price the man might like to name. He mentioned beer and food and gold in one breath, and undying gratitude in the next.

The man didn't hurry but seemed interested.

"Can't get out, that's a rum go?" said he as one who ponders on an elusive but absorbing problem. "Why don't you undo the door, then?"

Tuttle thought the man was a fool, but he didn't say so. Instead, he meekly went into the subtle difficulties of his position and managed to make it clear and beyond any dispute that he didn't undo the door, or release himself by any other means, because it was utterly impossible and not to be done.

He, the man, could do it if he would, and Tuttle dwelt in detail on a certain unfastened window round at the back which was easy of access and offered no difficulties whatever to an active man bent on being of service to a fellow creature in distress.

"I'll see what I can do, mister," said the noble-hearted fellow after further consideration which brought on a fresh attack of cramp and impatience in Tuttle. "But what about the dawg?"

"There isn't any dog," snapped Tuttle, impatiently. "There isn't any living creature about the place bar myself."

"All right, cocky, don't get shirty," said the man with a sudden access of gross familiarity, "I'll go and have a look."

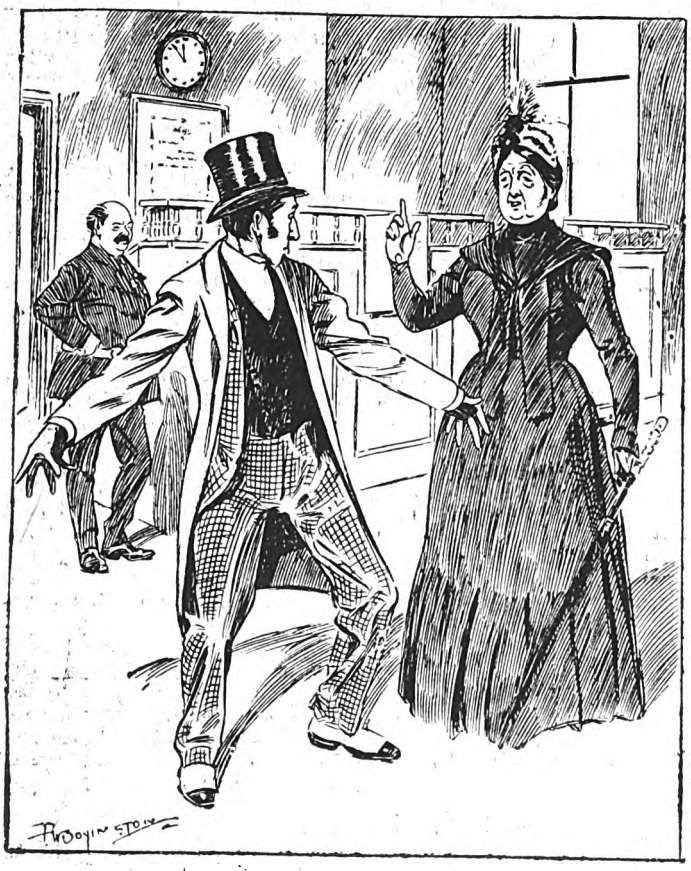
He went. To Tuttle's over-strained nerves it seemed that a double footfall went round to the side of the house, and he could almost have sworn he heard a whispered consultation.

"Must have been the wind in the trees," he mused. "I hope he'll hurry up. Wonder how much he'll expect for this? Should think half-a-crown and a glass of whisky ought to satisfy him. He seemed rather rough, and I was a fool to mention that soverei_n. I had better tell him to call in the morning when it is day-light and there will be someone about if he should cut up rough. You have to treat these fellows with a firm hand or they'll rob you right and left."

They will! Tuttle waited and waited, but not a sign or a suggestion of the rescue party was forthcoming

"Ta, ta, cocky, sweet dreams," said one, with a derisive chuckle.

Digitized by Google



"The latch was within two inches of your nose, and you hadn't the sense to knock a hole in the glass."

He strained his eyes trying to see into the dark hall, and then he became aware of a fitful will-of-the-wisp sort of light flickering about at the head of the stairs.

"Why, confound his impudence! He's actually prying," gasped Tuttle in petrified astonishment at the sheer impudence of the thing.

"Hi! You fellow. Come down at once and undo this door. How dare you go up to my room."

A window opened above him and a surly voice growled:

"Shut up you old fool, or I'll drop something on your nut. What sort of a bally ass do you take me for?"

Tuttle stood in petrified astonishment for half a second, and then the awful truth dawned upon him. The man was a burglar, and he had simplified his work for him and given him a means of excess, and saved him no end of laborious efforts with jimmy and other nefarious tools.

He started to yell: "Police, police! Help! Burglars!" at the top of his voice.

There was a hoarse chuckle from the room above and a pail of water, pail and all, fell at his feet and deluged him.

Then another voice spoke up. It said:

"Let the old fool yell, Bill. It'll amuse him and won't hurt us. You bet he wouldn't have been there all night if yelling would have set him loose. Lor! this is a swap."

This reasoning, sound and convincing as it was, struck a chill into the heart of the unfortunate man below who was constrained to stand and wait while his portable and valuable belongings were rifled without being able to lift a hand in defence of them.

Footsteps came and went inside the house, dim lights shone mysteriously from windows and passages, and now and again he caught the sound of hoarse vulgar glee, or surpressed comment indicative of joy at some unexpected piece of luck, or annoyance at coverts from which much was expected, drawing blank.

It lasted an hour—the worst hour Tuttle had ever spent in his life—and at the end of it the lights died away, the noise ceased, and shortly afterwards Tuttle became aware of two forms outlined against the fence in the dull grey of early dawn.

They came nearer, and with an indignation too deep for words Tuttle saw that one had donned his light dust-coat, with umbrella and hat to match, and the other was wearing his brand new trousers and tall hat. They were both smoking cigars which Tuttle felt sick to think ought to be between his own lips, and they had his big Gladstone bag between them with pounds' worth of portable property in it, and a small bag apiece to balance.

"Ta ta, cocky, sweet dreams," said one with a derisive chuckle.

Tuttle called them "rude fellows," and "body snatchers," and lots of other things which hardly seemed applicable but were no doubt prompted by the callous impudence of the proceedings; but he was merely wasting the sweetness on the desert air. They didn't even trouble to stop and hit him but passed out of the gate together down the road and were swallowed up in the immensity of space.

Two hours later a policeman making an early round discovered a conspicuous character drenched and bedraggled asleep up against a door-post of "The Lindens." He shook it and obtained only sundry irrevelant observations in which the words "burglars," "door," "trousers," "all night," continually recurred.

"This looks fishy," observed the policeman sotto voce. "The chap's drunk or luny. He looks a conspicuous lot. Come out of it my man."

He gave the paralysed Tuttle a drag, but Tuttle didn't come. He moved out a bit—as far as the policeman could drag him, that is—and on being released, sprang back as though fastened there by india-rubber springs, and bumped against the door post. This puzzled the policeman and made Tuttle more idiotic than ever. He started to cry, and asked the man as an immense favour to lead him off somewhere quiet and retired, and poleaxe him.

The officer couldn't oblige, but his suspicions were doubled now. He knew that class of shifty tramping individual, who dabbled in burglary in an amateurish way, and then got too drunk to get away with the spoil. He flashed his bull's-eye round and made a closer investigation.

"Oh, oh! that's it, is it?" said he with a whistle of mingled amusement and satisfaction. "Cracked the crib, got fuddled, and pinched himself by the togs coming away. Rummiest capture I have ever made.

Digitized by Google

"All right my man, you'll be safe there for ten minutes I'll just go and have a look round and then we'll walk along together and find a nice warm dry comfy cell for one of us."

Tuttle babbled—just babbled. He was dead beat, half asleep and half fainting, and past taking an interest even in "nice dry cells."

He would have liked a nice "long narrow one for ever laid," had the officer had such a thing handy; but even the liking for that wasn't very pronounced.

The policeman went the rounds, and of course it wasn't long before he spotted the little window so invitingly left open.

"Ha!" said he, "the old dodge! in here and out at the front. This ought to mean something serviceable to me."

He went in and in two minutes had evidence enough to commit any number of Tuttles had they only been genuine bona-fide burglars.

The place was literally ransacked from top to bottom.

"But where's he stowed it!" he reflected, "he couldn't have got away with it, that's certain. That'll do later, anyway, when I've lodged the beauty at the station. May as well go out of the front door and see to that first."

He chuckled as he paused and reflected on a neat little fold of his prisoner's breeches safely pinched in the door. Then he released the catch and the next minute was tearing down the path and along the road in chase of a bare-headed lunatic who was splashing through mud and puddles, waving his arms and frantically yelling "burglars."

Up by the station the officer overtook his quarry, and with the assistance of a brother constable led him off to another sort of station.

"House broken into and ransacked, sir," he explained to the sergeant in charge. "Found the prisoner caught in the door-way by his trousers, sir. He said he was a burglar and had been there all night."

"Right," said the sergeant tersely. "Anything on him?"

They searched the hapless Tuttle, and then put him to soak in a cell while an inspector and the constable who had made the capture went back to investigate.

That burglary had been committed there was ample evidence; but the officials couldn't get much further than that for all their trouble.

"There's been two in this, Wilcox," observed the inspector.

"Shouldn't be surprised, sir," replied the man. "It struck me that was how it was, and I expect his pal took advantage to clear off with the swag."

Along towards midday when Tuttle was being tidied up and made to look pretty for a preliminary visit to the presiding magistrate, Mrs. Tuttle came back in haste and irritation mingled with a vague anxiety as to what had become of her husband and found her house in possession of the police.

She knew her husband better than they could have been expected to do, and she had her suspicions long before she got to the station. When she did there was a scene.

Tuttle was furious and under the stimulating influence of hot cocoa and bread and butter sane enough now to give his remarks point and pith. The police were apologetic but maintained the reasonableness of their action.

Mrs. Tuttle also had her views of her husband, and expressed them briefly in the feminine equivalent for a painful irresponsible ass.

She didn't so much object to Tuttle spending a night on the door-step if that was his idea of rational healthy amusement, but to stand there like a ninny while her valuables were coolly appropriated and marched off with under his very nose was quite another matter altogether.

"Caught by your clothes," she snorted in fine disdain. "The latch was within two inches of your nose and you hadn't the sense to knock a hole in the glass."

That was the crowning blow!

Tuttle broke down under it and went home and to bed, and stayed there for the rest of the day.

They managed to catch the burglars down the line, and they, Tuttles', got back nearly all their property intact, or I don't believe he would ever have smiled again.

As it is he has long and painful hours of meditation, and he is particularly careful on going out to stand well away from the door before closing it.

FRANK SEARS.

IN FAR CATHAY.

In the darkest, dingiest street in all Whampoa, the "street of many joys," lived the widow, Sing-Shu, and her daughter, the pretty little Li-Li.

They were very poor, so poor indeed that Li-Li, fond to a degree of personal finery, and fonder still of displaying it, had often the greatest difficulty in procuring the means of gratifying her vanity.

The widow, with her daughter's assistance, contrived to eke out a scanty living by the manufacture of the various sweet dainties dear to the heart of the average Chinese child. These she would take out into the streets and sell, sometimes successfully, at others bringing home a nearly full tray, and a heavy heart.

It was at such times as these that Li-Li and her mother suffered most, and that the poor room, which served them for a dwelling, appeared to reflect only too plainly the ill-fortune of its inmates.

The widow bore the shocks of poverty with anything but a patient spirit. Perhaps she was weary of life, and its ceaseless, monotonous struggles to maintain a bare existence. Perhaps her thoughts went back now and again to the days when, but just wedded, Hung-So, her husband, a distinguished member of the "literary" class, could and did surround her with many of life's luxuries, in the Chinese sense of the word.

When Li-Li was a tiny tot, lying crowing on the floor, and playing mischievously with the temptingly dangling end of her student-father's pigtail, the prospects of the little "Celestial" seemed bright and rosy indeed.

But there came a day when Hung-So was accused to the Viceroy of the Province by the Chief Mandarin in Whampoa of a—in Chinese eyes—terrible crime, nothing less in fact than the holding of advanced socialistic opinions. It was suggested that he had imbibed these from a certain young Englishman, the interpreter to a large business house in Whampoa, and a warm, personal friend of Hung-So's.

Digitized by Google

The possession of Western ideas and inclinations was then, as now, looked upon by "the powers that be" as dangerous in the extreme, and, although Hung-So was amiable and honest-hearted, seeking no personal aggrandisement nor the injury of any man, his enemies determined upon his ruin.

That the private fortune of the unhappy scholar had excited official cupidity is not only probable but certain, for after his condemnation and sentence to an indefinite period of imprisonment, and the savage punishment of the "canque," the "vultures" descended upon his property, which they devoured to the last shred, leaving his wife and child to the mercy of a cold, cruel world.

The highly-strung, sensitive nature of Hung-So could not long endure the mental and physical torture of his iniquitous chastisement. Two months after the pronouncement of the unjust judgment the wretched man succumbed to the severity of his sufferings, but it was at least two years later when Sing-Shu learnt that she was husbandless.

Li-Li, now a girl of seventeen, with the smallest feet, the glossiest black hair, and the most impertinent little nose ever seen, had a vivid recollection of her father. Like him, she was quick-brained, clever, but unlike him, she was vivacious and merry-hearted to an extent that sometimes sorely irritated her surviving parent.

Li-Li had lovers in plenty, that went without saying, but she was a born coquette, and so played with and teased her admirers that, though they still kept round the honey-pot, their adoration was in no small measure tempered with discretion.

It so happened that in the same street, "the street of many joys," there dwelt two brothers, by name respectively Quang-Ho and Ah-Sheng.

No man knew the nature of their occupation, although many suspected its true character. Periodically they would quit Whampoa in their own river boat, to be absent a month, or two months, according to the time of year.

It was noticeable that both brothers, on returning from each of these journeys, invariably paid a visit to the house of the widow, Sing-Shu. They never came together, but always at intervals of a day. Each, too, was the bearer of some trinket or other article as a present for the fair Li-Li.

Quang-Ho, the elder of the twain, generally contrived to get to windward, so to speak, of his brother, and make the first call. But Ah-Sheng was a cunning man, a man who could patiently bide the time in any and every event of this life.

He was aware of Quang-Ho's inordinate addiction to the use of the fatal drug in both its insidious forms. True, he was himself an opium-smoker in a small, moderate way, but was too clever to allow the habit to have such complete mastery over him as to interfere with his deliberately laid plans and schemes. He therefore trusted to his own self-repressive power and to his brother's intemperate indulgence to bring about that which he devoutly desired.

Both men loved Li-Li in a way, but of the two Quang-Ho's affection had about it the most reality. He was more single-hearted than his fraternal relative, who, believing in nothing in heaven, or in earth, or in the waters under the earth, had a supreme contempt for sentiment of any kind whatsoever.

It may be said at once that Quang-Ho was in Li-Li's eyes the most desirable suitor. Her mother also favoured his attentions. Ah-Sheng's presents might have been intrinsically of more value, but the donor ever spoilt the effect of his gift by his manner of giving. Try as he would to play even passably the part of wooer, he dismally failed, besides letting it be plainly seen that he would assuredly stick at nothing to obtain his end.

In the neighbourhood of the gate of "The Precious Girdle," the east gate of the city, were a few houses of unenviable reputation for gambling. John Chinaman is an inveterate gambler. He brings the desire for it into the world with him; it is in his blood. The passion for "staking upon the cast" is so strong within him that he will starve himself, strip himself, and bring himself to the verge of death almost in order to gratify his mad craving for the "fan-tan" frenzy.

Unfortunately for his own welfare, Quang-Ho was in this respect no better than the rest of his fellows.

One of the houses above all the rest had among the select initiated a name for high play and free opium. With the worshippers of the drug the latter fact operated, of course, as a powerful attraction and inducement.

It was on an evening when Quang-Ho was at the widow's house that Ah-Sheng took his way in the direction of the gate of "The Precious Girdle." A brief parley at the door of the tenement he sought, and he was admitted.

The proprietor, an evil-looking Chinaman, with eyes whose unpleasant propinquity gave him an expression of limitless villainy, seemed to have expected Ah-Sheng, for, without any salutation, he led him into a close, dark den at the extreme rear of the building, carefully closing the door after them.

"Is it to be to-night?" said the rascally dealer in men's souls and bodies.

"Yes," replied Ah-Sheng in a low, cautious tone, "to-night. I will give you notice of his coming a few minutes before."

"Good," said the other. "But the price, my friend, the price. Have you brought it with you? You promised it to-night."

"It is here," impatiently returned Ah-Sheng, producing from the bosom of his jacket a small bag, the contents of which chinked pleasantly in the ears of his companion.

This important matter settled, Ah-Sheng remarked with imperious emphasis:

"Remember, if you play me false I will do that which shall cause this house to be razed to the ground before morning. Carry out my instructions to the letter, and a similar sum to that I have now given you shall be yours. Savee?"

The wicked little eyes of the other blinked and half-closed in sweet anticipation, while he purred like some disreputable tom-cat contemplating mischief.

"I savee," he said with a cold smile and a hard compressing of the lips that augured badly for the unfortunate victim.

"The boat is ready in the little creek," continued Ah-Sheng, "on the north side, and the captain of the junk has agreed to weigh anchor directly his freight is on board. It only remains for you to do your part and earn the 'syce silver' awaiting you."

Ah-Sheng rose and left the room, passing behind the other, through a long, gaudily decorated apartment filled with three tiers of bunks on either hand, and containing close to a large charcoal brazier, glowing red, a

Digitized by Google

Free to the Ruptured.

Dr. W. S. Rice, the well-known Authority, sends a trial of his famous method

Free to All.

REMARKABLE SUCCESSES OF THE DR. RICE METHOD.

Even Old Men Ruptured all their Lives Cured.

WM. T. BLANDIN, of Riceville, Ia., was cured by Dr. Rice after 33 years' suffering from a bad rupture. No more remarkable experience than his was ever recorded.

Any person who is ruptured, or knows of anyone suffering with this blighting affliction, should interest themselves in the now famous Dr. Rice method, a system invented by Dr. W. S. Rice, of Adams, New York, U.S.A.

His plan differs from all others in the fact that it not only holds any kind of a rupture continually and securely with perfect comfort, day and night, but causes new flesh to form in the ruptural opening, thus binding the broken place firmly and producing an absolutely perfect and permanent cure. No other method does this.

GEO. F. MULFORD, 424 E. 5th St., Boston, Mass., was a sufferer 18 years; tried various trusses; and was cured by Dr. Rice in a few weeks. Mr. Mulford naturally recommends Dr. Rice to all sufferers.

Those who have been ruptured for years and have tried everything without success will doubtless be sceptical about this new method, but it is worth while investigating. And when it is considered that the sufferer may go about his daily work with all the freedom of one having a sound body, without pain of any kind, with no danger and without undergoing an operation, then it is certainly a method that one ought to look into and learn all about.

For the convenience of British patrons, Dr. Rice has opened Branch Offices at Dept. (57), 8-9, Stonecutter Street, London, E.C., where all communications should be addressed. He will send free to anyone who is ruptured, or knows of any person ruptured, whether a man, woman, or child, a FREE trial of his famous home cure.

It is a marvellous method, curing cases that defied hospitals, doctors, electricity, and all else. Merely send your name and address, and the* FREE TRIAL *will be sent without any cost to you whatever.

Digitized by Google

table, at which sat and stood, leaning over it with bleared, staring eyes, a dozen Chinamen absorbed in their wrestle with chance. A quick glance at the miserable infatuates, and Ah-Sheng went out, rapidly walking towards "the street of many joys."

In the little hut, for it was nothing better, Quang-Ho and pretty Li-Li sat talking, the old mother dozing in a corner, quite oblivious to all that was being said.

"Li-Li," Quang-Ho was saying, "the money is enough now. My last trip has made me rich. We will leave Whampoa and Ah-Sheng, who loves me not, and go to Canton. There will we set up a little eating-house, where the delicate roast dog and the white rat's leg shall persuade in the hungry passer-by. Shall it be, my golden lily?"

"Quang-Ho is good, and we will go; but I fear the brother. Ah-Sheng is a bad man. He makes love to me, though he knows that I am yours. Can we go soon?"

"Yes, Li-Li, in three days time we will go. But," and Quang-Ho rose up and made to depart, "I have business to do to-night by the gate of 'The Precious Girdle,' and the moon is high. I must leave my little wife."

Even as he spoke a face appeared at the window, a cruel, hard face, with an expression upon it of devilish triumph.

Li-Li saw it, and caught instinctively at the loose sleeve of Quang-Ho's jacket, but she managed to repress an inclination to call out. As her eyes met those of the spy the face disappeared.

"Do not go yet," she pleaded, "I am lonely till my mother wakes."

"Little one, I must go; but I will come again to-morrow."

"Ah," she sobbed out, "to-morrow may never come—to-morrow may never come!"

Gently disengaging his sleeve from her grasp, Quang-Ho whispered a few endearing and reassuring words and went his way.

Li-Li sat on with her face in her hands for a minute or two, then she got up quickly, and enveloping herself almost from head to foot in a long, dark blue robe of Sing-Shu's, she opened the door timidly, looked this way and that, and sped in the direction of the gate of "The Precious Girdle."

When Quang-Ho reached the door of the gambling-house he found it on the jar. Pushing it open, he went through to the room Ah-Sheng had traversed but a short while ago. The proprietor, who was busy superintending the "fan-tan" table, left his occupation and smilingly addressed the new-comer.

"Better have a pipe before play," he said, furtively glancing from under his half-closed lids at Quang-Ho.

This was a temptation not to be resisted, and the old man, himself preparing the dainty morsel in the lamp which always stood burning, handed the reed to the other. At the same time he pressed upon him a cup of "samshu," to warm his heart, as he said.

Quang-Ho took the reed and the cup, and retired to one of the unoccupied bunks. The old man watched him with cunning eyes until, the drug inhaled and the cup emptied, Quang-Ho sank back torpid and breathing heavily.

Soon the stertorous respiration apparently ceased, and the other, hurrying the players at the table to their bunks, hastily went out to the door, where, in the shadow of the neighbouring shop entrance, stood Ah-Sheng.

"Well," said the latter eagerly, "is all ready?"

"Yes," answered the old man, "nothing short of the 'claw of the dragon' will have power to wake him until the sun sinks in the west to-morrow."

Ah-Sheng made no reply, but beckoning to two coolies who bore between them a black, coffin-shaped box, he bid them deposit it within the entry of the house and follow the proprietor.

In less than five minutes they reappeared bearing the inert, corpse-like form of Quang-Ho. Laying it in the box, which they then raised shoulder high, they trotted off through the gate and along the road which girdles the island and leads to the north side.

First passing something to the old man, Ah-Sheng turned and rapidly pursued the course which led to his own dwelling.

Now the two men who bore the burden were lazy rascals, and once out of sight of their employer they slackened their pace, and, by-and-by, halted for a rest. They had not observed a long-robed little figure following them. The moon was now hidden, and they were too intent upon their chatter with which they sought to beguile the weariness of the way.

At the spot they selected, by the side of the road, and on the top of a steep, green slope which trended down to a deep, stagnant pool, they laid down the box, and throwing themselves on the ground, were soon fast asleep.

There is no knowing of what a woman's arm is capable in moments of intense excitement. Li-Li felt assured, for her woman's wit had told her that in that box lay the reason for all this mystery, and she leaned over the sleeping coolies, her brain busy with thoughts of what she should do.

The sight of blood was abhorrent to her. She would not knowlingly hurt the least of living things, but here was a crisis when she must, as it were, play the part of a "Celestial" Judith. The opportunity was under her hand. How it was done she never really realised. The men lay broadside on to the slope and side by side.

With a fervent prayer to her departed ancestors for strength, the girl suddenly pushed the nearest coolie so effectively that in collision with his fellow they both rolled at lightning speed down the slope.

Two startled cries, and simultaneously almost two heavy splashes in the dark, turbid water, and Li-Li was lying in a dead swoon across the coffin-shaped, black box.

* * * * *

Quang-Ho now runs the best restaurant in Canton. His wife, Li-Li—the old mother has long been dead—is a true helpmeet for him, while, always in the way, chirping merrily in the wake of his father and mother, is a veritable little replica of Quang-Ho himself.

* * * * *

Ah-Sheng disappeared from Whampoa altogether upon the failure of the plot, and the gambling den by the gate of "The Precious Girdle" has been shut up and deserted this many a day. Ralph Enderby.

"A MOUNTAIN THAT DISAPPEARED" is the subject of an extraordinary article in the

FEBRUARY "PEARSON'S"

describing the strange history of Mount Mazama, a mountain which committed suicide.

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE for February may be described in one word—SUPERB. Some good advice on the subject may be given in two words—BUY IT.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A STRAWBERRY PICNIC.

The Morning Leader, July 13th, 1898, says: "Messrs. S. Chivers and Sons, the well-known jam and jelly manufacturers, understand the art of entertainment no less than the art of jam making. On Tuesday they invited a number of Pressmen to a strawberry picnic at their farm at Histon, Cambridge. The wondering pickers were delighted with the sight of two score top-hatted visitors bending their backs to the willing task of finding large strawberries. It is just twenty-five years since Messrs. Chivers started jam-making. They now have a thousand acres of land under cultivation, and employ, when busy, eight hundred hands. The jam factory is within the circle of the fruit-fields, and the fruit can therefore be handled without delay." In addition to the crops grown by the firm itself, a very large quantity of fruit is obtained from various growers in the neighbourhood of the factory. Plucked early on a summer's morn, the fruit is made into jam, or the juice extracted to flavour Chivers' Gold Medal Jellies. A lady writes from Ashton-under-Lyne: "I have tried several preparations of Table Jellies, and have not been satisfied with them, but yours have given me complete satisfaction. I shall continue to use and recommend them to my friends." Nurse A. writes: "I consider your ucted Jellies peculiarly adapted for use in the sick-room, and for those who suffer from dyspepsia." The Official Report of the Royal Commission on Agriculture, 1895, says: "Messrs. Chivers' factory at Histon is now well-known throughout the country for the excellence of its manufactures."

Chivers' Gold Medal Jams and Table Jellies are sold by Grocers and Stores throughout the United Kingdom. Insist on being supplied with Chivers'. A free sample packet of Jelly will be sent on receipt of post-card. S. Chivers and Sons, Histon, Cambridge.

FREE SAMPLE of most useful Pocket Rubber Stamp with particulars of splendid paying agency for whole or spare time.—Apply Dept. Y, 89 Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

HAIR DESTROYED.

Send me an envelope (stamped and addressed) and I will tell you how to remove all superfluous hair free of charge. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Miss E. V. (Room 3), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.
GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS,
148 Old Street, London, E.C.

£50 CASH PRIZE

SEND NO MONEY WE TRUST YOU.

FREE.

£2 10s. £2 10s. REAL SILVER

WE GIVE YOU YOUR CHOICE of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1s. 6d. each. (Regular price, 2s. 6d.)

WE DO NOT WANT YOUR MONEY.

JUST WRITE US A POST-CARD

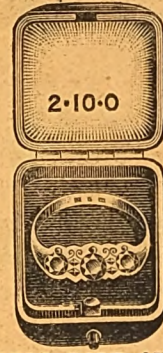
saying that you will either sell the Jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it with your name and address clearly written. On receiving your post card we will at once post you the Jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13s. 6d. you have received for same, and we will at once send you (no waiting), Absolutely Free, our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A Written Guarantee for Ten Years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1s. 6d. each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

FREE.



REAL GOLD AND REAL DIAMONDS

SEND NO MONEY. SEND NO STAMPS.

WRITE US TO-DAY. ONLY A POST-CARD.

WHAT THE PUBLIC SAYS:—

KNOCKING OTHERS IN THE SHADE ALTOGETHER.

100 High Street,
Mountain Ash, South Wales,

Dear Sir,—Just a line to acknowledge having received the beautiful present; it was beyond expectation. There are a lot of goods from a Glasgow firm but nothing compared with the British Goldsmiths Company's goods. We are knocking them in the shade altogether. Everyone who has bought our goods speak very well of them. I will do my best for your Company in little Wales.—Yours fraternally,
WILLIAM WILLIAMS.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS:—

"We have received some samples of the jewellery now being sold by the British Goldsmiths Co., the value of which is really wonderful considering the low prices asked for the goods. The British Goldsmiths Co. send out their goods to be sold by those who wish to put their spare time to good advantage. We should think there would be little difficulty about selling the goods we have before us. They are substantial, well finished, and cheap. The company offers a handsome present free to all persons selling a certain number of these articles."—HOME SWEET HOME, Jan. 5th., 1901.

BRITISH GOLDSMITHS CO. (DEPT. 29), 48 GRAY'S INN RD., LONDON.

Mr. Geo. R. Sims' Discovery "TATCHO."

20,000 LARGE (4/6 SIZE) BOTTLES TO BE DISTRIBUTED.

"TATCHO" is a brilliant spirituous tonic, the colour of whisky, free from all grease. A sprinkle of a few drops on the scalp and five minutes with the brush daily works marvels with every head of hair.

"TATCHO" acts as an invigorating tonic. It stops the hair falling, creates a luxuriant growth, and imparts to it a bright and youthful lustre.

"When I discovered the preparation, I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders," said Mr. George R. Sims to the representative of the Daily Mail. "Look at my hair now. Look at the colour. In time people got to know. Then the trouble began.

"Letters in thousands poured in to me from men and women in every quarter of the world, from all parts of the Kingdom, from America, India, Africa, China, and Australia. The work of answering the letters was enormous, and as far as possible the desired information was supplied; but it became quite evident that at the rate at which the demand was increasing I should very soon need a large staff of clerks to attend solely to the Hair renewer department of correspondence.

"In consequence, I said to myself. Why should this thing go on? If the public wants my hair renewer, the public shall have it; but the demand must be met in the ordinary business-like way. So I resolved to place the genuine article within reach of all, and with the assistance of a number of gentlemen, possessing the necessary commercial facilities, that has been accomplished."

THE GEO. R. SIMS' COMPANY HAVE DECIDED TO DISTRIBUTE

20,000 LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES OF TATCHO

to enable those who have not yet profited by Mr. G. R. Sims' discovery, to have the opportunity of doing so. The Company does this in the belief that such distribution will enable the preparation to become more widely known, and will introduce it to every home in a far more satisfactory manner than through unlimited puffing by advertisement.

COUPON.
S.S.
Feb. 2, 1901.

If you are desirous of participating in this distribution cut out this Coupon and send it to the Geo. R. Sims' Co., 81c Great Queen Street, London, W.C., accompanied by a postal order for 1/10. You will receive by return of post a plain package containing which will enable you to give TATCHO a fair trial and to satisfy yourself as to its merits.

A FULL SIZE 4s. 6d. TRIAL BOTTLE OF "TATCHO" POST PAID,

Digitized by Google

"No Better Food."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa

300 GOLD MEDALS, &c.

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c., lecturing on Foods, says:—"The chief text in the Gospel of Nutrition is that Tea and Coffee are not Foods at all, while Cocoa is an admirable and sustaining diet. Than FRY'S PURE CONCENTRATED COCOA, no better food product of this nature can be obtained or used."

N.B.—Sold only in tins with gilt tops.

A FREE TRIAL FOR 2/6

THE SET consists of Violin, Bow, Resin, &c.

VIOLIN OUTFIT COMPLETE.
Price £1 10s. 0d.

We will supply any reader of SHORT STORIES with one of these VIOLIN OUTFITS on Monthly Payments, as follows:—

You send us 2/6, with your Name and Address, and we will send one on approval.

If you approve of it you send us 2/6 on receipt and 5/- each month for 5 months, making the full 30/-.

BUT CUR NETT CASH WITH ORDER PRICE IS 27/- only.

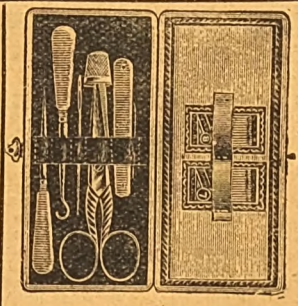
And if you do not approve of the Outfit, we will refund the cash sent, if you return the Outfit at once.



LADY'S COMPANION.

Containing 7 useful articles, exactly as illustrated, with Hall-marked Silver Thimble, in fine Leather Covered Velvet Lined Case. Price only 4/3.

MASTERS' 'FAVOURITE' MELODEON 12/6.

We will supply any reader with this Melodeon on receipt of 2/6. If you approve of it you send us 2/- on receipt and 2/- each month for 4 months. Nett Cash With Order Price 11/- only. If you do not approve of it we will refund the cash if you return the Melodeon at once.

Watches Clocks Albert's Medals Pendants Wedding rings Gem rings Signet rings Cutlery Cruets Electro-Plate Carvers Tea-pots Field glasses Pins Brooches

CATALOGUE

J.N. Masters, Ltd., Jewellers, RYE, Sussex.

Digitized by Google

FEBRUARY PEARSON'S NOW READY. PRICE 6D.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 632. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 9TH, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

A TYPIST AND DR. TIBBLES' VI-Cocoa

"NO LADIES EMPLOYED IN OFFICE WORK SHOULD BE WITHOUT VI-COCOA.

Miss JEANNIE FISHER, Railway Station Office, Stranraer: "I find it is my duty to acquaint you that I first used Vi-Cocoa three months ago, and at present I am unable to give vent to words sounding as high in its praise as I should like. I am a typewriter by profession. For the past ten months I was constantly troubled with pains in the forehead and weakness of the eyes, and you cannot conceive how ill and careworn I looked after a day's work of seven hours. I am now able to work all day wholly devoid of these feelings. I may say that Vi-Cocoa has kept me in employment, as I often had the intention of resigning.

"I have two cups daily in the office, and find it invigorating and refreshing, and I say with emphasis that no ladies employed in office routine should be without it. You have my liberty to use this for publication."

"Undoubted purity and strength."—Medical Magazine.

DR. TIBBLES' VI-Cocoa

"In the front rank of really valuable foods."—Lancet.

FAVOURED BY THE HOMES AND HOSPITALS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

ADDRESS: DAINTY SAMPLE TIN FREE TO ANY ADDRESS.

Dr. TIBBLES' VI-COCOA Ltd., 60 Bunhill Row, London, E.C.

DAINTY SAMPLE FREE.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henriette Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Height 12ins. Width 7ins.

Rye Clock (WITH ALARUM) 18/-

WE will supply any reader of Short Stories with one of these 18/- Alarum Clocks on monthly payments as follows;
YOU send us 2/6 with your name and address, and we will send you one on approval.
IF you approve of it, you send us 3/- on receipt, and 2/6 each month for five months, making the full 18/-.

BUT OUR NET-CASH-WITH-ORDER PRICE IS 16/- ONLY.
And we will refund the Cash sent, if you do not approve of the Clock, and you return it at once. (Signed) J. N. MASTERS.

A FREE TRIAL FOR 2/6

OUR 20th CENTURY CATALOGUE

containing illustrations of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, &c., &c., at 20 per cent. below London prices will be sent to any address on receipt of postcard.

OUR TERMS.

We will supply any reader of Short Stories with one of our Parcels of Cutlery on monthly payments as follows:—

YOU send us 2/6 and your name and address, and we will send you one on approval.

IF you do approve of it you send us 2/6 more on receiving parcel, and 5/- each month for four months, making the full 25/-.

BUT OUR NET-CASH-WITH-ORDER-PRICE IS 22/6 ONLY.

And we will refund the cash sent if you do not approve of the parcel and you return it at once.
(Signed) J. N. MASTERS.

Each Parcel contains 50 High-Class Table Articles.

RETAIL CASH PRICES.

6	White Bone Table Knives	3/6
6	" Dessert "	3/-
6	"Warewite" Table Forks	5/3
6	" Dessert "	3/9
2	" Table Spoons	1/9
6	" Dessert "	3/9
6	" Tea Spoons	2/-
1 pair	" Sugar Tongs	1/-
1 only	" Sugar Sifter	1/6
6	" Egg Spoons	1/6
2	" Salt Spoons	1/-
2	" Mustard Spoons	1/-

50 "Good Enough for a Gentleman's Table."

PLEASE NOTE! That we also supply other goods on similar terms.

SILVER, 2/- Gold 20/- Any name supplied.

J. N. MASTERS LIMITED "VERACITY" WATCHMAKERS, &C., RYE, SUSSEX.

CROSSE & BLACKWELL'S

4 PLATES OF SOUP FOR SIXPENCE

SOUP TABLETS

SOLD BY ALL GROCERS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

THE ENGLISH & WELSH COAL Co., SHAKESPEARE ST., MANCHESTER. Deliver in Truck Load. Prices on application. You will find it to your advantage to buy direct.

DRUNKENNESS CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

FREE SAMPLE of most useful Pocket Rubber Stamp with particulars of splendid paying agency for whole or spare time.—Apply Dept. Y, 89 Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

NEW AUTOMATIC KNITTER FOR HOME WORK. 15/- to 30/- Weekly.

"The machine that knitted the hosiery and comforts for the troops in Africa."—See what The Times said.

Knits Socks (a pair in 35 min.), Stockings, Fancy Goods, &c. Easily learned. Lessons Free.

Cash, hire, and Work Terms from "Sorres" dept.: 67 Southwark St., S.E.; 55 Oxford St., W.; 122 Upper St., London, N.; 105 Nicolson St., Edinburgh; 58 Union St., Glasgow; 132 Stephen's Green, Dublin; 62 Great Hampton St., Birmingham; 31 Stokes Croft, Bristol.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 632.] For the Week Ending February 9th, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

BY REGINALD BARNETT.

MOST houses have a story; I don't mean the architectural divisions designated by the word, but the narrative of some episode connected with inmates past or present. I know mine has, and though it deals neither with a crime nor with any accident of a thrilling sensational character, yet I think it worth the telling, and sit down to do so in a moment of leisure, with nothing of graver purpose to hinder me.

The house in question, occupied by me and mine, is situated in London. For obvious reasons I shall give no closer indications as to its exact position, but shall content myself with saying that I chose it some years ago on account of its vicinity to one of the Metropolitan Underground Railway stations, and the facilities which its site afforded for getting about comfortably and speedily from one end of the town to another. Being a business man, compelled by my commercial avocations to journey Citywards almost every day of my existence, I was naturally on the look out for such a convenient residence, and literally snapped at it when I heard it was vacant and to let.

I took it on a long lease and have ever since been able to linger at least ten minutes longer over my breakfast of a morning, a luxury which a man of my years and somewhat lethargic habit of body appreciates keenly, I assure you.

The building is an old one. No stucco, swiftly "run-up," enterprising jobbers speculation; but a good solid brick and mortar edifice, reared with care, and meant to endure.

A passing brewer's dray does not cause its stout walls to vibrate, and if I have any pressing work to do at home in the evening, my eldest daughter can stumble over a Beethoven sonato in the next room as much as she pleases without in the least disturbing me.

A roomy house, with good lofty ceilings, quaint high marble mantelpieces cunningly carved, and other indications of past glories. It was built, I should say, not only when George III. was king, but a young king too, and long before fashion had dreamed of migrating so far west as Belgravia. Goodness knows what lords and ladies held their refined jinks within its walls; what wits said good things over a pinch of snuff or a dish of tea; it is not of them I have to speak.

I am but a plain citizen, and it is enough for me that the house is a thoroughly comfortable one, suiting me and my pocket, and more than big enough to hold the whole posse of my five branches at such times when they all come home from school, and conspire together to remind of my responsibilities as a father.

The event I am going to relate happened some three or four years after I had settled myself cosily in my new abode.

I had returned one afternoon somewhat earlier than was my custom, for the purpose of celebrating my second boy's birthday, and sat at home in my easy chair like Goldsmith's good old Vicar, surrounded by my young hopefuls of both sexes.

Unlike him, however—owing to the din of romping and chatter—I entertained serious doubts as to whether I should not have been better off had I continued single and only talked of population, instead of marrying and endeavouring to bring up a large family.

Suddenly one of the children, who was at the window, attracted my attention by a remark.

"Oh, do look!" she said—it was Minnie, our youngest but one, who had not as yet overcome certain difficulties with regard to the pronouncing of her r's—"do look at that old man in the steet! He's just like old Father Cwithmas, and keeps looking up here!"

"Where? where?" said the rest rushing to the window.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

I myself—as great a baby as any of them—glanced out, and, to be sure, the little thing was right. There was an old gentleman to be seen; a very old gentleman, with a long snow-white beard, who stooped very much, and steadied his feeble gait by the aid of a stick. A real Father Christmas; but by no means a shabby one, for the black clothes he wore seemed to be in excellent condition. My house appeared to be the object of his attention, and he looked at it, hesitated, and then looked at it again.

"He's coming to the door!" cried my little ones. "Father Christmas is coming to the door!"

"Coming to the door!" said I, "Good gracious, so he is! Who can he be, I wonder, and what can he want?"

He was too respectable and venerable for a tax-collecter; and the manner in which he approached the entrance of the house showed apparent timidity and diffidence. Surely he was making some mistake; I did not know him, and expected no srtange visitors.

He knocked at the door, and I just peeped out of the dining-room, where we were sitting, impelled by a certain curiosity to learn what his motive might be in singling us out.

"Does Mrs. Smith still live here?" he asked the housemaid, who ran up to him.

"Mrs. Smith, sir? No, there ain't no such party living here."

"Ah, gone, as I supposed," I heard the old gentleman say, as though speaking to himself. "It is many years ago."

There was a pause after this; and I could see that Mary, our girl, was doubtful as to what she should do next.

The old gentleman did not seem disposed to go, but stood at the door reflecting in silence.

"Can I see the present owner of the house?" he said at last.

"Here is my card; I should desire, if it is convenient, a few minutes' interview."

So there was no mistake, after all. Father Christmas had marked us for his own.

I looked at the card which the girl brought into me, and read: Count Pogliano, Brescia.

"Count Pogliano, Brescia!" I thought to myself. "That sounds Italian. What can a count want with me?" However, the movements of the old gentlemen had excited some interest in me, so I decided upon seeing him.

"Take him upstairs to the drawing-room," I said to the girl. "I will be with him directly."

I packed the children off to the nursery, and, having informed my wife of the strange visitor's appearance, hurried up to wait upon him.

He had taken a seat, but rose on my entering, and bowed with grave courtesy.

Face to face with him, I saw a man, who, when young, must have been strikingly handsome, and to whom age gave a singular distinguished and patriarchal appearance.

But for the stoop of his body, he would have been far above the average height of men; his nose was well cut and slightly aquiline, and his eyes had not lost their lustre. A truly venerable old gentleman, whom it was impossible to mistake for anything but a gentleman.

"Pray be seated, sir," I said, noticing that his great age—he looked over eighty—to a certainty made him rather feeble upon his legs.

He sat down again, and then glanced at me timidly, as though at a loss for suitable words with which to express his thoughts.

"I scarcely know how to explain my intrusion," he began at last, speaking with a slight foreign accent, but otherwise perfectly clearly, and employing well-chosen

"Oh, do look," she said. "Do look at that old man in the street!"

phrases. "My reasons for disturbing you will, no doubt, seem strange."

I nodded my head in silence, and waited for him to continue.

"The fact is—that I lived in this house many many years ago——"

"Indeed, sir," I put in, observing that the old gentleman was growing more than ever nervous and diffident.

"Yes, sir. A Mrs. Smith was the occupant at the time; but perhaps you have no knowledge of such a person?"

"No, sir, I cannot say I have," I replied. "My tenancy is quite of recent date—some three years and a half at most; and Smith was not the name of my predecessor."

"Ah, just so; thank you. It is many years ago; and things alter more than men. To me it seems as though it were yesterday."

He looked about him with a saddened gaze, and I could see that some of the recollections of his past moved him deeply.

"In what way can I serve you, sir?" I remarked, after a brief pause, desirous of bringing matters to some precise and business-like stage.

"That is exactly what puzzles me to explain," he answered, rousing himself from the half reverie into which he had fallen. The—the question is a delicate one—one purely of sentiment—I scarcely—I hardly venture upon broaching it."

Digitized by Google

But for his grave sad demeanour and the quiet courtesy of his manner, I should have been strongly disposed to consider my strange foreign noble visitor a lunatic who had by some means got astray from an asylum. Under the existing conditions, my perceptions led me to think that the old gentleman had some genuine and powerful motive for doing violence to his natural timidity, and bearding a Briton in his own castle.

"Well sir," I remarked, "you will of course, understand that unless you yourself chose to assist me a little, I——"

"Bear with me, sir," interrupted the old gentleman, meekly. "When you know all, you will not fail I hope, to excuse my trespass upon your good nature and patience. I am eighty-five years of age, and yet I have travelled all the way from Brescia for the sole purpose of visiting this house."

"Indeed, sir," I once more observed, at a loss for anything more original or fresh. "You have come a long way."

"Yes, it is a long journey for one so old as I am, is it not? But I could not make up my mind to die in peace without seeing the place once more."

Judging that this was all the old gentleman required, I gave him the opportunity of taking a good look round the room. To my disappointment, however, he seemed but little interested in the apartment where we were sitting, and continued fidgeting about uncomfortably.

"You will pardon my presumption," he said nervously, "but I am a little upset at finding the house changed into a private dwelling. It used not to be so in my time, but was let out into apartments to all comers."

"Really, sir!" I began, not a little astonished at this turn of the conversation.

"Do not misunderstand me," he resumed promptly, perceiving, no doubt, my look of amazement. "What I mean, sir, is that this alteration of circumstances makes the request I am desirous of putting extremely awkward and delicate. Had Mrs. Smith or any ordinary lodging-house keeper been here still, I should not have experienced such reticence."

"Pray do not distress yourself," I said, seeing that the old gentleman was in reality a good deal put out. "You need be under no very great ceremony with me. I am a plain man of business."

"Thank you," he replied, bowing with great courtesy. "Your extreme kindness gives me confidence. Well, then, you must know that my object in coming here was to visit the rooms which are just over our heads—particularly the one at the back, looking on to the garden. Do I express myself clearly?"

"Perfectly," I answered. "One of the rooms is occupied by myself and my wife; the other is my eldest daughter's bedroom."

"Ah!" he said—his face, which had suddenly grown almost joyful and animated for a second, falling considerably at the latter part of my statement, "I was sure my request would be an awkward one, sir."

"Why, sir?" I asked. "Do I understand you mean that you wish to go up-stairs and see those two rooms?"

"Exactly," he exclaimed eagerly. "I—I was bold enough to hope that you would grant me the favour."

"Certainly, sir; nothing can be easier. Just one word to my wife, and I will return and show you to the rooms."

I rose and moved towards the door.

"One more question," he said, in an hesitating tone. "Have there—have there been great changes made in the house?"

"Changes, in what way, sir?"

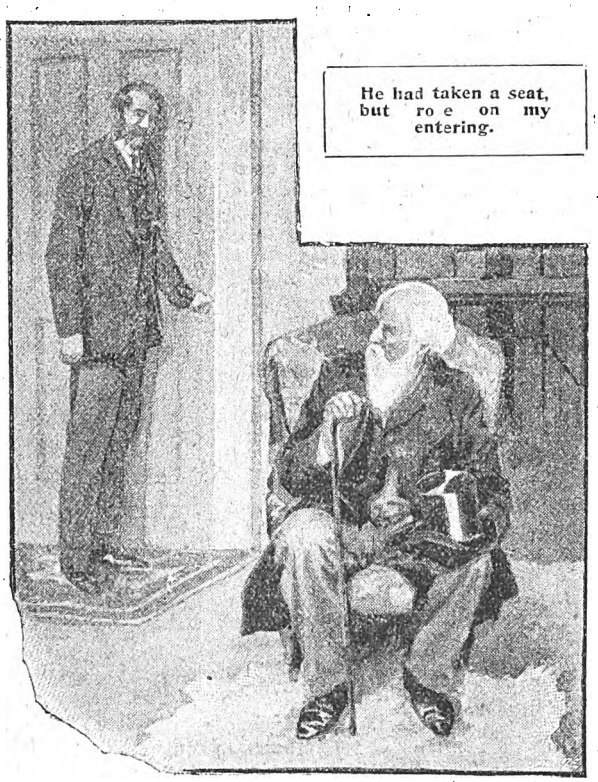
"Well—do you think the walls and—and the windows are much in the same state as they used to be years ago?"

"So far as I am able to say," I answered, puzzled and surprised at this odd query, "the house is pretty well what it must have been when it was first built. Of course, I need scarcely mention that the rooms have been painted, papered, and freshened up from time to time."

"Ah, you say they have been painted, sir?" he asked anxiously.

"Oh dear, yes; I myself had the place done up from top to bottom before I came into it."

"Thank you," he answered regretfully, "thank you.



He had taken a seat, but rose on my entering.

My questions no doubt seem strange to you; but I had my reasons for asking. I was indulging in a hope which I fear is vain."

I then went downstairs, and explained to my wife in a few words the result of my interview with the old gentleman.

"Good gracious how extremely peculiar," she exclaimed. "And you don't mean to say, John, that you have been imprudent enough to leave him all alone in the drawing-room, with all my blue china and things lying about."

"Don't be alarmed, my dear," I answered, amused at her dismay.

Digitized by Google

"I will be responsible for his honesty. The china is perfectly safe with him."

"Well then, he must be a lunatic," she replied, with a woman's logic. "Who ever heard of a sane man coming into a house, and making such a request?"

"I don't suppose he means any harm. He is very old and shaky, and has, no doubt, some sentimental reason for wishing to see the rooms. Surely there can be no objections to my gratifying his wish."

"But—I don't like the idea of strangers going up into the bedrooms. Besides, how am I to be sure that Carry's room is particularly tidy? it isn't as a rule, you know."

"Oh, he won't pay any attention to such trifles; and I can't out of common civility, refuse such a small thing to a man who has travelled such a distance."

"Well, if you must take him, take him," said my wife at last. "Only get rid of him as soon as you can. The tea things will be in presently; and the children will be troublesome if you keep them waiting."

Armed with my grey mare's grudgingly given consent, I rejoined the Count.

"Sir, I am entirely at your service," I said. "If you will please follow me up-stairs."

Visibly moved, the old gentleman rose in silence, bowed once more gravely as I opened the door for him, and walked up slowly, under my escort, to the rooms on the next landing.

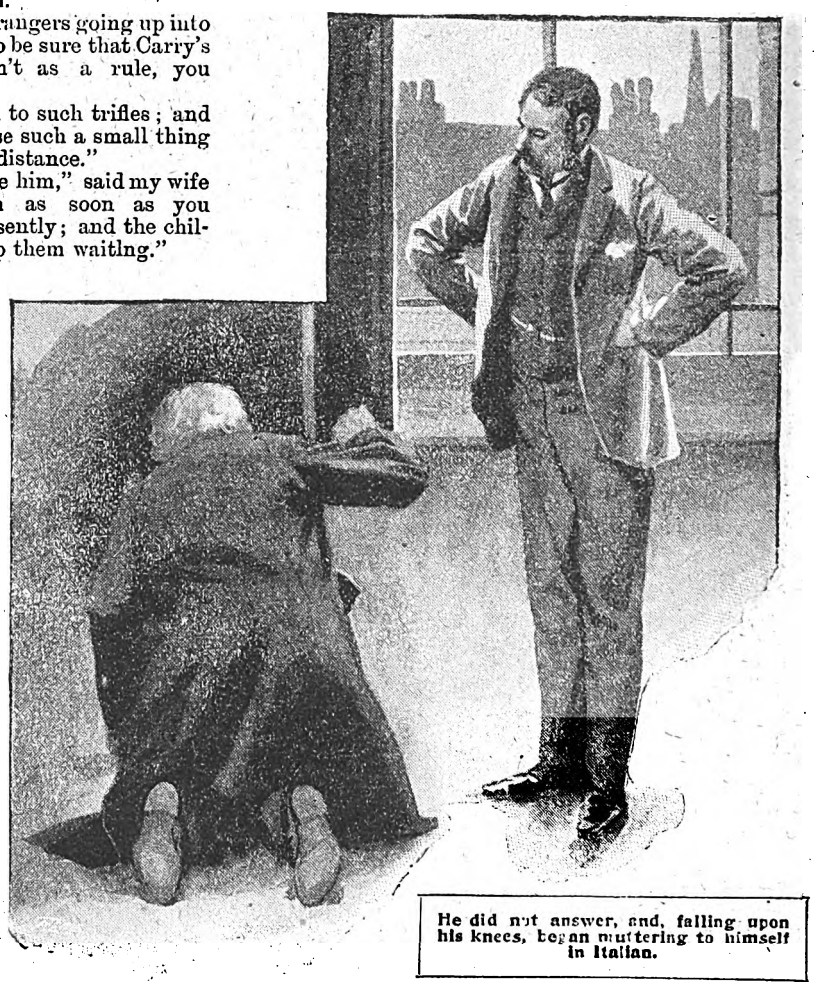
At his own request, we entered my daughter's chamber. It was a pleasant room, looking to the north and on to the garden, or rather a succession of gardens; for the space at the back was an open one, and studded with fine trees of goodly growth, which in the summer, when in leaf, presented a charming green and rural aspect—quite a cheering and refreshing view not often to be obtained from houses situated in such a dense and central district as ours.

I glanced at the Count. The sight of the room caused so deep an emotion in him that I made haste to procure him a chair, lest he should fall.

He thanked me feebly.

"I daresay you were surprised," he said, "at the effect produced upon me; but you must know that, forty years ago, I lived in this very room. My poor Teresa—my wife, sir—was with me, and died here. Our son Carlo was born here. He is also no more; he died the death of a brave man at Solferino, while fighting for the land of his forefathers. I am alone now in my old age, and this is all that remains to me of the past."

"We were very poor," he resumed dreamily; "but we were young, full of hope, and rejoiced to have escaped a great danger. I had been compromised as an intimate friend of Count Confalonieri—you may have heard of the great Italian patriot, sir?—and I was about to be arrested. A companion warned me, and I succeeded in escaping from the Austrian bloodhounds. I fled to England, and my fond Teresa followed me here to this house, to this very room, and shared my lot. My land, my estates, were all confiscated. Though absent, I was sentenced to death as a traitor to my country, and I had to struggle for daily bread as a teacher of languages. But we were happy, in spite of our poverty. When I came home, Teresa was waiting with a smile to receive me. In the summer, however poor we might be, that window-sill was gay with flowers; and those gardens, sir—those gardens, sir, were her particular delight. She gave them the name of Bosco Bello. All the birds knew her, and came to her and helped her to sing songs to our little Carlo. They are both dead, and the room is a good deal changed; but the gardens, the trees, are here still.



He did not answer, and, falling upon his knees, began muttering to himself in Italian.

"All is over now!" continued the old gentleman, making an effort to control his feelings. "My title, my riches, have long since been restored to me; but what are they to me? One more request, sir; I know I have been most selfishly intruding upon your time and privacy, but grant me yet one more favour before I take my leave. May I look behind that shutter by the window?"

"That shutter!" said I, surprised.

"Yes," he replied. "It is sheer folly on my part, I know,

Digitized by Google

after so many years have passed; but I still feel a mad hope in me to find something there that I remember well in the old days."

"Look, by all means," said I, a trifle suspicious that grief had preyed upon the old gentleman's mind, and that he was not perfectly sane.

He advanced, drew the folded shutter out with a trembling hand, and peered anxiously at the board or panel behind it.

"Look!" he exclaimed suddenly, with a kind of chok sob. "It is still there! Gran Dio! it is still there!"

"What is still there?" I asked, approaching him.

He did not answer, he seemed to forgot even my presence, and, falling upon his knees, began muttering to himself in Italian.

In a corner, blackened by the dirt and dust of time, but still fairly decipherable, was a faint scribble in pencil, and in a woman's hand.

"She wrote them two months before she died," said the old Count. "The verses are poor, but they mean more to me than the most beautiful lines of Petrarca. Her heart was in them. I am truly grateful to you for your courtesy and kindness. With your permission, I will now retire."

"Sir," said I with a great sense of sympathy and pity for the old gentleman, "if you ever desire at any time to come here again, pray stand upon no ceremony. I shall be only too pleased to welcome you."

I held out my hand, and he grasped it warmly.

"Thank you," he answered, "thank you. I hope to see you again—indeed, I have something more to ask of you; but not now, not now. I need rest, and have wearied you quite enough."

As I led him to the street-door, through the hall, two of my impish, mischievous little ones put out their curly heads, and, giggling to themselves, as children will, called out in shrill, audible voices:

"Father Cwithmas."

The old gentleman turned round, saw them, and smiled benevolently.

"Your little children, sir," he asked. "What did they say? Did I hear them call me Father Christmas?"

"Do not pay any attention to them," I said, frowning portentously. "They are exceedingly rude and ill-behaved."

"Nay, nay, sir," he replied. "Father Christmas is a good name."

He approached them as they came out timidly one by one, and patted them gently on their cheeks and heads, saying a few kindly words, after which he took his leave and disappeared, hobbling round the corner.

The next day a van drove up, and a vast package of elaborate toys of all sizes and description came to hand; and we knew the giver by means of a scrap of paper thrust into the parcel, on which the words, "From Father Christmas," were scrawled tremulously.

The good old Count must have ransacked and bought up the whole of a toy emporium, and my children were, of course, in ecstacies of delight.

I saw him once again in the flesh. He drove up one evening—three days after his first visit—and, when our preliminary greetings were over, I sounded him as to his desire to see once more the room in which the happiest period of his life had been spent.

To my astonishment he declined to trouble me. His pilgrimage had been accomplished, and he proposed returning to Italy in two or three days; but he had come to beg one more favour of me.

"It is my wish, if possible, to take that shutter back with me," he said. "I should like to close my eyes reading Teresa's lines."

I promised that this wish of his should be acceded to, and he shook my hands warmly, and, as I think, invoked a blessing upon me and mine in Italian.

The dusty board, on which the faint lines were still preserved, was duly forwarded to Count Pogliano at his hotel. I myself never saw him again, but some two years after the event, when the incident of his visit was almost forgotten, a letter bearing an Italian post-mark came, informing me of the old gentleman's death, and advising me that, in accordance with certain instructions contained in his will, I should be in receipt of some tokens of his regard, which I was earnestly desired to accept. The said tokens reached me in due course: a marvellous piece of gold plate, the genuine workmanship of that cunning artificer, Benvenuto Cellini (to this day in my drawing-room, under a glass cover, and partly the admiration, partly the envy, of my friends); a host of curious and valuable trinkets—all family relics—for my wife and children; and a little beautifully-executed minature portrait of the Contessa Teresa Pogliano, which I was begged to hang up, for so long as I remained in the house, in the little room where she herself had lived happily, and died.

The children called out in shrill, audible voices: "Father Cwithmas."

There it is fixed at this moment, against the wall, and as near the window as possible; looking on to the old smoky trees, and greeting Bosco Bello with a serene peaceful smile.

Digitized by Google

THE REAL THING.

OR, HIS LAST GAMBLE.

THE dainty drawing-room of a West End flat.

A pretty girl seated at a piano, softly rippling Tosti's "Return."

A warm blush still lingers upon her cheeks; her eyes are intently fixed on the sheet of music before her.

By her side stands a tall, well built man, upon whose features an expression of keen disappointment is plainly discernible.

"Then that is your decision, Miss Newcombe?"

"Yes."

"It is a serious matter to refuse."

"Marriage is more serious still."

"Granted. But I had thought you cared for me, and your decision comes upon me as a revelation."

"I had made up my mind never to marry."

"And I love you!"

"I am sorry—that is, you flatter me; but really, my duty to my father demands that I shall continue as I am."

"That is a noble sacrifice—for your father's sake. But do you think he shares——"

"Oh, pray don't mention that word, Mr. Hampton; that is the cause of all my trouble!"

"How so?"

"This horrid gambling on the Stock Exchange."

"Surely you don't——"

"Gamble? Certainly not! I see the folly of it."

"So do I. A friend of mine who thought he had discovered a royal road to wealth plunged a bit—had a flutter or two. But I—that is my friend burnt his fingers."

"Dear me! How painful."

"Ha, ha! You don't understand. He made several investments, on the advice of those who said they knew a lot about it. Instead of a rise in the prices coming off, they dropped and I—er—my friend lost every stiver."

"Ah, I understand. If your friend burnt his fingers, I'm afraid my father has cremated both his arms up to the elbow. Poor old dad. He is too credulous."

"What! Does the Admiral indulge in a flutter?"

"I am sorry to say yes; and the flutter invariably results in someone flying off with his money. The consequence is—I will be candid with you—he has lost every penny he possessed. We live on a small annuity, which he cannot touch, left me by my mother.

"Were he left alone, what would he do?

"That is why I have decided never to marry unless he can be reformed."

"But what reformation does he require? Without money, he cannot gamble on the Exchange."

"Ah! But he is such a slave to this terrible vice. You have no idea how the passion has gained the mastery over him. I fear—I dread to think about it, but I sometimes fear he will forget everything and sacrifice his honour and his name in getting the wherewithal to gratify his passion. It is terrible. My darling old dad."

Tears stand in the girl's eyes as she thus expresses herself. She goes on:

"How could I become the wife of any man who might be dragged into the mire by the act of a weak and infatuated relative?"

The voice of Hampton bears traces of emotion as he replied with some warmth:

"Under no circumstances could I regard your father with any feelings but those of a son. My love would be poor indeed if I allowed such fears to stand in my way! Mabel, I love you. Be my wife and make me the happiest of men."

"I cannot, I cannot consent."

"Is your rejection conditional? If I undertake to induce the Admiral to renounce for ever this weakness of his, may I hope—"

"I fear it is useless. If he would renounce it for anybody he would do it for me I know. But I have tried in vain."

"At any rate I shall endeavour to bring about that which you desire—the reformation of your father."

Again the tears flow into the big blue eyes of the distressed girl. She presses her lover's hands. He lifts one of hers to his lips and kisses it devoutly. So great is her emotion that, without a word, she hurries from the room.

Jack Hampton was not brought up in a very romantic school; he left Oxford to become a partner in his father's very flourishing firm of government contractors; and as he sits in an armchair alone in that pretty drawing-room, he is compelled to laugh quietly to himself at his self-adopted rôle of reformer.

"Is she only knew that I had been a bit warm on the same game myself; if it hadn't been for the hard headedness of my governor, where might I have been? Running a ranche; an undischarged bankrupt; anything bad, in fact. Happily the old man put on the brake at the proper time—and just saved me from ruin. It's a glorious life—the turf itself is quiet before it—on 'Change; full of excitement; a fortune in a day; ruin in an hour. It is a fascinating game indeed, and I have a big job before me to reform an old hand at the business—but here he comes."

Sundry sounds in the passage announce the advent of Admiral Newcombe, and he enters the drawing-room, slowly enough owing to his unwieldy size, which was designed on lines more suitable for a country mansion than for a bandbox flat in fashionable London. He greets the young contractor cordially.

Then, looking around carefully to make sure that they are alone, he asks in what he no doubt considers a whisper, but wasn't:

"How did you get on, my boy?"

"Badly, Admiral."

"Ha! How's that?"

"Miss Newcombe has rejected me."

"Too bad. But she's a keen judge of character, is Mabel."

"Mine is at fault, evidently."

"Poor fellow. But was her decision final?"

"Well, no; I may say there is hope if I succeed in a certain task."

"And that is?"

Digitized by Google

"The reformation of an old reprobate."

"What? How extraordinary! An old reprobate, did you say?"

"Yes; a frightful old scorcher."

"Very extraordinary! Fancy making a missionary of you! Ha ha! Some of her poor pensioners in the slums, I suppose. Well, I wish you luck, but if he is the old rake your words imply, I'm doubtful of your success. These old sinners want a lot of reforming."

"And he is an awful old rake; but I shan't despair. I'll keep my eye on him in future."

"He'll want a lot of that my boy. But, pardon me, Hampton, my boy; have you seen the latest tape prices on 'Change."

"No, Admiral; my investments are not of the risky sort, I don't take very much interest in speculative groups. In fact, I don't approve of gambling on 'Change at all."

"H'm. I don't quite agree with you there, Hampton. Remember that most of our millionaires operated on 'Change."

"So did most of our bankrupts. Our millionaires control the movements as a rule. They wouldn't be millionaires if they didn't."

"Well, well; someone must take a little risk. Now, I have a really good thing on—thousands in it, my dear sir. I can put you on; but mind, on the strict Q.T. Do you ever have a flutter?"

"Not very often. In fact, it is some time ago, since I did anything in that line."

The Admiral again looks around the room with an air of caution. Bending forward he grasps Hampton by the arm, shaking it at every syllable, as, in a sort of fog-horn whisper, he utters these words:

"Put your last shilling into 'Blue Snakes' my boy, they are the real thing!"

Hampton begins to look interested.

"Why, Admiral, a week ago they were offered to me at ninepence each any quantity up to ten thousand."

The Admiral grins ecstatically.

"So they were; so they were; quite so; but look here," and he produces a Financial Stunner from his coat pocket, "what were the closing prices yesterday? Fifteen shillings and sixpence! Think of it—fifteen shillings and sixpence sterling! Now, here's a bit of news for you! To-morrow at this time they will be selling by thousands at par, or over £5!"

"Are you sure of this, Admiral?"

"Positive! Here is a wire from an old friend of mine in the City. 'Listen:

> "There is every possibility of The Big Crowds Amalgamated purchasing the 'Blue Snakes' to-day at the handsome price of £3,500,000 on the strength of a code cable received yesterday. 'Blue Snakes' are therefore a likely investment.—JACKSON."

"What can be plainer than that. At the price named, every single share should to-morrow be worth £5 each. It's a wonderful chance, and it would be flying in the face of Providence to neglect it. I am going to speculate my last farthing in it, and I advise you to do likewise. It's a dead cert. What's the correct time."

The Admiral is puce in the face from excitement as he pulls out his own watch to check Hampton's.

"Five minutes past three! I've wasted too much time talking."

"Hampton, do me a favour—a service—for which I shall be ever grateful! I can't get about owing to my lameness! Like a good fellow now! This is too precious a matter to confide to the telegraph or telephone service! I beg of you to take a hansom at once and rush for the Stock Exchange! Here's a bank draft for three hundred. Give it with this letter of instruction to Knowles the broker—confound him! he refused to give me credit last month, but no matter—he's the safest man I know. You will go? Right! Off with you!

"There's not a moment to be lost! Promise the cabby double fare to hurry. Now then! Don't lose a moment, my boy. The purchase must be made before four o'clock or all is lost! Hurry, Hampton, hurry! Come back to dinner!" And not permitting a word of protest or acquiescence to issue from Hampton's mouth, he pushes him to the door of the flat, which he opens, and almost shoves the bewildered contractor into the arms of the lift attendant.

"Then that is your decision, Miss Newcombe?"

Digitized by Google

"Hurry, Hampton! Hurry!"

Then the Admiral rushes back to his drawing-room the window of which commands a view of the street below.

"Hurrah! He's got a hansom," and the old man capers about the room in spite of his bad leg.

* * * * *

"Here's a telegram for you, father."

It is nearly two hours since Jack Hampton left the house on his important mission.

Mabel enters the little smoke-room of the flat, bearing in her fingers the usual unmistakeable envelope.

The Admiral, who had been trying to keep down his excitement, grabs the missive; tearing off the cover in a tremendous hurry.

"Ha! What's this? Good God!"

A terrible groan bursts from the white lips, and the old man totters back into his armchair paralysed in every limb.

Mabel, almost fainting with fright, rushes out for some water, and places the glass to the old man's lips. His features, drawn and ghastly, have the greyish shade of death.

The devoted daughter trembling in every limb, and as pale as the proverbial ghost, bathes her father's forehead. He gradually revives. His groaning is awful to hear. Suddenly he realises that it is Mabel who is tending him. He shudders. Then he makes a violent effort to be calm.

"Oh, what is the matter, father?"

"Nothing, nothing, my girl; just another little financial disappointment. I'm all right now."

His shaky hand stretched forth to grasp the cause of the scene. He repeats the message almost unconsciously:.

"'Blue Snakes' purchase declared off. Don't invest. Shares worthless.—JACKSON."

He sinks back again into his chair.

"What does it mean, dad?"

The old man burst out into a torrent of sobs and moans.

"Don't speak to me, dear, don't speak to me! I'm a mug!"

"A mug!" gasps the girl. She thinks he has gone mad, and fancies himself to be such a utensil. "Oh, father, don't think that you're a mug."

"I am—I tell you. And a stone-broke mug too," he groans.

"Tell me all, father."

"I will," the old man sobbed, choking with grief. "I'll make a clean breast of it. I've spent the last penny we had in the world in a mining speculation! Two hours ago I handed the money to Jack Hampton to go and purchase the shares. That wire now tells me that the shares are worthless."

"Jack Hampton did this! Oh father! What a deceitful man! He promised to cure you of this terrible passion—and now he aids and abets you in spending your last farthing. The cruel wretch!"

"It's my fault, my dear. I begged him to do it. I forced him to do it. Don't blame him. It's all the fault of your silly old father that everything we have in the world is lost and we are beggars!"

"Beggars; no father; no beggars. There is still my £300 annuity which is due on the 17th, why, that's to-day!" exclaims the girl, joyfully clapping her hands. "That will keep us for ever so long!"

The old man now breaks down completely, weeping like a child.

"Oh," he moans between his sobs, "my heart is broken. My girl, I have robbed you. I received the bank draft to-day, but my cursed foolish brain spun visions of multiplying it by six on the Exchange, and I resolved to use it for that purpose. Oh, forgive your wicked old father."

Mabel stands as though stunned by the revelation. Could it be possible that her father had been so unutterably infatuated as to thus bring them to poverty, temporarily at any rate? She is forced to admit it. It was what she had been fearing, that her father would stop at nothing to gratify his passion for gambling.

And Jack Hampton, in whom she had placed entire confidence had been, in spite of his solemn undertaking, a party to this cruel, crushing injustice. This man who had pleaded so hard to win her hand and heart, was almost guilty of robbing her.

Her belief in man's honour was rudely shattered. Yet she resolved to bear up under the bitter blows.

"Dad, dear," she whispers softly in the broken old man's ears, "don't fret any more. If only this will show you the folly of gambling, and be the means of saving you further trouble, I will regard it as a blessing. I will work for you, if necessary, and we shall be very happy together."

"Ah, never again; never again!" vehemently declares the old gentleman. "I have done with it for ever! Here, before you, my daughter, I solemnly promise never to gamble again!"

Digitized by Google

"That is enough, dad dear; now see how happy we shall be together."

* * * * *

Mabel was not present when Jack Hampton returned to dine with the family; yet the Admiral's greeting was none the less hearty.

"The 'Blue snakes' have bitten me after all, Jack, my boy," he said, a little sadly.

"I thought their fangs looked a bit dangerous, sir," responded the contractor, without the slightest show of sympathy.

The old gentleman rather resented this.

"You don't appear in a hurry to offer your regrets for my loss," he remarked, a trifle peevishly.

"I am in too high spirits to care about regrets," said Hampton, airily. "When I went to the Stock Exchange on your mission I met an old friend of mine who knows more about shares than most people. He gave me the straight tip on a parcel of Kaffirs. I invested a couple of hundred and just before I started here I had a wire from my friend stating that I have landed a cool thousand over the deal."

"I congratulate you, Hampton. Still I think you might have spared a little sympathy for the losses of an old friend."

"What losses. I don't know any friend of mine who has lost anything."

"What!" the old man jumped up in sudden joy. "Didn't you buy those 'Blue Snakes' after all?"

"No, sir. My friend assured me that the reptiles were being rigged by a gang of bears, and declared that if you touched them with a forty foot pole you would be landed. So here's your draft."

"You don't—you can't be in earnest."

"I am."

The Admiral uttered a whoop of joy.

"Then I'm saved! Thank Heaven! You're a true friend, Jack; not to throw my money away recklessly! My heart is as light as air! You have saved—but hold on! Look here, how is it you didn't invest the money in those good things your friend put you on? Why, it would have meant a profit of—let me see—great Scott! £1,500. Think of it. Hampton, I'm extremely vexed with you. Why, good Heavens, it would have been a fortune for me! What induced you to drop me out of a good thing like that. Oh, it's a confounded shame, sir!"

Hampton was utterly astounded.

"How could I dare to risk another man's money without his authority? Why, it would have been absolutely dishonourable! Suppose the deal had turned out like the 'Snakes.' What should I have said to explain?"

"Oh, you wouldn't have had to explain anything but a jolly good turn of luck. As you are so confoundly scrupulous, why did you undertake the job at all, when you had promised my daughter to accomplish my reformation—the reformation of an reprobate, a regular old scorcher, a doddering old rake, and so on!"

Hampton looked very foolish and guilty; but he soon brightened up.

"Well, sir, that's a good reason why I didn't put your money on the good thing. That would hardly have reformed you—it would have encouraged you!"

"Well, I suppose I must forgive you. But I don't think I'm under any obligation to you."

Mabel had entered the room in time to hear the latter part of the conversation.

She came forward and said:

"Jack; if dad is not under an obligation to you, I am."

"Well," sighed the old gentleman, as he rustled the bank draft between his fingers, "at any rate it is better that this should have been saved. By the way, Jack; you must introduce me to that knowing friend of yours on 'Change. He might be able to put me on some other good thing—"

"Father; your promise," said Mabel reproachfully.

The Admiral sat down.

And Jack whispered:

"And yours, Mabel? Have you forgotten it?"

And she murmured:

"No, Jack, dear. I am yours."

"No, Jack, dear. I am yours."

Digitized by Google

THE LION'S WARS

The British Legion in Spain.

(1835-1837.)

WHEN King Ferdinand of Spain died in 1835 his widow at once installed her daughter as Queen, contrary to the national Salic Law of Spain that no woman could wear the Spanish crown.

A few months later, Don Carlos, the brother of the deceased King, announced his claim to the Spanish throne, and his pretensions were at once acknowledged by the inhabitants of the northern Basque province. The result of this was civil war.

It is true that this very ancient Salic law had been set aside by the King shortly before his death, but as Ferdinand even in his prime had been little better than an idiot, and as its abrogation had not received the assent of the Cortes and the nation, Don Carlos declared that the throne belonged to him.

To us, to-day, Don Carlos seems to have had a good deal of justice on his side, but in 1835 Britain thought differently.

Whilst the Spanish Queen's soldiers were vainly endeavouring to subdue the agile, brave, hardy mountaineers, public opinion here had become so convinced that it was the duty of all Britain to see that the rights of the infant Queen should be upheld, that when the Queen Regent found that the southern Spaniard had no chance of overcoming his northern brother, she besought in tearful accents the aid of Spain's old and generous ally, Britain.

Needless to say the appeal was not made in vain, and here let us state in reply to the criticism of those who may be of opinion that the story of a British volunteer force fighting for a foreign power should not be included in the list of Britain's wars, that the enthusiasm roused by Spain's appeal for help was so great that on June 10, 1835, William IV. by the advice of his Privy Council, issued an order permitting any English subject to enrol himself in a British Legion for service in Spain for the term of two years.

But the support accorded by the government went still further, the newly-formed Legion was armed and fully accoutred from the Tower and was publicly recruited by the beat of the drum with the Union Jack flying. No time was lost in raising the force. Recruiting depôts being opened in each of the three kingdoms, the recruits were of course very representative. Starving peasants from Ireland, mill hands from Lancashire, City clerks, shop assistants, agricultural labourers, barristers, veterans of the Peninsular War, broken down swells, betting men, and members of many other trades and professions filled the ranks. The officers were all experienced soldiers, mostly on half-pay.

The commanding officer was Lieutenant-General Sir G. de Lacy Evans, a brave officer no doubt, but sadly lacking in the peculiar qualities required for carrying on a war in the northern mountains of Spain against the finest guerilla soldiers in the world.

Still he had earned such distinction in India in 1807 and 1810, had shown such conspicuous bravery against Ameer Khan and the Pindaris, and had earned in America such a name for Indian border fighting, that in the opinion of military experts no better selection could have been made.

Digitized by Google

The experts were all wrong as we shall presently see.

The legion landed at St. Sebastian, famous in the annals of our own wars for its siege, the fearless assault of our soldiers, and the subsequent looting of the town. The Carlists were in strong force in the neighbourhood of the town, but General Evans, although a daring man, was not a reckless officer.

He knew the value of discipline so before commencing operations he devoted an entire month to drilling his men. The Carlists were not in good s irits when the British Legion landed. Zumalacarregui, a guerilla chief of great repute and their best leader, had fallen at the siege of Bilboa. His death, therefore, whilst depressing his own side, had raised the confidence of the Christinos.

The desire of our men to try conclusions with the Carlists was so great that when their leader told them to wait till they had learned their drill they nearly mutinied.

When they had at length learned their drill they were ordered to be under arms on August 30, 1835, General Evans having resolved to attack a force of Carlists stationed at Hernani. After marching a few miles the Legion found itself at the foot of a hill held by the Carlists who to strengthen their position had run a line of intrenchments along the summit. The Spanish soldiers not relishing the presence of the Legion which they declared was an insult to their courage, charged the hill at the point of the bayonet. The Carlists being less than fifty strong took to flight, whilst the Spaniards well satisfied with their achievement, lay down to rest.

The consequence was that an easy chance of capturing Hernani was missed. The Carlists were quick to perceive the error. The Legion watching the distant hills for the appearance of the Spanish saw the Carlists rapidly descend the hill, cross the little bridge, and flock into the town. When our men, who were greatly puzzled, found the soldiers they had come to assist smoking tranquilly at the top of the hill, they had stormed an hour before, they waxed very wroth.

Being, as the historian puts it, "fond of nothing but fighting, they turned on their Spanish allies and thrashed them soundly with fists and musket butts."

Burning to retrieve their prestige and goaded by the jeers of the British, the Spaniards next day attacked the town with great fury. They were, however, pushed back with such resolution by the Carlists that a portion of the British Legion, 500 strong, was ordered to their assistance.

Although this was the first time the majority of the regiment had been under fire, they marched with unflinching steadiness across a huge field of Indian corn of a height so great that the red caps of the Chapelgorris—a corps composed of foreign mercenaries attached to the Legion—who preceded them looked like gigantic poppies and despite the murderous fire of the Carlists succeeded in reaching the shelter of a friendly dip in the land.

After a breathing spell they made a dash for the ridge of a neighbouring hill in order to divert the Carlists' attack on to themselves. With loud yells they reached the top, drove the defenders down, and then raced like deer up the steep brown rocks of the Santa Barbara.

The British soldier of those days wore stocks, tight fitting uniforms, heavy ill-made boots, whilst their head-gear was extremely large and fearfully heavy.

The Legion finding that tight belts, stocks, and big helmets, were unsuited for the mountains of Spain forgot their discipline and did the job in their shirt sleeves. The Carlists fought like lions, but they stood no chance with our men, who though they followed such unwarlike callings as shop-assistants, clerks, agricultural labourers and the like at home, fought as only Britons can fight.

The main body of the Legion were about following up their success when they saw that a company of the fourth (the Queen's) had been surr unded by a large force of the enemy. Dashing down the Santa Barbara they swarmed up the hill where the beleaguered company were battling against huge odds, pouring such a destructive fire into the fl nk of the Carlists that their comrades were able to escape. But the position of the hill enabled the Carlists to mass in such overwhelming force that the first Regiment had to fight its way out of what the enemies of the expeditions at home described as a well-planned ambuscade.

Towards the close of the day it must be confessed our men were in full retreat, the pursuit being so keen that at one time the Carlists got between us and St. Sebastian. But the bayonet pulled us through, our losses at the finish being half those of the Spanish. During the retreat, a sergeant and a grenadier of the first Regiment had been shot dead. Believing that the bodies would be sent in our men left them behind. That night the Carlists cut the bodies up and marched through the town of Hernani with the flesh of their foes stuck on the points of the bayonet.

As the Peace Party at home had been endowing the Carlists with every possible virtue, including a quite exceptional humanity in the conduct of war, one would have thought that they would have relinquished their cause. Political hatreds, however, are not easily allayed. The peace party got rid of the difficulty by declaring that the Legion had invented the charge in order to draw attention from their own cowardice and incapacity.

It was no good t e supporters of the war asking their opponents to wait till th Legion caught the enemy on a high road or an open field where the cavalry could get to work. The Legion wa s so persistently ridiculed that although they had gone into winter quarters when the news arrived, they so clamoured to be led against the foe that General Evans had to begin a fresh campaign.

In the hopes of catching the Carlists napping, the greatest secrecy was obse.ved; a needless precaution, for the British quarters were so honeycombed with spies that our slightest movements were soon known in the mountains. Greatly therefore to the surprise and disgust of Gener l Evans the Carlists anticipated his plans by making a feint on the picket near Ametzagana hill a little to the left of the English centre. As soon as the greater part of the troops had been hurried off in the direction of Ametzagana hill the real attack was developed.

A large force of Carlists was hurled against the village and fort of Abza which commanded the important town of Pessages. Our soldiers were discussing their morning meal of wine and bread on the Ametzagana hill when an officer galloped furiously up.

The drums rattled, the bug ers dispersed among the hills to recall all wanderers. "Fall in!" "March!" Then came, "Quick march," and when another breathless messenger appeared, the ominous "Double quick" was ordered. Still another messenger, and before the return journey was completed every man was racing back at the top of his speed.

T eir presence was indeed urgently needed. The Carlists stealing up through an orchard had got quite

Digitized by Google

Drawn by] [C. Lawson Wood.

The Carlists got quite close to the village before their presence was discovered, and shot the sentries.

Digitized by Google

close to the village before their presence was discovered. They shot the sentries, cut the picket who came to their assistance, to pieces, drove back with great loss a small column which General Evans dispatched to hold them in check till the main body arrived, not forgetting to kill all the wounded. These formalities gave time for the troops to get back. The First Regiment was told to storm the church-yard, which they did after losing over a hundred of their men as they crossed a field.

A little diary of the war, now out of print, describes how a city clerk, on seeing one of the generals fall, seized his sword, mounted his horse, and, calling for followers dashed right into the centre of the Carlists. The courage he displayed was so great that a rush was made for his rescue. He was got out of the throng but not before he had cut down four and shot two of his adversaries. Still for all the gallantry displayed by the First Regiment, the Carlists captured the village.

Towards the close of the day General Evans made a desperate effort to effect its recovery. The ground was rough, woody, and so much intersected with thick hedges than that in the neighbourhood of the churchyard, that the night was well advanced before the Legion succeeded in dislodging the foe. According to the aforesaid diary our men to cheer each other kept repeating during the fight "what will they say at home of us now."

The night was well advanced when the contending forces reached the open. The fight then underwent a most surprising change. The Carlists knew how to use the bayonet but the men lacked the weight and nerve of the soldiers composing the Legion, and were now driven forcibly back with great loss. The Carlists as they retired on Aize set fire to the houses in order to deprive the Legion of shelter.

The smoke and the darkness was now so great that the troops fell into confusion, one of the regiments pouring several volleys into another before the mistake was discovered. This so enraged the men that when the Carlists reappeared headed by some priests holding their crucifixes aloft to encourage their followers, the Legion charged with such fury that priests and crucifixes both disappeared.

As the months rolled on the Carlists grew to so respect the dogged valour of our men as to prefer night attacks to day, in order to obtain some advantage, so they would assail us a couple of hours before daybreak. To recover a height commanding the town of Pessages a large force of Carlists one night crept silently towards our lines. But the sentinel saw them.

Waiting till they were quite close, the watcher fired a couple of guns, heavily charged with canister shot, and blew the whole force, dead, wounded, and living, down the hill side. Those who escaped uninjured met their death a little later when the Legion got in amongst them.

After this, the story of the British Legion in Spain enters on a new stage. Although the credit for the victories won rested mainly with the Legion, the Queen's Government issued a proclamation thanking her brave army, and especially the intrepid Spanish sentinel who had fired the gun in the night attack just recorded.

This mendacity filled the Legion with rage, and after this they never gave the Spaniards a chance. When the Carlists came in sight they would bear down on them like a red deluge and send them flying in all directions. Losses they thought nothing of as long as they could humiliate the Spaniards and annoy their enemies in London, but all enthusiasm for the cause had long since vanished.

Jealous of the fame the Legion were acquiring as hard fighters, the Government now starved the Commissariat to such an extent, that it was no uncommon thing for the troops to be without food for forty-eight hours. Then the officers, to suppress the growing discontent, tried to flog the men into submission.

They had defeated the enemy with great loss and had marched through St. Sebastian, which they had previously lost with flags flying, and bands playing.

The townspeople cheered, and the officers complimented the men. There had been hints as to a banquet, but the reception ended with the cheering. Great, therefore, was their disgust on reaching camp that night, to find there was nothing to eat. For a month after this a day hardly passed without some men after fighting from morning to night against their untiring foes being flogged.

One evening, in 1837, the Legion broke out into open mutiny. Some six of the officers, who had incurred much unpopularity amongst the men, were stripped in place of six soldiers they had ordered to have the lash, and but for the order that Hernani was to be assaulted without a moment's delay they would all have been flogged.

Forgetting their wrongs the Legion at once started for Hernani; great, therefore, was their chargin to find on their arrival that the Carlists had evacuated the town. In fact, they were so annoyed that they looted the shops. They were told to restore what they had taken and refused. You can shoot one man but not 5,000. General Evans saw this, so after persuading a few of the malcontents to go to Hernani and destroy the works, he set himself to win back the confidence and obedience of the Legion. But he never succeeded.

The force showed much of its old spirit on March 16th, 1837, when the élite of the Carlist army, 16,000 strong, attacked them. All the success they achieved was to force the Legion, which did not number 8,000 men, back about half a mile. The General was pleased, but it was London they were thinking of when fighting, and not the cause of the Queen Regent and her babe.

General Evans may have lacked the qualities of a great general, or even a guerilla chief, but in none of his battles did he lose either guns, equipage, or prisoners, whilst he took from the enemy 100 officers, 1,000 men, 30 pieces of artillery, and scores of entrenched positions. His men thought him a good officer but any regard they felt was quite overborne by the hatred they had conceived for the Spaniards, friend and foe alike.

Finding that they could not beat us in battle, the Carlists poisoned the wells, as certain of the baser sort among the Boers wanted to poison the rivers of the Transvaal with cyanide of potassium, and, with the connivance of the tradespeople, the food also, playing at night the part of assassins.

In April, 1837, they captured a party of 127 of our men and thirteen officers. Our fellows could have cut their way through but surrendered because they were sick of the war. The moment they gave up their arms they were brutally massacred.

In May, 1837, General Evans returned to England. Shortly after, Colonel O'Connell, with a new Legion of 1,393 men landed in Spain. But as, mainly owing to our exertions, the Carlist spirit was broken, the Spaniards took such little pains to conciliate the new-comers that they disbanded in disgust.

By July, 1837, both Legions had ceased to exist. A few returned to this country, but the majority were never heard of again.

[Next week: "Marlborough's Campaigns. 1702-1710."]

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES THAT MAKE YOU LAUGH.

The Prize of One Guinea for the best Storyette has been won this week by Miss E. WOOD, 14 Marywell, Arbroath, N.B.

The Pound Weight.

In a village in Warwickshire a labourer went into the general store, which was kept by an old dame, and asked for "a pound o' bacon."

The old lady cut some rashers, and laid them on to the scale, but looked round in vain for the pound weight.

"Oh, never mind!" said the customer, obligingly willing to help. "My fist weighs just a pound. I'll lay it in the scale."

The shopkeeper confidingly accepted this offer, and sliced away at the bacon, merely remarking that "it seemed to take her a good while to cut a pound!" Needless to say, our hero got good weight.

A few days later he called again at the store, and, in a friendly way inquired:

"Found yer weight, missus?"

"Oh, yes," she replied, "very soon after you had gone."

"Well, now, you see if my fist don't weigh a pound," said he.

The pound weight was accordingly put into one scale and the man's fist in the other, and of course the balance was perfect.

"Well, I never seed anything so near in all my life!" exclaimed the old lady in astonishment. "Here, lad, here's a red herring for yer honesty."

"Do it Again!"

They had been sitting side by side, he and she, on the back seat of a travelling circus. During the interval he slipped out to get a drink. She had not noticed his absence.

Presently an elephant, stabled in the rear, pushed his trunk through an opening in the canvas, and putting his trunk round her waist gave her a squeeze.

She did not scream, or even turn her head, she simply sighed and softly said:

"Do it again, George, do it again."

A Smart Ruse.

Mr. M., a well-to-do bachelor, after dining one evening with the officers of the infantry detachment, whose barracks lay about a mile from his house, invited two of them to dine with him on the following Friday.

But Mr. M. had a bad memory, and the invitation he had given passed from his mind.

On the said Friday, returning from his afternoon ride, he saw the two officers in front of him walking towards his house.

Mr. M. at once recollected the invitation, and at the same moment became painfully conscious that he had told his housekeeper he would only require a couple of chops for dinner.

After a brief moment of despair Mr. M. cantered on, and overtaking his friends a few yards from his own gate he accosted them hurriedly:

"Good evening. Out for a stroll, I suppose. Don't forget that you dine with me this day week."

Then he cantered off, but that day week the two officers dined off the best of everything.

Once Bitten——

I was cycling along a country road at an easy pace when a tramp pretended to have been knocked down by me as I passed. Getting up again with an assumption of great physical suffering he demanded pecuniary compensation.

I was so indignant at the clumsy attempt to knock money out of me that I seized him and thumped him, shook him, kicked him, and finally flung him into a brook by the roadside.

He scrambled out and scurried away as fast as his aching limbs would let him.

An intensely amusing sequel happened a week later, when I really did accidently knock this same tramp down. Jumping off my machine I put it against the edge and ran back to apologise, but the man took to his heels, although I ran some distance after him, being really anxious to know whether I had hurt him, and ready—on this occasion—to give him monetary recompense.

But he must have thought that I believed that he had again only shammed being run over, and that I was bent on giving him another thrashing, for he ran like the wind.

The Boar.

Two Irishmen, finding themselves dead broke at the Christmas season, consulted each other as to how they could raise some funds for their holiday. They thought of plan after plan, till at last one of them suggested that they should raffle a pig. Accordingly, a form was drawn up as follows:

"To be raffled, on Christmas Eve, a fine Yorkshire boar, recently imported into the country. Sacrificed for ten chances at half-a-crown each. The list was taken round the village, and in a short time all the chances were sold. Soon, however, the dread 24th came and the men had to face the uncomfortable reality that it was the day of the raffle. Looking over the list, they selected the subscriber whom they believed to be the best-natured of the lot, and wrote to him as follows:

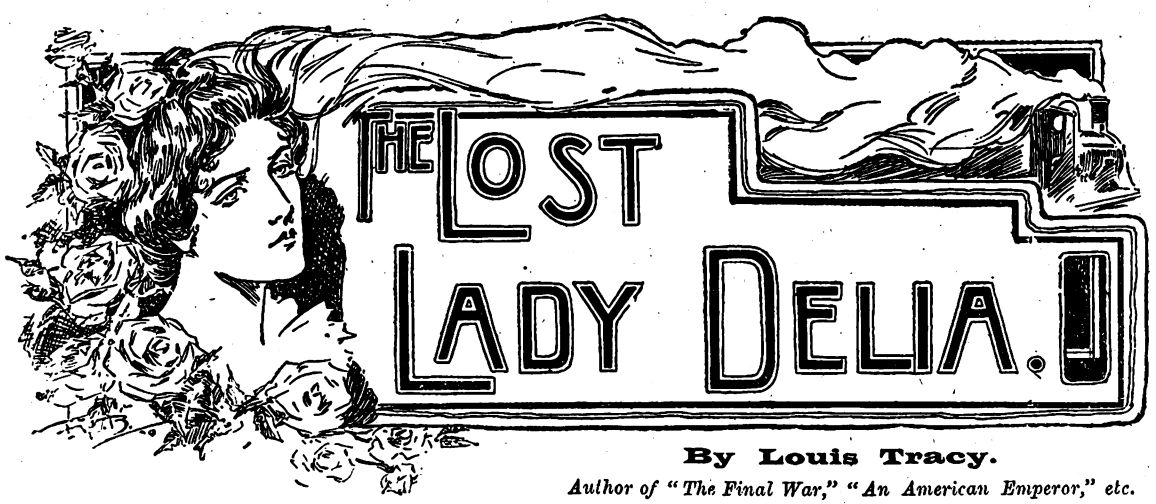
"Dear Sir,—We are happy to inform you that the raffle of the Yorkshire boar was held to-day, and that you are the fortunate winner. We hold the animal at your disposal, and shall be pleased to forward it as soon as you are prepared."

Early next morning, however, before the fortunate winner had fully realised his good luck, he was greeted with the following letter:

"Dear Sir,—We regret to inform you that the Yorkshire boar died at twelve o'clock last night. We do not know the exact cause of death; but, judging from the symptoms, we believe it to be either cholera or influenza. Owing to the existing sanitary regulations, the animal had to be buried without delay. We shall be glad to receive your cheque for ten shillings and sixpence, being the amount of funeral expenses incurred."

The fortunate winner did not remit the amount, but he thought it safe not to make any further inquiry about the pig.

Digitized by Google



By Louis Tracy.

Author of "The Final War," "An American Emperor," etc.

THIS TELLS THE STORY FROM THE START.

LADY DELIA LYLE leaves her house one foggy November afternoon, saying she is going to see her sister at Richmond, but from that time she is not heard of.

Her husband, Sir Charles Lyle, puts the matter into the hands of detectives, Inspector Winter taking charge of the case.

Reginald Brett, a barrister friend of the Lyles, also promises to do all he can, and he finds out that Lady Delia, on the night of her disappearance, instead of going to Richmond, alighted at Sloane Square, and went to a block of flats called Raleigh Mansions.

Towards the end of the month the body of a woman, evidently murdered, is found wedged beneath a drain-pipe in the Thames at Putney, and, though Sir Charles does not identify the body, Brett imagines it to be that of Lady Delia. Shortly after this discovery Lady Delia's maid, Jane Harding, disappears. She is afterwards found to have gone on the stage.

Brett now starts investigations at Raleigh Mansions, and he fixes on two residents there as being likely to have been connected with Lady Delia. These are a Mr. Sydney H. Pyne, who is not at present in residence, and a Mrs. Hillmer, whom he finds to be Pyne's sister.

It had transpired that Pyne had gone to Monte Carlo, and thither Brett goes, and he discovers that though letters are addressed to Pyne at the Hotel du Cercle he is not known there.

During his stay at Monte Carlo Brett becomes acquainted with an Englishman, named Albert Mensmore, whom he helps out of some money difficulties, but he does not discover anything about Pyne.

After his return Brett finds out that Sir Charles Lyle knows Albert Mensmore, but in what connection does not transpire.

A few days later Brett goes into the City, to the office of Dodge and Co., with whom he had had some speculative dealings, and from remarks made by Mr. Dodge, he thinks that Pyne and Mensmore must be one and the same man. In the evening Brett and Winter go to Raleigh Mansions and search the flat occupied by Pyne. Brett finds that a piece of one of the fire-dogs is missing, and that it exactly corresponds with the piece of iron which was found imbedded in the head of the body found at Putney.

He again visits Mrs. Hillmer, who is terrified by his inquiries, and this seems to strengthen suspicion against her brother.

CHAPTER XVII.

A POSSIBLE EXPLANATION.

BRETT had now several lines of inquiry open.

Apart from the main and vital question as to the exact method of Lady Delia's death, and the identity of the person responsible for it, a number of important matters required attention.

Why had Jane Harding quitted her situation so suddenly?

Whence did she obtain the money that enabled her to blossom forth as Marie le Marchant?

Who was Sydney H. Pyne?

Why did Mensmore adopt a false name; and, in any case, why adopt the name of Pyne?

Why did Mrs. Hillmer exhibit such sudden terror lest her brother might be guilty?

Whom did Mrs. Hillmer marry? Was her husband alive or dead?

Was the man who conveyed Lady Delia's body from Raleigh Mansions to Putney responsible also for her death?

Finally, why did he select that particular portion of the Thames banks for the bestowal of his terrible burthen?

Many other minor features suggested themselves for careful attention, but the barrister knew that if he elucidated some of the major questions the rest would answer themselves.

The last query promised to yield a good crop of information should it be satisfactorily dealt with. Turning to his notes he found that the former owner of the Putney house was a tutor or preparatory schoolmaster, named the Rev. Septimus Childe.

Could it be that this was the school in which both Sir Charles Lyle and Mensmore were fellow-students? If so, Brett failed to see why he should not forthwith place the whole of the facts in his possession at the service of the police, and allow the law to take its course.

On this supposition the case against Mensmore was very black; not, indeed, incapable of explanation—for circumstantial evidence occasionally plays strange pranks with logic—but of such a grave nature that no private individual would be justified in keeping his knowledge to himself.

Somehow, the deduction was disagreeable; Brett resolved to coerce his thoughts, and do that which was right, irrespective of consequences.

He did not possess a Clergy List, but could get one at his club. No letter came from Mrs. Hillmer, so he walked across the Park to Pall Mall to consult the appropriately-bound black and white volume, which gives reference to the many degrees of the Church of England.

Septimus Childe was a distinctive, though simple, name. But it was not there. There was not a Childe with a final "e" in the whole book. Without that important letter, as Brett's informant might be mistaken, there were several. Close scrutiny of each man's designation and duties convinced Brett that, though any of these might be one of the particular Child's children, none answered to the description of the gentlemen he sought.

Of course, he could always apply to Sir Charles Lyle, but he dreaded approaching the grief-stricken baronet on this matter. Now there was no help for it. The barrister was beginning to feel impatient at the constant difficulties which barred progress in each direction. After all, it was a small thing merely to ask his friend if he ever knew a reverend gentleman named Childe.

Digitized by Google

Brett was sure that Sir Charles could not be acquainted with Mr. Childe, and also with the fact that the Putney house had served as his school, for it would be strange beyond credence if it were so that he had not mentioned it.

The weather was still clear and cold, and a wintry sun made walking pleasant. Brett, on quitting his club, set out again on foot. He crossed St. James's Square, Jermyn Street, and Piccadilly, and made his way to Oxford Street up New Bond Street.

Not often did he frequent these fashionable thoroughfares, and he had an excellent reason. When walking, he was given to abstraction, and seldom saw his acquaintances if he encountered them in unusual quarters. He would thus cut dead a woman at whose house he had dined the previous evening, or, when he was in practice at the Bar, fail to notice the salutation of his own leader.

To Reggie himself this shortcoming was intolerable; consciousness of it when in the West made him the most alert man in the crowd to note anybody whom he knew, except on the rare occasions when he forgot his failing.

This morning Bond Street was pleasantly full. People were beginning to return to town, as Parliament met in a few days, and Brett passed many who were on his visiting list.

Outside a well-known costumier's he saw a brougham, into which a lady had just been helped by the commissionaire.

It is no uncommon thing to recognise an acquaintance by the colour of his horse or the peculiar cut of his coachman's whiskers. This time Brett knew the driver as well as the equipage, but the lady inside was not Mrs. Hillmer.

Instantly he was at the door, with his hat lifted; he assumed an expression of polite regret as he saw Dobson, the maid, in her mistress's place.

"Sorry," he said. "I knew the carriage, and thought that Mrs. Hillmer was inside. She is well, I trust."

"Not very, sir," answered the maid with an angry pout.

"Indeed, what is the matter?"

"Madame is going away, and has put us all on board wages."

Dobson had some of the privileges of a companion, and resented this relegation to the servants' hall.

"Going away?" cried Brett. "A sudden decision, eh?"

The girl was arranging some parcels on the shelf in front of her. She was not disinclined for a conversation with this good-looking gentleman, so she smiled archly as she said: "Didn't you know, sir? I thought you would know all about it."

What he might have ascertained by a longer chat the barrister could not tell, for an interruption occurred. The coachman, more loyal to his mistress than the maid, said:

"Beg pardon, sir, but the missus told us to hurry;" and he whipped up his steed, to mingle with the passing stream of carriages.

"More complications," murmured Brett. "Mrs. Hillmer contemplates a bolt. Shall I pay her another visit and surprise her? No, confound it, I will not. Let her go, and let things take their course."

Not in the most amiable frame of mind at this discovery, he pursued his walk to Portman-square.

Sir Charles Lyle was at home. He always was, now.

"For goodness' sake, Mr. Brett," whispered Thompson, in the hall, "get Sir Charles to quit smokin', and readin', and thinkin'. He sits all day in the library and hardly has anythink to eat."

Reggie reproached himself for having neglected his resolution to stir his friend into something like animation. He was wondering what he should do in the matter, when the baronet rose at his entrance, saying, with a weary smile:

"Well, Brett, what news?"

The other suddenly decided to throw all questioning to the winds for the moment. "I have come," he cried, "to bring you out. I won't hear of a refusal. Let us walk to the club and have lunch and a game of billiards."

Sir Charles protested. He had slept badly and was tired.

"All the more reason that you should sleep well to-night. Come, now, be advised. You will allow yourself to become a hopeless invalid if you go on in this way."

Lyle unwillingly consented, and they left the house. The older man brightened up considerably amidst the bustle of the streets. His colour returned, he talked with some degree of cheerfulness, and even laughed as he said to Brett: "I never understood you were a doctor, Reggie, in addition to your other varied acquirements. For the first time since—since November last, I feel hungry."

"Why don't you take my advice, and go away for some shooting? It is not too late, even now, to go after a hare."

"I will think of it. I wonder who we shall meet at the club."

"Lots of fellows, no doubt. And, by the way, you must be prepared for one little difficulty. Suppose they ask for Lady Delia!"

The baronet's momentary gaiety vanished. He stopped short, and clutched Brett's arm. "Don't you see," he almost moaned, "that this is the reason I have kept indoors for so long? What shall I say?"

"You must make the best of it. Say, off-handedly, you don't know where she is—either with relations or in Italy. Anything will do, and it will create a false impression."

"I am sick of false impressions. I cannot do it."

"You must."

The stronger will prevailed, and they entered the doors of the Imperial, where, of course, Lyle was hailed at once by a dozen men.

"Hallo, Charlie! Been seedy?"

"Good gracious, Lyle! have you had influenza? I've missed you for months, now I come to think of it."

"I haven't seen your wife for quite a time. How is she?"

In the multitude of questions there was safety.

Sir Charles answered vaguely, and a chance arrival created a diversion by announcing that Royal Message had again broken down in his preparation for the Grand National.

Later in the afternoon the two found themselves ensconced in a quiet corner of the smoking-room. Brett seized the opportunity to get quickly over the interrogation.

"You told me," he said, "that Mensmore and you were at school together?"

"Did I?" said the baronet.

"Yes; don't you remember?"

"I get mixed up in thinking about things. But it is all right. We were"

"Whereabouts?"

"Oh, a private establishment kept by an old chap called Septimus Childe—Lucky Number was our nickname for him."

Brett betrayed no surprise at this startlingly simple statement. He said casually:

"I mean where was the school situated?"

"At Brighton in my time. But afterwards he shifted to some place nearer London—something to do with examinations, I fancy."

"But don't you know where?"

"How should I? I was at Sandhurst then. I believe the old boy is dead. Why do you ask?"

"Oh, it has something to do with the inquiry. I won't trouble you now with the details."

"Go on, I can stand it."

"But where is the good in paining you needlessly?"

"That stage has passed, old chap. My wife's memory has almost become a dream to me."

"Well, it is an extraordinary thing, but that place where

Digitized by Google

—that house at Putney, you know, must have been the new school of the Rev. Septimus Childe."

"How did you learn that?"

"I have known it for months, ever since the inquest."

"And you did not tell me?"

"True, but at the time it seemed of no consequence. Now that Mensmore turns out to be a pupil of his, and probably passed the remainder of his early school days at that very establishment, the incident assumes a degree of importance."

Sir Charles looked earnestly at Brett as he put his next question: "Tell me, Reggie, do you seriously believe that Mensmore had anything to do with my wife's death?"

"I cannot honestly give you a satisfactory answer."

"But what do you think?"

"If you press me I will try to put my opinion into words. Mensmore was in some mysterious way associated with the crime; but the degree of association, and whether conscious or unconscious, I do not know."

"What do you mean by 'conscious or unconscious?'"

"I am sure that Lady Delia met her death in his residence; but it is impossible to say now if he was aware of her presence. He was in London at the time, that is quite certain."

"Do the police know all this?"

"No."

"I am glad of it. Mensmore did not kill my wife. The suggestion is absurd—wildly absurd."

"Things look black against him, nevertheless."

"I tell you it is nonsense. You are on the wrong track, Brett. What possible reason could he have to decoy my wife to his flat and there murder her?"

"None—perhaps."

"Then why do you hesitate to agree with me?"

"Because there is a woman in the case."

"Another woman?"

"Yes; Mensmore's sister, or half-sister, to be exact. She also lives in Raleigh Mansions."

"Indeed. So all kinds of things have been going on without my knowledge. Yet you promised faithfully to keep me informed of every incident that transpired."

"I am sorry Lyle; but you were so upset——"

"Upset, man. Don't you realise that this affair is all I have to think about in this world?"

The baronet was so disturbed that Reggie at once made up his mind to tell him as little as possible in the future. These constant possibilities of rupture between them must be avoided at all hazard.

To change the conversation he said: "Never mind, Lyle; this time you must pardon my inadvertence. How do Lady Delia's people bear the continued mystery of her disappearance?"

"At first they were awfully cut up. But lately they have been reconciled to her death, which they say must have resulted from accident, and that her identity must have been mixed up with that of some other person. Such things do happen, you know. Anyway, her sister has gone into mourning for her. You didn't know, I suppose, that I have made my little nephew my heir?"

"Was that step necessary at your time of life?"

"I shall never marry again, Brett."

"Well, let us drop the subject. You have done right as regards the boy under present circumstances; but, as a man of the world, I only point out that it is an unwise thing to bring up a youngster in expectation of something which chance might determine differently."

"Chance! There is no chance! My wife cannot return from the grave!"

"True. You have done right, no doubt. But the suddenness of the thing caused me to speak unwittingly."

They were silent a little while, when Sir Charles returned to the subject nearest his heart.

"Has your search developed in other directions?"

Brett fenced with the query. "To be candid," he said, "I am now most busily engaged in the not very difficult task of throwing dust in the eyes of the police. My motives are hardly definite to myself, but I do not want this unfortunate man, Mensmore, to be arrested until I have personally become convinced of his guilt."

"You are right, Brett. Your instinct seldom fails you. I question if he ever, to his own knowledge, saw my wife."

"Ah! You see you have hit upon my difficulty. Show me Lady Delia's reason for making that secret journey, and I will tell you how she met her death."

His concluding words sank to a murmur. An old friend of Lyle's had entered the room and came towards them.

A few minutes later Brett quitted the Imperial and drove to his chambers, where he found a note from the ticket-collector stating that Foxey's name was William Marsh.

The day was still young, and the barrister paid a visit to the West London Police Court, where the records soon revealed the conviction of the cab-driver and the period of his sentence.

"Let me see," said the resident inspector, "his time at Holloway is up on February 6th. That is a Monday, and as Sunday doesn't count, he will be liberated on the 4th, about 8 a.m. That is the habit, sir, in the matter of short sentences. If you want to see him when he leaves the gaol you can either wait at the gates or at the nearest public-house where the prisoners go for their first drink. They seldom or never miss."

Brett thanked the official and returned home.

He was on the point of going out to drive, when he received a letter from Sir Charles Lyle. It ran:

My dear Reggie,—To-day's experiences have impelled me to take this inevitable step of announcing my wife's death. Hence I have forwarded the inclosed notice to an advertisement agency, with instructions to insert it in the principal papers. I have also decided to follow your advice and leave town for a few days. I am going to Wensley, my place in Yorkshire, should you happen to want me.—Yours, Charles Lyle.

The notice read:

Lyle.—On November 6, Delia, wife of Sir Charles Lyle, suddenly, at London.

Next morning it figured in the obituary columns of many newspapers, as Brett, though taken aback by the rapidity of his friend's action, saw no reason to endeavour to stop him. In the words of the letter, it was "the inevitable step."

CHAPTER XVIII.

What Happened on the Riviera.

The White Heather swung quietly at her moorings in the harbour of Genoa the Superb. The lively company on board, tired with its day's sightseeing, had left the marble streets and palace cafés to the Genoese and sought the pleasant seclusion of the yacht's airy promenade deck.

"Dinner on board, followed by a dance," said Phyllis, as arbiter of the procedure. A few hasty invitations sent out to British residents in Genoa had met with general acceptance, and the lull between afternoon tea and the more formal meal was gratefully accepted by the hosts.

Genoa is so shut in by its amphitheatre of hills that unless a gale blows from the west, its bay is unruffled and its atmosphere oppressively hot during the day, even in the winter months.

Sir William Browne's excursion had proved so attractive to those invited that the White Heather was taken further along the coast than had been originally intended When all the best known resorts of the Riviera proper were exploited, some one, probably prompted thereto by Phyllis or Mensmore, suggested a run to Genoa.

They had been here three days, and on the morrow would hand the yacht over to the owner's agents, whilst those on board separated once more on their different routes. The Brownes went to Florence and Rome, and Mensmore was pretending to hold out against the pressing request to accompany them, given cordially to him by his prospective father-in-law.

Digitized by Google

This afternoon Phyllis and he were leaning over the taff-rail and discussing the point.

The young lady was slightly inclined to be angry. Her eyes roamed over the magnificent panorama of church-crowned hills and valleys of luxurious green, with the white city in front and the picturesque quays looking as though they had been specially decked for a painting by Clara Montalba. But Phyllis paid heed to none of these things. She wanted her lover to come with her and not to fly to smoke-covered London.

"Business!" she cried "it is always business that men think of. Of course I know that affairs need to be attended to, but now that everything is settled and we are quite happy, it is too bad of you to run away immediately."

"But, dearest——"

"There now, take your hand off my arm. You are not going to coax me into agreement. Just because you receive a horrid letter this morning you go and upset all the arrangements."

"Phyllis, listen to me. I——."

"You shan't go. I think it is mean of you to insist upon it when I am so urgent."

"I am not insisting. You might at least help me to settle matters; otherwise they will get terribly mixed."

"And you will stay?"

"What else can I do when you ask me?"

"Oh, you darling!"

This little quarrel was very delightful, and made them feel ever so much more in love than before; but it did not help Mensmore out of his difficulty.

"Let us see what Pyne really says," he remarked, ruefully taking a letter from his pocket.

"Am I to look too?"

"Of course. I have no secrets from you, little woman."

Phyllis nestled up close to him. This time she did not object to his hand resting on her shoulder, and together they read the following letter:—

"My Dear Bertie,—At last I am able to write to you definitely. The prospectors have struck it rich on our property, and I have sold two claims outright for 50,000 dollars. With this nest egg I am taking the girls to New York, and shall then start by the Teutonic for your side of the pond. I am due in Liverpool on February 4, so look out for me.—Yours ever, Sydney H. Pyne."

Both gazed thoughtfully at the document for a few moments before Phyllis said:

"Does that mean we shall be rich, Bertie?"

Her companion emphasised the gratification of the plural pronoun by a squeeze.

"I hope so, sweet."

"That will be very nice, won't it? I will marry you even if you have to take a place in father's office; but it will be so much better if we haven't to explain to him that we are poor after all."

Mensmore laughed. "It is not so bad as that in any case," he said. "This Springbok Mine speculation will probably turn out well, but I look to Wyoming to yield the best and most permanent results."

"Why is Mr. Pyne coming to London?"

"Because it is only in London that capital can be obtained for large undertakings, and if the Wyoming Goldfield is really a valuable one we may be able to realise some portion of our interests for a considerable sum. Anyhow, he wants to consult me."

"Do you both own the ranch?"

"Yes; it was a joint transaction, but I found the money."

"And why did you come away?"

"Well, let me see. We made very little out of it, Phil, and as Pyne had two sisters, I thought it best to leave what there was for him. He was absurdly grateful about what he called my generosity in the matter, but now that the land has proved so valuable, of course all that nonsense is at an end, and we go half-shares in the deal."

"Two sisters! Were they pretty?"

"What? Jealous already! They are very nice, but much older than their brother and he is my senior by two years."

Miss Browne was graciously pleased to accept this explanation. She knitted her smooth brow into a reflective frown as she said:

"Mr. Pyne arrives on the 4th. It is now January 30th. You ought really to go home, Bertie."

"Now my dear sensible little woman is talking like her own self."

"Well, if you must I give you permission. But I did hope we should see Florence together."

"So we shall. I'll tell you what I will do. I will write to Pyne to-day, care of the steamer at Liverpool, tell him to go to my flat, and stay there a few days until I arrive, and go home myself at the end of next week. He is sure to spend some time in seeing the sights before tackling business, and he can do that as well without me as if I were there. A line to my old housekeeper, who has a spare key, will make the place habitable for him. Happy thought, I'll do it."

"And another happy thought! I'll come and watch you do it," cried Phyllis.

She did not notice that Mensmore's face clouded at this otherwise pleasant intimation. Nevertheless, he raced off with her to the saloon and seated himself at the writing-table. But before he placed pen to paper, Phyllis bending over him meanwhile, he suddenly exclaimed, in a tone of annoyance:

"Now, what a bore this is. I don't know how to address the letter to make sure of reaching him at once, and it is very important that it should not miss him."

"Father will know. Let's ask him."

"No," said Mensmore judicially. "I will row across the harbour to the Florio-Rubattino office, find out the exact thing, and send off the letter. Back in half-an-hour. Be good!"

And before Phyllis could argue the matter he was at the gangway shouting for a boat.

She blew a kiss at him as he shot over the narrow strip of water inside the mole, and little realised that Mensmore was saying to himself: "That was a narrow squeak. Never again, as long as I live, will I take another man's name. It causes no end of bother, and at the most unexpected moments."

He did not trouble the Florio-Rubattino people, as he well knew that a letter addressed to the White Star offices would insure any communication reaching his friend.

The context of the missive, as finally indited at the post-office explains his hesitancy to write it in the presence of his fiancée.

My dear Pyne,—Your good news is more than surprising. Although I believe you, I cannot yet grasp its full significance. However, let us leave explanations until we meet. I am fixed here for a few days more, as I have just become engaged to the sweetest girl in the world, but will return home at the end of next week. Meanwhile, I want you to take up your residence at my flat, No. 12, Raleigh Mansions, Sloane Square, where my housekeeper has instructions to receive you. Do not be surprised if you find the name of Pyne familiar there. Indeed, I took the place in your name in August last. However, all explanations when we meet.—Yours ever, Bertie Mensmore.

This, with a note to the housekeeper, Mrs. Robinson, and another to the hall-porter of the Universities Club, in case by any chance the Liverpool letter missed his friend, completed his task.

He laughed as he hurried from the post-office to the harbour.

"By Jove!" he said to himself, "won't old mother Robinson be surprised when she gets my letter telling her that another Mr. Pyne is coming from America, and that my name, concealed for family reasons, is Mensmore. I guess that Syd. will feel a bit mixed up, too, until I tell him the whole yarn."

No wonder his housekeeper would fail to understand him.

Digitized by Google

Others, whose influence on his fortunes he little suspected were already puzzled by the circumstances. Brett, for instance, and Winter would have been very glad if some occult power enabled them to read the seemingly trivial letter posted that day in Genoa.

Every person known to the reader, and not the least the visitor from the United States, was on the eve of a mad whirl of events, the outcome of which no man could prophesy, but as yet one only, Reginald Brett, had the slightest suspicion that affairs were approaching a crisis.

When Mensmore reached the White Heather he found Lady Browne and Phyllis dressed for a drive before dinner. Sir William seized the opportunity to cross-examine his daughter's suitor as to his means. Phyllis was an only child, and her father did not propose that she should want, whatever the financial position of her husband might be. He liked Mensmore, and had ascertained by private inquiries that his social position was good.

"His father was a Major-General," said his informant, "but he lost his savings by speculation, and was unable to maintain his son in a crack cavalry corps, so the youngster resigned and went to America to try and better himself. There was a daughter, too, by the first wife, a very charming woman, who, when the crash came, was supposed to have gone on the stage. But I have never heard of her since."

So far the credentials were not bad; but Sir William thought it his duty to ascertain definite particulars.

Mensmore was quite candid with him.

"I have been somewhat of a rolling stone," he said, "but I am glad to believe that people have never had cause to think ill of me. At times my affairs have been at a desperate stage, but I hope such periods have passed for ever. I have already spoken to you about the Springbok Mine——"

The old gentleman nodded.

"Well, this morning I have received very satisfactory news from America," and he handed over Pyne's letter for perusal.

"Yes," said Sir William. "These things promise well. We will look into them when we reach England. Meanwhile I give my provisional sanction to my daughter's engagement. She is a good girl, Mensmore. She will be a true and excellent wife. I think you are worthy of her, and I hope that whatever clouds may have darkened your life will now pass away. You two ought to be happy."

"We will, sir," said Mensmore fervently.

"By the way, where is your sister? Is she in England or abroad?"

Mensmore had been expecting this question. He was prepared for it. "Mrs. Hillmer is my half-sister," he explained. "I have not seen much of her since—since an unhappy marriage she contracted some years ago."

"Indeed. Is her husband alive?"

"I can hardly tell you. I believe so. But she does not live with him. She is well provided for, but it was partly on account of this matter that I came to the Riviera for the winter. To tell the truth, I quarrelled with her about it."

"Ah, well. Her troubles need not affect Phyllis and you, except to give you warning. And take my advice. Never interfere between husband and wife. However good your motive ill is sure to come of it."

In the growing dusk Sir William Browne did not note the embarrassment of his companion in discussing this topic. Mensmore was essentially an honourable man, and he detested the necessity which forced him to permit false inferences to be drawn from his words. Yet there could be no help for it. He was compelled to suffer for the faults of another.

It was a relief to him when the dressing bell for dinner allowed him to escape to his cabin.

(To be continued.)

A BUST OF

QUEEN VICTORIA.

A BEAUTIFUL ORNAMENT FOR YOUR DRAWING-ROOM MANTLEPIECE.

GRAND OFFER TO READERS OF "SHORT STORIES."

This bust of Her Majesty was modelled from life by Miss Geflowski, daughter of the late Mr. Geflowski, the well-known sculptor, who made the celebrated statue of Her Majesty which forms one of the principal ornaments of the city of Bombay.

It is considered to be the most perfect likeness of our late Queen that has ever been produced. Nothing is idealised or sacrificed to the simple, truthful reproduction of Her Gracious Majesty's features, wearing, as they always did in her lifetime, so marked an expression of dignity, tenderness, and graciousness.

The original bronze from which the copies now offered were taken was to have become the property of the Queen but it was not completed at the time of her death. The reproductions are to be made by the eminent firm of Regali Brothers, modellers and sculptors, Clerkenwell Road, who are known throughout the Continent as well as in England for their religious statuary. It is not alone as a memento of Her Lamented Majesty that this bust is recommended to the public, but as in itself a work of Art, equal to anything that has been produced for many years.

In general the design resembles that which is shown on the coinage.

The head is draped with a veil, which hangs gracefully over the head and shoulders. But whereas on our coinage the crown is a sort of fillet completely encircling the head, the bust is surmounted by a copy of the actual crown worn by Her Majesty at her coronation.

This bust will be sent to any reader, securely packed, and post free, for half-a-crown.

As we have only been able to secure

A LIMITED NUMBER

OF THESE BUSTS

THIS OFFER MAY NOT APPEAR AGAIN.

It is advisable, therefore, for those who wish to secure one of these beautiful reminders of our late gracious Queen, should send in their orders immediately.

Postal Orders only should be sent.

Address: ROOM 38, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, Strand, W.C.

Digitized by Google

MY MURDER: A CONFESSION.

I.

THOUGH I am willing to record fully how and why I committed it, I decline to do more than indicate the place of the deed. Those who can recognise it by the clue I give, are at liberty to put two and two together.

Most people who have been to Switzerland will understand where the hotel of Les Trois Sages is situated. They will know that it is the chief hostelry of the large town at which the majority of tourists entering and returning from the region of the Alps usually halt, at least for a night, as from it diverge the main channels leading to the choicest scenery of the little republic.

They will recollect that the inn is charmingly placed on the banks of the Rhine, and that its balconies and windows look out upon and absolutely overhang the rushing river, not a hundred miles from its falls at Schaffhausen. Enough, then, as to the locality; now, as to my coming there, and what happened.

The superfluous energy of a Briton six-and-twenty years of age, six feet two in height, and strong in proportion, finds no better outlet than scrambling over peaks, passes, and glaciers; and I had been doing this, on the occasion of which I write, to my heart's content, for five or six weeks.

It was not my first experience of the Alps by many; but it had, on the whole, been the least enjoyable: the companion who was going with me disappointed me at the eleventh hour, and I started alone, the limited time for my outing not brooking delay; and though at times I fell in with pleasant people, I was bored by my solitude.

My temper too, always a peppery one at the best, was considerably ruffled by the loss, towards the end of my journey, of my remaining circular notes. I most stupidly flicked the little case containing them out of my breast-pocket with my handkerchief as I was leaning over the side of the steamer coming down from Flueln to Lucerne, and I had the mortification of seeing it sink into the blue lake before my very eyes.

My remaining cash was only just sufficient to carry me to—well, say Les Trois Sages— so immediately on reaching Lucerne I had to write home for more money, directing that it should await me at the aforesaid well-known hotel. I therefore timed my arrival there accordingly and it was not an hour too soon, for I could only just avoid over-staying my leave by starting for Paris by the first train the next day.

Hence it was with no little anxiety that on reaching my inn I demanded of the concierge whether there was any letter for me, and my satisfaction was so great when that majestic functionary handed me one, that I tore it open then and there, displaying the nature of its contents to the throng of waiters, porters, and idlers usually hanging about hotel halls.

It being late I was soon shown to my room—a luxurious one, for an alcove, where stood the bed, was divided from the salon by a heavy portière, thus making two apartments. I took little heed, however, of these vanities at the time. I was to be off early next morning, and ere long I was in bed and my light out. The loss of the money tended to make me unusually careful of that which I had just received; so, though I left my watch, etc. on the table in the salon, I laid the packet of notes on the little marble stand at the bed-head; and it was lucky I did so.

* * * * *

Sound asleep! Sound is not the word for it. Dead asleep would be nearer the mark; that sort of sleep which comes to a strong man in perfect health and training, after a fatiguing day's journey. What it was that aroused me from it I shall never clearly understand; but my belief is, that it was an instinct rather than a noise which caused me, without altogether returning to consciousness, to open my eyes.

My face was turned away from the wall against one side of which the bed stood, so that I looked straight across the little alcove, and through the half drawn portière into the salon.

The moon must have risen, for there was a much stronger light in the rooms than when I put out the candle, and a deep shadow was cast across the opening between them. Her rays thus flooded both apartments by the single window in each.

Now I was in that curious state that although I knew that I was awake I thought I was dreaming, in fact, I was just on that mysterious frontier-land between the two states, which is not the least perplexing amongst the phenomena of a mortal existence—that is to say, I thought I was dreaming—when I saw, on first opening my eyes, the figure of a man on all-fours, crawling out of the stream of moonlight in the salon into the shadow cast, as I have said, by the arch and heavy folds of the portière.

But I knew I was awake when, losing sight of him for a minute there, I saw him again emerging into the rays of light which fell across the floor of the alcove where I lay. I knew, I say, that I was awake now, for could I not distinguish plainly, as he came very slowly and stealthily towards the bed, that his face was hidden by a sort of crape mask? And yet still, for a moment more, I thought I must be dreaming. I had never moved or raised my head from the pillow; I had simply opened my eyes, and I still abstained from movement whilst endeavouring to realise in what condition I was.

Suddenly, however, all doubt disappeared. I took in on the instant the fact that this was an attempt at robbery, perhaps worse, for, approaching the little table at the bed-head, the figure, without rising from the floor, lifted one of its hands as if to reach the marble top. The man was within arm's length of me now, and without giving him the slightest warning by any preliminary movement, I endeavoured to spring out of bed straight upon him. For a second I had him by the collar; but not being able to get clear altogether from the bed-clothes I was checked, and he slipped out of my grasp like an eel, and disappeared in the shadow.

Digitized by Google

Instantly, however, I was on my feet; but thinking that the fellow probably would be armed I did not attempt to grope for him, but made straight through to the door of the salon giving on to the landing, intending to raise an alarm and prevent an escape, but before I could draw the bolt I saw him at the window opening on to the balcony. His figure came dark between me and the moonlight, and judging that, as the casement was open, he must have entered that way, and was now endeavouring to get out by it, I once more sprang towards him, and had him in my arms just as he stepped on to the balcony, and was in the act of climbing over it. He struggled for a moment or two desperately, of course; but my hot temper was up now, and thinking of nothing but the insolent audacity of the intrusion and the attempted robbery, I tore him away with great violence—for he was but like a child in his strength as compared to me—and saying in my fury, "Ho, ho, you scoundrel! you want to get out this way, do you? then, by George, you shall go!" I flung him, as if he had been a truss of straw, over the balcony into—good God! the rushing river below!

* * * * *

Then, and then only, for the first time, as my hands quitted hold of him, did I remember the situation of my rooms. I had been sleeping in different ones almost every night for the last six weeks, and in the suddenness and rapidity with which the whole of the incidents had happened I entirely forgot that below the balcony rushed the impetuous Rhine. Lightning does not express the swift keenness of the agony which shot through my brain, as glaring after the wretched man, I caught a faint glimpse of his falling figure, and heard the faintest cry and splash rise for a second above the rush of the torrent.

Not being skilled in describing sensations I abstain entirely from attempting to express what mine were now. I pulled myself together in a minute or two, endeavouring to collect my thoughts, and to settle what I ought to do. I walked to the table where I had left my watch—it was gone; to the little stand at the bed-head—my packet of notes were safe, but the hand which I had arrested, only just in time, as it rose towards them belonged to someone who knew that they were there, that was evident. Then my eye fell upon a black object lying on the floor in a streak of moonlight; it was a piece of folded crape with an elastic band attached. In the first encounter the thief's disguise had fallen off—here it was!—and I remembered that for a second on the balcony I had met the rascal's large dark eyes as they seemed starting from his head with terror.

The balcony! As I put my hand on the side of the balustrade, in the act of looking over, it touched the top of a light ladder, the other end of which, on examination I could now faintly discern, in the moonlight, rested not a dozen feet down on a long but less projecting balcony entresol to which this lower balcony belonged.

Clearly then, it was someone engaged about the house—a waiter probably—who had attempted to rob me; one of those who had seen me open my letter and examine the notes. I bethought me also, then, that my movements in my room must have been watched, or that stealthy hand would never have been raised with such fore-knowledge towards the spot where I had placed the money.

A long acquaintance with foreign habits had taught me that an amiable custom prevailed among this rascally scum of waiters of boring gimlet holes in the corners of the door panels, through which they might have become acquainted with the private proceedings of the occupants of the rooms, male or female.

I was not surprised, therefore, on rekindling my candle and examining my door, to find several of these trous-judas, as they were playfully called; one particularly so large and so directed, that anybody in the outer passage could easily observe all that went on within the room.

My impulse now was to raise an alarm; but an instant's reflection showed me that if I did I must bid good-bye to all thoughts of reaching Paris by the early train, and of saving the limit of my leave. And was it worth my while to do this? I decided in a moment—most certainly not.

Was I to expose myself to vast personal inconvenience and possible professional ruin, through not meeting my engagements, simply for the sake of explaining to the cumbersome law of the land what had happened, and to run the risk of not being able to do so to its satisfaction, and consequently perhaps of being incarcerated as a murderer? Not a bit of it. I would see the law of Switzerland at Jericho first! As it was, I had lost my watch, and my temper leapt up in rebellion at the thought, and easily persuaded me for the time that I should be little better than a fool to risk the prospects of my life by any act so quixotic. If the rascal were drowned, it was his own fault, and there should be an end of it, as far as I was concerned. So, at least, I thought then. No; I would be off as I proposed; and with this determination I began deliberately to dress and pack my knapsack, for sleep was gone for that night. Only one doubt perplexed me. Should I leave the ladder standing where it was, and let the hotel authorities think what they liked, or (for otherwise it would only lead to inquiries and difficulties) should I fling it into the river after the man? Right or wrong, with very little hesitation I adopted the latter course.

I saw the figure of a man on all fours crawling into the shadow.

Digitized by Google

Not a sign of life was visible as I looked once more out upon the broad river; and as I gently raised the ladder, and consigned it to its depths, I thought it was not the first secret by a good many that its impetuous current had carried away into oblivion.

An hour or two later I had quietly paid my bill at the bureau, and was on my way to Paris, and by the following night was once more in my chambers in the Temple.

II.

Argue, reason, justify, talk about self-defence, and if I hadn't done this, he would have done so-and-so, as much as you please, you can never quite philosophise away the very disagreeable sensation which will arise occasionally if you have ever had the misfortune, however unintentionally, to kill a man.

My hot temper has often given me cause for regret, not to say remorse; but since the night when I flung the robber into the Rhine I can safely say I have curbed it.

I flung him over the balcony into the rushing river below.

Whenever it comes bubbling up, there also comes with it the vivid recollection of that brief struggle on the balcony, and lo! it is subdued on the instant; but the recollection, alas, is not so speedily dismissed; it still hovers painfully in my memory at times, though twelve years have passed since the deed was done—twelve years! during which no mention, that I have ever seen, has been made in the papers of anyone having been missed from the hotel.

Of course I have been often to Switzerland since, but somehow I have always avoided the town where stands the hostelry of Les Trois Sages, and I should never think of going up the Rhine again.

I strike the Alps now by other routes, and have a tendency to get well to the Ital an side of them. Indeed I have lately returned from a saunter amongst the hills in the neighbourhood of Como.

What capricious fate led me there to the spot where I was to find the sequel to "My Murder" need not be speculated upon; it was one of those strange coincidences, I suppose, which when met with in fiction excite little surprise, but when stated as facts are generally doubted. Here it is, however, and if it had not been a fact there would never have been any record on paper of "My Murder."

Well, I pulled up one day at an unpretentious little albergo, on the side of a steep declivity overlooking the "lazy" lake.

The light refreshment which I ordered was brought to me as I sat at a little table in the garden, sheltered by vines, olive, and fig-trees, by the padrone himself a venerable grey-bearded man.

Only as he set the fruit and bread down before me did I observe he was blind.

He had walked so steadily and direct from the house to where I sat that no one could have guessed at his affliction.

The sudden discovery of it, together with a sorrowful expression which his face wore, touched me, and I began talking to him with what Italian I could muster.

His speech showed him to be above the common herd and after conversing for a while about the neighbourhood, and such ordinary topics, I ventured to touch on his blindness.

"Oh," said he, "that is very little, signor; men can be more severely tried than by having to live in the dark. There are worse afflictions than that."

"Indeed," I answered; "do you speak from experience?"

"Truly, signor, I do."

"You surprise me; I should have thought nothing could be worse. Do you mind telling me what you have found so?"

"No," he said, slowly sitting down opposite to me; "but it is a sad tale, I doubt if it can amuse the signor; but, if he is willing to listen, I am willing to tell. It sometimes eases the heart to pour out its troubles even into the ear of a stranger. But stay, let us know how the time goes, for I have some affairs to attend to by and by."

Whilst speaking he thrust a hand into the pocket of his vest, and, drawing out a watch without a chain, held it towards me, adding:

"What is the hour, signor? we blind folk are a little helpless in these matters."

I looked into his large brown palm and was about to answer, but the words stuck in my throat, for surely it was not the first time I had seen that dial.

"Permit me," I said after a pause, as, pretending not to be able to quite able to see it, I endeavoured to turn the watch over in his hand that I might by a glance at the back of it verify the idea which had crossed my mind.

Digitized by Google

He felt what I was doing, and said:

"The signor will find the time by the front, and not the back."

I was about to answer, but the words stuck in my throat.

"Surely," I answered; "it is three o'clock. But that is an English watch you have, is it not?"

"The signor is curious; can it signify to him of what manufacture it is?" replied the padrone, in rather an altered tone, but not rudely.

"Oh, no," I answered carelessly, not wishing to arouse any suspicions in him; "it only struck me as strange to find an English watch in these parts. Pray let me look at it."

With a return of his former sorrowful manner, and with an air of resignation, he reluctantly handed me his watch, saying:

"Certainly, if I tell you one thing I may as well tell you all."

A glimpse of the back revealed my own crest and initials; but I restrained the expression rising to my lips, and went on, "Ah, a good watch; may I ask how you came by it?"

"Yes, it will appear in what I have to say; it is all sad, and is only one of the many troubles which made me an old man before my time. Very sad indeed is all that hangs about that watch. It belonged to my son, my only son; at least it was found upon him when he was dead."

Needless to say how I winced under the old man's words. He continued, as he passed a hand across his sightless eyes.

"Yes, signor, he is dead these many years past, and perhaps it is as well. But, ah me! the way of it—there is my grief. Could it have been that I had been by, and have known that there was ever so little repentance in his heart, there would have been some little comfort for me, perhaps; but, as it was, it is too probable that he went unshriven, unrepentant, suddenly to his account."

"Tell me, tell me," I said quickly, "the way of his death!" But the padrone was not to be hurried. He seemed to like to linger on the pain his slowly-uttered words brought with them, little guessing how they were paining me also.

He went on: "Ever a prodigal from his youth upward, my boy grew worse and worse as he reached manhood. I had looked that he should inherit my business and good name, for they were both worth inheriting at one time. I kept an hotel at Bergamo, and for a while he was my chief waiter, but his vicious courses brought ruin on us both. He contracted debts which I had to pay; ran away in evil company, and I heard nothing of him for years.

"When I did it was, as usual, with a demand for money. He was then in Switzerland as a waiter, I believe, at the hotel of Les Trois Sages—the signor knows it, of course, all the English know it—and there, I afterwards heard, it was that he, in the act probably attempting some desperate crime, fell one night into the Rhine, and was picked up dead as appeared.

"Only by a miracle could it have been that his body was not carried straight away down over the falls at Schaffhausen but it seems that he got entangled with the chain of the ferry which crosses the Rhine, as you know, a little below the hotel.

"Here again, by a miracle, it chanced that he was seen by some men who were early working at some timber rafts, and was by them carried ashore, as I have said, for dead!"

"But was he?" I inquired, with an anxiety I could ill disguise, as the old man paused.

"No, signor; it was not his destiny to be drowned—would that it had been, for then he would have been saved from the commission of his greatest crime! No; he was restored, to return to me and pile upon me further anguish.

"He came back to Bergamo a year or two after to a smaller inn, which I was then keeping, and in a drunken brawl with some of his loose companions he used his knife with a fatal result upon an unarmed man, whose friend on the instant stabbed my son to the heart! That is all, signor; but the remembrance of his career has been far worse for me than the darkness."

"And the watch," I suggested, with a sense of relief quite inexpressible, "was found in his possession?"

"Yes, signor; but I doubt if he had come by it honestly, for they tell me there are a device and letters on the back in no way belonging to him. But still I treasure it for his sake, or rather for his mother's, for he was all that remained to me of her, and she idolised him for the five years that she was spared after his birth; and," added the old man, in a somewhat more cheery tone, as if the recital of his troubles had relieved him, "a good English watch is useful even to a blind man."

Most assuredly the last thing in my thoughts was to deprive him of his treasure. I was only too well repaid for my loss by what I had just heard; only too grateful for being able, after all, even to look back with complacency upon what I nevertheless still call "My Murder!"

W. W. Fenn.

Digitized by Google

THE CURATE'S LAST HALF-CROWN.

I WAS a poor curate residing down in the country.

Those were the old days of pluralism, and my rector was a great pluralist. He had two canonries, two rectories, a vicarage, a prebendal stall, a snug office in an ecclesiastical court, and an archdeaconry.

It was quite obvious that he could not inhabit all his houses at the same time, and so he graciously allowed me the use of his vicarage house, deducting something from my stipend; but, let it be said to his credit, not so much as he could legally have done on his own account.

He would come down to Cherrington, so called, perhaps, on account of the abundant cherry-orchards in our district, once a year, when he preached the village-club sermon and looked after his tithes.

Of course I married. It seems the destiny of the impecunious curate—what they must all come to. A bachelor curate would have very little chance among the cherry-cheeked maidens of Cherrington, all ripe, with delicate white and glowing red.

Farmer Dawson, the churchwarden for our parish, gloried in the singularity of having only one curate, and was very friendly and neighbourly. I used to turn in on a Sunday afternoon, for evening services at that time were hardly known in country places, and used to smoke a pipe with the farmer, and partake of his home-made wine and home brewed ale, until Mary called us in to tea.

Mary and I married—a very obvious course—and the six little ones came on with all the regularity of the cherry season. My father-in-law said that he should leave Mary fifteen hundred pounds when he died, and in the meantime allow us the interest.

I became very much attached to my work, and very fond of the house and noble grounds; indeed, our vicarage grounds were quite famous in our part of the country. At the same time I felt that it was the warm nest on a tottering bough. I was not my own master and every curate has an insane idea that he would like to be his own master; whereas, after my own experience, I can say that it is much easier and happier to be ruled than to rule, and in all my preferments I never was happier than in my first humble curacy. But I am anticipating. Here was I dreading the breaking of the bough, when that breaking of the bough in a kindly Providence was to bring some very strange things about.

There were two ways in which my bough might incontinently break. The curacy being an unusually snug one, the Rev. Dr. Jennifer might chose to eject me and appoint some private friend of his own. But, to do him justice, he was a quiet easy-going man. His own lines had fallen to him in snug, pleasant places, and he would not like to inflict hard lines upon any man. But there was the chance that, having had so many good things, he might cap them all by taking a bishopric, which would necessarily vacate all his appointments. There was also the chance that he might shuffle off this mortal coil, albeit tenderly attached to the mortal coil, and much nourishing and cherishing it. I should say that the bishop of our own diocese had local ties which brought him very much into our neighbourhood. Dr. Jennifer considered himself quite as good a man as our bishop, and I believe in point of income was the better man of the two. These were days before the administration of Church funds by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners was commenced.

Some of the bishops had immense revenues under the old arrangement, whereas others were much poorer than under the present equalised arrangements. Among these latter was our own bishop. He had one or two farms in our parish.

All the society in our own neighbourhood was made up of farmers; we had no estated gentlemen, that is to say, the bishop owned a small tract, and all the rest belonged to a great duke, whose castle was twenty miles away, and owned all the land between us and the castle.

Our bishop was comparatively poor, and made himself poorer than he need be. He never took fines and rack-rents; he granted leases, he improved the Church property, he maintained schools; he bore cheerfully even more than his share of the burdens upon land, that land which seems to me to be always grievously burdened.

So when the good bishop came down to these parts, which was pretty often, he would sometimes turn aside for a night or two at the vicarage, when he would romp with the little ones and talk with me about the Greek poets over a pipe and some of my father-in-law's home-brewed in the evening.

The very reverend vicar, an archdeacon of Archdeacon Grantley's own stamp, died suddenly of gout in the stomach. It was rather unhandsome of the gout, which generally troubles fingers and toes before making a sudden final descent upon such a very vital region.

Of Dr. Jennifer's numerous appointments, the vicarage of Cherrington was in the gift of the Lord Chancellor. Ordinarily, Chancellor's livings are not very good; but this was one of the best, being between four and five hundred, so I should have about as much chance of getting the living by applying for it as of going to the moon in a balloon.

But for all that I made up my mind that I would apply for it, and thought that now was the time when my happy friendship with the bishop might stand me in good stead.

Digitized by Google

It so fortunately happened that a few hours later the bishop, riding by on his cob to visit one of his farms, drew up to talk about the news which the morning's post had brought respecting this lamented demise.

"I am very sorry," said the good bishop when he had patiently listened to the story of my pains and expectations, "but I am afraid, though you may not think so, that I am the last man able to do you any good. I never asked a favour of any man; and if I did so, I do not think that my asking would have the slightest weight with the Lord Chancellor."

"I confess, my lord," I said, "that I had ventured to count upon your influence."

"But I have no influence, my dear Mr. Vavasour," said the bishop. "I have never given a party support to this Government or any Government, I go to London as little as I can, and am always glad to get out of it as soon as I can. Some of my episcopal brethren get little notes from the Treasury asking them to be in their places at certain times, or to use their influence with certain people. The Treasury never think it worth their while to send any little notes to me."

I could not help smiling at the engaging frankness of my worthy diocesan.

Evidently my poor bough had broken down altogether. It was not to be bound up by any care of mine.

"There is just one thing that I can do for you, Vavasour," said the bishop kind-heartedly, "without the least impropriety. I cannot ask him to give you the living, but I will write a few lines which you can show at any time to the Chancellor, or anyone else you choose."

The worthy bishop dismounted, and entering the study wrote a few lines, in which he stated, to my grateful confusion, that I was a good scholar, and had worked my parish admirably.

"And if I can ever do anything for you, of course I will," he added. "But you are still quite a young man, and there are worthy men who have grown grey in the diocese who have a first claim on me."

I discussed matters with my wife. My fix was really a terrible one. An incoming vicar could eject me in six weeks. So good a curacy might not be obtainable for years; and, indeed, I might not be able to obtain any curacy at all precisely at the moment I wanted it.

It was hoping against hope; but still this journey must be made. It was fifty miles off; but Farmer Dawson would take me over in his gig until I should meet a railway—a new-fangled invention betokening the end of the world, as was thought at Cherrington, and only then coming into use.

It was a long journey in those days; but I started at early dawn in order that, if possible, I might see the Lord Chancellor the same day.

Tea and candles were not procurable in our village—that is to say, of any degree of excellence—and I was to buy them in London.

Also I had a mysterious mission—to call at certain shops and get some gorgeous articles of attire for baby, with which she was to petrify the local mind on the forthcoming occasion of her being christened. I was to attend to these things—so ran the wife's instructions—the very first thing of all, so that I might make sure of them.

I verily believe that she considered the matter of a living as being of quite inferior importance to the matter of baby's hood and bonnet.

By these means my little stock of money, quite inconsiderable at first, grew "small by degrees, and beautifully less."

Emptying it out of my pockets and examining it just before I set out to leave my card upon the Chancellor, I found that it was reduced to a single half-crown and a few smaller coins, which might possibly bring me home again, after making allowance for a crust of bread-and-cheese and a glass of beer.

I duly turned the coins over and—shall I confess it?—spat upon them for luck's sake, according to a legend which I had inherited from my ancestors, and set off to make the acquaintance in a friendly way of his lordship the Chancellor.

But, like Bob Acres, my courage was imperceptibly oozing out of my toes as I drew near the big silent house where the great man kept the King's conscience in his bag.

Putting on a very painful expression of appearing to be entirely at ease, I ascended the steps and made a courageous imitation of an aristocratic double-knock.

"Is the Lord Chancellor at home?" I inquired of a bloated specimen of a British flunkey, who made his appearance.

"His lordship is not at home," answered the man, with just a suspicion of impudence in his voice.

"Can you tell me when he will be at home?"

"No, I can't," said the man, in a tone that convinced me of its insincerity, and he was evidently preparing to bang the door in my face, or something very like it.

Now I had heard in my time of the virtues of palm-oil. The human hand being lubricated with a composition of silver becomes tender and mollified. To use plainer terms, it occurred to me that it might be a useful thing to bribe the British flunkey.

But then arose the question of the wherewithal to bribe him. I had but my half-crown, my solitary coin of weight, my little all, my beautiful, my last. If I parted with my half-crown, I might have to trudge back to Cherrington.

All my earthly hopes just now were centred on my having an interview with the Lord Chancellor. I did not see any possible way of getting it unless this fellow would give me admittance. I felt very much inclined to believe that the Chancellor might be indoors at that very minute.

With a despairing clutch I grasped my last half-crown. Its seven brethren of the last sovereign which I had changed, had taken to themselves wings, and had all flown away in the course of the day. It was a desperate speculation, but I thought that I would venture this last half-crown on the chance, however remote, that something good might turn up from it. I slipped, not without a severe twinge, the last half-crown—the last rose of summer was a mere nothing to it—and said:

"I am sure, my good fellow, that you know the way how to bring me into speech with the Lord Chancellor."

"Lor, bless you!" he said, with a grin, as he pocketed the half-crown, which would be something far less to him than it would be to me. "It's of no use in the world your coming here, thinking that you may be able to see my Lord Chancellor. I thought that everybody knew that his lordship at this time of the year is almost always in the Court of Chancery."

"But he comes home," I said, thinking that my half-crown might persuade the man, at some time or other to usher me into the august presence.

"Bless your heart, we never knows when he comes home. He may have to go and see the Prime Minister or some other nobleman about business, or he may have to go down to the House of Lords, or he may go to his own private rooms at the House of Lords."

Digitized by Google

"But he comes home," said the man, with another grin; "but do you think that he would see you after all his work, for all that? Unless you have an appointment with him it would be more than my place is worth to let you in."

I thought of reclaiming the half-crown; but that was obviously impossible.

"And do you mean to say that I shall never be able to see him?"

"Well, sir," he said, "I see you're a thorough gentleman, and I'll put you up to a way by which you most likely may be able to see him. You should go to Chancery Lane, sir. He has got a little private room close to his court, and you might find him there. At least, you are certain to find him there if you are at the place in good time. Most likely he'll speak to you if you send in your name and business. He's a haffable gentleman after all, in spite of people being so frightened of him."

At all events, I had now got hold of a piece of definite intelligence in return for my money. I made my way to the Holborn end of Chancery Lane.

I threaded a variety of complications among the Law Courts, where I saw quite a variety of judges sitting in robed state, as like one another as one egg is to another egg, or one old woman to another old woman.

At last I stumbled upon the Lord Chancellor's court; but I was positively informed that "the court had risen," which legal phrase, as I subsequently gathered, signified that when the clock had pointed at four the Lord Chancellor gathered his legal petticoats around him and fled the place to recruit his vexed soul with a dry biscuit and some dry sherry.

I was out in a minute in a decidedly dark and awkward passage.

"And can you tell me where the Lord Chancellor is?" I asked of a little red man against whom I had stumbled in the passage, apparently another specimen of the usher species. "Can you tell me which is his private room?"

"And what do you want of the Lord Chancellor," he inquired, "that you want to go to his private room?"

"That is my business, my friend," I answered, a little nettled that "man, proud man, dressed in a little brief authority," should thus put me through my paces.

"And what is your business?" inquired the man, fixing upon me one of the sharpest and most penetrating glances that I ever felt in my life.

"The world's a wide one, my friend," I answered, "and there's room enough in it both for you and for me. I suppose I may want to see the Lord Chancellor without telling you all about it."

"But I am the Lord Chancellor," said the little old man with another of those penetrating gazes.

I was really so dumfounded that I did not at all know what to say.

"You look to me," he said, with another of those sharp looks which literally seemed to transfix one, "like some poor devil of a curate who's come out of the country to worry me about some living."

"My lord," I said, "you have stated the facts of the case with great accuracy. I am an unfortunate curate who have come up to London on purpose to speak about a living."

"Come in here," he said, with an amused twinkle of the eye and a not unkindly voice. "I was just going away for the day, but I can spare you five minutes."

He led the way into a small room, comfortably but very plainly furnished, nothing like so good as my own study at Cherrington vicarage.

"Who are you, and what do you want?" he said, with an almost cruel abruptness.

I stated my case in a few brief, but I really think I may venture to say vigorous and well-chosen, words. At least I had conned them again and again during my recent journeying, in case I should manage to get an interview.

"Have you any references or papers of any kind?"

"None, my lord, except a few words from my bishop. He is the only person of influence with whom I have any acquaintance."

"The Bishop of ——. I think Cherrington is in his diocese."

"Just so, my lord." And I produced the bishop's brief testimonial letter.

The Chancellor rapidly glanced at it, and next he glanced at his watch.

"I see, Mr. Vavasour, that the five minutes of which I spoke to you are out."

I stood mute and disappointed.

"Would eight o'clock in the morning be too early for you to call on me at my residence?"

"Oh, no, my lord," I said.

I should have said the same thing respecting any other hour he might have named.

He gave me a nod, which I rightly interpreted as a dismissal.

In a few minutes I was blundering, half-dazed, among the cabs, carts, and omnibuses of Chancery Lane. I had no other course than to go to an hotel and remain there in person until Mr. Dawson, in his capacity of father-in-law or churchwarden, should release me, with a view to Sunday's duties.

I was close to the Lord Chancellor's house the next morning, and hung about it till the bells of a neighbouring church-tower should clash eight.

I then gave my customary double-knock. My friend of the preceding afternoon opened it, and for a moment a pantomimic gesture of surprise stole over his impassive features. Without a word he ushered me into a dining-room close by.

It was a dull cold morning, and the Lord High Chancellor was stretching his right honourable person on a rug in front of the fire. He advanced and shook hands.

"Ah, Mr. Vavasour, good-morning! Have you breakfasted?"

As a matter of fact, I had only had a biscuit and a glass of water. So I said that I had not.

"Very well. Then you shall have some breakfast with me. Burroughs," to the man, "bring some cold chicken and another tea-cup."

I sat down amazed. In all my experience I had never heard of the like of this—that I should take a friendly bit of breakfast with the Lord Chancellor.

"Now, Mr. Vavasour, not to keep you in any suspense, I may tell you at once that I mean to give you my living of Cherrington."

"My lord, my lord!"

"I find, Mr. Vavasour, that you are a scholar, which is not the case with every clergyman. I find also that you have so far managed the parish of Cherrington very creditably. I have these two facts on the excellent testimony of the Bishop of——. Now I assure you, Mr. Vavasour, that I have very often great anxiety about these livings. I am most anxious to appoint the best man. The difficulty is to find out the best man.

Digitized by Google

But in the present case I have no difficulty on this point. I can place the utmost reliance upon your bishop's recommendation."

"I am sure, my lord, that I will do my very best, all my days, to deserve it."

"I am quite sure you will. But I appoint you simply and solely upon the strength of what the Bishop of—— says about you. I have not sat so long with him in the Upper House without seeing how thoroughly good and honest he is. And please tell the bishop when you next see him, with my best regards, that I have had great pleasure in giving you this living in consequence of his favourable report. After breakfast I will give you a line to my secretary of presentations, who will put you in the way of all necessary steps."

I hardly know how I got through my breakfast, but in some fashion I did so, and I know that it did me good.

With a full heart I left the house, knowing that my fortune was made. I glanced at Burroughs, the man in the hall.

If I had had the money in my pocket, his half-crown ought to have blossomed into a five pound note. But I regret to confess that Burroughs has never received the five pound note.

Indeed, though I was now practically a beneficed clergyman, I had nothing in my pocket that could take me home.

The thought occurred to me that I might ask a cousin of mine, a lawyer in a good way of business, to help me. I went and asked him to lend me a sovereign to enable me to return home.

"No," he said, buttoning up his sensitive breeches pockets. "I make it a rule never to lend anything to anybody."

"As a minister of the gospel, I must remind you that we are told that we ought at times to lend."

"Mr. Vavasour, I am perfectly shocked to hear a clergyman of the Church of England talk in such a way. I knew, too, you had made a poor sort of marriage; but I did not think that you had sunk so low as to be driven to borrow a sovereign."

"I don't know what you mean by sinking so low. I only know that the Lord Chancellor, with whom I have just breakfasted, has given the living of Cherrington, which is more than four hundred a year."

"Whew!" said my second cousin, with a sort of gasp. "That quite alters the case. Now I dare say, my dear Vavasour, that you will want some money to pay induction expenses, stamp duty, dues to Queen Ann's Bounty Office, and that sort of thing. I can lend you a hundred pounds on the usual business terms."

I did not express my opinion of the fellow, but borrowed a proffered sovereign to enable me to return to Mary and the little ones. I sent it back to him in the shape of a guinea next day, and have not seen him from that day to this. It is astonishing how ready people are to oblige you when you are in reality independent of their help. Even dear old Dawson left me, I believe, a much bigger slice of his property than he would have done if I had been a poor man.

This was the way in which I planted my footsteps on the first rung of the ladder of clerical promotion, of that great success in life for which I cannot feel too humble and too grateful.

[This was substantially a story of early days which a very distinguished dignitary used to relate of himself. Its leading incident is strictly true, and seems worthy of a safer record than mere tradition.]

IDEAL BEAUTY

VERSUS

UNSIGHTLY OBESITY.

The following is an extract from a Signed Article appearing in "Woman" of December 12th, 1900:

"The specialist who will teach a simple, and harmless gospel of reduction by safe, healthful, and withal pleasant means is Mr. F. Cecil Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, who makes no secret of his method, but clearly describes it in his book, 'Corpulency and the Cure,' which he will give to any sufferer from overstoutness who will apply for it, and send him two penny stamps to cover its postage."

A UNIQUE TREATMENT.

The "Russell" treatment is a marvellously efficacious and radical cure, which is not only not harmful, but is extremely vitalising and strengthening, promoting appetite and aiding digestion, assimilation, and nutrition. Meanwhile the reduction of adipose matter goes steadily on until normal weight is reached.

NO NOXIOUS DRUGS.

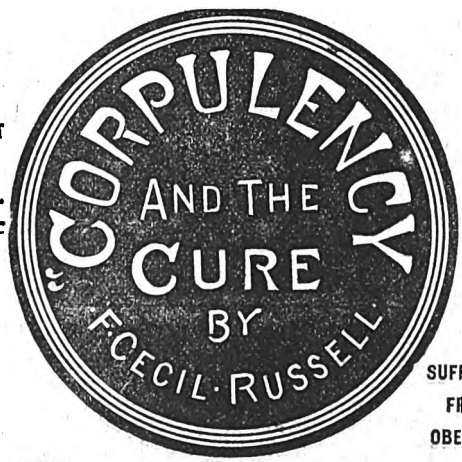
NO STRINGENT DIETARY.

NO DRASTIC RESTRICTIONS.

An UNFAILING TEST

The weighing machine will prove that the reduction of fat commences within 24 hours, the loss of weight varying from ½lb. to 2lb.; even more than this in severe cases of obesity. The compound forming the basis of the treatment is purely vegetable, and wholly free from objectionable ingredients.

FREE TO ALL STOUT PERSONS.



FREE TO ALL SUFFERING FROM OBESITY.

FREE. SPECIAL OFFER. FREE.

Mr. Russell will be pleased to give to all readers of Short Stories suffering from Obesity a copy of his book, "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pages. When writing for the book, enclose two penny stamps to cover its postage. The book will be forwarded in a sealed, plain envelope.

ADDRESS:

Woburn House, 27 Store St., Bedford Square, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

The Log of the Albatross.

It is a very, very simple tale that there is to tell; the story a woman's faithful hope—just that.

Of all the women I have ever known, Beata Mandrix was, I think, the noblest-hearted, and the truest.

Hers was, in one way at least, no ideal life, as her husband, between whom and herself there existed the most perfect affection, was away from her, and from his home, nine months out of the twelve; he being in command, and part-owner of the sailing barque Albatross, a fine teak-built vessel of some 700 tons burden, trading to the West Indies, and the coast of the Southern American States, between, that is, Florida and Chesapeake Bay!

Now, for a sailor's wife, Beata Mandrix was strangely ignorant of the manners and customs of the sea, and this for two reasons.

First, because David Mandrix, thoroughgoing seaman though he was, invariably left ship matters strictly behind him at the Dock Gates, believing in the complete contrast of wife and home, and home interests, and also it must be said in woman having quite enough worry in connection with her own domestic affairs, without having the anxieties and responsibilities of man's especial sphere added to the heap.

Then, secondly, Beata was an inland country girl, born and bred in Shakespeare's County, lovely Warwickshire. Ormiston Farm, far from the sound and smell of the salt sea, had been her little world, until she met David Mandrix, and by that time her love for wood and meadow, leafy lane and golden corn-field, had become a very part of her nature, which not even the magic words of one who knew so well the wondrous secrets of the mighty deep, could charm away or displace.

So it was, therefore, that when, during one of his rare home residences, Captain David's wife told him one day of a certain dream she had had, he was the more astonished, and even puzzled.

"You are sure," he said to her, "that the word 'log' was distinctly conveyed to your mind, sleeping though you were?"

"Yes, dear, spread out before me was a large book, with, along the top of each page, printed in large type: 'Ship's Log. Barque Albatross, of London.' In a sort of cloud appeared your head, out of it also seeming to stretch your hand and arm. You, or your hand rather, wrote something which I could not quite decipher upon the right hand page, then after signing your name at the foot, and deliberately tearing out the page, you and it vanished, leaving the mutilated book in front of me. It remained a moment, and then also disappeared, and I awoke."

"I should have said that your last night's supper had disagreed with you," said the captain, smilingly, "but I can't get over the 'log.' You've never heard the word before, at least not from me; and more than all, the words on the top of the pages of the book are absolutely correct. I'm not superstitious, although I am a sailor, but I must confess to being a bit mystified over this thing."

Beata was, somehow, sorry that she had told him, for he was to sail next day, and she could not shake off the notion that a disaster of some kind was in the near future about to befall her husband.

She was angry with herself for indulging in this train of thought, the more so because she could not shake off the impression it created in her mind.

David Mandrix would never allow his wife to "see him off." He had a horror of scenes, and felt that the parting, as parting there must be, was better gone through in the privacy of home than in the presence of a crowd of "all sorts and conditions," with whom it was no matter of concern whatever.

This particular trip of the Albatross was to be longer than usual, as she was to extend her voyage to Demarara, there to open up a new trade, if possible, the demand for British Guinea products having increased of late.

As a proper understanding of the ship's adventures will be better arrived at by accompanying her on her course, it may be just said that Beata sat down to wait the issue, possessing her soul in patience, although an

Digitized by Google

RESCUED FROM DRINK

Heroic Work of a Girl in Saving Her Brother from Drunkenness.

Put a Remedy in His Coffee and Without His Knowledge of the Secret Was Completely Cured.

The terrible evil of drunkenness has at last found a conqueror. Miss Mary Roberts, of 1033 Golden Gate Ave., San Francisco, Cal., U.S.A., will gladly tell any lady who will write her how she saved her brother from ruin, and her words burn with a new hope to every woman who would rescue a son, brother, or husband from the scourge of drunkenness.

"May every mother, sister, or daughter learn from my experience, is my devout hope, and in thus making public the story of our private misfortune and subsequent blessings it is my earnest desire that every woman read in my words the way to happiness, not only for herself but for the man who is struggling with the curse of liquor upon him. Dr. Haines, who discovered Golden Specific, is deserving of woman's homage, and I am glad to know that he will send a free trial package of the remedy to every woman who writes him.

"Send your name and address to Dr. J. W. Haines, 3248 Glen Bldgs., Cincinnati, Ohio, U.S.A., and he will mail the remedy to you in a plain, sealed package, and thus you can begin the cure at once. The remedy is odourless and tasteless, and you need have no fear of discovery."

Remember, a letter to us from British Isles requires 2½ postage. Write your name and address very plain, or, better still, enclose a self-addressed envelope so there can be no mistake in delivery.

HAND ORGANS FROM 20s.

Made in three sizes, in black and gold case. Full tone. Six metal tunes, plays all songs, hymns, or dance music. Sent on receipt of 4s. P.O., if desired, balance 4s. monthly. Send for list of tunes, prices, &c. ATLAS CO., 182a High Street, Camden Town, London; 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; and 14 High Road, Kilburn.

£50 CASH PRIZE

SEND NO MONEY WE TRUST YOU.

FREE.

£2 10s. £2 10s. REAL SILVER

WE GIVE YOU YOUR CHOICE of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1s. 6d. each. (Regular price, 2s. 6d.)

WE DO NOT WANT YOUR MONEY.

JUST WRITE US A POST-CARD

saying that you will either sell the Jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it with your name and address clearly written. On receiving your post card we will at once post you the Jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13s. 6d. you have received for same, and we will at once send you (no waiting), Absolutely Free, our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A Written Guarantee for Ten Years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1s. 6d. each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

FREE.

REAL GOLD AND REAL DIAMONDS

SEND NO MONEY. SEND NO STAMPS.

WRITE US TO-DAY. ONLY A POST-CARD.

WHAT THE PUBLIC SAYS:—

KNOCKING OTHERS IN THE SHADE ALTOGETHER.

100 High Street,
Mountain Ash, South Wales,

Dear Sir,—Just a line to acknowledge having received the beautiful present; it was beyond expectation. There are a lot of goods from a Glasgow firm but nothing compared with the British Goldsmiths Company's goods. We are knocking them in the shade altogether. Everyone who has bought our goods speak very well of them. I will do my best for your Company in little Wales.—Yours fraternally,
WILLIAM WILLIAMS.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS:—

"We have received some samples of the jewellery now being sold by the British Goldsmiths Co., the value of which is really wonderful considering the low prices asked for the goods. The British Goldsmiths Co. send out their goods to be sold by those who wish to put their spare time to good advantage. We should think there would be little difficulty about selling the goods we have before us. They are substantial, well finished, and cheap. The company offers a handsome present free to all persons selling a certain number of these articles."—HOME SWEET HOME, Jan. 5th, 1901.

BRITISH GOLDSMITHS CO. (DEPT. 29), 48 GRAY'S INN RD., LONDON.

Mr. Geo. R. Sims' Discovery "TATCHO."

20,000 LARGE (4/6 SIZE) BOTTLES TO BE DISTRIBUTED.

"TATCHO" is a brilliant spirituous tonic, the colour of whisky, free from all grease. A sprinkle of a few drops on the scalp and five minutes with the brush daily works marvels with every head of hair.

"TATCHO" acts as an invigorating tonic. It stops the hair falling, creates a luxuriant growth, and imparts to it a bright and youthful lustre.

"When I discovered the preparation, I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders," said Mr. George R. Sims to the representative of the Daily Mail. "Look at my hair now. Look at the colour. In time people got to know. Then the trouble began.

"Letters in thousands poured in to me from men and women in every quarter of the world, from all parts of the Kingdom, from America, India, Africa, China, and Australia. The work of answering the letters was enormous, and as far as possible the desired information was supplied; but it became quite evident that at the rate at which the demand was increasing I should very soon need a large staff of clerks to attend solely to the Hair renewer department of correspondence.

"In consequence, I said to myself. Why should this thing go on? If the public wants my hair renewer, the public shall have it; but the demand must be met in the ordinary business-like way. So I resolved to place the genuine article within reach of all, and with the assistance of a number of gentlemen, possessing the necessary commercial facilities, that has been accomplished."

THE GEO. R. SIMS' COMPANY HAVE DECIDED TO DISTRIBUTE 20,000 LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES OF TATCHO

to enable those who have not yet profited by Mr. G. R. Sims' discovery, to have the opportunity of doing so. The Company does this in the belief that such distribution will enable the preparation to become more widely known, and will introduce it to every home in a far more satisfactory manner than through unlimited puffing by advertisement.

COUPON. S.S. Feb. 9, 1901.

If you are desirous of participating in this distribution cut out this Coupon and send it to the Geo. R. Sims' Co., 81c Great Queen Street, London, W.C., accompanied by a postal order for 1/10. You will receive by return of post a plain package containing which will enable you to give TATCHO a fair trial and to satisfy yourself as to its merits.

A FULL SIZE 4s. 6d. TRIAL BOTTLE OF "TATCHO" POST PAID,

Digitized by Google

ever deepening grey shadow, such as she had never known before, rendered her task of waiting a weary one, at times, almost an insupportable one.

All went well with the Albatross until she reached one of the Azores, where she put in for a few days to repair a mysterious leak which had appeared a few days before.

Putting to sea again on the fifth day. during a stiff breeze, that rapidly freshened into a gale, the barque held a straight course for St. Thomas'.

A brave man to his heart's core, David Mandrix could not help feeling unwontedly uneasy after leaving the little Spanish port.

He argued with himself and took himself severely to task for giving way to fancies, engendered he knew by a rec ollection of that strange dream of his wife's on the eve of his leaving England.

It was well perhaps for him that he had not much time for morbid brooding, for the exigences of the ship's situation, in the teeth of an Atlantic storm, demanded his whole energy and attention.

Still his thoughts, even when a fiercer blast of wind than usual, threatened to carren the vessel, would turn to the anxious little woman living alone in that quiet country village, and to what he was beginning to assure himself was a prophetic intimation of calamity for both of them.

He fought vigorously against the desire to make the prophecy true by writing a message to his wife upon a blank page of the ship's log, and signing it, that when the need came, he might commit the book to the sea, hoping that the friendly element would cast it up at the feet of his Beata.

Every day, every hour the probability became almost certainty that the hand of God was in the thing, and that He does speak to the children of men in these latter days in dreams and visions of the night.

It was when, the leak having broken out again, the Albatross became practically water-logged, that David seriously bent his mind to the carrying out the notion that had been haunting his brain night and day.

It was a dark night, the sky a vast black pall. The wind whistled and tore through the shattered rigging, to which was added intermittent storms of heavy rain and sleet.

Giving the command over to his chief officer, David went below to his cabin, and shut to the door.

He could hardly keep his feet, so sharp was the angle taken by the ship every now and again, when struck by a heavy sea.

He got out the log, and placing it on the lid of his chest, propped it up as well as he could, and on a fair blank page wrote the following:

Sweetheart

I am thinking of you, and praying that this may not last very long. God bless you, my darling, and always remember that your love for me has been the one good thing of my life. Good-bye! Good-bye!

Your own David.

From David Mandrix, master of the barque Albatross, of London, to Mrs. Beata Mandrix, of Rosedene, Farnham, Surrey, England.

Wrapping the book itself in a piece of sail-cloth, several times folded, he bound it firmly up, and going out upon the deck made the package fast to a large spare spar—a top-gallant yard.

At the moment when he judged the ship had but five minutes life left in her, he with the help of Andrews, the mate, cast the spar with its message into the sea.

That was on July 6th. On Nov. 10th, in the same year, a big liner was breaking her record to New York, when on a calm, clear day, the look-out saw and reported a spar with an object—he could not say exactly what—attached.

Without stopping the steamer's way, a large grapnel let down grabbed the spar as it drifted past, and hauled it aboard.

* * * * *

On Christmas Eve a woman sits alone in a fire-lit little room with her hands before her, gazing abstractedly into the red coals.

She sees all sorts of things there, things that make her, to tremble and sob.

A letter is brought in to her, and a large unfamiliar-looking package.

She is impelled, somehow, to open the latter first. It contains a large parchment-covered book. There is no title upon the front or back.

She opens it, and it falls apart, at the portion of it where one page, the right, is written upon, the left a blank.

Is it a dreaming over again, only more vividly, the dream of that other night, months ago?

It is the same book, and the me sage there transcribed is the one thing only needed to complete the vision.

I cannot say that she weeps—she cannot. Oh! that she could!

Tenderly! so tenderly! she removes the precious leaf and sits with it, poor soul, holding it in her two hands till morning light.

Then tears flow, and the relief is great.

And her treasure?—that leaf of the Albatross's Log?—she has it to-day, holds it, prizes it as her best, her choicest treasure, for is it not her David's message as he made to cross the river and enter the haven on the other side?

And she would join him there, some day soon—her David; she would show him that she never forgot!

Ralph Enderby.

JUST PUBLISHED.

AN INTERESTING WAR BOOK.

AT PRETORIA,

The Capture of the Boer Capitals, and the Hoisting of the Flag at Pretoria.

A Companion Volume to "TOWARDS PRETORIA."

By JULIAN RALPH,

Special War Correspondent to The Daily Mail.

Extra crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

This is a continuation of Mr. Ralph's brilliant story of war commenced in his earlier volume, entitled, "Towards Pretoria."

A WAR NOVEL.

THE INVADERS,

By LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Final War," etc.

Crown 8vo, cloth, with Four Illustrations, price 6s.

Mr. Louis Tracy is so well known as a writer of war books that any introduction is unnecessary. In his earlier books the scenes of battle have been across the sea, but in his latest story he has brought war nearer home, and caused England to be invaded, and how "the invaders" made good their footing in England and were finally defeated.

London: C. Arthur Pearson, Limited.

Digitized by Google

Pearson's New Magazine for Ladies is a magnificent success. This was only what might have been expected, judging from the manner in which it was produced; nevertheless, it has been very gratifying to us. From the expressions of approbation which have been received, it is clear that already the "Lady's Magazine" has won its way to the esteem and patronage of the most fashionable and cultured ladies in the land.

We may now look forward with pleasure to seeing the "Lady's Magazine" in the boudoir or the drawing room of every lady who would lay claim to any place in Society or Fashion.

Much appreciation has been shown for Mr Hall Caine's Novel "The Eternal City." Needless to say, each instalment of this story increases in power and intensity.

ADIES OVE UXURY.

THE

ADY'S MAGAZINE

is a

UXURIOUS MAGAZINE.

It is full of

IGHT and LIFE.

It is the

EADING MAGAZINE

FOR

ADIES.

OOK OUT FOR No. 2,

Published Feb. 9.

Number 2 of the "Lady's Magazine" will be on sale on Saturday, February 9. If possible the contents are more varied and altogether of greater interest than No. 1. There is another large instalment of "The Eternal City," the second of the series of articles by the late Mrs W. E. Gladstone, a charming Story by Flora Annie Steel, and a number of Storyettes, Articles, and Poems, all of which it is believed will be dear to the heart of most ladies.

Be sure you get a copy, published Saturday, February 9, by Messrs C. Arthur Pearson Ltd.

Digitized by Google

RESULT OF THE "QUICK CHANGE" COMPETITION.

THERE was only one competitor who succeeded in sending in a correct list. The Graphophone has, therefore, been forwarded to him, viz.:

Mr. E. HEALEY,
8 Central Terrace,
Coatham, Redcar.

Three competitors had one error each, and divide the second prize between them:

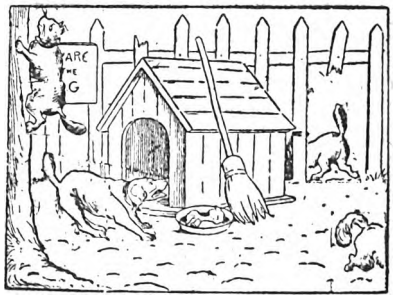
James Moore, 6 Southview Street, Belfast.
Mrs. H. Harper, 33 West Parade, Rhyl.
George D. Taylor, 3 Pryme Street, Hull.

Eight competitors with two mistakes share the massed amount of the third to eighth prizes:

E. Shalcross, 71 Myddelton Street, Clerkenwell, E.C.
P. Burke, 4 Rembrandt Terrace, High Road, Lee, S.E.
A. J. Smart, 16 Hamilton Road, Highbury, N.
Miss E. Martin, 17 Dolby Road, Fulham, S.W.
W. Perkinson, 48 Lancaster Street, Blackburn,
Miss A. J. Braden, 34 Little London, Chichester.
A. Brad-haw, 34 Seaford Road, Eastbourne.
E. W. Sanders, 10 Alderney Street, Pimlico, S.W.

THESE ARE THE CORRECT PICTURES.

1

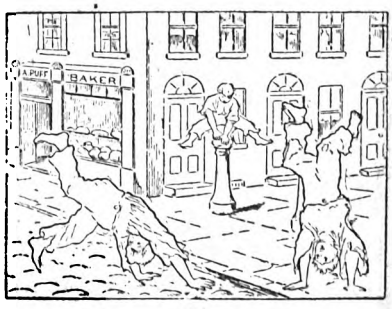


2

3

4

5



6

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

KAPUTINE

The Best & Safest Remedy for

HEADACHE.

NURSE HILL, of the London Association of Nurses, writes:

"I have seen Kaputine administered to many patients, and can truly say it is a remedy which should have a place in every household."

All Leading Chemists sell KAPUTINE, 1/-. Samples One Penny.

If your Chemist has not KAPUTINE send his name and address to KAPUTINE, HUDDERSFIELD, and we will send you a SHILLING PACKET FREE.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

COLDS CURED IN ONE DAY!

NAZALENE will positively CURE a COLD in ONE DAY, and a HEADACHE in Three Minutes. NO NOXIOUS DRUGS TO TAKE. One drop applied to each nostril acts like a charm. By post, 1/6. Particulars of this wonderful discovery will be sent FREE on receipt of stamped envelope. CITY DRUG COMPANY, 76 Fi sbury Pavement, E.C.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

A FREE GIFT.

500 40-EGG INCUBATORS.

Ladies and Gentlemen can greatly increase their incomes by POULTRY BREEDING, thus converting 1d. Eggs into 1s. Chickens. To encourage this industry we intend supplying each applicant during the next 28 days with one of our 40-Egg Incubators.

Write for Free Gift Form to POULTRY BREEDERS' APPLIANCE CO., 3 Clarence Road, SOUTHEND-ON-SEA.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.

THE MARSTON CO.,
59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

2/9 CHALLENCE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.

GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS,
148 Old Street, London, E.C.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

FREE. FREE.

Our £2 10s.

Real Silver Watch

(with chain),

or

A Real Gold Ring

Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

SEND NO MONEY.

NO MONEY REQUIRED.
WE TRUST YOU.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money.

Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10/- Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

Send no money. Write to-day.
BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 5).
282 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

HAVE YOU TRIED KEATING'S LOZENGES FOR YOUR COUGH?

ANY DOCTOR WILL TELL YOU "there is no better Cough Medicine."—One gives relief. If you suffer from cough try them but once: they will cure, and they will not injure your health; an increasing sale of over 60 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1½d. tins.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

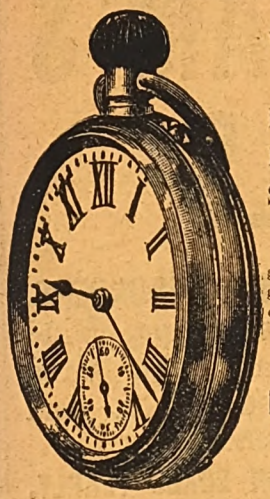
SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Warnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

Digitized by Google

YOU PAY ONE SHILLING

to start with and one shilling per week until article is paid for. We do not make any enquiries nor do we require any guarantees.



SPECIAL PRICES:

Watch, as illustrated, in metal cases . . . 6/-
Best nickel silver cases 10/-
Black Oxydised ,, 14/-
Silver Watches . . 15/-

Ladies sizes also supplied.

All watches warranted and guaranteed good timekeepers. Cash refunded on goods not approved of if returned in good condition within 7 days.

SPECIAL LINE:
LADIES' CURB BRACELETS
With Padlock,
Best Gilt, 2/6; H. M. Silver, 6/6; 14c. Rolled Gold, 8/-.

AGENTS WANTED.

Send stamp for price lists and particulars.

KING & CO., Wholesale Jewellers,
Baldwin Street, Bristol.

WHEN BUYING A CHEAP BICYCLE,

look at the tyres. If they are not the machine is not cheap at any price.

DUNLOP TYRES

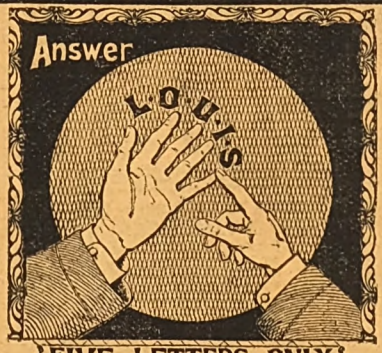
Trade Mark.

The DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE CO., Ltd.,
Factory: Alma Street, Coventry;
160 Clerkenwell Road, E.C., London.

Branches: Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Nottingham, Manchester, Glasgow, Dublin, &c.

HOW DO YOU SPELL VELVETEEN?



FIVE LETTERS ONLY.

Don't Forget this when you buy.

EVERY YARD IS STAMPED

L-O-U-I-S.

ZEBRA Grate Polish

No Hard Work.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ADY'S MAGAZINE, NO. 2 NOW READY. PRICE 6D.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 633. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 16TH, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

A Good Appetite; Enjoyment in Eating.

What is Appetite after all? Really a sensation of hunger caused by a craving of the digestive organs for work to do. Nature provides this craving for food so that the Body shall be well nourished. Hence it follows that a sharp Appetite is a good and natural thing to have. No one need be ashamed of it. And what after all is enjoyment of food—the so-called indulgence in the pleasures of the table—but proper and efficient Digestion of Food?—in moderation of course. If you do not digest what you eat, you certainly do not enjoy it. Quite otherwise; you are subject to pains, aches, stuffiness, Nerve Depression, and a host of minor ailments which quite destroy enjoyment. You may even fear and loathe food, and dread having to eat at all. But what can you do? You must eat, for you cannot let yourself starve. Approach the subject from another point of view. Consider how food is digested, how it is absorbed, how it enriches the Blood, and how finally it is transformed into vitality, vigour, health and strength, to replace the waste of hourly decay. Realise at once that you can facilitate, promote, and make easy all these processes, and that you can do it simply, cheaply, and efficiently by the use of Guy's Tonic.

Do not allow possible prejudice against proprietary medicines to sway your judgment. Because some are bad or indifferent, do not condemn Guy's Tonic. Judge it fairly on its merits. Examine its claims to your consideration. Realise by enquiry what good Guy's Tonic has done, and is doing, in thousands of cases. Investigation will soon convince you that Guy's Tonic is a genuine British remedy, prepared from the formula of a West-End Physician. He tested it, altered it, and from time to time improved it, during a long and varied practice, before it reached its present perfection. Nothing good gains lasting success, and affords comprehensive benefit, at a bound. It must go through a period of trial, stress and test. Guy's Tonic went through this long ago, and emerged triumphant. Never did a Remedy offer so much value, and do so much good, at so small a price (a six-ounce bottle costs only 1/1½), as Guy's Tonic. January, 1901, was a record for Guy's Tonic. The sales were larger than in any one month before. What else, after more than ten years' working, can this mean other than that Guy's Tonic holds its customers; that it does them good; gives prompt relief, and thus has a host of friends, who gladly recommend it to others?

A new size (Six Ounce) Bottle of Guy's Tonic, price 1/1½, is now on sale at all Chemists and Stores.

Allen Foster & Co.

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

Buy Direct at First Cost from the Leading Firm of London Manufacturers.

Design No. 2131. Half-a-Guinea.

Design No. 2121. 10/6

The New Alfosco Half-Guinea Costume.

Tastefully trimmed with a fancy silk braid, as shown in sketch; full, well-made skirt. Produced in Specialite Serge and Venet an Cloth in Black, Navy, Fawn, Grey, Brown, Purple, Green, and Red. Good fit guaranteed. Price only 10/6; carriage paid 6d. extra; or Skirt alone 5/6; carriage paid, 6d. extra.

Design No. 2131. 10/6.

The Fashionable three-quarter Sacque Jacket, 30in. long. Made in a superior Beaver Cloth, in Black, Fawn, Brown, and Royal. This Jacket has a Chesterfield front with the new side pockets. Price only 10/6; carriage, 6d.

DESIGN NO. 2121. 10/6

Design No. 323. 6/6

The New and Fashionable Flounce Skirt. It is made in Black, Navy, Fawn, Grey, Royal Blue, Brown, Red and Green. All sizes in Stock. This Skirt is cut in the new Circular Shape, and with a 16in. flounce round bottom, which is lined with good linenette. A bargain for 6/6; carriage paid, 5d. extra.

Send for one.

6/6

Design No. 323. 6/6.

Write for Patterns, New Spring Sketch Book and Catalogue of Bargains, Sent Post Free.

MOURNING.

Ladies' Black Costumes and Black Costume Skirts Ready Made and to Measure. All Special orders to customers' own measurements executed in a few hours' notice. Good fit and satisfaction guaranteed.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C.

Shilling packets

Kaputine "the" safe Remedy For Headache

WARNING. Instead of using the common White Headache Powders, which generally consist entirely of a crude drug, which has been condemned as dangerous by the medical papers, insist on having a bona-fide anti-quack remedy, recommended by such eminent medical authorities as Dr. RAMAGE, L.R.C.P., Dr. THURSTIN, L.R.C.P., late Dr. BOYD-WILLIAMS (Liverpool), the Editor of the Medical Journal, "Health," etc., etc. The name of this safe remedy is KAPUTINE.

ALL LEADING CHEMISTS SELL IT, OR CAN GET IT FOR YOU IN A FEW HOURS.

Sold by BOOT'S, TAYLOR'S, DAY'S, WHITE'S and other Stores. Most Co-operative Stores sell it.

PACKETS, 1/-. SAMPLES ONE PENNY,

or KAPUTINE LIMITED, HUDDERSFIELD,
will send it FREE for 12 stamps.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

Don't Cough-use

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves.
Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

Keating's Lozenges

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

THIS SILK UNDERSKIRT

can be made by any lady who follows carefully the Paper Pattern and instructions.

GIVEN AWAY

with every copy of THIS WEEK'S

HOME NOTES

The Best and Daintiest of Ladies' Weeklies. You should get a Copy at once.

ONE PENNY.

PILES!! TO CURE PILES!!

A NEW SCIENTIFIC REMEDY.

MOST IMPORTANT TO SUFFERERS!

The Recipe of an Eminent Physician for the Relief of the above distressing ailment will be sent Post Free for 1/2 Postal Order. Address:

Mr. BEESTON, 8 Church Passage, Cross Street, Islington, London, N.

FREE, FREE. NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

Our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch (with chain), or A Real Gold Ring Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money.

Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

SEND NO MONEY. Send no money. Write to-day
BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 5).
282 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. Assorted sample boxes, 6d., to be obtained from all Stationers. If out of stock, send 7 stamps direct to the works, Birmingham.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 633.] For the Week Ending February 16th, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

THE WEIRD CASE OF OLD BAVIDGE.

By W. DELISLE HAY.

As a young man I entered the office of Bavidge and Co., merchants, trading with the East, chiefly with Singapore and Penang. I have used the plural, but in reality the firm consisted solely of one—old Bavidge, as we clerks called him. There never had been any other members of the firm. Old Bavidge had worked his way up from what he was accustomed to call "the bottom rung of the ladder." When he first set up in business on his own account, as a commission agent, he had styled himself Bavidge and Co., and so he had continued to do after he prospered and became a merchant on a larger scale.

There were four of us in the office, and sometimes one or two more, when a press of business made it necessary. But we were merely clerks and no more. Old Bavidge liked to keep things in his own hands, and make confidants of no one. His clerks had no responsibility, and were not trusted with any knowledge of the conduct of affairs. In point of fact we were one and all little more than old Bavidge's writing and cyphering machines. The result of this was that we had no chance of rising in the office beyond a not very exalted point. Few clerks stayed more than a year or two, therefore.

Now I remained with Bavidge for more than six years, and the reason for that will presently appear. I was nominally head-clerk at the end of that period, but my salary was not much more than it had been at first, and though I necessarily learnt a good deal of the nature of my employer's transactions, yet he never took me into his confidence or talked to me of the prospects of concerns in which he was engaged.

Old Bavidge lived at Clapham, in a very nice house of the villa species. He was a confirmed old bachelor, but had long ago taken to live with him a widowed sister and her young daughter Emmeline. The latter he doted on.

Even when a little thing she was the queen of his household and the light of his life. As she grew up the best governesses and masters were engaged to educate her, and finally she spent two years at a finishing school near her home.

Our employer was often in the habit of inviting one or other of his clerks out to Clapham. He was a kindly man and liked to exercise hospitality towards his employés. These visits were great events in the eyes of his clerks.

They fared sumptuously, were kindly treated, and invariably fell incontinently in love with pretty little Emmeline. Need I say I followed the example of my predecessors and companions in this last respect?

Indeed, I soon adored my employer's niece, and it was for the sake of sometimes seeing her that I remained on in his service, and rejected various opportunities of getting into a more prospectively promising berth.

Latterly I had risen in favour, chiefly because Bavidge had taken up an enthusiasm for his garden and hothouses, and I had in early years imbibed a good deal of horticultural knowledge.

He, who knew nothing of the art, was glad to find in me someone to talk to about it and advise him. So I became a very frequent visitor at Clapham, and often enough I was asked out on Saturday afternoon to stay over till Monday.

At the time when I had been six years in the office, Emmeline had left school for good and had "come out"—whatever that may mean. My passion for her was becoming serious, and she was so kind to me, and so intimate with me, that I had much ado to refrain from declaring myself.

I knew too well that to do that would but lead to my dismissal from the house. Bavidge was not likely to encourage a suitor who was merely his clerk, and whose means consisted solely of £120 a year, paid monthly. But I was young and would not despair.

It was about this time that an event happened which, looking back by the light of later experience, my memory reverts to, as the first link in the chain of evil, of which I have yet to tell.

One day, I had been out for an hour or two during business hours, and on returning to the office was jocularly condoled with by my fellow-clerks.

"You've missed something," they said. "We've just had a real 'Penang lawyer' in the office."

It turned out that a Malay, wearing his native dress, had called upon our employer. He spoke English well, my fellow clerks said. He had sent in a neat, glazed card bearing the name of Zamat Driss, and had mentioned that he had just arrived from Penang.

To add to the singularity of this visit, it appeared that old Bavidge had been heard to speak in high and angry tones to the stranger at first, though what he said was inaudible through the closed doors. But he had soon quieted down, and after an interview lasting more than hour, he had gone out with the stranger, both apparently on the best of terms.

Digitized by Google

We did not see the Malay—if such he were—in the office again; but I have reason to think our employer met him elsewhere subsequently.

A few days later, I casually remarked on the Oriental's visit.

"To be sure," said old Bavidge, "a most worthy man; a merchant at Penang. Not a little curious," he went on musingly, "not a little curious I should have been doing business with his firm for more than thirty years, and this is the first time I've met one of them face to face." Presently he added: "There's a pretty general belief in the craft and guile of these Orientals, now, I've always found them keen traders, but thoroughly honest and trustworthy. Thoroughly honest and trustworthy," he repeated. "I'd rather deal with a Malay than with either a Greek, a Jew, or a Yankee any day."

But he gave me no information concerning Mr. Zamat Driss, or of the purport of that individual's visit, either then or at any other time.

As the weeks and months went by after this, I began to notice a change coming over old Bavidge. He was fidgety and restless, contrary to his ordinary character; he betrayed great anxiety on the arrival of each mail from the Straits Settlements; he had the air of a man who has some great weight on his mind.

He lost interest in horticulture.

If I had not known him to be an ultra-cautious trader, always averse to rash speculation, I should have supposed that he had risked his all upon some great transaction.

One night I had been dining at Clapham, as was frequent, and the old merchant and I were sitting alone together over some choice port which he had recently added to his cellar.

We were aroused by the sound of carriage wheels, and then by a commotion at the front door.

I think he must have drunk a little more than usual, at any rate he became mellower than I had ever seen him, and let me into his mind perhaps more thoroughly than he intended. It began by his saying, in answer to some remarks of mine:

"Well, no, I don't feel the same interest in the garden just now. The truth is, I've other things to think about."

Then he rambled on, talking more to himself than to me.

"Besides, what's the use? I don't think we shall be here another year. I'll buy a nice place of my own, for Emmeline; I'll settle it on her; somewhere—a little further out of town, perhaps. I shall be in a very different position after—hum!"

And here he ruminated for a moment.

"I don't see why I shouldn't be elected alderman. Greenway says I might, even now. And—and—by-and-bye possibly the chair. Why not? Emmeline would be Lady Mayoress then, of course. Ha, ha! Bless her heart! We'd have to get her a husband—a nobleman—who knows?"

But here some uneasy movement of mine disturbed the current of his thoughts. He looked at me and awoke from his reverie.

"There, get along to the drawing-room, lad. I think I must have a little nap after that wine. Yes, yes, and you shan't suffer for sticking to me; there'll be a rise for you in my office yet, perhaps. We shall see before long."

About a month after the conversation recorded above, there was a great banquet at the Guildhall, given by the Lord Mayor and Corporation to some illustrious personages from abroad.

I don't know how he managed it, but old Bavidge in his usual pushing way contrived to get himself numbered among the guests. Business was concluded at the office in the usual way on the appointed evening; after that, old Bavidge dressed there and went off to the Guildhall.

He locked up the safes in his private room before going, put the keys in his pocket as he was accustomed to do, and bade me go out to Clapham for the evening, if I liked, to amuse his sister and niece in his absence.

Between nine and ten o'clock that evening I was sitting in the Clapham drawing-room playing, or making believe to play, a most delicious game of bezique with sweet Emmeline, while her mother tranquilly dozed in her arm-chair by the fire. From this blissful condition of peace and quiet we were aroused by the sound of carriage-wheels grinding on the gravelled approach outside, and then by a commotion at the front door.

We rushed out to see what was the matter, and then all became confusion, dismay, wailing of women and helpless wringing of hands.

Poor old Bavidge was borne in, speechless, inert, scarcely conscious; amid the loud lamentations of terrified women he was taken upstairs and laid on his bed, while somebody ran for the nearest doctor.

Digitized by Google

I also took upon myself to send off, post-haste, for a physician of eminence.

When the local practitioner came, he first talked of apoplexy, the shook his head gravely over the patient, and then set about such restorative measures, as suggested themselves to his experience.

From a City friend, who had kindly accompanied my employer from the Guildhall, I gleaned all that could then be ascertained of the circumstances attending this sad affair.

While the guests were assembling at the Guildhall, old Bavidge had been seen wandering about the library, museum, and other chambers, talking to various acquaintances. He was then apparently in the best of health and spirits.

At the banquet my informant had sat next to him, and on his other side was a foreigner, of whom many were present. This was an Oriental, the gentleman stated, one of the suite of some Indian rajah, he thought; at any rate old Bavidge seemed to know him, for they talked together a good deal.

Half-way through the dinner my employer had begun to complain of not feeling well; his indisposition rapidly increased, and just before the speech-making began he turned quite white and feeble, while the sweat stood in beads upon his forehead.

Apparently finding it hopeless to struggle any longer against the fain ness that was overpowering him, old Bavidge now made an effort to withdraw from the hall quietly, while he could do so without attracting attention.

He seemed so feeble and tottering that my informant was quite concerned, and gave him his arm, while the Oriental also assisted him on the other side; they got him out into the waiting-room, and then the gentleman went to look for Bavidge's carriage, leaving then the Oriental with my employer.

He was some minutes away, and when he returned Bavidge was much worse; he could no longer speak, or even stand; they had to get the help of some waiters to lift him into the carriage. The foreigner's attentions were given in the kindest possible way; but my informant would not hear of his leaving the Guildhall, as he offered to do, and himself got into a carriage and brought my poor employer home.

The eminent physician I had sent for shortly made his appearance. As soon as he saw the patient he intimated to me that death was at hand. Then a short colloquy was held by the two doctors apart. I ove heard a word or two of their consultation, as it happened. The local practitioner seemed to be urging something, which the other pooh-poohed.

"Preposterous, my dear sir," I heard him say. "At a Guildhall banquet! Nonsense! No, no, one of those cases of obscure cardiac disease, ending in sudden and unexpected syncope. The case is plain to me."

The local doctor relinquished his opinion, whatever it was, and bowed to that of the great man. A sudden weakening of the heart's action was, they told me, the cause of old Bavidge's prostration. There was probably some unsuspected organic disease, and this, acted on by the excitement of the banquet, had resulted in syncope.

Meanwhile the patient lay white and motionless upon his bed, scarcely breathing. Towards midnight he opened his eyes and looked at us. He gazed at Emmeline and her mother as they knelt sobbing by the bedside, then at me, the doctors, and his friend, who still remained. He seemed to make great efforts to raise his left hand, but could not succeed in doing so, and kept looking at it and then at us.

"Curious," said the gentleman who brought him home, "he kept doing that in the carriage."

The physician lifted the hand and looked at it. A slight recent cut or scratch was perceptible on the ball of the thumb.

He seemed to make great efforts to raise his left hand.

"That's it," said the great man. "His weakening faculties are fixed upon this little cut, you see. Likely he caught his hand on something just before the seizure, perhaps even in the carriage."

And then old Bavidge gasped and gasped as if he tried to speak but could not. And finally he looked wistfully and yearningly at Emmeline and then at me. And a half-whisper gurgled from his stiff lips. I thought he said: "Take care of——"

But then the spirit fled, and left me for ever uncertain whether he meant to warn, or wished to give his dear one into my charge.

Digitized by Google

The funeral took place a day or two later, and then the will was read. Except a few legacies, including a year's salary to each of his clerks, the testator bequeathed all he died possessed of to Emmeline.

The trustees, two City friends of Bavidge's, appointed an accountant to wind up the dead man's affairs, and asked me to remain at the office and help him for the present.

The day after my employer's death, I had gone to the office to inform the other clerks. I was rather surprised to find my poor old Bavidge's keys upon the table in his private room. But everything appeared to be locked up and undisturbed.

Still the forgetfulness was unlike the man, and I took it as indicating the beginning of his seizure.

Yet there was something mysterious about it, for I fancied recollecting his taking those keys away with him, and he certainly had not returned to the office before the seizure overtook him.

The housekeeper whom I questioned on this head—our office was a set of chambers in a large building—had not seen or heard anyone come in after we left.

She fancied someone had come in late at night, because in the morning she had seen muddy footmarks on the stairs she had cleaned the night before.

But there were many offices in the building, and nothing to indicate which of them the person had gone to, if any such had indeed entered at all. It must have been somebody belonging to the place, at any rate, or he would not have had a latch-key for the outer door. The matter did not rest in my mind just then.

When the accountant and I came to look into affairs, we found the business extremely compact and simple, and the records thoroughly posted.

It seemed that when all goods and securities were realised, there would be some £80,000 at least for Emmeline.

This was our first impression, but it quickly appeared we were premature in accepting it.

We received intimation of a large credit given to "Bavidge and Co." by a bank; then another similar claim was heard of, and then various unaccountable acceptances began to crop up. It appeared that large transactions in the East were still in progress.

The odd thing was that no reference to these matters appeared in any of the books. All I had had any knowledge of was straightforward and easily understood, but these latter affairs were a puzzle indeed.

Only one unheeded scrap of paper thrust away in a corner threw any light upon them. There seemed to have been a memorandum upon it, pencilled by my late employer.

There was a column of figures with dates and initials opposite them. We gathered eventually that it was a rough list of bills and acceptances now falling due; but it did not enlighten us, except as to the total amount, which was startling.

The paper appeared to have been used as a wrapper for others, as on the back of it appeared the indorsement—"Vouchers of Z.D. and others."

Of course, we made diligent search in every possible place for papers relating to these matters. We found none; but we discovered that certain pages had been extracted from Bavidge's private books; that receptacles wherein I knew he kept invoices, vouchers, and such-like documents, were wholly or partially empty, and that a small journal he used to carry always about with him was missing.

We could only conclude that everything relating to the operations he had recently embarked in had for some reason been carefully destroyed or secreted.

Of course inquires were made on our behalf at Singapore and Penang. After long waiting we learnt that these would be practically fruitless, unless we could produce the missing accounts of the transactions.

The firms which had been authorised to draw upon Bavidge had supplied goods to persons acting as his agents. These, again, had transferred value to others.

Since the transactions were numerous, generally petty in detail, and passed through many hands, it would be an arduous task to follow any of them up without any record of them in hand to guide us.

Moreover we had nothing to show to make good our claims, and were consequently not in a position to force information from naturally unwilling people.

For example, there was a native firm at Singapore, composed of Chinese and Malays which, had agents in every Eastern port.

Such of the transactions as were traceable appeared to have ended with these people.

But they blandly declined to discuss matters which, they said, referred to business concluded and done with. If we, the representatives of "Bavidge and Co.," had any claims to make upon them, these must be brought forward through the usual channels.

This firm, our English correspondents in Singapore informed us, was one of long standing and repute. There had been rumours it was shaky some months before, but it had recently recovered ground and enlarged its operations.

To make an end of this part of my story, it was plain that old Bavidge's money had flown away to the East. When, some months later, all the claims we had knowledge of were made good, and coming through London banks there was no way of evading them, the trustees considered themselves justified in winding up affairs and making a settlement. Nearly all the property old Bavidge had possessed was required to liquidate the credits he had received. A mere pittance remained for Emmeline and her mother. They had to give up the villa at Clapham, sell the furniture, and go into furnished lodgings.

It was a sore trial, but the two poor things bore up bravely. Under the sad circumstances I had ventured to speak to Emmeline, and we were now formally engaged. But I had lost my situation, of course, and the new one I presently got did not seem to justify me in pressing my dear girl for our immediate union. We saw that we must wait awhile.

One day I was pacing up and down the great hall of the Guildhall, brooding over past events. Suddenly I was tapped on the arm and accosted by a stranger. He wished to put some trivial questions relating to the place we were in.

Looking at him, I saw the man dressed in the semi-nautical costume of a ship's captain or mate when ashore. He was of very dark complexion, with black hair and eyes, and he wore rings in his ears. He spoke English fluently, and talked like a well-educated person, but he was evidently a foreigner.

I was able to give him the information he desired, which related to the history of the Guildhall, and we dropped into conversation on antiquarian topics, the stranger evincing no mean acquaintance with the subject. This led to our presently wandering off to the museum, to look at some of the Roman relics placed there.

Now my mind was continually running upon the memorandum marked "Vouchers of Z. D." which I referred to a Malay who, it will be remembered, had once called at the office some months before old Bavidge died, and whose name was Zamat Driss.

Digitized by Google

It was my private opinion that this person could give, if he choose, much information towards clearing up the mystery of old Bavidge's affairs. But all inquiry had failed to elicit anything with regard to him. And then there was the Oriental who had sat by Bavidge's side at the banquet. Could he be identical with Zamat Driss? Nothing more had been heard of him.

As my new acquaintance and I were ascending the stairs leading to the museum, it occurred to me that he was too dark to be the Portuguese I had hitherto fancied him.

It now struck me he might be an Oriental, and, as courteously as I could, I asked if such were the case. He replied indifferently that he came from Singapore. Here was a discovery. In a moment impulse prompted me to ask if he had ever met one Zamat Driss there.

The first effect of my questioning was not a little surprising, though I did not at the moment see any significance in it. He staggered as if I had struck him, and a singular expression came into his dark eyes, a stealthy feline expression, if I can make myself understood by so describing it. But in a moment this had passed. He smiled and said:

"Perhaps you are not aware, that the names you mention are nearly as common among Malays as John Smith among yourselves? I have known several men called Zamat Driss. If you can tell me more about your man, perhaps I could help you. Where did you know him? And why do you ask about him?"

I mentioned that the man I sought had done business with my late employer, Mr. Bavidge, and that there were circumstances making it desirable he should be found. Then it was the stranger's turn to ask questions. He seemed unaccountably interested—excited I might say—by what I said. His eyes gleamed and sparkled like a snake's, but his manner was so composed, his politeness so excessive, that I answered him with incautious freedom.

But presently he told me he could not recollect any person answering to the one I was in search of. I had been led on to talk so much that I now felt greatly disappointed. I would have left him, only he seemed so sorry not to be able to help me, and so voluble in leading conversation into other channels that I was induced to linger with him.

We were now in the museum of the Guildhall, looking at and soon chatting about the various antiquities stored there. By-and-bye we came to a rather dark corner where was nothing very interesting, but my companion seemed especially drawn that way; and presently, behind a pile of broken sculptures, he pointed out to me some objects I should not otherwise have noticed.

These appeared to be a bundle of bows and arrows and other weapons, covered with dust, and, to all appearance, shoved away there and forgotten.

He took up one of the arrows which lay a little apart from the rest and examined it.

"This," he said, "is of modern make. Rather out of place here, isn't it? I fancy it comes from some island of the Asiatic Archipelago. I've seen the like at home."

He went on to descant about the making of these weapons by savage tribes in an easy way, but with so much detail that it interested me. He told me of the rough tools employed and bid me observe, nevertheless, how beautiful was the finish attained.

That I might the better see the perfection of the point and barb he laid that in my hand, he continuing to loosely hold the shaft attached. At the moment the point of the weapon lay in my palm I noticed his hand shake a little. Fearful of receiving an accidental dig, I hastily slipped my hand from under the point, looking innocently up at him as I did so. What I saw in his face was—well, if never before or since my eyes met those of a murderer, they did so then. Though far from thinking that at the moment, I yet started violently with a sudden, indefinable fear. My start was accelerated by an official voice near by, saying:

For just a second he glared at me and at the attendant with a tigerish look.

"You must please not to touch the things, gentlemen."

It was an attendant whom I had not previously noticed who spoke and now came up to us. His voice, together with my start, so affected the dark stranger that he let the arrow slip from his hand. It fell point downwards upon his foot. For just a second he had glared at me and at the attendant with such a tigerish look that I instinctively stepped back.

Digitized by Google

Then he stooped and began to examine his foot, and I saw that the arrow had slightly pricked him, having passed through the thin cloth "upper" of the boot he was wearing.

He handled the place with far more attention than such a trifle seemed to warrant. When he rose there was a new expression on his face, one that it was easy even for me to understand—an expression of intense, livid terror. Hoarsely he murmured:

"I am hurt, I am hurt! I must go! Ah, it is Fate! Fate!"

He spoke again in what was, I suppose, his own tongue, and, wringing his hands with a gesture of frantic despair, glided past, rapidly and disappeared from the room.

I was about to run after him when the voice of the other spectator stopped me.

"Well, I never!" he exclaimed, picking up the arrow and restoring it to its place. "These Indian chaps make a deal of nothing. As if a mere scratch could signify."

Then a sudden idea shot into my mind which caused me a thrill of sickening horror. What if the arrows were poisoned.

I had read that savages in many parts of the world were in the habit of putting poison on the points of such weapons. What if the stranger knew the fact! What if——

As soon as my mind was clear enough I began to question the attendant. He told me the weapons had been temporarily deposited there some years before.

Apparently they had been forgotten. Poisoned! He had never heard tell, and didn't believe in such things. At any rate he didn't believe poison on an arrow would keep active for years. Very few people seemed ever to discover these weapons or notice them because they were laid almost out of sight.

The last time he had seen anyone look at them was long since. There was a banquet at the Guildhall so he remembered the occasion. Some persons came into the museum before the dinner and he remembered there was an Indian rajah or Siamese prince, or something of that sort, as he judged from his dress, among them. This man was looking at the arrows with another, an Englishman. He did not remember what the Englishman was like. And that was all he knew or could recollect.

My thoughts were so tumultuous and my head swam so with the real or fancied discoveries I believed I had made that I could only go home to think. Next morning all was still confusion, but I had resolved to see the Clapham surgeon who had been summoned to old Bavidge's deathbed. With difficulty did I get him to listen to me. At last he got interested. He acknowledged that, when first called in, he had momentarily suspected some unnatural cause for the seizure certain symptoms being peculiar but the eminent physician had set his mind at rest on that point, referring everything to cardiac disease, and his authority on such points was almost absolute.

This doctor however was sufficiently interested to aid me in obtaining permission to examine the arrows. We tested them on rabbits and soon had clear evidence of their venomous and deadly character. A slight film of varnish-like matter was perceptible on the points. A clever analyst pronounced this to be of vegetable origin, but was wholly baffled in trying to ascertain what it was. It was akin to "woorari" he thought. After this discovery some effort was made to find out the depositor of the weapons, but all trace of him had disappeared, and it was surmised that he had either died or forgotten the matter.

The physician on being told what we knew and suspected, declined to alter his opinion that Bavidge had died from anything but heart-disease. The Clapham doctor half inclined to my opinion, but he pointed out to me that it would be impossible to prove it now. The poison was one of which no trace could be detected, because no tests for it were known. Exhumation of the body would, therefore, be futile. And even supposing that it was proved that old Bavidge had died because his hand had been pricked by a poisoned arrow, there was no evidence of crime. It might have been accident. No criminal could be named, no crime could be proved; just as the accountant had told me that no evidence of fraud really existed. A lawyer I consulted told me much the same thing.

And yet I have worked out a theory in my mind which I believe to be the truth. I think that a plot was formed in the East and that Bavidge was selected as the victim, probably because he was not only wealthy, but was also known to conduct his business in an unusually private manner. Zamat Driss, the Malay, came to England to execute the plans. First, old Bavidge was lured into some large undertaking. Most likely the enterprise was genuine and the securities given to him for advances also good, for he was not the man to be taken in by false representations.

But when he had embarked all his credit, in other words, his capital, then the conspirators sought to secure it to themselves.

Driss effected the murder of Bavidge at the Guildhall, by means of the poisoned arrows (which he may possibly have deposited there himself). How he did so I guessed from my own adventure.

It will be remembered that the Oriental stranger, doubtless Driss, who sat beside Bavidge at the banquet and left the table with him, was afterwards alone with the half-conscious sufferer for a few minutes. What more easy to pick his pockets of the keys and pocket-book?

During the night, probably disguised, he might have used the keys to let himself into the office to destroy every paper referring to his own securities. Hence his villainous associates would be enabled to retain Bavidge's property without anyone being the wiser.

Now I think that the fascination which causes a murderer to return to the scene of his crime brought this man again to the Guildhall. Fate, or the hand of God, led him to accost me. By accident he learnt from my words what doubtless led him to suppose I was on his track. He instantly conceived the idea of removing me by the same apparently accidental means he had used against my employer.

That the wretch went from the Guildhall to certain and immediate death, I know and his look and words now assure me that he also knew it. I never succeeded in tracing him, but I suspect it was his body that was picked up in the Thames a week later. The description I read of a "foreign seaman found drowned" sufficiently tallied with my recollection of the Malay. But the actual robbers, of whom he was but the active agent, are they never to be pursued and brought to justice?

I am only a poor clerk, though I am rich in dear Emmeline's love—who is now my wife—but the only thing I regret is that I have neither means, nor time, nor ability to hunt down the plunderers of old Bavidge, the associates of his assassin.

Digitized by Google

A STORY FROM JAPAN.

In that low quarter of the city of Yedo, called Shinagawa, there lived a poor sandal-maker. He was very poor, and belonged to a proscribed tribe of Etas, a race which previous to the present era of refinement and enlightenment, lived by themselves, the spurned and despised of men; able to follow certain trades of a menial character, such as the flaying of animals, the execution of criminals, and the making of sandals and clogs, to which the free-born citizens would not stoop.

Poverty and misery preyed upon the mind of the poor sandal-maker so much that one night he said to his wife:

"O, Taki, I wish I could be a great lord for a few days, to do nothing, to eat and drink of the best, and never be obliged to think of spending a tempo."

"Don't be stupid, Denkichi," replied his wife, "you would never do to be a lord, you might just as well try to swallow Fuji" (the great mountain).

But the god Inari, who was prowling about as was his wont, heard this, and resolved that he would teach the poor man a lesson in contentment. So when the sandal-maker was asleep between his grimy quilts he appeared to him, and said:

"You want to be a lord. Very well, you shall try it for a week."

The sandal-maker rubbed his eyes and awoke. He was in a beautiful room, the walls of which were hung with curiously-painted scrolls; the mats were of the finest and whitest straw; his quilts were of the softest silk, and his pillow was of camphor wood with a roll of the best bamboo paper tied upon it.

As he awoke a servant approached him kneeling with a tray of sweetmeats. Denkichi took a handful and swallowed them, smacked his lips, and cleared the dish. The servant prostrated himself to the mats and retired, as he came, kneeling.

"Well," said Denkichi, "this is luck! I suppose I'd better dress."

His old garments were gone, and in their place was a suit of splendidly-embroidered silk, fitted with stiff cardboard wings, and adorned with huge white crests of oak leaves. A personage, who seemed to be a sort of major-domo, appeared, and informed him that the suitors were waiting in the ante-room.

"But where's O Taki?" asked Denkichi.

The man shook his head.

"Well, as I'm a regular lord," thought Denkichi, "I may as well see what it's like; but I should have liked O Taki to have seen me. And these clothes are confoundedly hot and heavy. But never mind, here goes."

So he went into the ante-room, where there must have been at least a hundred people assembled, who all made obeisance as he appeared.

The major-domo showed him a sort of raised daïs on which he was to seat himself, and for three long hours he was obliged to remain motionless, listening to claims and petitions, and remonstrances and beginnings of favours, and details of estates, and of revenue, and of a hundred other things about which he knew nothing.

Several times he felt as if he would have liked to jump up and stretch his legs, and hitched himself uneasily, but the eye of the major-domo spoke a silent remonstrance, and he subsided with a sigh.

When at length the business was concluded, Denkichi was about to fling off his robes, and lie down as was his wont, half-naked, with his pipe between his lips and a bowl of wine beside him, when the major-domo informed him that the hour of the midday meal had arrived. At this repast he was introduced to the ladies of his retinue, who were magnificently arrayed, but so staid and solemn of demeanour, so unable to appreciate the jokes by which he had won for himself the name of the "Shinagawa Wit" that he would much rather have had his plain, homely O Taki by his side.

The meal was splendid, but Denkichi would have preferred a dish of stewed eels, a bowl of Yakidofu, and a measure of Three Virtue wine, to all the delicate dishes presented to him, so smothered in condiments and sauces as not to preserve an atom of their natural flavour. It was a long affair too, and when it was over he exclaimed with a sigh of relief:

"Well, at any rate, now they'll let me have an hour's peace."

But the major-domo appeared, and reminded him that the fencing-master was waiting. So poor Denkichi was obliged to incase himself in a heavy suit of chain armour, and for more than an hour attack and defend, repeat, parry, cut, lunge, and dance about until he was well-nigh dropping with fatigue.

After the fencing came the master of Chinese, and after the master of Chinese the music instructor.

A few cups of tea—spoilt, so thought Denkichi, by the infusion of cherry flower—somewhat refreshed him, and for the first time during the day he was enabled to get a few minutes of such rest as his stiff raiment would allow him. But the business of the day was by no means over.

A council of the heads of the ward was held, at which Denkichi presided, and again he had to sit listening to dry arguments on questions of law, petty differences of opinion, long speeches, and statements about matters in which he did not feel the slightest interest. This was followed by the evening meal, an entertainment just as formal and twice as lengthy as that at midday.

He was almost asleep with weariness and fatigue, and would have crept into his sumptuous bedchamber, but the major-domo—how he hated that major-domo—told him that a new theatre had been opened in the quarter, and that the people would be offended if the lord were not to honour the first night with his presence.

A fresh suit, if possible, heavier and stiffer than the first, was necessary for this performance, and not until the small hours of the next morning could poor Denkichi at last throw himself down between the quilts, only to be aroused in a short time to meet the assembly of suitors.

So for a week this continued, with but little variation. On the evening of the sixth day, Inari appeared.

"Well," he said, "how do you like it?"

Denkichi fell down on his knees. "Let me go back this minute!" he cried, "and never more shall you hear a word of discontent pass my mouth."

Inari granted his prayer, and he found himself back again at the hut at Shinagawa with O Taki by his side.

So utterly wearied and worn out was he that he slept during the whole of the next day, and then he related his experiences to a wondering circle of friends. But he never more was heard to grumble at his lowly condition.

FRANK ABELL.

Digitized by Google

THE LION'S WARS

The Cabul War of 1836-1842.

INDIA is such a far off land, its people, climate, and country so different to our own, that till recently events of even the most vital importance excited but a languid interest. The mutiny in 1857 roused the country, it is true, but the danger once passed we paid little heed to its affairs till the stealthy but unceasing extension of the Russian empire in Asia woke into active life the Sleeping Lion of Britain.

To-day we keep a watchful eye on India, and especially Afghanistan. We know that its existence as an independent buffer state, for which the mountainous character of the country admirably fits it, renders India secure.

Our great Indian rulers foresaw, as far back as the commencement of the century, the dangers to be apprehended from foreign aggression, and it was a cardinal feature in their policy not only that Afghanistan should not be weakened by civil strife but that its rulers should take their policy from Calcutta.

In 1838 Lord Auckland, then Governor-General of India, sent an army into the country to reinstate Shah Sujah-el-Malek on his long lost throne of Afghanistan, His lordship at the same time issued a proclamation declaring that he was acting in the interests of the Afghan people whose welfare he had at heart.

It was necessary that we should intervene, for our secret agents had discovered that the Shah of Persia, forgetting with true Oriental ingratitude that he was indebted to us for his throne, was intriguing with Russia. Dost Mohammud, the Ameer of Afghanistan, had given so many proofs of his loyalty to the British that when the Shah of Persia, secretly encouraged by Russia, publicly proclaimed his intention of seizing Herat, Dost naturally looked to England for protection.

Why Lord Auckland should have refused assistance, especially as he knew that Persia and Russia were hand in glove with each other, seems strange. But he did, his motive, it is stated, being that he had conceived the wild idea of restoring to the throne of Afghanistan the old and once formidable Duram dynasty in the person of Shah Sujah. Whether the Afghans would have preferred Shah Sujah to their reigning monarch matters not. They probably liked neither, but as they hated foreign intervention more, they at once, as soon as it transpired that Shah Sujah had accepted the British offer, prepared for war.

At the close of the year 1838 a British army of 30,000 men, officered and paid by the East India Company, crossed the Indus in two columns. The first check was caused by the refusal of Ranjit Singh, the head of the Sikhs, to allow us to pass through his territory. This compelled the troops to descend the Indus a thousand miles and march by way of Kandahar to the Afghan capital. After leaving the boats they crossed the wilderness of Cutch Gandara. The distance across was only 150 miles, but the heat was so great that the mortality amongst the men and cattle from want of water was terrible.

After Sir John Keane had assumed command, one of the columns was sent through the Bolar pass in the Brahm mountains, sixty-six miles in length. Fearing attack, our men by means of a forced march, upset the Afghan plans, and managed to arrive at the other side without incurring loss.

Digitized by Google

On April 6th the two columns met near Quetta, and after resting, separated to continue their march on the capital. Again the plans of the Afghans were defeated. After the spies of the enemy had discovered our route, we retraced our steps and proceeded through the pass of Kajuk.

On April 25th Shah Sujah entered Kandahar. The other column arrived on May 4th, and the army encamped under the walls of the city. On arriving at Ghazni on the 21st of the following month the men found that the town was protected by fortifications of such strength that a siege train would be necessary for their destruction. The walls were of immense thickness and sixty feet high. In front were several ditches filled with water and not shallow enough to ford, and further protection was afforded by a deep river. What was to be done? An assault would have entailed heavy loss and a retreat still greater dangers. Knowing the treacherous character of the Afghan the garrison was sounded. A traitor was soon found. A nephew of Dost Mohammud offered for a large sum to betray his uncle's fortress.

Whilst our artillery was thundering at the enemy's wall on the night of the 22nd, a party of engineers exploded three hundred pounds of gunpowder at a secret gate called Kabul shattering it in ruins. The storming party under Colonel Downie at once dashed into the fort. Leaping over the debris our men rushed forward, completely surprising the garrison. At this juncture the gallant little advance guard nearly came to grief.

The main column under Brigadier General Sale was hurrying in the footsteps of their comrades when one of the engineers of the exploding party rushed up, saying that the gateway was so blocked up with fallen masonry that it would be impossible to enter. Sale had already ordered the retreat when he noticed that the man seemed strangely excited. What if the shock of the explosion had unhinged his reason. So he ran to the gate and to his joy found it clear.

"Now my men," cried Sale, "make haste or we shall be too late."

The little band, back to back. were fighting for their lives when assistance arrived. Then ensued perhaps one of the most desperate fights ever recorded in history. Our men were confronted with the very pick of the Afghan warriors whom they resisted for over two hours.

One enormous Afghan nearly ended the career of General Sale. He had brought the Englishman to the ground with a sabre cut, and had drawn slightly back to deliver another, when his foot slipped and he fell. In a moment the Englishman was on him. Over and over they rolled amongst the other combatants. During the struggle the hardy mountaineer made repeated efforts to draw his dagger but his wrist was held in a grip of iron. Suddenly the General developed a fresh attack. Quitting his hold on the other wrist he made a supreme effort and jerked the mountaineer on his back. Before his antagonist could draw his dagger, Sale had seized a sword and with the pummel battered his foe's head till he became insensible. There were other hand-to-hand encounters equally as desperate as this one but space forbids our dealing with them.

After a desperate struggle the garrison capitulated. Our loss in killed was seventeen and 165 wounded. Of the Afghans we not only killed 600, but we took 1,600 prisoners. But it was the capture of a fortress they had fondly believed was invulnerable that made the Afghans indisposed to continue the struggle. Dost Mohammud besought his officers to try their fortune once more against the Feringhi dogs but they hung back.

"I will put myself at your head and after my death you can make your own terms with Shah Sujah," he said, but ere the chiefs, who asked a day for thought, could decide, the British had reached the capital. Finding that the town was threatened in two directions the Ameer sent his artillery to Argandeh and fled on August 2nd towards the Hindoo Kush. A strong force of cavalry under an officer afterwards known as Sir James Outram at once started in pursuit. But their guide, the nephew of Dost Mohammud who had helped them to win Ghazni, being an impartial sort of traitor, this time befriended his relative. He took our gold it is true but he directed our men wrongly.

In due course Shah Sujah was installed as Ameer but regarding him as the puppet of a foreign power the Afghans resolved on the first opportunity to depose him. Calcutta soon learnt that in Afghanistan potentates placed on the throne by the sword have to be kept there by the sword. The army of invasion therefore became the army of occupation. Then our troubles commenced.

Shah Sujah's rule was soon so openly scouted, that in a very short time his authority extended no further than the territory occupied by the British Army. Seeing that the dangers of our occupation would increase unless we captured Dost Mohammud, Sir Robert Sale was instructed to obtain possession of this person. After a hunt extending over two years, he ran the ex-Shah to earth.

When the authorities at Calcutta received the unfortunate potentate, they thought that Afghanistan would at last settle down. They were wrong. Ever since the British occupation, a secret conspiracy had been maturing to expel the intruders. Although its ramifications extended to all parts of the country, the secret had been so well kept that the British Resident, Sir Alexander Burnes, was blissfully unconscious of its existence. Even when Abdula Khan, a chief with an exceptionally evil reputation, even for an Afghan, dropped dark hints as to what was in store for us, no suspicions were aroused.

Early one morning a howling mob collected outside the British Residency. Sir Alexander attempted to address the crowd and was stoned. When one of his suite fell shot through the brain, the fury became general, till finally the Kabulese, after setting the house on fire, attempted to storm it. With death staring him in the face, Burnes allowed a treacherous Afghan, who promised to effect his escape, to disguise him; but no sooner did he reach the garden than the guide called on the crowd to slay the English dog. A forest of knives gleamed in the air and the Resident was soon hacked to pieces. The native soldiers attached to the British Residency offered a brave resistance, but they were overcome, and the inmates of the house, men, women, and children, slaughtered.

On the news reaching the British camp, Colonel Campbell was ordered to proceed to the Presidency with assistance. Losing his way, his men presently found themselves in one of the narrow streets of the city. He had not gone far when the progress of the columns was checked by a strong barricade. As they turned to retrace their steps, the mob closed round the

Digitized by Google

One big Afghan was carried to a little group in which were crouching some ladies with their little ones.

Digitized by Google

little force, the deadly knife claiming so many victims that but for the arrival of Brigadier Shelton they would have been massacred to a man.

Although the safety of our Army was now seriously menaced, further disasters might have been averted had the generals in command acted with common courage and prudence. With a lack of judgment that was simply incredible the little force was at once divided into two divisions. One being stationed at Bala Hissar and the other at some cantonments quite two miles off, the difficulties of communication being greatly increased by the river Kabul and a broad canal which ran between them.

But there were worse blunders committed. All the supplies were lodged in a small weak fort nearly half-a-mile from either of the stations and, to crown all, neither of the British camps could possibly be defended being located in a hollow surrounded by lofty hills. Two days later our incapable general sent a detachment to enter the city. It was so ridiculously small that it was at once driven back with heavy loss.

Now thoroughly alarmed, General Sale was ordered up from Jalalabad, and General Nott who was at Kandahar was asked for a couple of regiments. Nott sent reinforcements but they were driven back, and Sale being short of provisions and ammunition was compelled to withhold assistance.

A short respite and then a few days later thousands of Afghans, attracted by the prospect of plunder, swarmed round the British camp. Their first act was to force us to abandon the commissariat fort which they at once looted. When Shah Sujah, from the battlements of Bala Hissar, saw his triumphant subjects leaving the fort in hundreds laden with booty he exclaimed, "Surely the English must be mad."

Why General Elphinstone did not at once join the divided forces it is impossible to imagine. Led by a Commander who understood his business the British troops in Afghanistan should have made short work of any force brought against them. What Elphinstone did, although he had enough supplies for twelve months, was to write to Macnaghten, the new Resident, advocating a retreat. His officers then becoming alarmed persuaded Elphinstone to recall Shelton and give him the post of second in command. But Shelton, although a man of great courage, was of so fiery a disposition that his plain speaking so irritated his chief that any advice he gave was scouted. The Afghans, emboldened by our inactivity now began to encircle us. Shelton led a couple of sorties with his usual bravery, but by this time our men had lost all confidence in their commanders, and on both occasions retreated.

A little later we captured a fort the enemy had erected close to our position, but it was a near thing, and the operation cost us 200 men.

Fate seemed to have mapped us out for special persecution, for the imbecility which characterised our operations in this war now extended to our diplomacy also. Lieutenant Conolly, who filled the post of political agent to the Ameer, offered 15,000 rupees for the heads of the principal Afghan leaders. His instrument, Mohun Lal, soon found a couple of ruffians who expressed their willingness to undertake the job, but their nerves failing they split on their employers. Enraged at this perfidy the Afghans assembled on the heights and for several days rained on our troops below a most deadly fire.

Ordered to attack, Shelton stormed the heights, but he could not maintain his position and two days later had to retreat. After a rest he again carried the enemy's position but having only old-fashioned pieces of ordnance the Afghans were able, by creeping round the side of the hill to take us in flank. Worn with hunger and fatigue, convinced that their position was hopeless, not a man stirred when Shelton in order to anticipate the coming onslaught gave the word to charge. An Afghan chief planted a standard 30ft. from where our men had formed into square. "I'll give £50 to the man who pulls that flag down," cried Shelton.

The shadow of disaster weighed heavily on our men, and the offer was unheeded. When the Afghans charged, our men bolted to their cantonments. British soldiers flying from the foe! It sounds incredible, but it was true. Macnaghten then invited the Afghan chiefs to a conference, and signed a treaty agreeing to evacuate the country in three days.

Although Macnaghten hypocritically declared that we parted as friends, the wily Afghans were not to be deceived. They contrived to delay our departure till December 18th, when snow was falling, and Macnaghten, on his part, in the hopes of reinforcements arriving, tried to delay the march still more. Disappointed, he communicated with Akbar Khan offering to make him Prime Minister if he would have the Afghan chiefs arrested.

Akbar, who was the son of Dost Mohammed, pretended to assent, lured the British official to a meeting, and told him he should hold him as hostage for his father. In the scuffle which followed Macnaghten lost his life. Incredible as it may seem, the British generals actually offered to renew the treaty, which was, of course, annulled by this dastardly murder.

The demands of the Afghans then rose. They insisted that all but six guns should be surrendered, all spare muskets, and that General Sale, his wife and daughter, and the wives of some of the other officers should be also left behind as guests.

On January 6th, 1842, a force of 15,000 men, of whom 4,500 were British soldiers, demoralised by the incapacity of their commander, started on their ill-fated march home. No sooner had they started than their troubles began afresh.

Stimulated by prospects of plunder, the Afghans hung on their flanks like wolves. The soldier who fell out of the ranks for a moment's rest was doomed. A creeping form, two swift blows with the long Afghan knife, and then a crowd of wretches tearing the clothes off their victim for hidden valuables. The little force had hardly gone ten miles when the mountain thieves, impatient to begin, attacked the baggage guard. A deadly struggle and the survivors fly, leaving fifty wounded comrades in the hands of an enemy to whom mercy was an unknown quality.

There was no need to tell their tale when, panting and exhausted, the survivors reached their companions. Why speak when all knew that what had happened was only the prelude of worse disasters yet to come?

The close of the first day found the army so exhausted that, although the men knew the air of night was thick with peril, they sank to sleep, their only covering the snow. When the cold grey light of morn stole into the sky, the survivors awoke. With eyes averted, for the snow was deeply crimsoned, they rushed away, wondering why the greedy knife had not claimed them as well. Those dreadful nights—the days were bad enough—narrowing paths blocked at the end and bringing the little force to halt whilst death rained down on them from the heights above. Still the light was not withheld, and sometimes they saw their foes.

Digitized by Google

But the nights. A shuddering, cowering soldier half asleep would hear a sigh, a murmured prayer, a stealthy step gliding away in search of other victims, and then one comrade less at dawn.

At the close of the third day the troops staggered into a little mountain valley, looking so peaceful and pure in its garment of white that a hope grew up in their hearts that even foes as merciless as theirs would shrink from marring the beauty of this lovely scene.

Vain illusion. By morning the owners had transformed it into a shambles. This crowning calamity snapped the bonds of discipline. Freed from restraint, the men turned savagely on their officers, and would have played the game of murder, too, had not one exclaimed: "Why stain our hands with blood when their doom is sealed?"

Their ranks now thinned so rapidly that the survivors huddled together, as they staggered along, for warmth and safety. Up the mountain side where the sun shone clear and cold, down into cavernous depths where tribute was exacted, growing ever weaker and weaker till, scorning traps and ambuscades, the mountaineer met and fought them hand-to-hand. Then came a lull, and the few survivors began to hope that their troubles were at an end. Another rush, and this time so fierce that one big Afghan was carried to a little group, in the centre of which were crouching some ladies, wives of the officers and men, with their little ones.

There were no more respites after this. Hopeless as their plight seemed, the bulk of the army, or rather rabble, might have escaped if they had pushed on with as few halts as possible; but General Elphinstone, with the fatal lack of judgment which had characterised his proceedings throughout the campaign, halted at Batkah.

This gave time for Akbar Khan and a stronge force of Afghan horse to overtake the fugitives. The wily chief offered to spare the lives of the retreating force, but declared that hostages must be forthcoming for the surrender of Jellalabad. Major Pottinger, Captain Laurence, and Mackenzie were accordingly surrendered. The march was then resumed; but when they reached the awful pass of Khurd Kabul their remaining stock of hope gave out.

The tribes that lived in this gloomy country knew nothing of what this little force had suffered. Neither did they care. They lived by plunder, and were not averse to murder. The poor ladies, who had borne up with undaunted courage, sank sobbing to the ground as they gazed into the depths of this dread defile. Shorn as our men were of their courage, the little manhood left them kindled into sudden light at the grief of these poor souls.

Six hours of desperate fighting and they were clear again. But the losses; over 3,000 British soldiers perished in this ill-omened spot.

The remnant staggered on, dozing in the snow at night, and creeping along during the day. A little later the treacherous Akbar again appeared, offering to take charge of all the ladies and children who remained alive. Lady Macnaghten, Lady Sale, and nine other ladies agreed to go. It was well they did, for in a narrow gorge next day we lost 200 more.

Of the 15,000 men who had left Kabul, only 500 were now left. When they neared the frontier the little remnant were set upon by the Ghilzees, the fiercest of all the mountain tribes. From this point they had literally to fight their way, every inch being fiercely disputed by their remorseless enemies. One by one they either dropped overcome by exhaustion, or fell victims to the deadly knife. The number of survivors was only two by the time Futtchabad was reached, and of these one then died of hunger.

Out of the entire force of 4,500 men only one man, a Scottish surgeon named Bryden, escaped to Fellalabad. Counting camp followers, it is calculated that 26,000 lives were lost in this retreat.

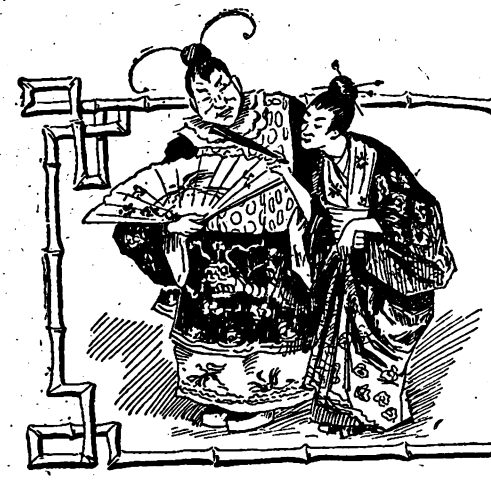
The great heart of the nation stood still when it heard the news, and then silently but steadfastly prepared for vengeance.

[Another thrilling battle story next week.]

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Editor begs to inform his readers that he has been fortunate enough to secure some excellent stories of a special nature, which will appear in due course, and which will do much to enhance the already great popularity of SHORT STORIES. Further particulars regarding these tales will be given next week. Meanwhile the Editor will be pleased if readers will call the attention of any of their friends who enjoy good fiction to this brief announcement.

Digitized by Google



Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XXXV.—HE MAKES SOME AFTER NEW YEAR'S RESOLUTIONS.

ALL was peace and harmony in the house of Bowser. Dinner had been disposed of, and the Bowsers sat reading, and the family cat lay on the hearthrug and slowly opened and shut her eyes and purred in contentment.

By and by Mr. Bowser laid down his paper, heaved a sigh of satisfaction as he looked around and then said:

"Mrs. Bowser, New Year's day has come and gone some weeks ago."

"Yes," she answered.

"In the early part of a year most people look back over the last twelve months and call up their shortcomings and determine to avoid them in the future."

"It is what they call 'swearing off,' isn't it?"

"Yes. It has got so that everybody pokes fun at the man who makes New Year resolves, but nevertheless it is right and proper that one should decide to do this or that to better things. I didn't say anything to you on New Year's day, but yet I had several things in mind."

Mrs. Bowser looked at him and felt a slight chill pass over her. If he had determined on any change of conduct, it would end in a riot in less than two hours.

"No; I didn't say anything on that day," he continued, "but I'm going to say something now. I have firmly and fully made up my mind to do different in certain matters. I shall make my resolves now. Mrs. Bowser, do you know I've got to be an old crank—a silly old crank, with ears a foot long?"

"You are nothing of the kind," she protested. "You get out of sorts now and then, as all husbands do, but that's to be expected. There is nothing you need feel conscience stricken over."

"But there are dozens of things. Yes; I'm an old crank and a bully. About four nights out of seven I come home ready for a row. If nothing else is wrong, I find a shirt button on the floor and use it as an excuse. By gum, but when I think of the rows I have raised over nothing I wonder that you have not stabbed me with a poisoned bodkin as I slept. The fact that you haven't simply proves that you are one of the sweetest and best little women in all the world."

"You have done nothing," she reiterated, "and so there is no need of any new resolves. Was there any late news of the war to-day?"

"I don't know anything about news of the war, but I do know that I'll make a change in myself or hire some jackass to kick me to death. Mrs. Bowser, I've been an old lallaloo."

In his agitation Mr. Bowser got up and began gesturing, and the cat grinned to herself and saw fun ahead.

"What's a lallaloo?" asked Mrs. Bowser.

"I don't know, but it's something very mean. Now, you look at me and hear me as I say from this time forth:

"First.—I'm not going to rage and roar around when I find a clothespin on the doorstep.

"Mrs. Bowser, I've been an old lallaloo!"

"Second.—If the beefsteak is over done and the coffee not up to the mark, I'm going to keep my mouth shut.

"Third.—If you discharge the cook, I'm not going to interfere and make a fool of myself.

"Fourth.—If the gas bill is a shilling extra or the coal is gone eleven minutes too soon, I'm not going to jump up and down and charge you with being the most reckless and extravagant woman ever born.

Digitized by Google

"Fifth.—I shall bring home a cre[illegible]ar to-morrow, and the very first time I get one of my spells on I shall expect you to turn up your sleeves and hit me across the neck.

"Sixth.—I shall invest in no more tramps, lost dogs, spring t[illegible]nics or fire escapes, but behave myself like a sensible being. That's all, and now give your old hubby a kiss and let's be happy."

Mrs. Bowser embraced him and told him he was as good as gold and then used all her power of persuasion to get him to sit down to his cigar and newspaper again. She couldn't accomplish it, however. His conscience and his enthusiasm being aroused, he couldn't keep quiet. He wasn't satisfied with being good, but he wanted to be very, very good.

"How on earth you managed to put up with a husband like me all these years is a mystery," he said, as he walked to and fro, with tears in his eyes.

"There is nothing wrong with you," answered Mrs. Bowser, laying aside her book and rising up.

"There has been, yes, a thousand things wrong with me, but there will not be hereafter. When I have played the crank and the fool, why haven't you hired someone to kick me out of the house."

"I must go upstairs and shut the window," she replied as she moved away.

The idea was that if Mr. Bowser was left alone for a quarter-of-an-hour he would calm down and a row would be avoided, and five minutes had passed, and he was growing calmer, when the kitchen bell rang, and in a minute or two the servant brought him up a bill. It was a bill from the butcher amounting to one and four-pence.

Mr. Bowser jumped clear off the floor as he looked it over, and the next moment he was shouting for Mrs. Bowser.

She came rushing downstairs to find the cat grinning with delight and Mr. Bowser as red as paint, and he waved the bill up and down and demanded:

"Do you see this? I gave you butcher money, and what have you done with it? Spent it for novels and chocolates and run me in debt!"

"You made that bill yourself one day last week when you ordered chops. You had a five pound note and the butcher couldn't change it. Don't you remember?"

"Never! Never! I never ordered chops!"

"But you surely did. It was last Wednesday night, and you said it was New Zealand mutton."

"Woman, here is the incontestable evidence!" hoarsely whispered Mr. Bowser as he thrust the bill under her nose. "I give you money—millions of money—and you squander it and run me in debt! What sort of a wife are you?"

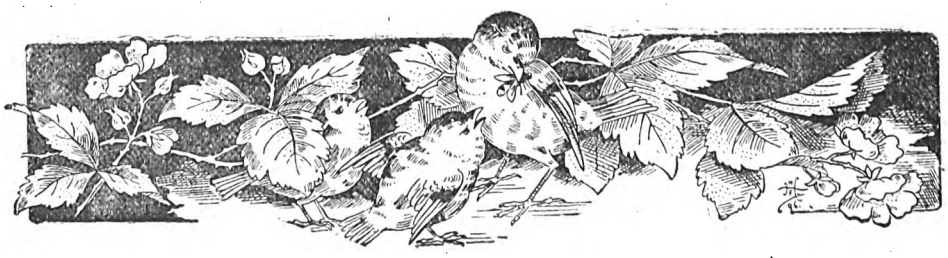
"I thought you had resolved to leave off being a crank," she quietly remarked.

"Crank! Crank!" he shouted as he jumped up and down and flourished the bill in the air. "I was never a crank! I am not a crank now! I give you money to pay cash down. I give——"

"It was a long time before he got up."

The cat stood with her back humped up and a wink in her eye. In his desire to make splinters of something Mr. Bowser rushed at her; but, striking a footstool, he fell over it and came to the floor with a crash and rolled over with his head under the lounge. It was a long time before he got out and sat up. There on the floor lay the guilty butcher bill, and there on the piano stood the innocent cat, gazing down upon him, but Mrs. Bowser had fled and left no tracks behind her.

M. Quad.



Digitized by Google

BETWEEN TWO LOVES.

"WELL, Jack, old boy, you are a regular ass."

Thus spoke Lieutenant Burton to his friend and brother officer, Lieutenant Edwards.

"Here is one of England's fairest daughters head over ears in love with you. She is good-looking, affectionate, domesticated, and has means—just like the matrimonial adverts. isn't it?—and her father is the C.O. Now, if you had your own interests at heart, you would go in and win, and become the possessor of a lovely wife and greatly enhanced prospects."

"How you rattle on, Tom. If the lady is all you say, which I don't deny, why don't you go in and win yourself?"

"For the simple reason, my boy, that it would be utterly useless. Miss Arnthwaite keeps us all at arm's length, but when you condescend to honour the dances by your presence, her face lights up immediately."

"Don't be absurd, Tom."

"Ditto, my friend. Just because three years ago, a girl, who was not worth a second thought, jilted you for a wealthier suitor, are you going to mope your life away?"

"You know my sentiments, Tom."

"Sentiments be bothered."

"Will you be serious a moment? I don't mind admitting to you that I admire Miss Arnthwaite, but for the reasons I have given you on several previous occasions I shall never get beyond that point."

"What rot," was Lieutenant Burton's reply.

"All right, Tom. We have gone over all this before with the same result. Now suppose we adjourn to our respective couches."

Lieutenant Burton took the hint and departed to his quarters. As he walked along he communed with himself and while anathematizing his friend's obstinacy, he admired his feelings.

The two young officers had been schoolboys together, they had entered the army together and had been modern examples of David and Jonathan.

Three years before my story opens, something had happened which threatened to have a lasting effect upon Jack Edwards.

He had been engaged to the daughter of the vicar down at his home, Dora Armstrong, but suddenly a blow fell upon him.

He had met his sweetheart one evening, and with very little warning she told him that their engagement must become a thing of the past.

Not because she did not love him, said the fickle Dora. It was the old story. The vicar had only a small stipend and a large family.

The gentleman whom she proposed to install in Jack's place was wealthy and influential, and she was going to sacrifice herself for the sake of her father and the family.

She bemoaned the fate which demanded the sacrifice and managed to squeeze a tear or two to add effect to her protestations of affection and regret.

Jack pleaded for a while and then bowed to the inevitable.

It was a great relief to him when his regiment was ordered abroad—to India.

His chum, Tom Burton, of course, accompanied him thither, but before they sailed, the eyes of the discarded lover were opened.

It was the day before their departure. The two friends were seated in their room at the hotel were they had been staying, when a card was brought in by a waiter and the man who had supplanted Jack requested an interview with him.

Greatly wondering what this could mean, Jack told the waiter to show the gentlemen in and Tom he took himself to the smoke-room. The visitor entered.

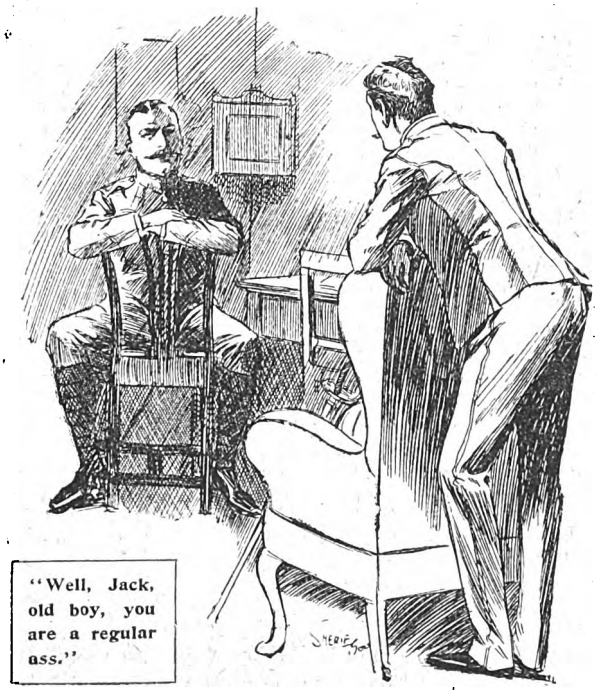
"Lieutenant Edwards, I believe."

Jack assented.

Without waiting for a reply, the visitor went on: "I must apologise for intruding upon you, Mr. Edwards. I am afraid your feelings towards me are not of the friendliest, but I can assure you that any wrong I have done you I have done unwittingly."

"I am afraid I don't follow you," interposed Jack.

"Permit me to explain. I did not know of Miss Armstrong's prior engagement until a few days ago. Had I known of it earlier I should never have made my proposal for her hand, and immediately I learned of it I withdrew. Of course, as you know, your engagement had never been made public, and it was only by accident that I became aware of it. Miss Armstrong has treated us both badly, for she has not been straightforward in her dealings with me either, and she is now free. But, if you will permit a stranger to advise you, you will think no more of her. I could not let you leave England, however, without setting myself right in your eyes. Now I am contented."



"Well, Jack, old boy, you are a regular ass."

Digitized by Google

"You have acted most honourably, sir," replied the agitated officer, "but I am not quite sure that I can express any degree of gratitude at present. The information you give is very painful to me, as you will readily understand."

After his visitor's departure, Jack Edwards and his chum discussed the subject together.

Lieutenant Burton was very indignant and spoke very strongly, but when he had finished, Jack replied:

"Dora may be all that you have said, Tom, and yet because she is Dora, I still love her and am perfectly willing to marry her if she will have me."

Tom could do nothing but indulge in a wide eyed stare and a prolonged whistle when he heard this.

"I mean it Tom," went on Edwards.

"Do you? Then you are absolutely and hopelessly mad, that's all I have to say."

"All right, Tom, wait until your turn to fall in love comes."

"Long may it be delayed then, if there is any probability of it affecting me in the same way."

Lieutenant Edwards, in pursuance of his declared resolution, wrote to Dora Armstrong at the first opportunity.

He waited patiently for some time and then the reply came.

It was a refusal. Dora for some reason imagined he had had something to do with the eye-opening of his wealthy successor, and on these grounds expressed anything but regard for her former lover.

"That settles it," remarked Lieutenant Edwards when the received this missive.

"Does that effect your cure?" inquired Tom when the information was communicated to him.

"It cures me so far as this," replied Jack. "It practically condemns me to a bachelor's life, for while Dora Armstrong lives, I shall never marry."

"Why on earth not?" queried Tom.

"For this reason. Although, I have been most shabbily treated by Dora I still love her, and that being so, I could not in honour ask another woman to become my wife."

Time after time had the two friends been over this ground.

It was as Tom Burton said.

The pretty daughter of the Colonel reserved her sweetest smiles for the man who had banished himself from the land of domestic bliss.

Vainly had Tom tried to shake his friend's resolution. Up to the time our story opens he had failed to move him.

As he strolled home after that last conversation Tom Burton, good friend and chum that he was, meditated deeply on the subject.

"It's enough to make one wish the girl would die," muttered he. "If she would only oblige us by shuffling off this mortal coil, then perhaps my Quixotic friend would have eyes and heart for someone else."

Then another thought occurred to Lieutenant Burton. He wondered if it were possible to get a fictitious announcement inserted in the death list of one of the English papers. If this were done, possibly it would effect the object, but after reflecting thereon for a time he dismissed the idea as impracticable and too risky.

Three uneventful months passed and the subject was not again mentioned. Lieutenant Burton was taking it easy in his quarters. The mail had come in that day, and he had slung himself into a hammock to enjoy his letters and read the papers which had been sent out to him.

He got through the news and then turned his attention to the advertisements. Suddenly he bounded out of his hammock, and regardless of the dangers of sunstroke or heat apoplexy, he raced bareheaded across the square to his chum's quarters.

Just as he got to the door he stopped, thought a moment and then put the paper under his tunic. Having done this he walked into Lieutenant Edward's room.

"Any news from home, Jack?" he asked.

"Two letters—one from the mater and another from an old chum."

"Any mention of Miss Armstrong in them?"

"No! Why do you ask? You look rather excited."

"Do I? Well I suppose I am."

The visitor entered. "Lieutenant Edwards, I believe."

"What has happened, man? Who has she married?"

"She is not married, Jack, she is dead."

"Dead? Dora dead?" queried Jack. "How did you learn this?"

For answer Lieutenant Burton drew out the paper and pointed out the paragraph. Yes, there it was plainly enough.

> Armstrong—on the 7th. inst., at the Grange, Lydenham, Dora, only daughter of F. Armstrong, Esq. Friends will kindly accept this, the only intimation.

Jack Edwards read it through slowly and then re-read it.

"Poor Dora," he muttered, and as his chum, Burton, gazed upon him he realised how devotedly Jack Edwards must have once loved this girl who had died so prematurely.

Digitized by Google

When he remembered how he had almost wished for her death he felt a pang of remorse, and yet he could not entirely repress the thought that it was better so.

Very little was said on that occasion. Tom Burton left his chum busy with his reflections, but nevertheless he resolved to do his best to bring about the result he had so long had in his mind.

As time rolled on, the depression which had followed the news of Dora's death, wore off and Jack Edwards began to drift more and more into the scenes of gaiety, wherewith the officers and men stationed at the fort enlivened their period of service there.

While his late sweetheart lived he would most religiously have adhered to his oft expressed resolution, but with Dora dead he felt himself free to avail himself of the chance of happiness which presented itself to him.

Six months after he had seen that newspaper notice he sought Evelyn Arnthwaite's hand in marriage. Once, and once only, had he given expression to any doubt on the subject of Dora Armstrong's death. He and his chum were chatting together when he suddenly broached the subject.

"Tom," he said, "it's very strange my people have never mentioned Dora's death in their letters."

"Nothing strange about it, to my mind, old boy. It only shows their tact. They were afraid of stirring painful memories, and considered it best not to mention it, and if I were in your place I should say nothing of it to them. Let the dead past remain buried."

The subject was never mentioned again.

Jack was a promising young officer, and though he was not overburdened with wealth, he had quite enough of world's goods to enable him to support a wife.

Hence, when he approached his colonel as a suppliant for Evelyn's hand, that gentleman, who was not in the least a mercenary man, gave a ready consent. In a very short time Jack Edwards and Evelyn Arnthwaite were united, the reason of the short engagement being that the Colonel was retiring from the service and was going home to England.

Shortly after the wedding, at which Tom Burton most joyously assisted in the capacity of best man, the Colonel and his wife sailed for home, and Jack settled down to the enjoyment of his long deferred domestic bliss.

Evelyn was devoted to her husband, and he in turn displayed a great amount of affection for his wife, but all too soon their dream of bliss ended, and this was how it happened.

The new C.O. was expected and the officers of the station had assembled to meet him. The carriage containing the new chief and his wife came round a bend in the hills.

Jack Edwards and Tom Barton were of course among the group waiting to give them a hearty reception.

As the carriage came into view Jack focussed his glasses on the occupants. For a moment he gazed and then an exclamation startled Lieutenant Burton. Turning, he looked at his friend. He was white and agitated.

"What's the matter, Jack? You look as though you had seen a ghost."

"It is not a ghost, but a horrible reality," replied Jack hoarsely. "Dora Armstrong is in that carriage with the Colonel and his wife."

"What! you must be dreaming," said Burton.

"Would to God I were," he answered.

Lieutenant Burton seized the glasses and gazed intently at the rapidly approaching vehicle.

"Great Scott," he muttered. "What does it mean?"

Then he turned swiftly on Jack.

"Look here, old boy, forgive my seeming impertinence, but don't forget you are now the husband of another and a better woman, and for Heaven's sake pull yourself together."

Jack made an effort, and by the time the carriage arrived he had regained somewhat of his composure.

One by one the officers were introduced to their new chief, his wife and his wife's companion, for it was in this latter capacity Dora Armstrong had arrived in

Digitized by Google

India, Jack was one of the last as he purposely delayed the meeting as long as possible.

He greatly rejoiced that a passing indisposition had kept his wife from this scene. He shook hands with the Colonel, was introduced to the Colonel's wife, and was just bracing himself for the ordeal of his meeting with Dora Armstrong, when that lady sprang forward:

"Why it's Jack—I mean Lieutenant Edwards!"

"What! have you two met before?" interposed the Colonel.

"We were acquainted in England, sir," replied Jack.

"Then I will leave you to escort Miss Armstrong to her new abode," said the C. O., and so saying he turned away, followed by his staff.

"You seem surprised to see me," remarked Dora.

"I—I thought you were dead," stammered Jack.

"Are you sure the wish was not father to the thought?"

"Perfectly sure. But I saw the announcement in the papers."

Dora laughed, and the laugh jarred upon Jack.

"That was my cousin."

"But the notice said: 'Dora Armstrong, only daughter of F. Armstrong Esq.' and the death took place at your home."

"Yes, my cousin, whose full name was Dorothy, was on a visit to us when she caught a chill and died."

"But how about the F. Armstrong and the only daughter? Was that a mistake?"

"No it was perfectly correct. Dorothy was the only daughter of Uncle Fred, and Frank is my father's name. Hence the similarity in the initals."

"It was a very unfortunate mistake."

"What! do you mean to say you wish the notice had referred to me?"

"No, I don't mean that. But let us change the subject."

"Very well. Tell me something of yourself."

"Well first of all, I suppose you have heard of my marriage?"

"You married?" ejaculated Dora. "Where is your wife?"

"She was unable to come with me to-day, owing to a slight indisposition."

"You must take me and give me an introduction."

Jack hesitated before replying. After a moment's thought he spoke.

"Let us be perfectly plain with each other, Miss Armstrong. In view of the past I would rather not. You will of course meet at some of the social functions of the station and I would prefer that the introduction came about in that way, and through some one else."

"Very well," replied Miss Armstrong coldly.

By this time they had reached her new home, and having thus done his duty, Jack excused himself and withdrew, a prey to conflicting emotions.

"Dora Armstrong alive and here," he soliloquised. "Why has Fate played this strange trick upon me?"

The fact of the matter was Jack Edwards realised that the old feeling was not dead, that the sight of Dora Armstrong's face had fanned into flame all the old love, and here he was married to another woman. In his perplexity he sought out his chum, Lieutenant Burton, listened gravely to his friends anxious remarks.

"It is truly a distressing position. You must not get too friendly with Dora Armstrong. On the other hand, if you cause her to hate you, I am afraid she will prove mischievous. You remember the poet's remark, 'Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned!'"

As he entered Dora flashed him a look of defiance.

Lieutenant Edwards groaned aloud.

"Come, old boy, cheer up. You must face the position like a man. You must crush down these feelings. There must be no disloyalty to your wife."

Edwards rose and went off to his own quarters.

As soon as he entered his wife noticed his agitated look.

"What is the matter, Jack?"

"I am not very well, dear. I think I shall go and lie down."

At that moment he could not talk to his wife.

Accordingly he withdrew to his own room and flung himself on the bed, but not to sleep, only to think.

His reveries were disturbed by the sound of voices in the outer room. Evidently there were visitors. A voice, which he knew too well broke upon his ear.

"Mrs. Edwards, I presume."

"Yes!" replied his wife, with a note of pride in her voice.

"I felt I must come and see you. Jack—I mean your husband and I were such great friends at home."

Jack shivered with apprehension. His wife knew nothing of her husband's earlier attachment.

He arose and joined the ladies. As he entered Dora flashed him a look of defiance.

"You see I have soon found you out," she said.

"Miss Armstrong informs me that you are old friends," interposed Evelyn.

"We were friends," replied Jack.

"Were friends?" said Dora.

"Yes! were, but that is past and I am surprised you should force yourself upon me here after what I said to you earlier in the day."

Dora flushed with anger. She had come out, thinking to re-establish her sway over her old sweetheart. The news of his marriage had somewhat disconcerted and piqued her, although she had rejected him. After these words there was nothing more to be said. Her position there, was very embarrassing. Accordingly she withdrew, but as she did so, she fired a final shot:

Digitized by Google

"I am afraid residence in India has not improved your husband, Mrs. Edwards," she said as she turned to go. Neither husband nor wife replied, and she departed.

"Who is that woman, Jack?" asked Evelyn, when she had gone.

"We knew each other years ago, but she behaved so badly that it ended. To tell the truth we were once sweethearts, but now we are nothing to each other. In fact, until to-day I thought she was dead. Now, dear, let us say no more about her."

Thus the matter dropped.

Days and weeks passed by, Lieutenant Edwards and Dora Armstrong met each other occasionally, but there was no sign of further trouble and the officer's mind became easier again.

At last the blow fell.

Jack had been away for several days on an expedition. When he returned it was to find his wife absent, and a note was handed to him by his servant. It was brief, very brief.

"The enclosed will speak for itself," it said. "By the time you return I shall have reached the coast and have taken my passage home."

Jack reeled, and then feverishly read the enclosure. It was the note he had written after hearing of the break with the other man. By a fatal chance that note had been headed with nothing but the date. No address, no year was given, and the scorned woman had used it most unscrupulously.

"Dear Dora," it ran, "though I feel deeply hurt by your conduct, yet I still love you. Even though another has intervened, still there is no reason why we should not again be happy in each other's love. Until I know your feeling on the matter I will say no more, but it only needs a word from you to restore our old relations, Yours ever, Jack."

This was dated April 8th. It had been written three years before. The letter had evidently been most carefully preserved. It was now April 12th, but three years later. What a fiend the woman was. Truly "Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned."

Jack dashed out of his quarters, and heedless of military etiquette he rushed into the Colonel's residence and demanded to be confronted with Miss Armstrong. The Colonel gazed in astonishment at the angry Lieutenant, but on hearing his explanation his face grew very grave.

"Miss Armstrong is dead," he answered. "She died two days ago from the effects of poison, self-administered. She had left a note for you, which I kept, as we were informed your wife had gone away for a few days to the coast. He brought the note. Jack seized it and feverishly tore it open. Its contents were the ravings of a maddened brain.

DEAR JACK,

After you wrote I found out how much I loved you, but it was also after my refusal. I came out here hoping to find you and again win your affection, but when you insulted me before your wife my love turned to hate and I determined to be revenged and then to die. Fate has given me the chance and I have taken it. Your wife believes you faithless and has left you. Now you will know what I felt when you scorned me.

DORA.

This time Jack acted promptly. The Colonel granted him the necessary leave at once and he immediately set off for the coast. There he ascertained that his wife had not sailed for England. In fact she was lying dangerously ill with brain fever at an hotel. Jack was shown into her room and as he saw her altered appearance he flung himself down by the bedside in agony. Now, his wife occupied his whole heart and he fervently prayed that she might not be lost to him. For several days her life hung in the balance. Then consciousness returned, but with the first returning gleams, the doctor insisted upon Jack retiring until he had prepared his patient for the interview. The next meeting between husband and wife was a touching one. Forgiveness was mutually asked and given, and when Evelyn had fully regained her strength, they returned to the station, where they received an ovation.

Lieutenant Burton was the first to greet them. Clasping his chum's hand, he said with deep fervour: "Thank God, the plot failed!"

Jack looked more than he could say, and thenceforward the current of his life ran smoothly.

JOHN HENRY PEAT.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES THAT MAKE YOU LAUGH.

The Prize of One Guinea for the best Storyette has been won this week by Mr. F. W. FINCH, of 236 Leicester Causeway, Coventry.

Quite Simple.

PATRICK is a big policeman whose good humour and promptness in emergencies have endeared him to the people in the district over which he is a guardian angel.

One day he noticed that a street workman was leaving an unsightly pile of gravel at the side of the road.

"Come, now, you can't leave that heap there," said Patrick sternly.

"Well, I've no place to put it," said the workman.

"You can't leave it there," persisted Patrick.

"What'll I do with it, then?" asked the workman, sullenly.

"Do with it!" echoed Patrick. "Dig a hole in the road, to be sure, man, and bury it!" F. W. F.

At a Classical Concert.

ONE item was a septet, the general idea of which, to my untrained ears, seemed to be that the seven instruments were engaged on the contract of levelling a musical scrap heap. The foreman on the job had evidentally been called away, consequently the instruments had it all their own way. For a few minutes they would go shovelling away at the heap in a promiscuous go-as-you-please style.

Then the clarionet and the fiddle would challenge each other as to which could load his barrow first, and the crochets and semi-quavers fairly flew, while the rest of the instruments stood round, and the flute saw fair play. Bye-and-by, when the fiddle seemed to be having the worst of it, you could hear the 'cello spit on his hands, so to speak, and go in to help it, while the clarionet accidentally dropped a shovelful of accidentals on to the toes of the double bass, which caused it to growl and swear in a way that ought not to be allowed.

Thus the work went on. At first it was interesting, but soon it became wearisome. At the end of twenty minutes, by which time the septet didn't seem to have worked any particular diminution on the scrap heap, I went outside to smoke until they had completed the job and swept up, and I forgot to return. G. E. G.

Thick-Skinned.

A DEESIDE laird was out shooting one day, accompanied by his gamekeeper. Excelling as a litterateur, the laird was a desperately poor shot, but his gamekeeper was an adept at framing excuses for his master's misses. Having fired a considerable number of shots to no purpose, a rabbit bounded out of a bush a few feet from where the laird was standing.

"Noo, sir, tak' time, and let her have it," said the gamekeeper.

Bang, bang. Two shots rang out, but still the rabbit maintained its onward course, and was soon out of sight.

"Confound it all," muttered the laird.

"Weel, sir," was the keeper's reply, "that brute must have had a deevilish thick hide." C. F.

Irish Again.

MRS. O'GRADY: "Good evening, Mrs. M'Ginnes, how is your husband to-day?"

Mrs. M'Ginnes: "Sure, and he's but poorly, thank goodness, and—oh, be jabers, there's the clock strikin', and I must go and wake him to give him his slapin' draught." E. L.

Smart Reply.

A SHORT time ago a boy fresh from school started work at a factory. Being late three successive mornings, he was discharged. The following morning the foreman was greatly surprised to find the boy at work, and going to him said: "I thought I told you not to come back."

"Yes," replied the boy, "and don't you do it again. I got a jolly good hiding when I told father."

E. R.

Rather Nasty.

A MAN who does not mind a joke at his own expense says he went into a chemist's recently, and asked for some morphine. The assistant objected to giving it without a prescription.

"Do I look like a man who would kill himself?" the customer asked.

"I don't know, I'm sure," said the assistant, "but if I looked like you I should be tempted."

C. R. F.

A True Bill.

"IF you were a—a jury, Clara," said the embarrassed young lawyer, hesitatingly, "I could plead my cause with more self-possession. In the courts of—er—of love I don't think I can claim to be a first class advocate."

"Perhaps you have not had an extensive practice in such courts, William," suggested the maiden, softly.

"That's it, exactly, Clara," eagerly rejoined the young man, moving his chair a little nearer. "I'm a new hand at this business. But if I could feel sure the jury——"

"Yes."

"Wasn't prejudiced against the advocate——"

"Yes."

"Why, then, I might——"

"What kind of a jury do you consider me, William?" she asked with eyes downcast.

"A—h'm—common jury, of course. You couldn't be a grand jury, you know, darl——"

"Why not?"

"Because I don't plead before grand juries."

"I think, William," said the young girl, blushing, "I would rather for this occasion be considered a grand jury."

"Why?"

"Because," and she hid her face somewhere in the vicinity of his coat-collar, "I have found a 'true Bill!'" J. J. McC.

Digitized by Google

A VICTIM OF VERBOSITY.

Too well I know the awful truth. For weeks I have been an object of commiseration to my friends, and the burden of my life has well-nigh pressed down my sinking frame. Reason is tottering on her throne, but ere she is finally and possibly for ever unseated and I descend into the black and awful darkness of drivelling idiocy, or maybe, raving insanity, let me endeavour to state for the benefit of my contemporaries and successors, the circumstances which have reduced me to this deplorable condition.

Until a comparatively short time ago I could as fairly and confidently claim to be "clothed and in my right mind," as any man, and would have defied each and every member of the Lunacy Board, individually and collectively to have found the slightest trace of a disturbance of my mental equilibrium. Now, alas! I have been weighed in the balances and found wanting, and if, when my beclouded life has reached its termination there should be any among my legatees who may consider themselves aggrieved by the smallness of the portion of this world's goods, which my last will and testament directs shall be apportioned unto them, I can with confidence look forward to the Courts being called upon to decide whether the testator—my unfortunate self—was in a condition, when that document was drafted, to properly dispose of the property therein named.

Having thus, in the foregoing preamble, endeavoured to state with all lucidity of expression remaining at my command, my present condition, I will now proceed to explain the reason of the catastrophe which has come upon me with overwhelming force.

But if the succeeding narrative should be marred by vagueness of term and mediocrity of expression, I beg that my readers will make every allowance which a sympathetic nature would prompt in view of the circumstances under which the recital of my misfortunes is penned, and that, even though the narrative may come under their condemnation, they will yet spare a pitying thought and a kindly word for the victim who in sending out this narrative to the world writes "Finis" to his labours and whose only wish is to thenceforward sink into oblivion and forgetfulness.

Now to my story.

I am as yet only in the heyday of my youth and had looked forward to a happy and possibly prosperous career, ending in a ripe old age amongst my friends. It is not necessary for the purposes of this story that I should weary my readers with the details of my life in its earlier periods. These were commonplace and uneventful and can therefore be at once dismissed. I had ambitions in a certain direction.

I was desirous of achieving fame and possibly fortune in the world of literature and with this end in view I commenced work upon a book, which I fondly hoped would at least lay the foundation of my future reputation. I gave much anxious thought and care to this work.

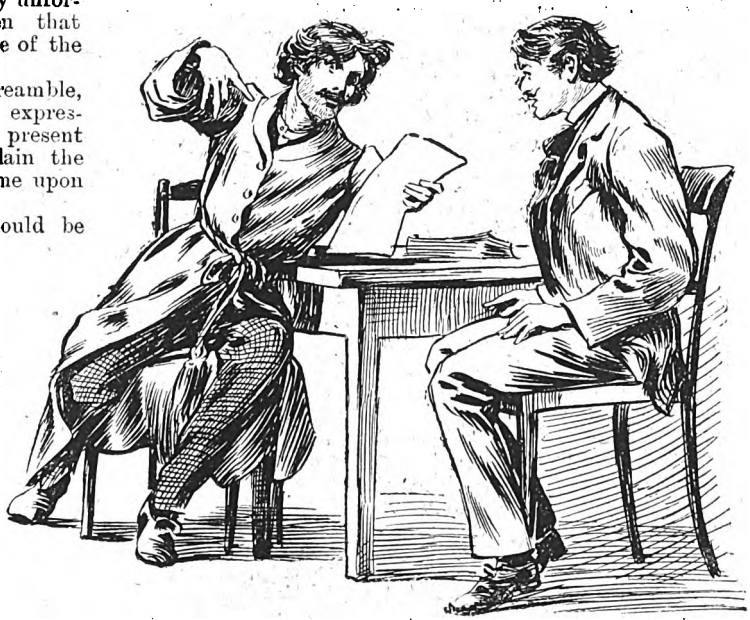
Page after page I wrote, chapter after chapter was concluded.

Early and late I racked my brain in order to clothe my characters in suitable dress.

Many and many were the pages of manuscript which I penned only to destroy. At times I despaired of even being able to bring my labours to a satisfactory conclusion, but I stuck doggedly to my purpose, until at last the arduous task was completed and I looked with pride upon the finished creation of my brain.

At this juncture a friend—I still call him such, for I am loath to believe that it was with malice prepense that he acted—introduced me to an individual whom he described as a brother litterateur, thus pandering to my vanity.

Though my work had not as yet received the seal of approbation from the stern critics who sit in the seat of the literary judgement hall, though my manuscript had not even been submitted to a single publisher, I had unbound confidence in the merits of my production and its ultimate success. Consequently it was only natural that before I had been long in the company of this individual that I should modestly hint that I had written a story, and that I should esteem myself very highly favoured if my more experienced brother would do me the honour of reading and criticising my production.



"What you require is diction, my young friend, diction!"

Here, in a nutshell, lies the story of my undoing. If requested criticism, if he had even hurt my pride by hinting that he could not afford to waste his time over the crude effusions of inexperienced literary aspirants, the story of my life would not have contained the gloomy pages which I now inscribe. But, unfortunately, when my request was preferred Mr. Ellison most graciously—at least, so it then appeared to me—expressed his willingness to give me the benefit of his matured experience, and from that moment I felt that the success of my story was a foregone conclusion.

Digitized by Google

Though the incident may appear to the average reader somewhat commonplace, I cannot refrain from retailing it as showing what manner of man the Fates had brought me in contact with. As is well know it is a thoroughly English custom when men meet for the first time, and indulge in a few minutes' conversation, for them to further cement the acquaintance by an adjournment to some neighbouring hostelry. In due observance of this time-honoured custom I made the usual suggestion.

"Will you come and have a drink?" said I.

Mr. Ellison's reply was, as I subsequently ascertained to my cost, characteristic of the man.

"My young friend," he replied, "although I am an individual who is singularly, if not conspicuously abstemious in the matter of alcoholic refreshment, and have an extreme abhorrence of the undue indulgence of the bibulous inclinations, yet I am distinctly of opinion that the present meeting is of a sufficiently auspicious nature as to justify me in quaffing a goblet of the inebriating fluid. Therefore, it is with extreme pleasure that I shall accept the invitation so genially extended to me, and shall now propose an adjournment to the Bacchanalian resort, where we will drink to your ultimate and enduring success, coupling with it the hope that when you have climbed the giddy heights and stand on the topmost pinnacle of the temple of Fame, you will not be overcome by the altitude to which you have attained."

This lengthy speech in response to a simple invitation appealed strongly to my sense of the ridiculous, and I had some difficulty in controlling my risible faculties, but as I had no wish to offend my new acquaintance I repressed my merriment.

The following day, by arrangement with the gentleman who had thus become my literary adviser, I took my precious manuscript round to his residence and was desired by him to call upon him a week later. Ere I left his abode he put several questions to me.

"Before I enter upon the perusal of your maiden effort, my young friend," he said, "let me ask you whether you really desire a fair and honest criticism irrespective of what the result may be."

"Most certainly I do," I replied.

"Very well. I can assure you I shall be neither hypercritical nor censorious. If your work merits condemnation I shall make my pronouncement as unhesitatingly and plainly as I should were it the reverse, though it would give me infinitely more pleasure to eulogise than to condemn. In either case, however, it will be in your own interests that I should speak."

I warmly thanked Mr. Ellison and withdrew with a greatly enhanced admiration for him. Seven days later I called with some trepidation to hear sentence pronounced.

When I was shown into my friend's study I found him seated with my manuscript in front of him.

"You will observe that I am in readiness for your visit, my young friend," he remarked, "I am rejoiced to find that you have apparently inculcated the virtue of punctuality. My pet aversion is the person who in failing to keep his engagement at the time appointed, thereby encroaches on my time, and thus, as time is money, deprives me of a certain proportion of the currency of the realm. Now to the consideration of your work."

I set to work to remodel it.

"What is your decision concerning it?" I asked eagerly.

"Steady, my young friend, steady. We must proceed to the consideration of this subject with patience and deliberation."

Curbing my impatience as well as I could I waited for the verdict, in the meantime endeavouring to gain some idea as to whether the criticism I was about to receive was adverse or favourable, from Mr. Ellison's face, but his countenance was as impassive and inscrutable as a sphinx. At last the oracle spoke:

"After carefully and conscientiously perusing the work which you submitted to me I have come to the conclusion that you are endowed with considerable literary ability."

A gratified smile overspread my face, which, unlike my mentor's countenance, was very much of an open book, which he easily read, as his following remarks indicated.

"I am glad that I am able, in communicating my decision, to preface the detailed criticism with a general expression which is of such a nature as to give you some pleasure, as it will subsequently be my duty—you will observe I use the word duty, for I am conscientiously directed in these matters—to say certain things which may give you pain, though I trust you will treat my words as you would the surgeon's knife which inflicts a momentary punishment in order to remove the danger of serious complications and possibly a fatal termination."

Digitized by Google

"I am quite sure I shall take your criticism in the spirit in which it is given," I replied.

"Well spoken, my young friend," he exclaimed. "Had I discovered in you any indication of resentment prompted by wounded vanity my interest in you would have evaporated, and I should, without any compunction, have abandoned you to your flounderings in the whirlpool of folly, even though it might result in your eventually being engulfed in the vortex of an overweening confidence and unreasoning vanity."

I began to wonder when the real business upon which we were met would be reached, for to tell the truth, my patience was getting exhausted and my friend's long speeches were beginning to weary me. At last to my intense relief he approached the subject.

"In the first place, I can heartily congratulate you on the conception of your plot. It is most daringly and ingeniously contrived and is highly creditable to your inventive genius. It bristles with originality which is, of course, highly commendable. The grouping of your characters is also good. Thus far, I have only referred to the qualities which would recommend your work. Now I come to the defects. Though your plot and the grouping of your characters, are, as I have said, good, yet there is one point which would effectually damn your story in the eyes of the public, were it permitted to get into circulation in its present form. I am afraid it will be necessary to entirely rewrite the book before you can with any degree of confidence submit it to any publisher. What you require is diction, my young friend, diction," and as he spoke he brought his hand down on his desk heavily as though to emphasise his remark.

"Your language is at present commonplace. Your dialogue is lacking in pungency. You must make it more piquant and pleasing. You must crystallise your ideas and stamp your characters with individuality, but above all you must express yourself forcibly. I repeat, what you require is diction. For instance take this paragraph," and as he spoke he turned over the leaves of the manuscript. "Now, listen while I read it to you and then I will read you a paraphrase of that paragraph. Here is your wording," and he commenced to read.

"Ella Godfrey was the first to descend to the breakfast room and she passed the time of waiting for the other members of the family in watching the falling snow, which, during the night, had effected a transformation. As yet the snow was untrodden and Ella thought how beautiful it looked and sighed almost regretfully at the idea of its being converted into dirt and slush. 'How like the lives of many of our unfortunate fellow creatures,' she soliloquised. She was prevented from moralising further by the entry of the other members of the family, and in a few minutes the clatter of crockery and the jingle of the other table requisites showed that breakfast was being discussed.

"Now my object in selecting this particular paragraph is because it is one of the simplest and least important in the book. In fact it could be eliminated without detracting from the narrative. But this same paragraph well handled can be made the basis of a splendid moral lesson and become forcible and brilliant. I have rewritten it on a separate sheet. Here it is.

"On the following morning the first to break the spell of somnolence was Ella Godfrey. With celerity and dexterity she completed her preparations and descended to the breakfast room to await the arrival of those who were still wooing the drowsy god. During the time the thick mantle of darkness had enshrouded the earth, its face had undergone a complete transformation and Ella looked forth upon a pure white, gleaming and glistening expanse of country. The feathery crystals were still descending, and as yet they had not been despoiled of their pristine purity by the foot of man. As the fair girl's gaze rested upon the scene, and she meditated on its probable appearance in the course of but a few fleeting hours she started a train of thought. 'How like the lives of many of our fellow mortals,' she mused. 'Now the fleecy covering presents a most attractive appearance and I can find myself in entire sympathy with the writer from whose pen we received that simple, yet grand poem commencing, "Snow, snow, beautiful snow," but ere long the attractiveness and the purity will have departed, leaving only a mire, repulsive in its aspect. Thus many a wrecked life, many a degraded soul, many a sunken wretch, has once possessed the attributes which go to make up the pure, noble and dignified image of the great

I was fairly staggered by this pronouncement.

Creator, but by contact with the impure, the ignoble and the debased, has lost all that life made attractive and beautiful.' Ella's reveries were disturbed at this point by the entry of the less energetic members of the family circle, and ere long the delayed meal was in progress."

Digitized by Google

There is no need to weary my readers with further details. Suffice it to say that my manuscript was literally torn to shreds in this fashion. I took it home again and immediately set to work to remodel it in accordance with the suggestions of my friend.

It was a herculean task and involved much anxious thought and much weariness of mind, but at last it was completed.

There was no opportunity of again submitting it for criticism to Mr. Ellison, as he was abroad, so I despatched it to a publishing firm.

During the period of waiting—and it was a fairly long one—I endeavoured to cultivate the style of expression which characterised the rewritten manuscript, with the object of improving my diction.

The simplicity which had previously characterised my conversation and writing gradually vanished to such extremes did I go, that I sincerely believe that during that period no friend ever received a written communication from me without having to apply to his dictionary for assistance in arriving at my meaning.

In ordinary converse I plumed myself upon the fact—for such I supposed it to be—that I was in a fair way for establishing a reputation as a brilliant conversationalist.

I have subsequently learned that I was looked upon by my long-suffering friends as a most intolerable bore, who was endeavouring to establish a record in the use of unnecessarily lengthy words.

* * * * *

At last the verdict of the publishers was pronounced upon my work. It came in the form of a letter with which my manuscript was enclosed. I think I cannot do better than give the letter in full. It was as follows:

> Dear Sir,—We have read your story, which bears marks of decided literary talent. Your plot is an excellent one and you have shown some discrimination in the selection of your characters, but we cannot accept it in its present form. We do not wish to hurt your feelings, but rather to assist you, if possible, as we are of opinion that you can do much better than this. Were you to re-write your story in plain, simple language, instead of employing the grandiloquent expressions and exaggerated phraseology, which now make it appear stilted and unnatural, we are of opinion that it would have a fair chance of success. If you care to adopt our suggestion and again send it on to us, we shall be pleased to give it further consideration— Yours faithfully,
>
> Watkins, Mills and Hampson.

I was fairly staggered by this pronouncement, but as I was naturally anxious to get my work published, I at once decided that if Messrs Watkins, Mills and Hampson preferred the simple style, I would proceed with the revision with the utmost despatch. Accordingly I began, but it was all of no use. Like King Charles's head in Mr. Dick's narrative the exaggerated phrase would creep in.

For weeks I endeavoured to revert to the former style, but it was all of no avail, until now my friends say my condition is so serious that it is absolutely necessary that I should be taken where I can have perfect rest and quiet.

I understand them perfectly.

The light of reason is not finally extinguished and I know, from hints which they have let drop, that they contemplate placing me in a private asylum in order that I may have the benefit of a celebrated brain specialist's treatment.

* * * * *

Poor Charlie! we parted with him yesterday, and it now devolves upon me, as his most intimate chum, to complete the narrative he began. We had all been greatly interested in the book which he was writing and looked forward to its ultimate publication.

All went well up to a certain point and I thoroughly believe that had it not been for what turned out to be a most disastrous meeting, his book would have been a success.

Just when he had completed it he was introduced to another literary man, whom, I am grateful to be able to say I have never met, and whom I hope I never shall meet. This man was evidently cursed with—if I may use the expression—a strong weakness.

I have since heard it said of him that he could and did use more words of six syllables than any other man breathing.

Upon that I am, of course, unable to speak with any degree of definiteness, but I do know that poor Charlie's trouble dates almost from the time he made Mr. Ellison's acquaintance. It was after an interview with this man Ellison, that he came home and commenced to re-write his manuscript in language which was perfectly absurd in its verbosity, and those of us who were permitted to see it from time to time were unanimously of opinion that it was foredoomed to failure, and subsequent events only proved too truly the correctness of our prognostications.

When we attempted to remonstrate with him on the subject he simply informed us that our ignorance of the requirements of modern fiction alone excused our interference.

"It's diction, Fred, my boy, diction that provides the element of success in present day literature," he once said to me.

And diction was his undoing. From being one of the most entertaining of men he became a most intolerable bore and a laughing stock to his friends because of the extravagance of his speech, which he would inflict upon us in his endeavours to extend his vocabulary.

As we all anticipated, his work was rejected. This was a heavy blow to him, and in his endeavours to correct it he worked so feverishly and made such enormous demands upon his reserve of strength and his mental faculties that eventually his brain gave way and it became necessary to place him in a private asylum. His case is not looked upon as hopeless, but for the present there he remains a victim of verbosity.

J. P.

?

WHY IS EVERYBODY READING

THE PRIVATE LIFE OF QUEEN VICTORIA,

By One of Her Majesty's Servants?

BECAUSE IT IS THE ONLY ACCOUNT OF OUR MOST LAMENTED QUEEN'S DOMESTIC LIFE.

Cloth, price 2s. 6d., post free.

Four of the twenty-seven chapters are:

The Queen Among Children ..... Chap. III.
The Queen's Fads and Fancies ..... Chap. VIII.
The Queen's Fortune and Expenditure ... Chap. IX.
The Queen as a Housekeeper ..... Chap. XIII.

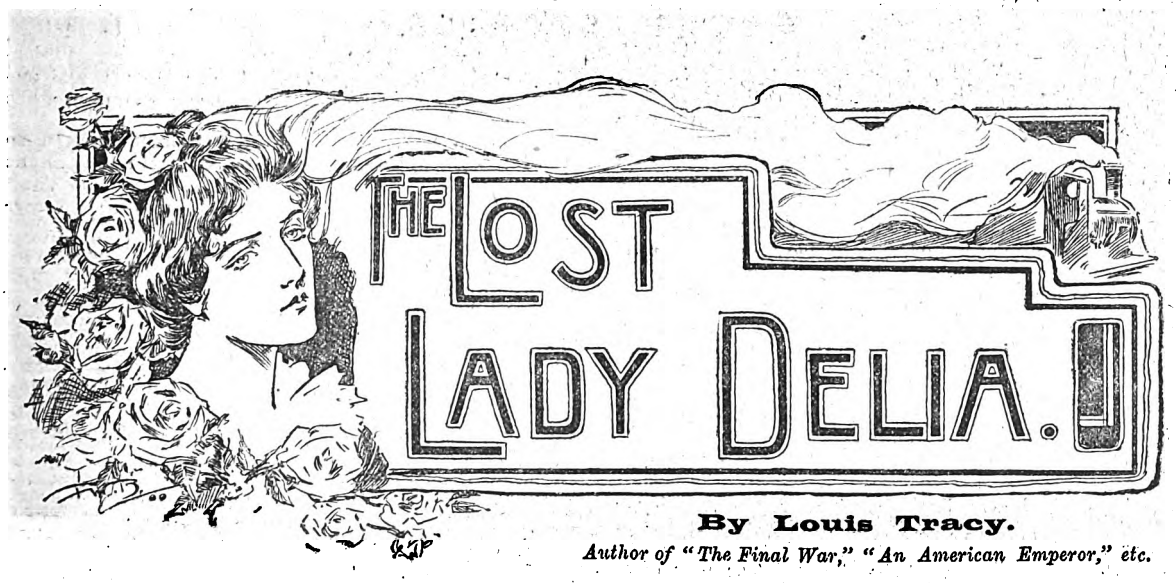
With Portrait and numerous Illustrations, including a photograph of the bedroom at Osborne, and the bed upon which Her Majesty breathed her last.

"It gives a charming sketch of Her Majesty as the mistress of her own household and as the head of her large family."—Pall Mall Gazette.

At all Booksellers and Bookstalls, or of the Publishers.

London: C. A. Pearson (Ltd.), Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google



By Louis Tracy.

Author of "The Final War," "An American Emperor," etc.

THIS TELLS THE STORY FROM THE START.

Lady Delia Lyle leaves her house one foggy November afternoon, saying she is going to see her sister at Richmond, but from that time she is not heard of.

Her husband, Sir Charles Lyle, puts the matter into the hands of detectives, Inspector Winter taking charge of the case.

Reginald Brett, a barrister friend of the Lyles, also promises to do all he can, and he finds out that Lady Delia, on the night of her disappearance, instead of going to Richmond, alighted at Sloane Square, and went to a block of flats called Raleigh Mansions.

Towards the end of the month the body of a woman, evidently murdered, is found wedged beneath a drain-pipe in the Thames at Putney, and, though Sir Charles does not identify the body, Brett imagines it to be that of Lady Delia. Shortly after this discovery Lady Delia's maid, Jane Harding, disappears. She is afterwards found to have gone on the stage.

Brett now starts investigations at Raleigh Mansions, and he fixes on two residents there as being likely to have been connected with Lady Delia. These are a Mr. Sydney H. Pyne, who is not at present in residence, and a Mrs. Hillmer, whom he finds to be Pyne's sister.

It had transpired that Pyne had gone to Monte Carlo, and thither Brett goes, and he discovers that though letters are addressed to Pyne at the Hotel du Cercle he is not known there.

During his stay at Monte Carlo Brett becomes acquainted with an Englishman, named Albert Mensmore, whom he helps out of some money difficulties, but he does not discover anything about Pyne.

After his return Brett finds out that Sir Charles Lyle knows Albert Mensmore, but in what connection does not transpire.

A few days later Brett goes into the City, to the office of Dodge and Co., with whom he had had some speculative dealings, and from remarks made by Mr. Dodge, he thinks that Pyne and Mensmore must be one and the same man. In the evening Brett and Winter go to Raleigh Mansions and search the flat occupied by Pyne. Brett finds that a piece of one of the fire-dogs is missing, and that it exactly corresponds with the piece of iron which was found imbedded in the head of the body found at Putney.

He again visits Mrs. Hillmer, who is terrified by his inquiries, and this seems to strengthen suspicion against her brother.

It is shown by this time that Mensmore (who is at Genoa) had previously adopted the name of Pyne. The real Pyne (his mining partner) writes him that their property is likely to bring them much wealth.

CHAPTER XVIII. (continued).

There was quite a large gathering for dinner. Places like Genoa contain a number of highly-interesting personages if the visitor can only get to know them. The British race produces a richer variety of human flotsam and jetsam than any other. These derelicts come to anchor in out-of-the-way parts of the earth. They seem to have been everywhere and have done everything, whilst the whole world is an open book to them.

Thus there was no lack of variety in the conversation, and, as usual in such assemblies, it dealt more with persons than with incidents.

Phyllis had arranged the guests, so it may be taken for granted that her lover was near her—in fact, he sat exactly opposite. The lady he took in to dinner was the wife of an English doctor, and the British consul at the port was Miss Browne's table companion.

The consul was a chatty man, who kept himself well informed concerning society events.

"By the way," he said to Phyllis, "did you ever meet Lady Delia Lyle?"

"No, her name is not familiar to me."

"Do you mean the wife of Sir Charles Lyle?" said Mensmore; and the sudden interest he evinced caused Phyllis to glance at him wonderingly.

"Yes that is she."

"I know Sir Charles well. What is there new about his wife?"

"She is dead."

"Good Heavens! Dead! When, and how?"

Mensmore was so obviously agitated that others present noticed it, and Phyllis marvelled much that in all their confidences the name of Lyle had never escaped his lips.

The consul, too, was a little upset by the sensation caused by his words.

"I fear," he said, "that I have blurted out the fact rather unguardedly. The Lyles are friends of yours?"

"No, no, not in that sense. Sir Charles I have known for many years. But are you sure his wife is dead?"

"My authority is an announcement in the Times, to hand by to-day's post. I should not have mentioned it were not Lady Delia so well known in society, and the affair is peculiar, to say the least."

"Peculiar—how?"

In his all-absorbing interest at the consul's statement, Mensmore paid no heed to the curious looks directed at him by those near, for he had become very pale, and was more excited in manner than the circumstances appeared to warrant.

"In this sense. The paper is the issue of January 28, yet the notice says that Lady Delia died on November 6. That is odd, is it not? A woman of her position could hardly have quitted life so quietly that no one would trouble to publish the fact for nearly three months after the event."

"It is extraordinary—inexplicable?"

"Did you know Lady Delia personally, Bertie?" put in Phyllis timorously.

The question restored Mensmore to some sense of his surroundings.

"I have never even seen her," he said, trying desperately to be commonplace; "but her husband is an old schoolfellow of mine, and I have heard much of both of them since their marriage. I am quite shocked by the news."

Digitized by Google

"I can only repeat my regret for having spoken of it so carelessly," said the polite consul.

"Oh, I am glad to know of it since it has happened. Poor Lady Delia! How strange that she should die."

Phyllis had the tact to change the conversation, and Mensmore gradually recovered his self-possession. A woman's eyes are keener than a man often gives her credit for; and Phyllis could see quite well that after the first effect of the news had passed, it, in some indefinable way, seemed to have a good effect on her lover. But if a woman's intuition is seldom at fault her reasoning faculties are narrow.

Trying to arrive at a solution of the mystery attending Mensmore's behaviour, Phyllis suddenly became hot all over.

She felt furiously and inordinately jealous of a woman she had never seen, and who was admittedly dead before Mensmore and she herself had met.

Hence her nose went high in the air when Bertie claimed her for the first dance.

"Who is this Lady Delia in whom you are so deeply interested?" she said, pulling him off beneath a sheltering awning.

"As I said," replied Mensmore, "she is the wife of an old acquaintance of mine."

"But you must have been very fond of her to feel so keenly when you heard of her death?"

"Fond of her! I have never, to my knowledge, laid eyes on her."

"Oh!" and the tone was somewhat mollified. "Then why did you look so worried during dinner?"

"Simply because I know Sir Charles."

"What a dear sympathetic little boy you are! When I die, Bertie, I suppose you will drop down stiff from grief at once."

"Don't talk nonsense. We are missing all this delightful music."

And they whirled off down the snowy deck, forgetful of all things save one, that they were in love.

Now, what a pity it was that Brett did not happen to be on board the White Heather that night.

Many complications, and not a little misery, would have been avoided thereby.

CHAPTER XIX.

Where Mrs. Hillmer Went.

Sir Charles Lyle, in sending off the hurried announcement of his wife's death, forgot the "society" papers.

Such a promising topic did not come in their way every week, and they made the most of it. Where did Lady Delia die? when did she die? under what circumstances did she die? They rolled the morsel under their tongues in every conceivable manner.

Details were not forthcoming.

"Our representative" called at Wensley House, Portman Square, but was informed that Sir Charles was in Yorkshire. Inquiry by a local reporter from Sir Charles in person elicited no information. "Lady Delia is dead," wrote this enterprising journalist; "of that there can be no manner of doubt, but her husband states that for family reasons he is unable to supply the public with the precise facts concerning his wife's demise."

This ill-advised authentic statement only fanned the flame. An evening journal got hold of the proceedings at the Putney Coroner's-court which inquired into the death of the woman found in the Thames, and, with a portentous display of headlines, published interviews with the doctor giving particulars of the iron spike found imbedded in the skull.

The paper was also able to state "on the best authority" that at this inquest Sir Charles Lyle and the missing lady's personal maid were called in to identify the body but failed.

A first-class sensation was in full swing and threatened to reach the question stage in the House of Commons when Brett took hold of affairs.

He went to Sir Charles Lyle's solicitors, and induced them to send out the following authoritative communiqué to the Press:

Much unnecessary pain is being caused to Sir Charles Lyle and to the relatives of his late wife by the comments which have appeared in many newspapers regarding Lady Delia Lyle's death. Her ladyship left her home on November 6th to pay a visit to her sister at Richmond, and since that date has not been seen or heard of. There was no possible reason for Lady Delia's disappearance. After a long and agonising search, her husband and relatives have come to the conclusion that she met with some accident on the date named, with the result that her identity was not established and she was probably buried from some hospital or other institution long before her friends seriously entertained the thought that she was dead. Every such case of accidental death followed by the interment of unknown persons by the authorities, occuring on or about November 6th, has since been rigidly investigated, but no definite trace has been found of the missing lady. Sir Charles Lyle finally determined to take the public step of announcing his wife's death in the hope that any hitherto undiscovered clue might thereby come to light. But there are no grounds to suppose that any other explanation of the occurrence than that given will be forthcoming. The investigation has throughout been in the hands of Scotland Yard, so no good purpose can be served by further discussion in the Press of what is now, and threatens to remain, a mystery rendered more complex probably by the simplicity of its leading features.

Several newspapers, of course, pointed out that they were helping forward the inquiry by noising it abroad, but thenceforth the paragraphs ceased, being eclipsed in interest by the revelations of a great divorce case in which there were no less than six titled co-respondents.

One man was much puzzled by the original obituary notice and the semi-official statement supplied by the solicitors.

Mr. Winter did not know what to make of them. He guessed that Brett had inspired the "explanation," and he read many times the final sentence.

"It threatens to remain a mystery, does it?" he murmured. "Just wait, Mr. Brett, until I lay my hands on Pyne. Clever as you are, I think I will show you that Scotland Yard can occasionally get the better of your theories. Anyhow, Pyne will have to be very explicit about his movements before I am satisfied that he knows nothing about this business."

He had written to the Chief of Police at New York, and something definite would soon come to hand.

Nevertheless, he felt somewhat shaken in his diagnosis of the crime. Wyoming was a long way from London, and the letter from Pyne, which he had in his possession, did not exactly confirm his suspicion that this man was concerned in the murder of Lady Delia.

He quickly became aware of Mrs. Hillmer's departure, and at once jumped to the conclusion that she had recently left England for the United States.

A close scrutiny of the passage lists at Liverpool and Southampton did not help him much, and he ultimately resolved to call on Brett, in the hope that a chance exclamation might reveal the barrister's opinion of the situation.

Reggie was not at a loss to account for Mr. Winter's presence.

"I expected you," he said.

"Really now, may I ask why, sir?"

"Because you have missed Mrs. Hillmer, and you want me to help you to find out where she has gone, and why."

The detective smiled.

"I won't say that you are wrong, sir," he cried. "In these affairs it is always well to keep an eye on the woman, you know."

"When did Mrs. Hillmer leave Raleigh Mansions?"

"On the 30th."

"It is now February 3. Four days ago, eh?"

"That's the time. She might have left by the American line from Southampton or the Cunard from Liverpool on Wednesday, but she did not, and no one answering to her description is booked by the White Star to-morrow."

"Southampton! Liverpool! Do you think she has gone to America?"

Digitized by Google

"Where else? She's in league with Pyne, somehow, of that I am certain, and I think that the Monte Carlo address for the letters was a mere blind—a clever one, too, as it even deceived you, Mr. Brett."

"Yes. It did deceive me."

"Then why are you so surprised at the suggestion that the lady should attempt to cross the Atlantic?"

"Because I have not your rapid perception of the points of a case."

"That's your way of pulling my leg, Mr. Brett."

The barrister smiled.

Mrs Hillmer, of course, had gone to Monte Carlo. Once there she would not have much difficulty in tracing the White Heather, and overtaking Mensmore.

She would warn him of the police pursuit, and there would be a scene between them.

How would it result? Would Mensmore, guilty, seek safety in flight? Would he, innocent, return to London and demand to be confronted with his accusers?

For the life of him, Brett could not say positively. Yet he felt that the situation was too delicate to be dealt with by Mr. Winter's bludgeon methods, and he forbore to speak.

The detective interpreted his silence as an admission of inability to find a satisfactory explanation of Mrs. Hillmer's absence.

He went on:

"Pyne is not at Monte Carlo."

"So I imagined."

"Well, it is a fact. The police have made constant inquiries for him at the Hotel du Cercle and elsewhere. Not the slightest trace of him can be found."

"I was there myself, you know."

"Yes, sir. I have not forgotten that. But it shows what a clever rascal the fellow is in concealing his identity. However, he could never have counted upon my discovering that letter of his. Even if he is not in America we shall get some reliable data to go upon in answer to my queries."

"There I fully agree with you. You will have done a great deal if you thoroughly clear up the mystery regarding Pyne. May I ask you to let me know the result?"

"With pleasure, sir. And now, can I request a favour in return?"

"Certainly."

"Tell me, then, what is, in your opinion, the best way to find Mrs. Hillmer?"

Brett did not expect to be thus openly challenged on the matter. It was one thing to withhold his own theories and discoveries from this representative of the majesty of the law, but quite another to refuse to help forward a detective with whom he was nominally working.

Besides, Mrs. Hillmer had four days start. It would take some time—possibly a telegram would not be sufficiently explicit—to obtain the desired assistance from the Continental police. Yes, in this instance Mensmore must take his chance.

"If I were you," said Brett, slowly weighing his words, "I would inquire at the Continental booking-offices at Victoria and Charing Cross, and from the guards in charge of the morning mail trains on the 30th. In fact, it would be quite safe for you to wire the authorities at Monte Carlo, asking if Mrs. Hillmer is not now at the Hotel du Cercle."

The detective started as though he had been shot.

"What!" he cried, "you think she is there all the time?"

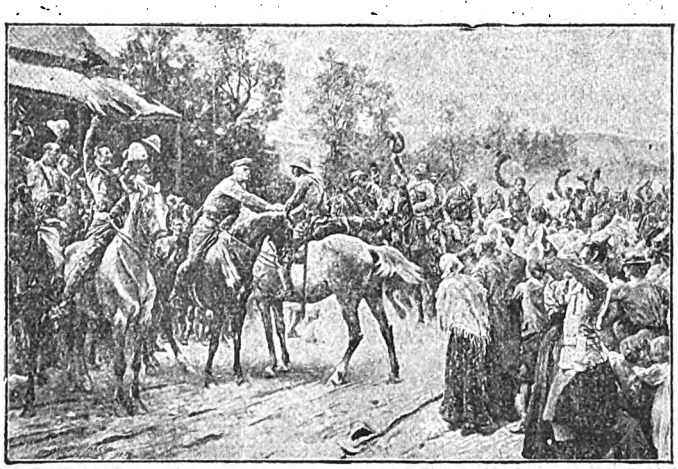
"I think she has been there since Wednesday morning."

"That's what I mean. Why did you not tell me sooner?"

"Because you never asked me. And now, Mr. Winter, one word of advice. Go slow."

"It's all jolly fine telling me to go slow when I have no

BOVRIL WAR PICTURE.



"THE RELIEF OF LADYSMITH." JOHN H. BACON.

A Magnificent Historic War Gravure, 28in. by 18½in., printed on Fine Plate Paper 40in. by 30in., free from advertising matter.

FREE TO PURCHASERS OF BOVRIL.

COUPON AND PARTICULARS WITH EVERY BOTTLE OF BOVRIL.

Digitized by Google

reason to go fast. The case even against Pyne is shadowy enough at present."

"Exactly. Wait until you can grasp a substance."

"I will, sir," said Winter, jamming his hat on; "but when I lay my hands on Pyne I will grip him hard enough."

It took Mr. Winter all that day to satisfy himself that Mrs. Hillmer had really booked for the Riviera by the Club-train from Charing Cross on the preceding Monday.

Just as he had verified the fact, came a reply from the Monte Carlo police:

Mrs. Hillmer arrived at Hotel du Cercle on Wednesday. Left for Italy same afternoon. Shall we endeavour to trace her?

"Oh, bother," growled Mr. Winter. "Pyne may be in Jerusalem by this time. And here have I been fussing about Wyoming or some other potato patch in the Far West."

However, he wired again to Monte Carlo.

Yes. Locate Mrs. Hillmer, if possible. I will then telegraph instructions to local police.

When this message had gone he felt easier in his mind. The chase was at least getting warm.

"I cannot arrest him yet," he reflected; "but if I once get fairly on his track, I will not lose sight of him again if I can help it. I suppose it will mean a trip to Italy for me. I must lay the evidence before the Treasury to see if a warrant is justified."

Two days passed without incident.

Late on Sunday evening, February 5th, a continental telegram was handed to him at Scotland Yard.

Mrs. Hillmer's present address, Hotel Imperiale, Florence.

He promptly wired the chief of police at Florence:

Keep Mrs. Hillmer, English visitor, Hotel Imperiale, under surveillance. Also watch her associates, particularly Englishman named Pyne, if there. Letter follows.

"That's a good stroke of business," said Mr. Winter when the message had gone. "Now we shan't be long."

It was in quite a contented mood that he lit a cigar on the steps of his office, and prepared to start home for dinner but a messenger with the badge of the Commercial Cable Company in Northumberland Avenue bustled past him.

"Who's the cable for, boy?" said the detective.

"Winter, Scotland Yard," was the answer.

"That's me."

He tore open the envelope and found that the contents were coded, but he caught the word "Pyne" amidst the unintelligible jumble.

With considerable display of excitement he rushed into the office to find the A.B.C. Code, and after some confusion in deciphering the words, this was what he read:

Regret delay in replying to your communication. Pyne left New York in White Star steamer due Liverpool February 4th.

"February 4th? Why, that's yesterday. Good gracious, he's here all the time. Well of all the——"

But exclamations were useless. Calling another plain-clothes man to accompany him, Mr. Winter drove off in mad haste to Sloane Square.

About an hour later Brett received a typewritten slip gummed on to a telegraph form. It was from Florence and ran as follows:

My brother wildly excited regarding allegations. We start for London to-night. Meanwhile fearful complications expected. Mr. Pyne of Wyoming, my brother's friend, is probably occupying his flat, and may be arrested. We both trust to you to save him. Wire us at Modane or Gare du Nord. Gwendoline Hillmer.

So Brett also rushed off in a hansom to Sloane Square.

CHAPTER XX.

Mr. Sydney H. Pyne.

Mr. Winter glanced at Brett's chambers whilst passing through Victoria Street.

"I wonder what he would think if he knew what we are after," he said to his colleague, one of the two who accompanied him when Brett was arrested by mistake.

"What are we after?" said the policeman.

"This time we're going to nail the right Pyne," was the answer.

"Will we cart him off?"

"Well, now, that depends. I think I am quite right in collaring him unless he explains things to my satisfaction, which is hardly likely."

"The charge is one of murder, isn't it?"

"Yes."

"Who did he kill?"

"Well, up to now it hasn't come out for the sake of the family. But if Pyne is here you will know soon enough."

"It's a funny way to go to work."

"Commissioner's orders, my boy. I am not to reveal the la—the name until it cannot be helped. However, as I have said so much I don't mind telling you it's a woman, and a big one too."

"Big! Fat, do you mean?"

"No. A woman of high position."

"Phew. A regular society scandal, I suppose."

"That's about the size of it."

On arrival at Sloane-square they quickly ascended to No. 12 Raleigh Mansions.

A stout, elderly woman answered their knock, and a glance at her face revealed the map of Ireland, although her name was Saxon Robinson.

"Mr. Pyne in?" said Winter.

"Faith, he's not."

"Then where is he?"

"I don't know, mister; an' if I did I wouldn't be afther telling when axed in an oncivil manner."

"All right, Mrs. ——"

"Robinson's my name, if that's any use to ye."

"Very well, Mrs. Robinson. We want to have a word with Mr. Pyne, and we will be much obliged to you if you can tell us when he is likely to return, if he is in London."

"Arrah, it's meself is mixed entirely about him. But this Mr. Pyne is in London right enough, and is comin' in to dinner in half-an-hour, so by yer leave I'll just go on wid me wurruk."

"May we come in and wait for him? We wish particularly to see him."

Mrs. Robinson surveyed them suspiciously, but seemingly decided in their favour.

"Stip in her, gintlemen both," she said, and conducted them to the sitting-room.

A fire now burned brightly in the grate, where Brett had made his pregnant discovery. The damaged bracket still stared at Winter, so to speak, but he saw it not.

Mrs. Robinson bustled about in the kitchen, and the two officers sat silent, waiting developments. Suddenly a thought occurred to Winter, and he went into the passage.

"Mrs. Robinson," he said, "what did you mean by referring to this Mr. Pyne?"

A quick step came bounding up the stairs, and a key rattled in the lock.

"You'd better ax him yerself," responded the housekeeper pithily, and the door opened to admit a handsome, well-knit man, tall and straight, with the clearly cut features of the true Westerner, and the easy carriage of one accustomed to the freedom of the prairie.

He was quietly dressed. The only sign that he was not a Londoner was given by his wide-awake felt hat, the last token of environment relinquished by a wandering citizen from the region of the Rockies. In the semi-darkness of the interior he could but dimly discern the form of the detective, standing behind the ready-tongued housekeeper.

"There's two gintlemen to see ye, Misther Pyne," said she.

Digitized by Google

"Well, now, that's cu-rious," he answered, cheerfully. "I can only see one of you, but I'm glad to have you call, stranger, anyway; come right in. Are you sent by my friend to kinder cheer me up. I find this big city of yours a powerful sort of tonic after Wyoming. Come right in."

Mr. Winter was as greatly nonplussed by the new-comer's attitude as by his flow of language, carried on as it was in the balanced cadence of the American accent.

Within the drawing-room Pyne caught sight of the second detective. "Hallo! Here's the other one. Ve-ry glad to meet you both. Now, if you'll just tell me your names we'll get along straight away, as I guess you know mine all right."

The man was genuinely pleased at this unexpected visit. He smilingly pushed a box of cigars, green ones, towards them and helped himself to a weed.

"My name," said the detective, "is Inspector Winter, of Scotland Yard, and my friend here accompanies me officially."

"And hasn't he got a name?"

"Yes, but it doesn't matter."

"Well, if it doesn't matter, we won't quarrel. I guess you've got a message of some sort for me, else you wouldn't trouble to climb these stairs. Why don't you have e-le-vators in these big buildings?"

"As I said," began Mr. Winter, "we are from Scotland Yard."

"That's so. I've got that fixed O. K. Your name is I. Winter, from Scotland Yard. I don't know where Scotland Yard is, but we'll worry along without the geography of it."

"I am in the police. My title is Inspector. It is not my Christian name. Scotland Yard is the headquarters of the London police."

The American's eyes opened wide in wonder at this announcement, and a thought seemed suddenly to occur to him. But he said quietly:

"I'll figure it out better when you tell me why you've been good enough to call. And suppose we all sit down. I'm not used to stone pavements. I'm tired."

"Your name is Sydney H. Pyne?" said the detective severely, though he took a chair.

"So my people always told me."

"And you have occupied these chambers since August last?"

"Have I?"

"So I am informed."

"Get along with your story."

"You have just returned to England from Wyoming. The New York police cabled me that you arrived in Liverpool yesterday."

"Did they now? That was real cute of 'em."

"I want to ask you in the first instance, the exact date of your departure from this country?"

Before replying to the detective Pyne looked at him fixedly, as though he was trying to read what was passing in his mind.

At last he said, with a smile:

"Say, what are you after, Mr. Winter of Scotland Yard? What's the game? Who's been fooling you?"

"That is not the way to talk to me, sir. Answer my question fully and properly, or it may be worse for you."

"Jehosh. Have you come in to wipe the floor with me?"

"Are you going to reply to me or not?"

"I'm not going to speak square to any man who comes along and puts a thing like you do."

"Very well. I can get my information by other means. You leave me no alternative——"

Mr. Winter had half-risen and was about to add, "but to arest you," when with a rapidity known only to those accustomed to "draw" from boyhood, Pyne whipped a revolver from a hip pocket and covered the bridge of Winter's nose with the muzzle.

"Just you sit still, right there, Mr. Winter of Scotland Yard, or I will let daylight through you and your nameless

ASTHMA

WHY is it generally thought that there is no cure for

Asthma, CHRONIC BRONCHITIS,

Shortness of Breath, BLOOD SPITTING, &c.?

BECAUSE the usual treatments only confine themselves to combating single symptoms, instead of attacking the root of the disease.

BE SURE THERE IS ONE

ABSOLUTE LASTING CURE.

Sufferers will receive, Post Free, FREE OF CHARGE, particulars of the famous WEIDHAAS HOME TREATMENT, when applying to THE PAUL WEIDHAAS HYGIENIC INSTITUTE, 16 T.A. Buckingham Road, Brighton.

Mr. Weidhaas has tried the treatment on himself, after having been given up as incurable, and cured himself, and had then practised it for over 19 years in many thousands of special cases. Many having suffered for over 40 years have been cured by my treatment (in some instances even at the age of 70 and 80 years), after having been GIVEN UP AS INCURABLE.

No interference with daily occupation. Send description of complaint, and mention if you suffer from COLD FEET.

Read the following testimonial, one out of scores received:

BRONCHIAL ASTHMA (3 years' standing) CURED.

Having suffered from Asthma for three years, and not getting better by my own doctor, I decided to try your Cure. Before I tried it I was better for about a week, then the next I was so choked and short of breath that I had to keep in bed, for it was too much trouble to dress; and such a wheezing on my chest that you could hear it in the next room; and scarcely any appetite; and could not sleep at night. I could not lie down, for if I did I had such a fit of coughing, which seemed to take my breath away. I am now very pleased indeed to be able to send you my best thanks for all your advice and kind attention to my case; I am sure I should have never been as well as I am now had I not tried your Cure. I shall be very happy to recommend you to any one I know suffering as I did before I tried your Cure.

MISS SCARFE (from a Photo).

Cromer. (MISS) SCARFE.

(Address on application.)

THE DIRECTOR is prepared to pay to any Charitable Institution if the above is not a genuine extract from the patient's own letter. The original may be seen at the Paul Weidhaas Hygienic Institute by any bona-fide inquirer.

£1,000

CURABLE

Digitized by Google

friend if he interferes. You'd better believe me. By gad, I won't speak twice."

Neither Winter nor his companion were cowards. But they were quite helpless. They had not grapp'ed with the circumstances with sufficient alertness, and they were utterly at this man's mercy. They were away from the door, and a table separated them from Pyne, whilst there was that in his eye which told them that he would shoot them dead if either of them moved. They had both sprung to their feet, and now glared at him impotently.

"Now, gentlemen," said Pyne, with the utmost coolness, "let me persuade you to sit down again and go on with your story, which interests me."

Winter was scarlet with indignation and annoyance.

"Let me tell you——," he roared.

"Sit down!"

"Make the best of it, Jim," murmured the other policeman; and the queer gathering resumed their seats.

"That's better," said Pyne, genially. "Now, we'll have a nice little chat. Am I correct in supposing that you were about to march me off to gaol, just now, when I spoilt the plant?"

"There's no use in resisting," growled Winter. "You cannot escape. If you have an atom of sense left you will come with us quietly, as it's all up with you."

"It looks like it," said Pyne, with a grim smile. "But if it's so bad a case as all that there's no desperate hurry, is there?"

"You're only making matters more difficult for yourself."

"Maybe. But as I happen to be a citizen of the United States I allow that I can't be whipped off to prison just because a silly fool like you thinks it's good for me. I've been a law-abiding man all my life, and I've lived in places where each man made his own law. If you can show good cause for your action I'll stand the racket. But at present I regard you as a blamed idiot."

The situation overcame the detective. He could only mutter:

"Time will show who's the idiot."

"I'm getting mighty hungry, Mr. Winter of Scotland Yard, and I've a kind of notion that the old lady is ready with the eatables. Will you be good enough to say what you're after?"

"I came here to ask you to account for your movements, and, failing a satisfactory explanation, to arrest you."

"On what charge?"

"For being concerned in the murder of Lady Delia Lyle, on or about November 6th last."

"Lady Delia Lyle!"

"Yes."

"Arrest me!"

"Yes."

"I placed you right away. You are a blamed idiot, Mr. Winter of Scotland Yard."

This repetition of his address goaded the detective almost beyond endurance.

"Now you know the charge," he shouted, "are you coming with us quietly, or——"

"Or what?"

The revolver still hovered across the table.

"Are we going to sit here all night?"

It was a weak conclusion, but to suggest an attack was sheer madness under the conditions.

"I guess not," was the calm answer. "I want my dinner, and I mean to have it."

"Very well. Eat your dinner, and have done with it."

"That's better. You and your friend shall join me. We'll have a nice little talk, and straighten out matters, which have got kinder mixed."

This was too much for Winter's associate. He burst out laughing.

"I allowed there was a joke in the deal, somewhere," went on Pyne; "but I haven't quite got the hang of it yet. Now, Mr. Winter of Scotland Yard, are you going to act like a reasonable man, or must I keep your nose in a line with my shooting-iron?"

Winter was saved from deciding which horn of the dilemma he would land on, for a sharp rat-tat at the door induced silence, and a moment later Brett's voice was heard inquiring: "Is Mr. Pyne in?"

"Faix, there may be half-a-dozen of him in by this time," cried Mrs. Robinson. "I dunno where I am, at all, at all. The gintlemen are in the parlour, sir."

And Brett entered.

In order to scientifically enfilade the newcomer, Pyne backed to the corner. Reggie glanced at the three, saw the revolver, and said with a comical air of relief:

"Thank goodness, nothing has happened. Put away your revolver, Mr. Pyne; you will not need it."

Although the barrister's manner differed considerably from the brusque methods adopted by Mr. Winter, the American remained on his guard. He said stiffly:

"You all seem to know me fairish well; but if you had the advantage of closer acquaintance, you would allow that I am not the man to be rushed on a confidence trick. If somebody doesn't explain quick I will lose my temper, and there will be trouble."

"I sympathise with you!" cried Brett. "But the first thing you must learn in this country is to keep dry cigars for your visitors. Our respective tastes differ in that respect."

"I guess I'll cotton on to you, stranger; but I'm tired holding this pistol."

"Put it away, then. I tell you it is not wanted. Winter, listen to me. You have hit upon the wrong man."

"Wrong man!" cried the detective, feeling more confident in the barrister's presence. "Why, I've had a cable about him from New York."

"Possibly; but you're mistaken, nevertheless. Mr. Pyne has not been within five thousand miles of England for years, possibly not in his life."

"Bully for you, stranger," broke in Pyne.

"Then who is the Mr. Sydney H. Pyne whom you believe, as well as I, to be the murderer of Lady Delia Lyle?"

"Steady, Winter. The last time I saw you I appealed to you to go slow. The man whom you want, simply because he happens to be the real occupant of these rooms, is at present travelling to London as fast as he can from Florence, and his sister, Mrs. Hillmer, is with him."

"Florence! Mrs. Hillmer!" gasped the policeman. "I've just arranged to have her watched there."

"Your arrangements, though admirable, are somewhat late in the day."

"Then what is her brother's name?"

"Herbert Mensmore. For some reason, hidden at this moment, he lived here under the name of the gentleman who has, I see, been giving you a practical lesson in the art of not jumping at conclusions."

"Have you known this long?"

"For some weeks."

"Then why didn't you tell me?"

"Because I have no definite reason for connecting Mensmore with Lady Delia's death. If I had, his action in returning to London the moment he hears of the charge would shake my belief."

"Who told him?"

"Mrs. Hillmer."

"Oh, this business is quite beyond me. I can't fathom it a little bit."

And Winter sank dejectedly to his chair again.

(To be continued.)

The Author of this story is writing "The Great Strike" in Pearson's Weekly.

Digitized by Google

Solving the Jelly Problem.

No housewife who has wasted time and effort in attempting to make Table Jellies by the old troublesome and expensive method can fail to appreciate the economy and high excellence of Chivers' Gold Medal Jellies. Instead of facing the difficulty of ascertaining the correct quantities of the various materials used, and the further trouble of straining and flavouring, the modern housewife takes her packet of Chivers' Jelly, and without loss of time or trouble and at a minimum of expense, she produces a dainty dish fit for any table. Clear, sparkling, with the fragrance and flavour of ripe fruit, Chivers' Jellies are indeed a dessert to grace a feast. Prepared under ideal conditions of cleanliness and purity, they represent the highest excellence, and that the public recognise and appreciate this fact is well evidenced by the wide popularity of these delicacies. Chivers' Gold Medal Jellies are nourishing, refreshing, and cooling, just the thing for large dinner parties and children's gatherings. Dr. Andrew Wilson writes: "Chivers' Jellies cannot be surpassed." A lady writes to her grocer as follows: "When I order Jellies, please always send Chivers', as cook says they are so much better"; whilst the Lancet, confesses them to be "an excellent Jelly, possessing a flavour of quite a natural character."

Chivers' Gold-Medal Jams and Table Jellies are sold by Grocers and Stores throughout the United Kingdom. Insist on being supplied with Chivers'. A free sample packet of Jelly will be sent on receipt of post-card to S. Chivers and Sons, Histon, Cambridge.

£50 CASH PRIZE

SEND NO MONEY WE TRUST YOU.

FREE.

£2 10s. £2 10s. REAL SILVER

WE GIVE YOU YOUR CHOICE of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1s. 6d. each. (Regular price, 2s. 6d.)

WE DO NOT WANT YOUR MONEY.

JUST WRITE US A POST-CARD

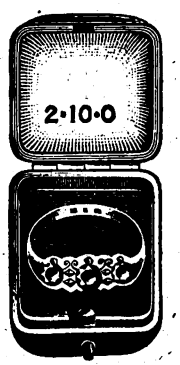
saying that you will either sell the Jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it with your name and address clearly written. On receiving your post card we will at once post you the Jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13s. 6d. you have received for same, and we will at once send you (no waiting), Absolutely Free, our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A Written Guarantee for Ten Years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1s. 6d. each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

FREE.



REAL GOLD AND REAL DIAMONDS

SEND NO MONEY. SEND NO STAMPS.

WHAT THE PUBLIC SAYS:—

KNOCKING OTHERS IN THE SHADE ALTOGETHER.

100 High Street,
Mountain Ash, South Wales.

Dear Sir,—Just a line to acknowledge having received the beautiful present; it was beyond expectation. There are a lot of goods from a Glasgow firm but nothing compared with the British Goldsmiths Company's goods. We are knocking them in the shade altogether. Everyone who has bought our goods speak very well of them. I will do my best for your Company in little Wales.—Yours fraternally,
WILLIAM WILLIAMS.

WRITE US TO-DAY. ONLY A POST-CARD.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS:—

"We have received some samples of the jewellery now being sold by the British Goldsmiths Co., the value of which is really wonderful considering the low prices asked for the goods. The British Goldsmiths Co. send out their goods to be sold by those who wish to put their spare time to good advantage. We should think there would be little difficulty about selling the goods we have before us. They are substantial, well finished, and cheap. The company offers a handsome present free to all persons selling a certain number of these articles."—HOME SWEET HOME, Jan. 5th., 1901.

BRITISH GOLDSMITHS CO. (DEPT. 29), 48 GRAY'S INN RD., LONDON.

Free

From the Antexema Co., 83 Castle Road, London, N.W., if this paper is named, a booklet on the Skin and a FREE SAMPLE of

"Antexema."

It is absolutely the most wonderful Skin Cure that has ever been discovered. It gives immediate relief from itching and burning and cures all skin diseases and every form of Eczema.

1/1½ bottles of chemists, post free for 1/3.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

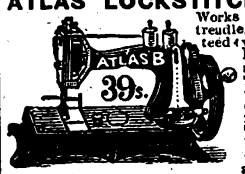
THE ENGLISH & WELSH COAL Co.,

GLOBE SHIPPING OFFICE, 81 BRIDGE STREET, MANCHESTER.

Deliver in Truck Load. Prices on application.

Purveyors to The Licensed Victuallers by special appointment.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 184a High St., Camden Town, London, N.W., 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

A FREE GIFT.

500 40-EGG INCUBATORS.

Ladies and Gentlemen can greatly increase their incomes by POULTRY BREEDING, thus converting 1d. Eggs into 1s. Chickens. To encourage this industry we intend supplying each applicant during the next 28 days with one of our 40-Egg Incubators.

Write for Free Gift Form to POULTRY BREEDERS' APPLIANCE CO., 3 Clarence Road, SOUTHEND-ON-SEA.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.

THE MARSTON CO., 59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.

GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS, 148 Old Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE EDITOR'S PAGE.

IN future, dear readers, I am going to have a weekly chat with you. I have arrived at this resolve for various reasons. In the first place, it is an article of editorial faith with me that a feature of this kind tends to strengthen the bonds of friendship between readers and editor, and in the second, I have been much besought of late to establish such a page by readers themselves. "Such-and-such a paper has it, why not you?" they say in effect. And so for once departing from the programme of Short Stories, which is to lead and not to follow, I comply, with the greatest pleasure in the world, with the wishes of my many correspondents.

WHAT are we going to chat about? Well, that depends to a great extent upon yourselves, for I shall look to you to assist me in this matter. I shall be happy to chat about whatever you please. Just what kind of subject that you might discuss with an old friend is what I mean. Perhaps you are anxious about some little point of everyday social conduct; maybe you are worried because the girl of your heart will flirt with "Charlie," or perhaps, reversing the case of sex, "Tom," or "Dick," or "Fred" may be unduly lethargic in the matter of "stating his intentions." In any such case, without intending to pose as an expert in etiquette, or setting up business as an amateur matrimonial agent, I still may be able to help you with a little commonsense advice and sympathy. So write to me.

IDEAL MAN AND WOMAN COMPETITIONS.

A LITTLE while ago I offered a prize of two guineas for the best idea (by a lady) of an ideal man, and a similar prize for the best idea (by a man) of an ideal woman. The result has astounded me. Postcards have come in by the thousand from every part of the kingdom, and from all sorts of men and women. The task of selection and adjudication has been extremely difficult. My hair has grown visibly greyer during the process, and upon my breast is a feeling of dull despair, for I, personally, can never hope to attain the standard of excellence which is expected in a man by many of my lady readers.

"The flame-clear light of inviolable truth must shine from out his azure eyes. Chesnut curls must wave above his towering brow where the majesty of intellect sits." So runs one description of an ideal man. It almost makes one despair—or buy a hair restorer.

Many ladies have selected some popular hero as their ideal. Thus Earl Roberts, Lord Kitchener and Major General Baden-Powell, come in for much approbation.

* * * * *

PLEASING too, in these days of problem plays and cheap cynicism, is the fact that many ladies describe their husbands and sweethearts as their ideals, and I am proud to say that many of my own sex, not to be outdone in this respect, claim pre-eminence for the particular objects of their hearts.

Quite a prominent feature is the unanimity with which competitors of both sexes seem willing to forego mere physical charms for the more enduring qualities of the heart. Which, after all, is exceedingly comforting to some of us.

PRIZES of two guineas each have been awarded to Miss E. Douglas, 34 Holt Street, West Hartlepool, and Mr. L. F. Andrewes, Norella, Stenlvee, Blackheath, S.E., for the following:

MY IDEAL MAN.

THE qualities I would most desire in an ideal man would be chivalry and courage. Smart young people nowadays fancy chivalry a relic of the days when our grandmothers sat at home spinning, and cycles were unknown. Not at all. My ideal man is chivalrous to a fault. In the street he will give place to the weak; amongst his companions he will never indulge in cheap sneers and scoffs at the expense of women. It is always a safe index to a man's character—his estimate of women. But it is in his own home that you will find my ideal man at his best. He will be loving, kind and respectful to his mother, and helpful to his brother and sister. In short, he will be a gentleman. He will also possess courage—courage to tell the truth at all costs, courage to be honest, courage to say "No" and withstand temptation. And if he has courage to do these things he will not turn coward when physical danger, even to life itself, comes. Then his character will show itself, and men will call him by his true name—A Hero.

MY IDEAL WOMAN.

MY ideal woman must be very human. She must not be an angel—at any rate, not at present. She must possess the truest beauty, and that which is the most difficult of attainment, the beauty of intelligence. Beauty of face or form is incidental, not necessary to her ideality. But the two most important characteristics of my ideal woman are, sympathy and the power to love deeply. This latter, indeed, comprises all that is most desirable. "Love covereth a multitude of sins." For a woman, who, while aiming at a high standard herself, yet recognises, nay, even sympathises with, the peccability of others, is a possession to be "valued above rubies." And if any misanthropic scoffer should doubt her existence he is to be pitied for his ignorance. For I have seen her.

SHORT STORIES ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	...	...	£0	10	0
Double " " "	...	...	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	...	...	...	...	10	0	0
Half-page " " "	...	...	...	...	5	0	0
Quarter-page " "	...	...	...	...	2	10	0
Eighth-page " "	...	...	...	...	1	5	0
Front page, whole " "	...	...	...	...	12	10	0
" half " "	...	...	...	...	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Feb. 19th, if intended for the issue on sale March 5th, and dated March 9th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

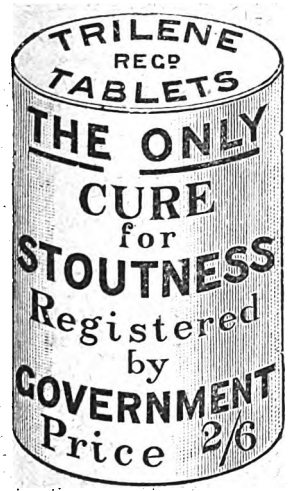
Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

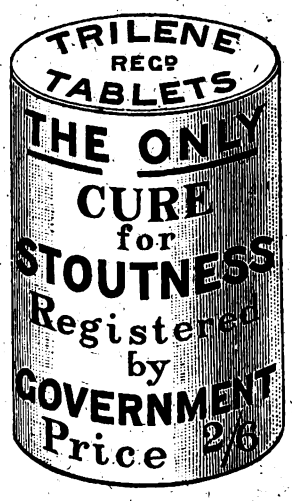
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Mrs. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

Miss CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st. and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 2lib. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me. "Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholme Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

Mrs. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mr. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 40 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

Mrs. DREW, of 1 Bellevue Gardens, The Nursery, Devizes, writes: "I took Tablets some years ago; they soon reduced me and I have not got stout since. Send me a box for my mother."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt tops.

OROCO SOX

A New Invention to keep the feet warm and dry yet allowing perfect ventilation. 18 pairs post free for 1/- State size required. A boon for tender & tired feet

WILL SUIT YOU DOWN TO THE GROUND.

OROCO M'F'G. Co. WIGAN.

NATURE'S AID TO THE SKIN.

Icilma

Icilma is the modern Fountain of Youth Water

THE OXYGENISED NATURAL WATER.

The only Natural and absolutely Safe Remedy for the Complexion, for the Nursery, for Cuts, Bruises, Nettlerash, and all Irritations of the Skin. "ICILMA" stops bleeding immediately, and with a magnifying glass the skin can be actually seen to grow over a cut or wound. Never be without it; and if a Clear, Smooth, Transparent Skin is desired, use always

ICILMA SOAP MADE WITH ICILMA WATER.

(N.B.—"Icilma" has been examined at Somerset House, and as a Natural Mineral Water is exempt from the Patent Medicine Stamp.)

"ICILMA" ACTS AT ONCE AND LIKE MAGIC. Shilling Bottles (Scented 2s.)

Of all Chemists or from Barclay & Sons Ltd., 95 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

A FREE TRIAL FOR 2/6

THE SET consists of Violin, Bow, Resin, &c.

VIOLIN OUTFIT COMPLETE.
Price £1 10s. 0d.

We will supply any reader of SHORT STORIES with one of these VIOLIN OUTFITS on Monthly Payments, as follows:—

You send us 2/6, with your Name and Address, and we will send one on approval.

If you approve of it you send us 2/6 on receipt and 5/- each month for 5 months, making the full 30/-.

BUT OUR NETT CASH WITH ORDER PRICE IS 27/- only.

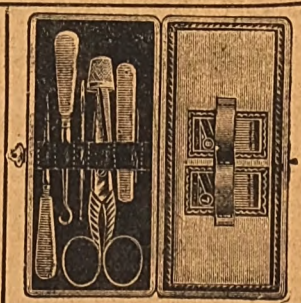
And if you do not approve of the Outfit, we will refund the cash sent, if you return the Outfit at once.



LADY'S COMPANION.

Containing 7 useful articles, exactly as illustrated, with Hall-marked Silver Thimble, in fine Leather Covered Velvet Lined Case. Price only 4/3.

MASTERS' 'FAVOURITE' MELODEON 12/6.

We will supply any reader with this Melodeon on receipt of 2/6. If you approve of it you send us 2/- on receipt and 2/- each month for 4 months. Nett Cash With Order Price 11/- only. If you do not approve of it we will refund the cash if you return the Melodeon at once.

CATALOGUE

Watches, Clocks, Albert Medals, Pendants, Wedding rings, Gem rings, Signet rings, Cutlery, Cruets, Electro-Plate, Carvers, Tea-pots, Field glasses, Pins, Brooches

J.N. Masters, Ltd., Jewellers, RYE, Sussex.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

LADY'S MAGAZINE, NO. 2 NOW READY. PRICE 6D.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 634. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 23RD, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

STOP

THROWING MONEY AWAY ON DOUBTFUL REMEDIES,

AND DO NOT BE INDUCED to buy an article of which little or nothing is known.

STOP BEING MISLED. The Proprietor of BEECHAM'S PILLS does not publish testimonials, but he could fill a volume with those he has received if he so pleased. He is content to let BEECHAM'S PILLS stand on their own merits, knowing they recommend themselves; this they have done, are doing, and will continue to do.

REFRAIN FROM MAKING EXPERIMENTS with so-called remedies, but adhere to the bridge that has probably carried you over many an anxious time.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

But if you have never tried BEECHAM'S PILLS, then ask your parents or friends what they think of them, and judge by what they say; you can generally trust your own acquaintances, though there are some folks it is very hard to believe, just as there are some advertisements published which are open to grave suspicion.

You can get 56 BEECHAM'S PILLS in a box labelled 1s. 1½d.

You can get 168 BEECHAM'S PILLS in a box labelled 2s. 9d.

No other advertiser of a recognized first-class medicine gives such good value, so WHY THROW AWAY MONEY ON DOUBTFUL AND UNTRIED REMEDIES? BEECHAM'S PILLS have been before the public for over FIFTY Years, and in spite of all opposition are to-day

MORE POPULAR THAN EVER, and why?

Because THEY RECOMMEND THEMSELVES.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Height 12ins. Width 7ins.

Rye Clock

(WITH ALARUM) 18/-

WE will supply any reader of Short Stories with one of these 18/- Alarum Clocks on monthly payments as follows:

YOU send us 2/6 with your name and address, and we will send you one on approval.

IF you approve of it, you send us 3/- on receipt, and 2/6 each month for five months, making the full 18/-.

BUT OUR NET-CASH-WITH-ORDER PRICE IS 16/- ONLY.

And we will refund the Cash sent, if you do not approve of the Clock, and you return it at once. (Signed) J. N. MASTERS.

A FREE TRIAL FOR 2/6

OUR

20th CENTURY CATALOGUE

containing illustrations of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, &c., &c., at 20 per cent. below London prices will be sent to any address on receipt of postcard.

OUR TERMS.

We will supply any reader of Short Stories with one of our Parcels of Cutlery on monthly payments as follows:—

YOU send us 2/6 and your name and address, and we will send you one on approval.

IF you do approve of it you send us 2/6 more on receiving parcel, and 5/- each month for four months, making the full 25/-.

BUT OUR NET-CASH-WITH-ORDER-PRICE IS 22/6 ONLY.

And we will refund the cash sent if you do not approve of the parcel and you return it at once. (Signed) J. N. MASTERS.

Each Parcel contains 50 High-Class Table Articles.

RETAIL CASH PRICES.

6	White Bone Table Knives	3/6
6	,, Dessert ,,	3/-
6	"Warewite" Table Forks	5/3
6	,, Dessert ,,	3/9
2	,, Table Spoons	1/9
6	,, Dessert ,,	3/9
6	,, Tea Spoons	2/-
1 pair	,, Sugar Tongs	1/-
1 only	,, Sugar Sifter	1/6
6	,, Egg Spoons	1/6
2	,, Salt Spoons	1/-
2	,, Mustard Spoons	1/-
50	"Good Enough for a Gentleman's Table."

PLEASE NOTE! That we also supply other goods on similar terms.

SILVER, 2/-

Gold 20/-

Any name supplied.

J. N. MASTERS LIMITED. "VERACITY" WATCHMAKERS, &C., RYE, SUSSEX.

KAPUTINE

The Best & Safest Remedy for

HEADACHE.

NURSE HILL, of the London Association of Nurses, writes:

"I have seen Kaputine administered to many patients, and can truly say it is a remedy which should have a place in every household."

All Leading Chemists sell KAPUTINE, 1/-. Samples One Penny.

If your Chemist has not KAPUTINE send his name and address to

KAPUTINE, HUDDERSFIELD,

and we will send you a SHILLING PACKET FREE.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,

7, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

FREE. FREE.

Our £2 10s.

Real Silver Watch (with chain), or A Real Gold Ring

Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

SEND NO MONEY. Send no money. Write to-day

BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 6).

282 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money.

Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

NEW AUTOMATIC KNITTER

FOR HOME WORK.

"The machine that knitted the hosiery and comforts for the troops in Africa."—See what The Times said.

Knits Socks (a pair in 35 min.), Stockings, Fancy Goods, &c. Easily learned. Lessons Free.

15/- to 30/- Weekly.

Cash, hire, and Work Terms from "Sorres" dept.: 67 Southwark St., S.E.; 55 Oxford St., W.; 192 Upper St., London, N.; 105 Nicolson St., Edinburgh; 58 Union St., Glasgow: 132 Stephen's Green, Dublin; 62 Great Hampton St., Birmingham · 31 Stokes Croft, Bristol.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 634.] For the Week Ending February 23rd, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

Fooled by a Woman.

THAT something very unusual had happened to the firm of Warde and Crowdey, the Regent Street jewellers, was very evident.

Mr. Warde, the senior member of the firm, was in the shop at the ridiculously late hour of nine o'clock in the evening, and Mr. Warde strode up and down the shop with ill-concealed nervous excitement. Every now and again he stepped to the door and glanced up the street as though expecting someone. That someone was no less an individual than Bart Hocking of Scotland Yard, and he came upon the scene a few minutes before ten o'clock.

"What's wrong now?" he said genially, as he was conducted to the private office in the rear of the shop.

"Everything's gone wrong," said the gentleman who had conducted the detective, "permit me, Mr. Hocking—this is Mr. Gray," with a wave of the hand to the other occupant of the office. "This is a nasty business—a nasty business!"

Mr. Warde, the senior member of the firm, was evidently labouring under considerable excitement he could not control, and he punctuated his remarks by putting his glasses on his nose and then removing them.

"We have been completely done, sir, fleeced—fleeced, Mr. Hocking, and by a woman.

"Mr. Gray is at the head of our diamond department. A shrewd man, too. But I am not surprised that he was taken in by that woman. Why, I was myself completely taken in, sir. I had taken notice of her entrance, and—and observed her somewhat and the purchases she was making. She was a stunner, and no mistake. Why, she was the handsomest woman, the best dressed, well bred, most—most—why, bless me, she would have deceived anyone. She looked like a queen."

Mr. Warde put his glasses on his nose to finish with, and then proceeded to duck his head and look over them at Bart Hocking.

All rights reserved.]

"Perhaps she is entitled to be called a queen," replied Bart quietly. "The Queen of Diamonds, eh? But come, tell me just how this thing happened."

"Why, this afternoon about two o'clock, a lady walked into the shop," responded the jeweller. "Gray, here," indicating the gentleman with a wave of the hand, "was behind the diamond counter.

"The lady walked straight up to him and presented her card. Show Mr. Hocking that card, Gray."

Gray produced the card, with something very like a groan. It read as follows:

DOCTOR WALTER FARDYCE.

MRS. FARDYCE.

Kensington Gardens, W.

The lady's name was engraved. The physician's name and address were written, apparently with a fine steel pen.

"As soon as she handed that card to me," explained Gray, "she drew it back again instantly as though she had made a mistake. It was very clever, I see now.

"'Oh, I beg your pardon!' she said, 'I didn't notice that that card had writing on it. Somebody's address it seems to be.'

"She adjusted a dainty pair of gold-bowed eyeglasses, and looked at the card.

"'Ah, it's only my husband's name,' she said. 'That does not matter, though I don't know how he happened to write it on my card.'

"She selected a fresh card and gave it to me, and after I had glanced at it, I asked her, as politely as possible"—here Gray ground his teeth—"what could I do for her?"

"'It's my birthday,' she said. 'Isn't it dreadful? They do come round so fast to us women when we are no longer young.'

Digitized by Google

"She made a pretty little gesture of regret for old Father Time's ruthless conduct, and then continued:

"'My husband is going to do his best to prevent the day from being a sad one for me. He has promised me a handsome present of diamonds, and, better still, has given me permission to choose them myself. That's what I am here for.'

"I saw a pretty good sale in that, so I immediately began to show her some handsome stones. I happened to know all about Doctor Fardyce, though I'd never seen him nor any of his family. He's a very rich man, and spends money freely. I supposed that he'd lay out at least a thousand pounds on this particular present and might go as high as five thousand.

"But when I saw the lady picking up solitaires and bracelets and necklaces, and laying them aside as if she intended to take them all, I began to stare.

"She didn't ask the price of anything at first, and so, after awhile, I ventured to ask, in the most roundabout way, how much she intended to lay out on her birthday present.

"'Oh, I can have almost anything I want,' she said. 'Dr. Fardyce has sold one of his houses, and he said he'd give me all he got for it, and that I might put it into diamonds, which, he says, are a good investment. I'm quite an expert, you must know, as a buyer.'

"Well, I hadn't supposed so, by the reckless way in which she had chosen thousands upon thousands of pounds worth of stones; but when she began to talk figures I discovered that she'd told only the truth.

"She knew all about diamonds. I didn't get any the best of her. When we had finally listed the articles, and had made prices on paper (which she did very carefully, compelling me to write the figures), I was forced to confess to myself that she really was making a first-class investment.

"Acting under instructions from Mr. Warde, I was willing to sell cheap, and the jewels she got for £10,117 were very cheap. If she sells them again in six months as carefully as she bought, she could make a handsome profit."

"When Gray had made his prices," the jeweller said, taking up the story, "the woman said that she would like her husband to see the stones before closing the sale, and asked if we could send a man from the shop with her to her home. She said the doctor would be there between the hours of three and four, and that he would have accompanied her to make the purchase, but for pressure of business.

"Gray came and asked me about it.

"'Is the woman all right?' I asked.

"'I believe so,' he answered; 'I saw her husband's name on one of her cards. I know his signature. Have seen it often when I was with Tate, Cope and Co.'

"Well, that seemed to settle it. Though, to tell the truth I had no doubts about her and I'm sure Gray had not. I've been watching the sale all the time, and, well, I've told you what I thought of her. I even spoke with her a few minutes, myself, and there wasn't a suggestion of anything wrong in her language or manner. Her story about wanting her husband to see the diamonds first was perfectly plausible, and she even asked for a man to accompany her, for greater safety. I did what I thought was right and even asked her pardon for sending one of the clerks with her.

"She laughed at that, and said she wouldn't dare to take the responsibility of caring for them herself.

"Ackersley, one of our most trustworthy clerks, came over to ask me a question while we were discussing this point, and as he turned away, she said in a low tone.

"'Can't you send that young man with me, he's so polite.'

"Ackersley is a man that one would notice and like at the first glance. He is a fine-looking fellow and dresses like a west-end swell, always. I don't mean loud, but well.

"I didn't think the request at all strange. Our messenger was of course to accompany her and she naturally wanted as gentlemanly a fellow as possible."

At this point Gray tore at his moustache viciously.

"I don't know what was the matter with us," he said. "It seems as if we must have been blind. Certainly the game was open enough."

"Gray thinks that Ackersley was in it," said Warde.

"Why?" asked Bart.

"Because he hasn't come back," said Gray somewhat warmly.

"There are several reasonable explanations of that fact," rejoined the detective. "Before I discuss them, let me learn just what you have done."

"In the first place," replied Warde, "I must tell you that the woman and Ackersley rode away together in the carriage in which she had come."

"It was an open carriage. I stood at the door of the store when they started. There was Ackersley with the jewel case on his knee. There was the coachman in full livery sitting on the box as if he was driven into it, and there was the woman, handsome as a picture and wonderfully young-looking. By the way, Gray, how old should you think she was?"

"Forty-five, at least," growled Gray.

"Not a bit of it!" exclaimed Warde. "She didn't look much over thirty. I'm particular about this, for it may account for any influence she has exercised over Ackersley."

"Perhaps," said Gray, "but I guess the plunder is the main thing with him. He has been living beyond his means."

"Well, to return to the story," said Warde, "it had been agreed that Ackersley should come back with the diamonds, or Doctor Fardyce's cheque for them, as soon as possible.

"We thought he might not be able to make it by six o'clock—the hour when we close—so it was arranged that Gray should stay here a while and wait for him."

"So I did," said Gray, taking up the story. "I had dinner sent in, and I remained here after the shop was closed engaged in some work with a lot of new stones which I recently purchased for the firm.

"Time slipped away fast, and it was eight o'clock before I realised it. It was so quiet that I heard when Big Ben struck an hour, and at that very moment it flashed through me that Ackersley should have been back, and that something was wrong.

"I picked up a telephone book, and found that there was a 'phone in Doctor Fardyce's house. Then I could have kicked myself for not using it in the afternoon.

"I rang the call. The operator at the Exchange said that that instrument had been taken out of the house, but that Doctor Fardyce had one in his sanatorium in Surrey, though it wasn't in the book.

"Of course I asked her to give me the sanatorium. Doctor Fardyce was there. He came to the 'phone.

"I told him that Mrs. Fardyce had called at our shop in the afternoon; but he interrupted me right there, to say that Mrs. Fardyce was in Liverpool.

"Without letting him know that a robbery had actually been committed, I satisfied myself beyond a doubt that the woman was an impostor, and that, in short, we had been done.

Digitized by Google

"Then I telegraphed to Mr. Warde. He replied that he would come down to the shop.

"On the way down, however, he struck the idea of going to Fardyce's town house. He did so, and found it closed."

"They haven't lived there since the first part of the summer," said Mr. Warde. "I learned that from the neighbours."

"But here's the curious part of it. Beyond question, the woman and Ackersley drove to that house. The people living on the other side of the street told me so.

"The carriage stopped before the house. The coachman got down from the box and went in by the area door. Presently he came out, and seemed to deliver a message to the people in the carriage.

"Then he got on the seat again, and the carriage drove off. I wasn't able to trace it beyond that point, so I came on here, telegraphed to Scotland Yard for you, and here we are."

"It's a very pretty case,' said Bart. "I'm glad to get into it."

As he said these words there was a noise of hoofs and wheels, and a carriage stopped before the store.

Warde stepped to the door, unlocked it, and the next moment two women entered hurriedly, and in evident excitement.

THE MAN BY THE ROADSIDE.

"MRS. ACKERSLEY," exclaimed Warde, "what has brought you here?"

The person addressed was a sweet-faced lady somewhat past middle-age. She was accompanied by an extremely handsome girl. Both were very well-dressed, though not expensively, but as ladies of slender means and abundant good taste dress when they are going out to some evening entertainment.

"My son," cried Mrs. Ackersley; "I am anxious about him."

Warde was on the point of disclosing the whole matter with a directness which might have been sufficient to seriously endanger the life of a woman as delicate as Mrs. Ackersley seemed to be. A sign from Bart warned him.

"Why are you anxious about him?" asked Warde, restraining himself.

"He was to meet us at the theatre," said Mrs. Ackersley, "and he did not do so. He had said that he might be quite late, and had told us to remain through the performance.

"We did so, though at the last we became quite anxious about him. But when we got to my home and found that he had not been there, we were alarmed.

"Oh, has something happened to him? I seem to read it in your face that—that——"

"Miss Enid"—indicating the handsome girl—"remembered that Arthur has sometimes been detained here very late, and so she suggested driving down here. Oh, has something happened to him? I seem to read in your face that—that——"

She stopped, overcome by her feelings.

"To be frank with you," said Warde kindly, "we do not know where your son is, and we, also, are anxious about him."

Mrs. Ackersley gasped for breath, and would have fallen but for Bart's arm. Miss Enid, too, was prompt to render assistance, though it was evident that she could scarcely find the strength to do so.

Digitized by Google

Bart had not lost a single detail of this scene. He had noticed, besides what has been related, an interchange of glances, rapid as thought, between Miss Enid and Gray.

They were distrust and suspicion on the one side, and a suggestion of malicious triumph on the other, which were full of meaning to the keen detective.

"Am I right in supposing," he said to Mrs. Ackersley, "that Miss Enid and your son are on terms of very close friendship?"

"They are to be married," replied the lady.

Gray scowled.

"So I ventured to imagine," said Bart; but whether he referred to the engagement or to Gray's frown may be a matter of conjecture.

He did not pursue the subject, but, anticipating the questions that were on the lady's lips, he told the story of the diamond robbery so far as it is known to the reader.

This he did in the gentlest manner, but it was an ugly story at the best.

There seemed to be only two alternatives. Either Ackersley was in the plot, or he had suffered some injury at the hands of the plotters.

It was impossible to account for his failure to return or to communicate with the girl in any other way. True he might be a prisoner, but such was improbable to say the least.

"It looks bad for your son, there is no denying," said Gray to Mrs. Ackersley. "He was implicitly trusted by Mr. Warde. But we all hope even now that he will prove to be honest."

"You need have no anxiety on that score," said Miss Enid. "He will."

"That's how the wind blows, is it?" was Bart's mental comment, as he took in every expression and gesture of those about him. "Gray is in love with the young lady, and jealous of his rival and nothing will suit his purpose better than to have Ackersley found guilty."

"Allow me to remark that I quite agree with you, Miss Enid," he said aloud.

Mr. Warde and the two ladies looked very much relieved, and the former took occasion to remark:

"This is Mr. Bart Hocking of Scotland Yard. You have heard of him?"

The mother at once appealed to the detective.

"Tell me," she said, "do you think my son is safe, or that he has suffered at the hands of some dreadful criminals?"

"From all I can learn there is but one criminal in this case, so far, and that is this woman. Who her accomplices are and how they have worked I have yet to find out. Your son was young and strong, and was doubtless able to take care of himself. It is certain, however, that he has met with some difficulty in the discharge of his duty, and it remains for us to help him out of it.

"The greatest help you can render me at present, ladies, is to go home and remain there until we communicate with you. Should Mr. Ackersley return home, telegraph at once to Scotland Yard."

The ladies reluctantly yielded to Bart's persuasion, and at once bade good-night and were driven home.

As the door was closed behind them Bart Hocking turned to Gray and said:

"I wish you would remain here constantly, Mr. Gray. Should Ackersley turn up, communicate with headquarters. Mr. Warde, will you accompany me?"

The famous detective and the jeweller went out together, and, hailing a cab, Bart Hocking gave directions to be driven to the house in Kensington Gardens.

"We must trace that carriage from this point," said Bart, when they had arrived.

"Impossible," exclaimed his companion.

Bart smiled.

"Nothing is impossible," he said.

Some think that this tracing of a person or a vehicle is simply a matter of asking questions. They are mistaken. It requires skill and an intelligent perception, of which an untrained mind has no conception. With the born detective, there is to be sure a great deal of instinct—a sort of second sight.

Although it was far past midnight when they set out, Bart was able to follow that carriage along the route it took through the city streets. It took a great deal of patient work, the asking of innumerable questions, and much profound reasoning.

At last Bart and his companion made their way to the nearest hackney stand, and the detective looked carefully at the horses, eventually selecting one, that showed he was an excellent judge of horse flesh and knew when the qualities of speed and endurance are apparent.

A few words of direction to cabby, and they were off as fast as they coul l safely go.

"Where are you going?" asked Warde, in a tone of bewilderment.

"We are going to visit the sanatorium of Dr. Fardyce, in Surrey. I want to ask the gentleman a few questions."

"But, my dear sir, he can't possibly know anything about it."

"Possibly not."

"You don't suspect him?" asked Mr. Warde in consternation.

"No, I can't say I do. I'm not doing any suspecting yet. But I am not going to his asylum as a patient. No; my brain is working all right, I think, and I am quite sure Dr. Fardyce can have no conscious connection with this affair."

"Then why are you going there? By Jove, I have an idea! I wonder it didn't occur to me before."

"What is your idea?"

"Why, Fardyce keeps a lunatic asylum."

"That's the size of it, although he talks, or rather writes—for I've read some of his stuff—about diseases of the brain as though you could wash them out of the head with a shampoo."

"His patients are crazy. Now you've got my idea. This thing was done by a patient who imagined she was the doctor's wife."

The detective laughed heartily.

"You are ingenious at conjecture, but it won't work."

Mr. Warde looked hurt.

"I'm simply following the trail of that carriage."

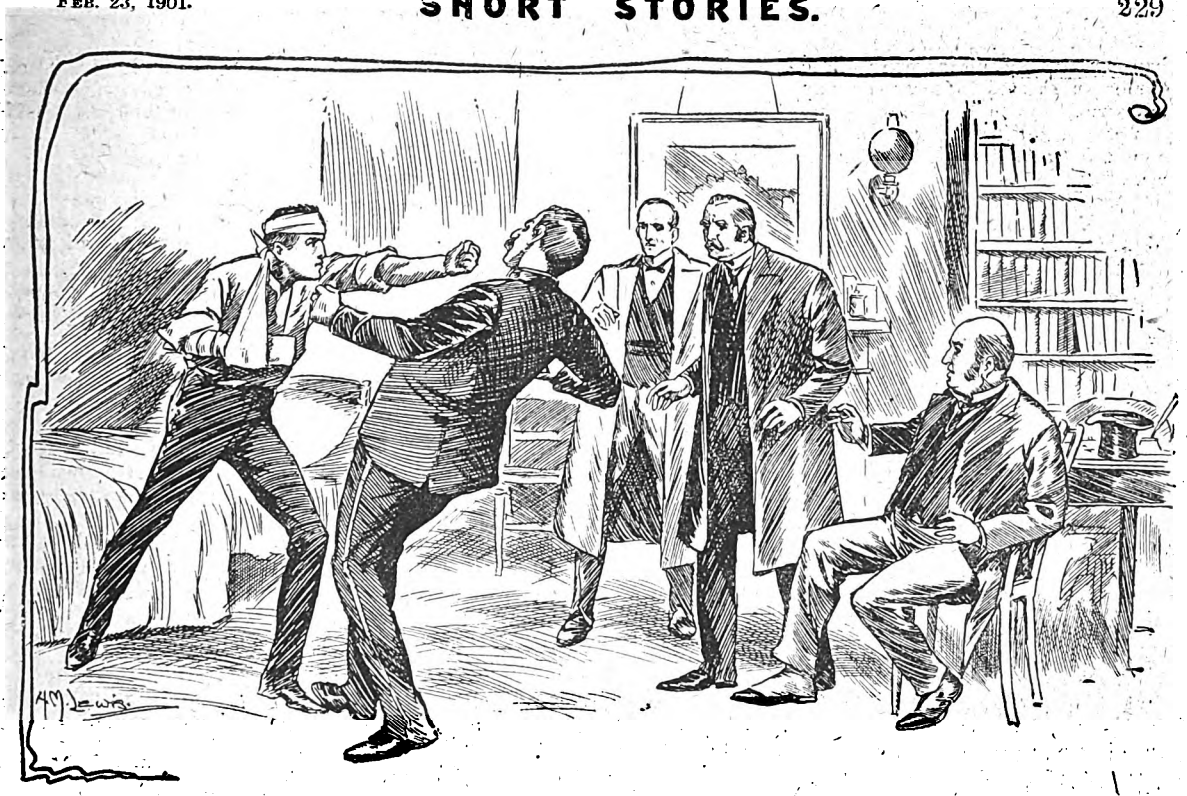
"Why, how do you know——"

"Look here! This woman said she was going to see her husband. She drove up to the town house. Of course, she knew that it was closed.

"That was only a starter. She couldn't turn any trick with a man like Ackersley in broad day and in the city streets.

"In short, she had to take him somewhere else. Where? Why, of course, to Doctor Fardyce's other residence—to his sanatorium or lunatic asylum or whatever you call it.

Digitized by Google



"He staggered to his feet and struck straight out."

"That's in quite an open country. It would give some chance for the job to be done.

"And it would have seemed quite natural to Ackersley that they should go there. Of course, that coachman who pretended to go into the house delivered a satisfactory message explaining why the doctor wished his wife to bring the diamonds to the sanatorium.

"To make this conclusion perfectly sure, I traced the carriage for some distance in this direction. I have no doubt now as to its destination."

"But what do you think became of Ackersley?"

Bart's brow darkened.

"I'm afraid he's been roughly dealt with, but Nan Oldham has always had the reputation of avoiding violence."

"Nan Oldham? Who is she?"

"The woman in the case. I recognised her at once by the description. She's one of the finest confidence operators in the world. She ought to be, for she's been at it since she was ten years old, and she's now forty-nine, or will be on the twenty-ninth of this month."

"Is it possible? By Jupiter! What a head you must have! Why, you recognise this thief in a flash; you knew what she was doing before you were born, and you name her birthday as if she were a member of your own family."

"I'm quite at home in the great and ancient family of Crook," laughed Bart; "it's an interesting family, and repays study."

They flew along over the excellent roads. Day broke, but mistily, so that it was not yet light when they entered the ground surrounding the sanatorium.

A large and dense grove completely hid the house The private way wound through the shadows of the great trees, as if seeking the darkest spots.

His eyes seemed to pierce the shadows.

Suddenly "Halt!" he cried, and sprang out. The light of his lantern flashed upon the way. He seemed to be taking measurements.

"The carriage passed here," he said. "It went in, and it returned. Of course, I can't be sure of this; but I obtained one fairly good imprint of the wheels while we were tracing. The carriage was unusually wide. Drive on; I will walk a few steps. Hold."

The last word was uttered softly, but with a thrill that struck to Warde's heart.

Bart's figure, too, might have been a sculptured ideal of Attention.

Suddenly he leaped over some low shrubbery, and vanished instantly from Warde's view.

That was too much for Warde. His curiosity, reinforced by a nervous dread of some terrible disclosure, got quite the better of him.

He leaped out and sprang forward toward the spot where Bart had stood, the horse frightened by the sudden movement, dashed ahead, and went careering up the avenue with a clatter of hoofs, and a rattle of the swaying vehicle.

"What's that?" called Bart.

"Cabby has lost control of his horse."

"Let them go. Come here."

A light shone among the trees. It was close by the road, but a dense shadow had hitherto hidden Bart. The lantern's light had been thrown upon the ground, but when Bart turned, at the noise of the runaway cab, the light became visible and guided Warde.

Digitized by Google

He, too, leaped over the little hedge-row, and found Bart standing beside a dark object which lay huddled upon the ground, upon the gnarled roots of a great tree.

UNRAVELLING THE MYSTERY.

"Is this Ackersley?" said Bart.

He had turned the man upon his back. The light of the lantern flashed upon his face.

Warde shuddered.

"I don't know," he said. "I shouldn't recognise him. He's dead of course."

"No, he isn't dead, and he isn't going to die."

"What? With that face!"

"That's only a bruise. It looks rather gruesome, I admit, but in a week's time, he will look as well as ever."

"I shouldn't know him," said Warde, "Yet, it looks like him. Yes, it must be he. But, hold on! These aren't his clothes."

"Sure?"

"Perfectly. There's nothing fashionable about this rig."

"I should say not," responded the detective. "The same idea crossed my mind."

"What ails him?"

"He's got a bad cut on the inside of his right arm, and he has fainted from loss of blood. Why he didn't bleed to death is a question which I leave to his guardian angel. However, he is safe now, I have stopped the bleeding. We must take him to the house."

Steps were heard on the walk. Men were running. The light of a lantern flashed among the trees.

A burly man leaped over the low hedge and confronted them, holding up the lantern so that the light struck into their faces.

"What are you doing here?" he cried.

"We were coming out to see Dr. Fardyce," replied Bart, "and we found this wounded man in the grounds."

The fellow with the lantern bent forward. Then he shouted to someone in the road.

"It's him! Here he is!"

"Who?" asked Bart blandly.

"An insane patient from the sanatorium," responded the man. "He escaped during the night. Is he dead?"

"No, he will come to himself soon. What's his name?"

"Al Hayman. I don't know any more about him. Dr. Fardyce can answer your questions if he thinks best."

At this moment cabby drove up slowly, having regained control of his horse. The wounded person was carried out and put into the cab.

The newly-risen sun by this time was dispersing the mists and paling the lantern's light

They drove to the house. On the veranda of the large and handsome building they saw Dr. Fardyce, a tall, high-shouldered man, with a tremendous mass of hair that was almost white, though he seemed not to be very old.

"You've got him, have you?" he asked. "Who are these men?"

Bart was not slow in effecting an introduction, though he did not allow it to delay proceedings. It is Bart's peculiar faculty that he always directs when he wishes to do so. He asked the doctor who the wounded man was.

"He's a patient committed in the usual way to my care."

"By whom?"

"By his mother, under the advice and certification of physicians, as the law directs. Here are the papers."

"Doctor Fields, Doctor Lee, Doctor Warren Graham," murmured Bart, glancing at the document. "I know the first two, but not the last."

"He is, I understand, a very competent physician. He was here yesterday when this young man was committed."

"Spare man, not above medium size, close-trimmed beard and moustache, very bright blue-grey eyes?" asked Bart.

"Yes."

"I know him. Please tell the whole story."

"Well," replied Doctor Fardyce, "it was the day before yesterday when the young man's mother came here. She described her son's case to me.

"It seems that he suffered from melancholia, accompanied by the usual delusions and other adverse symptoms. He had, for instance, the delusion of persecution—very common, as you know. When irritated, so she told me, he imagined that he was being robbed, etc., etc. Common enough.

"Well, she examined my establishment with the utmost care. She inspected the kitchens, the bedrooms, the sanitary arrangements—everything.

"I have never seen a more intelligent woman, nor one of more refined and cultivated manner and conversation.

"At last she expressed herself satisfied. She promised to bring her son the next day.

"She arrived promptly, accompanied by the son—whom you see here—and by Doctor Graham.

"The young man seemed perfectly calm, but his mother was evidently labouring under violent agitation. When she came into the parlour I was not present. In fact, on seeing her approach, I had gone to summon two of my assistants, for I feared a scene. She had prepared me for it.

"The two assistants, one of whom is now present," he pointed to a broad-shouldered fellow, who was attempting to revive the patient, "came into the room before me.

"The lady, the son, and Doctor Graham were there. Suddenly the lady's feelings overcame her.

"She flung her arms around the young man's neck and began to bid him the most affectionate adieu.

"Of course, that was very injudicious. He became violent so my assistants tell me, in a moment.

"The mother attempted to get out of the room. The son raved, and declared that he was being robbed.

"You see, that was his delusion. His mother had prepared us for that.

"Finally he sprang towards his mother, who had attempted to leave the room, and my assistants were obliged to seize him.

"They pinioned his hands. His mother, with tears in her eyes, kissed him while my men held him, and then tore herself away, followed by Doctor Graham.

"And accompanied by ten thousand one hundred and seventeen pounds worth of diamonds belonging to you, Mr. Warde," said Bart, "I guess the game is clear enough now."

"What?" gasped Warde and the doctor in one breath.

Digitized by Google

"Certainly," said Bart. "The woman was Nan Oldham, the celebrated confidence operator; the 'doctor' was her husband; the coachman on the box was in reality her son; and the pretended son was your clerk, Ackersley who now lies here bruised and unconscious."

The two men were speechless. Bart continued:

"I can see how it was done. That husband of hers is really a doctor, but he's much more of an actor. It must have been he who played the lunatic, and was examined by Dr. Fields and Dr. Lee.

"Then, you see, when the certificate was made out, the husband, Oldham, had the two doctors' signatures. He merely put on Dr. Graham's name in order that he might pass for a doctor out here."

"But the diamonds——" Warde began.

"They will be recovered; I have notified the police. Oldham and his wife will be arrested."

It may be well to say that this was actually the case.

He found Bart standing beside a dark object.

When Bart had spoken, a noise was heard in that corner of the room where Ackersley lay on a couch.

"He's coming to," said the attendant.

Neither before nor since is there a case of such a remarkable recovery in all Bart's experience.

Ackersley woke from his stupor almost as a man wakes in the morning. He gazed wonderingly round. Then the condition of things was explained to him.

Then Ackersley told how the woman had taken him to the city house, how the coachman had brought out the pretended message that Dr. Fardyce had been unexpectedly called to the asylum, how the woman had persuaded him to go there.

Then came the scene in the parlour, his surprise when the woman suddenly flung her arms around his neck and began to call him "her dear son," his wrath when, overpowered by the two strong men, he saw her take the box of jewels from the table, where he had put it, and walk off with it.

In the struggle which he had made to free himself, his clothes were torn to shreds, and both the attendants received mementoes of his skill as a boxer.

But he was finally caged in a room with barred windows, where he yelled and raved until he was worn out.

In the night he had escaped by wrenching the bars off the window and breaking the sash.

As he climbed through, he cut himself with a piece of the window glass, but he did not think it was serious. The flow of blood, however, soon weakened him, and he fell unconscious beside the road, toppling over the low hedge and string face downward upon the roots of the tree. He remembered no more.

It is needless to say that the fortunate conclusion of the adventure carried joy to Mrs. Ackersley and Miss Enid—a joy which Mr. Gray could not share.

"There's one particularly curious thing about this case," said Bart in summing up after the arrest of the Oldhams and the recovery of the diamonds. "This woman's mother worked almost the same game in Liverpool nearly fifty years ago. Now, as the mother died when this girl was an infant, and it's doubtful whether the daughter ever heard of it, we find this problem—Did Nan Oldham inherit the game? Was it implanted in her brain? I think I'll send this to the Society for Psychical Research."

Digitized by Google

A BARD OF THE "HALLS."

"You knows I ain't a 'ard woman, Mister Jessip; but pay me somethin' this week you must, or I'll 'ave to let your room to somebody else. Times is bad; here's my own flesh an' blood to think on an' the struggle it is for a pore widder like me to——"

"I think I shall be able to manage something this week, Mrs. Batty—perhaps to-day. I'm just off now to try my luck."

"There mustn't be no thinkin' about it. Onless you can settle up the back rent, you réal'y must make room for somebody as can pay reg'lar. 'Eaven knows, I wouldn't speak so crool if I wasn't obliged; but it's a dooty I owes to my children when they ain't gettin' none too much to eat. You see 'ow I'm placed?"

"Yes, yes; you've been very good to me, and nothing would please me better than to square up. Anyhow, wish me luck at the Corner to-day. I've written a song for Hyde—the famous Arnold Hyde, you know. I fancy he'll like it."

"I 'ope 'e will, an' that 'e'll pay you somethin' 'andsome."

"We shall see about that. Well, good-morning, Mrs. Batty; I'll be back as soon as I can."

And, opening the street-door—for the foregoing colloquy had taken place in the passage—Mrs. Batty's second-floor-back left the house.

"Pore feller!" mused the landlady, as she retired to her kitchen; "'twas a 'ard job to tell 'im 'e must go, 'e do look that mortal bad—but there, I 'ad to do it."

His eyes fixed on the pavement, Paul Jes op slowly made his way towards the eastern end of York Road, Lambeth. It was Monday morning; that morning of the week on which all sorts and conditions of folks connected with the "variety" profession assemble at the spot known as "Poverty Corner."

Ever since music-halls have existed, "the Corner" has been the Monday morning rendezvous of artistes, agents, managers, song-writers, and certain mysterious nondescripts who go there on Heaven knows what business. The "stars" usually drive up to the Corner, and swagger into the saloon of the adjacent tavern, where portly, overdressed agents and proprietors await them with contracts ready for signature. The failures of the profession cool their heels on the spacious pavement outside, discuss the prospects of something turning up, and try to borrow shillings from any fellow-pro. who was lucky enough to be "in work" during the previous week.

It was among the seedy ones of the pavement that Paul Jessop took his stand. Though the day was bitterly cold, he, like many others present, wore no overcoat. His clothes, originally of none too stout a texture, were nearly threadbare, his boots were decidedly leaky; and as his diet for several days past had consisted of dry bread and weak tea, it was small wonder that he looked somewhat pinched and haggard.

Paul Jessop was a poet—a bard of the halls. It was an unlucky night for him when his maiden effusion was graciously accepted by a third-rate comic vocalist appearing at the "Bijou," a minor north-London hall. At that time Jessop was managing a little grocery establishment for his aged mother, and, being on friendly terms with the proprietor of the neighbouring "Bijou," he was almost a nightly frequenter of the place. He hobnobbed with the performers, stood them whiskies, and sometimes "went behind." Then, being ambitious, he had ground out four verses of doggerel with a chorus commencing "We're the boys who Never Pass a Pub," which, with some diffidence, he submitted to Arnold Hyde, an obscure artiste who was glad enough to render three songs a night for as many pounds per week.

Hyde voted Paul Jessop's ditty "rippin'."

"I'll get Jimmy Brett to do the melody for it," he remarked with enthusiasm. "Set to a good tune, this thing o' yours 'll fairly knock 'em. It's great! You must do some more for me, my boy; there's coin to be made at the song-writin' biz—'eaps o' coin!"

The verses were duly set to a jingling melody, and Arnold Hyde sang the ditty. His prophecy proved correct—"We're the Boys who Never Pass a Pub" was to the public's taste; it delighted music-hall audiences, and was soon all over the town. 'Arrys and 'Arriets bawled the chorus as, with linked arms, they paraded the streets; every orgin-grinder added the tune to his répertoire; and the publishers of the song sold thousands of copies.

Digitized by Google

Arnold Hyde's agent quickly pushed him to the front and at a bound the erstwhile third-rater became a "star," worked three big halls a night, and was driven thither in a brougham.

Paul Jessop, the writer of the "roof-raiser," received a guinea as his reward; Jimmy Brett, the composer, was paid thirty shillings (but then, he provided a set of "band-parts" in addition to the bare melody).

Hyde himself received several snug cheques from the music-publishers on account of the royalties; and as the ditty also made his reputation, he had reason to be tolerably satisfied with his bargain.

His initial success as a song-writer, proved the undoing of Paul Jessop. He began to neglect the grocery business, haunted the West-end and variety-palaces, and struck up expensive friendships in taverns of professional resort.

He wrote another song, which Hyde purchased "outright" for three guineas. This second attempt, entitled "I'll Never Take In Lodgers Any More," though not so successful as the first, was nevertheless popular. It strengthened Hyde's reputation, and brought him in money, for the song sold exceedingly well when published.

At his mother's death, which occurred about this time, Paul Jessop inherited the little grocery business. He engaged a man to attend to the shop; but, as things didn't flourish, Jessop sold the stock and goodwill for something less than a hundred pounds. Then he migrated to the south side of the Thames, and became a professional song-writer.

For a time his earnings averaged about a pound per week, for at the outset Arnold Hyde paid him the fixed sum of three guineas a song. As, however, Jessop failed to produce another "We're the Boys, etc.," the price was soon reduced by one half. Other artistes for whom he wrote paid anything from two guineas to five shillings.

Upon his earnings and the money realised by the sale of the business, Paul Jessop subsisted for a while. Then he contracted a serious illness, and, as the doctor's bill ran away with all but a few sovereigns of his scanty reserve fund, he deemed it prudent to seek cheaper lodgings.

Accordingly, he engaged a single room in a dingy street off the Waterloo Road, and at first paid the worthy Mrs. Batty's bill with commendable regularity. Soon, however, his money gave out, and arrears began to accumulate.

Jessop had never been a ready rhymester, but, since his illness, the composition even of such stuff as passed muster at the halls had become a species of torture. Nor would ideas come as formerly. Cudgel his brains as he would, his output dwindled both in quantity and quality, and during the last month he had disposed of one solitary song for the princely sum of seven-and-sixpence.

Thus things had gone from bad to worse, until at length Widow Batty, seeing no prospect of an improvement in the financial position of her second-floor-back, had been forced to "speak out" in the manner above related.

Paul Jessop had one ray of hope this morning. In his pocket was the MS. of a song written for his first patron, Arnold Hyde. The conception, writing, and touching-up of this effusion represented several days' hard labour, and the author was well satisfied with the result. It was a convivial ditty, written in Jessop's best style, and—what was a most important detail—it had a promising "catch-line."

"I'll ask four guineas for it," mused Jessop, as he shivered at the Corner, "perhaps Hyde will give that—it's a long time since he's had a real success."

Presently Hyde arrived in a smart trap, jumped out, and hurried into the saloon bar. Jessop waited about twenty minutes; then, judging that the comedian had probably settled what business he had with his agent, he entered the place.

Hyde was just standing brandies and ninepenny cigars to a knot of prosperous-looking cronies, when Jessop touched him upon the sleeve.

"Hullo!" he said, turning, "got something to show me?"

Jessop nodded, whereupon Hyde drained his glass, and led the way to a quiet corner of the bar.

"What's it like this time?" grumbled the comedian. "Those last things I had of you were rotten frosts—dear at a bob a time. I can't get hold of a decent song lately. Why don't you write me something as'll fetch 'em?"

Paul Jessop offered the MS. by way of reply.

"Um! this might go down," observed Hyde, after a hasty perusal. "How much?"

The poet nervously suggested four guineas, whereat the other laughed boisterously.

"Well, you've got a nerve, I don't think!" he remarked. "Why, I can get reams o' stuff like this at half-a-dollar a verse. Four guineas! I wonder you don't say five while you're about it!"

A quarter of an hour later, Paul Jessop was walking wearily to his lodgings. In his pocket was ten and sixpence. The great Arnold Hyde had promised him "a bit extra" in the event of the new song catching on.

* * * * *

Three weeks elapsed before "Oh Lor! Didn't We Shift the Gargle" was tried in public. The song was an instant, an unqualified success; "it fair paralysed em," to use Hyde's own expression. At each of the halls where he appeared the gallery seized lustily upon the chorus, and that "Oh Lor Didn't We Shift the Gargle" would be the song for some time to come was patent to everybody who understood the signs.

On the night that witnessed Hyde's great triumph there halted outside St. ——'s Hospital, a police-ambulance. From it was lifted an inanimate form. A moment's examination was sufficient. "A hopeless case! He won't live another hour," said the doctor.

* * * * *

Many Monday mornings came and went, and Arnold Hyde wondered why Jessop failed to show up at the corner. "I must give the poor devil a couple o' quid, I suppose," said the "star." "'Didn't We Shift the Gargle' is a fair ripper—it'll go for months yet."

The ditty did go for months. Hyde, whose popularity and salary had been steadily declining, once more became a prime favourite; his name appeared upon the bills in the largest of type, and his terms went up to a high figure. Royalties on the sale of "Oh Lor! Didn't We Shift the Gargle," also swelled his banking-account appreciably.

But he has never had an opportunity of rewarding the "poor devil" of an author. For Paul Jessop lived barely an hour after his admittance to St. ——'s Hospital, and, in due course, the coroner recorded a verdict of death from starvation and exposure.

The parish saw to the burial.

Digitized by Google

THE LION'S WARS

The Afghan War of 1842. "The Army of Retribution."

ALTHOUGH it may be urged that having been guilty of the supreme folly of forcing on so proud and warlike a race as the Afghans a sovereign whom they hated, the reverses we subsequently experienced were a just punishment for the folly of our policy, still it was absolutely necessary on political grounds that the disaster which had befallen our arms in our ignominious retreat from Afghanistan in 1841 should be avenged.

Our humiliation had been great. Of the 21,000 fighting men, 30,000 camp followers, and 30,000 camels which had crossed the Indus to seat Shah Soojah on the throne a few thousands were left, but the whole of the Cabul division, which numbered 5,000, under General Elphinstone, had perished, with the exception of one man, whilst of the others General Sale was besieged at Jellalabad, and General Nott was surrounded at Candahar.

But there were other reasons besides the restoration of our prestige why a moment should not be lost in sending out an "Army of Retribution."

Lady Sale and her daughter, Lady Macnaghtan, and the wives of three officers, and three privates, were in the hands of the Afghans; in addition, General Shelton, Colonel Palmer, Major Pottinger, Major Griffith, twelve captains, nine lieutenants, three ensigns, three surgeons, and twenty-eight non-commissioned officers and privates. General Elphinstone had died in captivity.

Preparations for invading Afghanistan were pushed on with feverish haste. After much deliberation the command of the "Army of Retribution" was vested in General Pollock whose ability as an officer, in addition to a wonderful shrewdness of character, would be of great service in counteracting the egotistical timidity of Lord Ellenborough, the new Governor General, a clever but weak man.

In April, 1842, General Pollock and 8,000 men left Peshawar to relieve the "Illustrious garrison of Sale" as it was called, in India, and Nott at Candahar. A new line of advance was selected. No General had ever conveyed at that time a body of troops through the formidable Khyber Pass.

The news of our approach quickly spread amongst the fierce native mountain tribes, and on our arrival we found over 10,000 Khyberees ready to contend our advance. But the mountaineers had to contend, in the person of the British general, with one even more wily than themselves, and a body of British troops burning to avenge the late disastrous defeat. Finding the enemy posted in strong force on the precipitous cliffs lining the pass, General Pollock sent a couple of strong columns to scale the rugged heights and take the enemy on either side in the rear.

These admirable tactics so bewildered the Khyberees that our main body was enabled to traverse the pass and demolish the barrier which had been erected at the other end. This success, especially as our losses were only fourteen killed and 104 wounded, greatly elated the troops. But much remained to be accomplished.

Digitized by Google

The country to be traversed was as full of defensive positions as that round Ladysmith in Natal. Indeed, the efforts of General Pollock to relieve General Sale of Jellalabad bore striking resemblance to the Natal operations of General Buller.

On April 6th Ali Musjid was attacked, and after a series of desperate encounters, lasting several days, the enemy were driven headlong from all their positions, and the road to Jellalabad was clear. Jellalabad relieved, and none too soon, Pollock was making arrangements for the relief of General Nott at Candahar when the vacillating Governor-General sent an order peremptorily forbidding Pollock to advance.

The Governor-General was greatly alarmed because he had heard that Brigadier England and a portion of General Nott's army had suffered a reverse at Hykulzye. Why General Nott was to be left to his fate because General England had been defeated is not clear.

Pollock obeyed his instructions, but he allowed General Sale to sally forth and attack Akbar Khan's camp. Such was the daring of the troops—a striking contrast to the column which perished under Elphinstone—that, on nearing the enemy, the artillery galloped to the front, their accurate discharges throwing the Afghan centre into such confusion, that two strong columns of our infantry coming up at the double were able to come to close quarters with the bayonet.

The Afghans fought in the most gallant style. The way their horsemen charged down on us would have done credit to our own cavalry, but as the British soldier is never so dangerous as after a reverse, the field was soon covered with riderless horses. There was no task too hazardous for our men to accomplish that day. Great damage was done during one of our flanking movements by an Afghan battery of three guns, screened by a garden wall, the serving of which was superintended by Akbar Khan in person. A wild rush, a British cheer, and in a trice the wall was scaled, and the gunners cut to pieces, Akbar Khan himself narrowly escaping capture.

It is said that the elation exhibited by our men when they learnt that these three guns they had taken were part of the artillery lost by the Cabul force under Elphinstone, was something to remember. Strong men flung themselves on these mute witnesses of their country's dishonour, kissing and hugging them as if they were alive.

Although the day was practically over, our men could not rest content till the recovered artillery had regained its lost character, so they at once turned on the foe. About 5 p.m., the Afghan camp caught fire, burning the whole of their tents. This completed their discomfiture. During the retreat, we captured all their food, munitions, standards, besides killing some thousands, including many of their most powerful chiefs. Our own loss was trifling, three officers and about fifty wounded, in addition to casualties among the native troops.

To have been soundly thrashed by the very force they had been blockading was a deep mortification to the Afghans. But the retirement of General England to Quetta, although quite an unimportant affair, still weighed so heavily on the spirits of the Governor-General that he ordered General Nott to evacuate Candahar, and retreat to the Indus, after demolishing the defences and blowing up the gateways. As Nott was not a general of the retiring order he, naturally, deeply resented his instructions, but fearful lest the command of his force should be transferred to one of the staff of the Commander-in-Chief, Sir Jasper Nicholls, who had disapproved of the expedition, he obeyed.

The moment it became known in India that Lord Ellenborough had resolved on the evacuation of the country a storm of indignation arose. This so unnerved India's ruler that Pollock, who had been also peremptorily ordered by Sir Jasper Nicholls to retreat, wrote, stating with sarcastic emphasis, that the retirement would involve the sacrifice of the captives, to say nothing of an additional loss of prestige. To this the Governor-General replied, reiterating the order to evacuate the country, but giving the two generals permission to select their own route.

General Pollock and Nott, being officers who placed the honour of their country above all other considerations, and having implicit confidence in their men, were not long in devising a plan, which enabled them to fulfil his lordship's instructions and still preserve the honour of the country.

On August 10th General Pollock left Jellalabad to return to India. He did not make for his destination in as straight a line as the Governor-General or Sir Jasper Nicholls would have liked, for he marched to Jugdulluk. Finding there a strong force of Ghilzees he at once attacked them.

The British soldier is, as a rule, no politician, but tell him that as the country is to be evacuated, the chances of engaging the enemy will be strictly limited and he realises that he is expected to do his work thoroughly when the time comes.

Tommy, being fully persuaded that there was something wrong in Calcutta, resolved to put matters right in Afghanistan. So our men buckled to. They stormed apparently inaccessible positions, they climbed towering heights, and routed the Ghilzees from positions regarded as impregnable. In short, Mr. Atkins showed such zeal that day that Akbar Khan became so alarmed, that after sending his captives into Turkistan, he collected a large army and met us at Tezeer, the very pass in which a few months before so many of our poor fellows had been massacred.

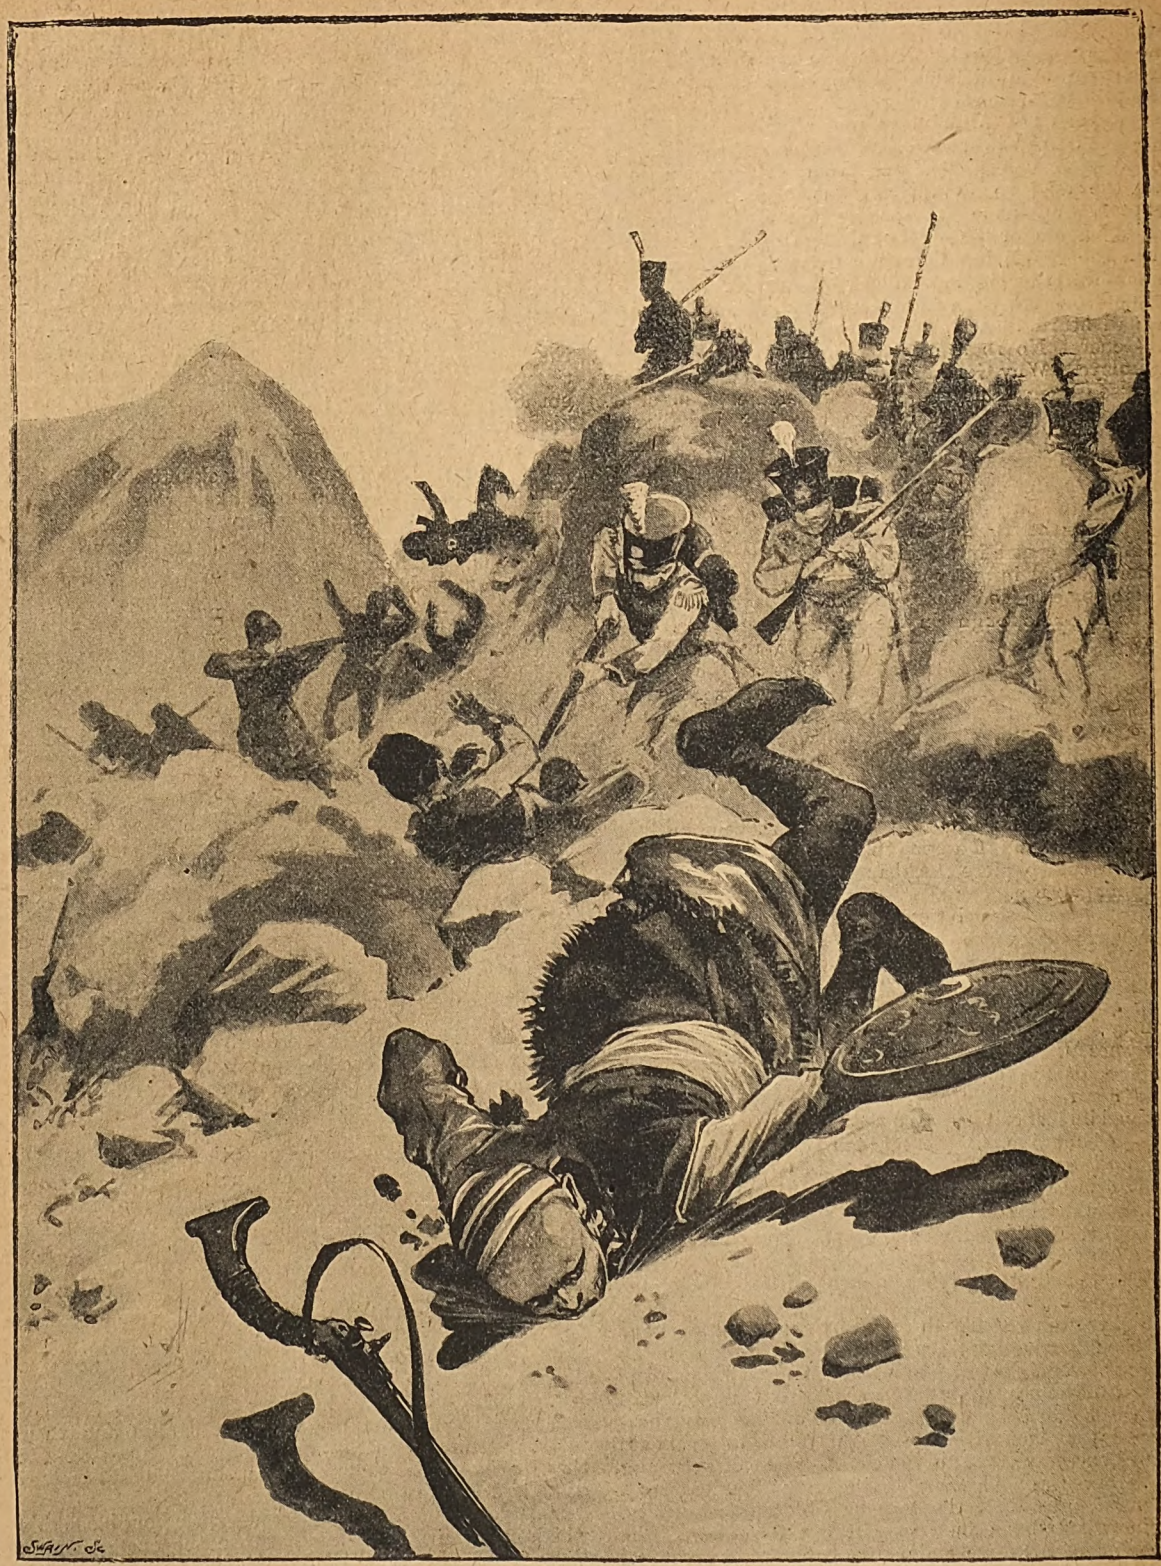
It was a great mistake for Akbar to fix on Tezeer as a battle ground, for the moment our men heard the truth they literally burned for the fray to begin. What cared they if the plains were alive with the enemy's cavalry and that their footmen swarmed in the hills? The more there were, the more there would be to kill. So the moment they caught sight of the enemy they rushed pell mell at them.

The Afghans, being as clever as the Boers in taking cover, strove to check their advance. But what hope was there of preventing our men reaching the top when at every step they passed the skeletons of their dead comrades? It is said that what with emotion and excitement, our men's faces were bathed in perspiration and tears when they reached the top. Then they wiped their faces and chased the enemy from off those frowning hills. They felt, at last, that the army was fulfilling its mission, and an "Army of Retribution" it did prove itself to be that day.

Akbar and his chiefs, knowing that on the issue of this battle depended the fate of the capital and their relatives, fought with an energy of despair. If they had been wise they would have removed the corpses of their victims beforehand

Next day the troops, maddened by the horrible sights which met their gaze, literally drove the enemy before them right through the formidable pass of Khurd

Digitized by Google



They chased the enemy from off those frowning hills.

Digitized by Google

Kabul. They strove to delay us by seizing various strong posts in the heights above, but as the day wore on the fury of our men so got on their nerves that, despite all the exertions of Akbar and his chiefs, the Afghans took to flight.

They screwed their courage up at Buth-huk, but the stern, set faces, and the bayonets of our men dislodged them so effectually, that finding the road clear, General Pollock, on August 14th, pitched his tents outside Cabul, and two days later, with his staff and a strong escort, entered the Bala Hissar. There were shorter ways to India than the way he had travelled, but as a band playing "God Save the Queen" in the streets of Cabul was the quickest way of restoring the prestige of Britain, General Pollock was quite prepared to risk the displeasure of his official superiors.

Curiously enough, General Nott, having also arranged to return to India via Cabul, evacuated Candahar, August 7th, 1842, leaving the city in the hands of Sufder Jung, son of Shah Soojah, the potentate we had foolishly forced on the Afghans. Determined not to be outdone by Pollock's men, the soldiers of General Nott rushed with such inconceivable fury on every fort in their road that the nerves of the defenders got into as bad a state as those of their countrymen who had fought Pollock's beauties, as they were called.

When Lord Ellenborough heard that Nott had reached Ghaznee, he evidently thought it time to identify himself with the avenging movement, so he ordered General Nott to bring away the gates of Sommauth adorning the tomb of Guzerat. A more monstrous exhibition of folly, a more shameless act of desecration, was never perpetrated. The gates were of no service to us, whilst to the Afghans they were beyond price.

Cowed as the Afghans were, the news that Nott had stolen the gates from the sacred tomb stirred into life the dying embers of their resistance.

Driven at last on to the plains below, they sustained such a crushing defeat that Nott was free to turn his attention to Shumshoodan Khan, who, after the destruction of Ghazni, had retired to a range of strong mountain posts at Nayden. Although these strongholds were not on the road to India, Nott made his way there, fighting a series of battles for their capture. The posts all destroyed and the Afghans dispersed, Nott now made for Cabul, to unite his forces to those of General Pollock.

The great object of the campaign had now to be achieved. Akbar had removed all his prisoners from Cabul on August 25th, compelling not only the officers and men, but even the ladies and children, to travel day and night without cessation. Their clothing was insufficient, and the food supplied was of the poorest quality; but of that Akbar thought nothing. His aim was to get them to Bamecan, on the other side of the snow-capped Hindu Kush.

Sir Richard Shakespeare and 600 horse were at once dispatched in pursuit of the fugitives, with instructions to use every means to overtake them. On the following day Sir Robert Sale and a strong force of infantry followed hot foot.

Akbar Khan had left word that the prisoners were to be murdered if we ever took them; but, fortunately for the rescuing party, Saleh Muhammed, their gaoler, was one of those Asiatics whose love of gold was even greater than his hatred of the English dog. He met the troopers twenty miles from the fort where they were confined, and spurned with disdain the first offer of Sir Richard Shakespeare; but when the bribe was increased to a lakh of rupees to give up the captives, he hesitated. Two days later he produced a letter from Akbar, ordering him to transfer the prisoners to the charge of Usbeg, chief of the Khulumans.

The pursuers, knowing nothing of the infamous character this worthy bore, made Saleh no further offer. This so staggered Akbar's agent that he returned to his prisoners, and told them who their gaoler was to be. They at once wrote to the pursuing party, who, being greatly alarmed, now played their last card. They produced a letter from General Pollock in which that officer promised if Saleh Muhammed would secure the release of the captives, to give him 20,000 rupees and a pension for life of 1,000 more. Saleh's cupidity was now thoroughly roused. "I know nothing of General Pollock," he cried, "but if you three gentlemen will swear by your Saviour to make good to me this offer, I will deliver my prisoners over to you."

The officers agreed; but Saleh, still mistrustful, again sought the captives, one of whom drew up in Persian an agreement, to which all the others affixed their signatures, promising that the sum named by General Pollock should be paid. This done, Akbar allowed himself to be arrested, the governor of the fort where the captives were was deposed, and the Union Jack hoisted.

The danger, however, was not yet passed, and this they knew. Confronting the surrounding tribesmen with the utmost sang-froid, the little party marched to Tophee Bala, and with breathless anxiety awaited the approach of their deliverers. At length a letter arrived from Sir R. Shakespeare, and the little band hurried on to meet him.

The company reached Cabul on September 21st, 1842. The entire British force turned out to receive them, and a salute of twenty-one guns was fired. It is said that the scene was one of the most pathetic ever witnessed. The ten rescued ladies fainted from excess of joy, and tears rolled unchecked down the cheeks of the strong men looking on. One of the captives, Captain Bygrave, was missing, but Akbar, who had personally detained this officer, sent him in a day or two after.

Smarting under the numerous defeats they had sustained, the Afghans were not likely to allow us to retreat without an endeavour at all events to recover the stolen gates. Hearing that Amun-Kha-Khan was collecting the scattered remnants of the Afghan Army, General Pollock dispatched General McCaskill to attack Istalif, the place of meeting. The vineyards of Istalif, a beautifully situated town, afforded admirable cover for the Afghan sharp-shooters. Very curiously the plan of the battle was conceived by Captain, afterwards Sir Henry Havelock, of Indian Mutiny fame.

Havelock's idea was to allow the enemy to collect in the vineyards in the belief that he would attack them there. The moment the Afghans saw the British columns marching stolidly in that direction, they hastened with great precipitation to the aid of their comrades. Before they could realise what was happening, our men were rushing the village of Ismillah, the key of the position. The enemy made one effort to retrieve their mistake, but they received such a severe handling that, being by now thoroughly demoralised, they took to flight.

The "Army of Retribution" having now amply avenged their past defeats, prepared to retire. This so alarmed Futteh Jung, son of Shah Soojah, that he at once vacated what he called the "seat perilous" and returned with us to India.

Next week: "The Crimean War."

Digitized by Google

Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XXXVI.—HIS MOTHER-IN-LAW ARRIVES AND SPEAKS HER MIND.

On his way home the other evening, Mr. Bowser had his feet stepped on, his hat knocked off, and his ribs poked by umbrellas, and by the time he reached home he was ready for a row. To add fuel to his feelings, he found that his mother-in-law had arrived two hours before and was comfortably installed at the head of affairs, while Mrs. Bowser had gone to bed with a headache. Formal greetings had scarcely been exchanged when he said:

"What's all this twaddle about headache? When I left the house this morning, Mrs. Bowser was as chirpy as a cricket. Mighty funny that a headache should flop her into bed all at once."

"There's nothing funny about it," promptly replied the mother-in-law. "She had a nervous headache, and I told her to go to bed. She looks to me as if her nerves were all racked to pieces, and she ought to go home with me for a year."

"That's all nonsense. Her nerves are all right—as right as mine. She's probably been sloshing around in the rain and got her feet wet, and if so, she will get no pity from me."

"You are not asked or expected to pity her, sir, and if you want any dinner, you'd better eat it now. I found the cook very lazy and impudent and trying to run things to suit herself, and therefore I discharged her. I've managed to cook a little something myself, however."

"You—you discharged the cook at an hour's notice!" he exclaimed, with flushed face.

"I gave her seventeen minutes to get out. I'd like to see a cook or anyone else trying to walk over my daughter."

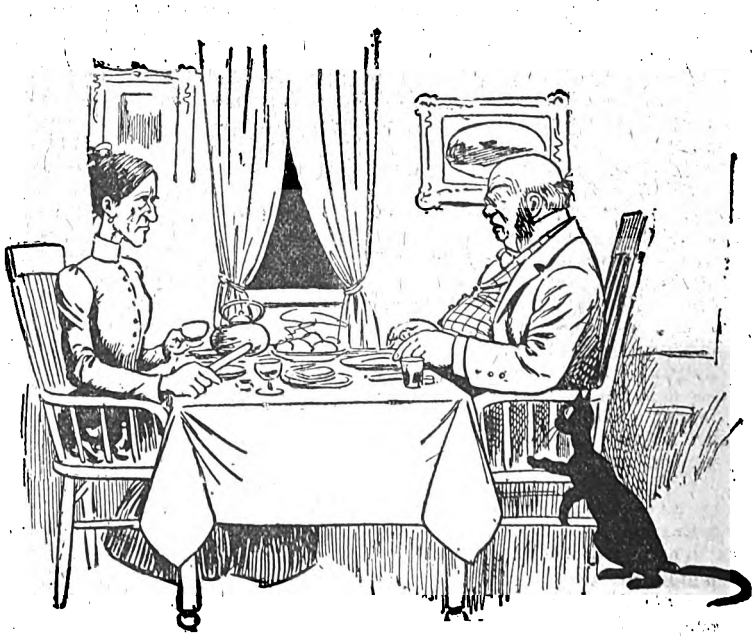
Mr. Bowser sat down to the table, with his gorge in his throat. The mother-in-law had thrown down the gauntlet, and he had picked it up.

"Here is the dinner," she exclaimed, as she brought it from the kitchen. "This is one of my Irish stews, and I know you'll like it."

"A stew for dinner!" he gasped, as his eyes began to roll.

"Certainly, and not much besides; but if it's good enough for me it's good enough for you. I've heard about your finding fault with your dinners, but you can either eat this or let it alone. When a man gets the idea that a house is run for his benefit only, it's time he was brought to book."

Mr. Bowser meant to jump up and pound on the table and declare that he was master of his own house, and wouldn't eat Irish stew for dinner if he starved to death; but, to his intense surprise, he not only clung to his chair, but found himself eating the stew. There was something in the icy glare of the woman that had a restraining influence on his impetuosity. The coffee was weak and the potatoes underdone, and he had opened his mouth to declare that he wouldn't ask a dog to sit down to such a meal, when the mother-in-law fastened her eyes on him and said:



There was something in the icy glare of the woman that had a restraining influence on his impetuosity.

Digitized by Google

"You just keep quiet and be thankful for what you've got. I've known husbands to make a dinner on raw turnips!"

The pudding was flavoured with vanilla, and had Mrs. Bowser been there, Mr. Bowser would have made her heart ache for a month, but those icy eyes checked his outbreak, and even compelled him to eat rather generously. It was only when dinner was finished and they had returned to the sitting-room, that he determined to shake off the incubus, and assert his independence.

"I think I'll go over to the club for two or three hours this evening," he observed, as he toyed with the cat.

"You'll do nothing of the kind!" replied the mother-in-law, as she turned on him. "You'll sit here and see if a doctor is wanted, or if there are any errands to be done. The idea of your loafing around a club when your wife is almost too sick to speak! If you had a soft corn on your toe, the whole house would have to hover over you."

Mr. Bowser choked and strangled in his indignation, and the cat grinned and said to herself that things would break loose pretty soon.

"And I've heard," continued the woman, as her teeth clicked together, "that you play cards at the club, and sometimes lose as much as two or three pounds of an evening. I wish you were my husband for about an hour! You'd never play cards more than once."

"Did you come here to insult and abuse me?" demanded Mr. Bowser, with a flash of independence.

"I came out here to put things right, and I shall do it," she sternly replied.

Then followed a powerful silence, broken at last by his going down to the cellar to nail a board on the coal-bin. He had just started to drive a nail, when the mother-in-law appeared on the stairs, and said:

"Drop that hammer like a hot potato! Don't you know that every blow goes through your poor wife's head with a bang? You've got about as much heart in you as a rhinoceros."

"Woman, how dare you talk to me like that!" he shouted as his face grew as white as flour.

"Don't call me 'woman' and yell out that way," she replied. "No bully can frighten me. If you want something to do, go up and sit with your wife while I wash up the dishes."

Mr. Bowser sulked for a few minutes and then walked upstairs. Finding Mrs. Bowser asleep, he thought it would be a good thing to overhaul his wardrobe. He had scarcely pulled out one of the drawers when he discovered a sock with a hole in the heel. Indignation overcame him on the instant, and he flourished the sock on high and exclaimed:

"So this is the way my house is run, is it! Here's a sock that I bought new two weeks ago and never had on my foot, and yet someone has worn a hole in the heel!"

"Is—is it you?" asked Mrs. Bowser, as she woke up.

"Yes; it is me, and what about this sock? Look at it! Behold this specimen of wifely interest in her husband's welfare! Is it any wonder——"

The mother-in-law appeared at that moment, and, pointing to the stairs, she said:

"You and your holey sock get out o' this as fast as you can!"

Mr. Bowser went. Something in her he feared—some element of mastery; but as they returned to the sitting-room he shook off the feeling, and hoarsely whispered;

"There is a train at 10 o'clock in the morning! you can go b that!"

"If I do, it'll be as a corpse!" she grimly replied. "Sit down there! Now, then, I want to tell you a few things. You are a bullying husband, and it would do you good to be hit across the neck with a crowbar. You think you know a lot, and you are bound to have your way with everybody. No other woman in this world, except your wife, would live with you two hours, and she's a fool for doing it. You never come home except to kick about something, and if I was your wife, I'd scald you. You talk about waste and extravagance, and yet you'd buy sand for sugar if left alone. You browbeat and roar and bellow, but in a week I'll have you as humble as a cat. It's all in the right woman getting hold of you."

"And you'll stay a week," groaned Mr. Bowser.

"Four of them!" she replied. "And I'll work a remarkable change in you, or know the reason why. It won't do you a mite of good to roll your eyes, gnash your teeth, and crack your toes. Don't go upstairs again till bedtime, and if there's any more rows over holey socks, you'll go bare-foot in your shoes the rest of the winter!"

She went to the kitchen to finish the dishes, and the cat crept over to Mr. Bowser and rubbed against his leg and purred in sympathy. The room seemed to stifle him, and he got up and walked softly down the hall and out on the step, followed by the cat, and they sat down side by side on the step and gazed into vacancy. A tramp halted at the gate and asked for a penny to get victuals for his vitals, but Mr. Bowser and the cat gazed on—gazed at vacancy, and realised that the end of the world was close at hand.

M. Quad.

"A KEEPER OF SECRETS."

Splendid series of complete stories begins next week.

Digitized by Google

A MODEL ROMANCE.

"Sir," said Dr. Johnson, "let me show you a model."

"Oh, Mr. Ormond, I am so tired of this position. I wish you could let me have a rest. Do—there's a good fellow—please."

"Wait just five minutes, Polly, till I've done this bit of your head. Don't move—just one minute more. I'm getting it right now, and then we'll knock off for a bit."

The request was the request of a model; the answer was the answer of a painter. The model reclined, in a half-kneeling attitude, apparently at the foot of a cross. Her clasped hands were uplifted; her eyes were upraised pathetically; her long hair streamed down, flowingly, over neck and shoulders; a loose white sort of shirt clothed her to the waist; below was a reddish brown skirt, skilfully disposed as "drapery," in artful folds. The whole attitude and expression represented—and represented well—imploring agony combined with tender despair. The bare arms were beautifully disposed, the eyes gleamed with a sublime splendour.

The painter—my friend Frank Ormond, A.R.A.— is working with quiet excitement at his easel. His figure is tall; he wears the velvet coat of his craft; he—but why describe him? Everybody knows Frank Ormond. Let that pass.

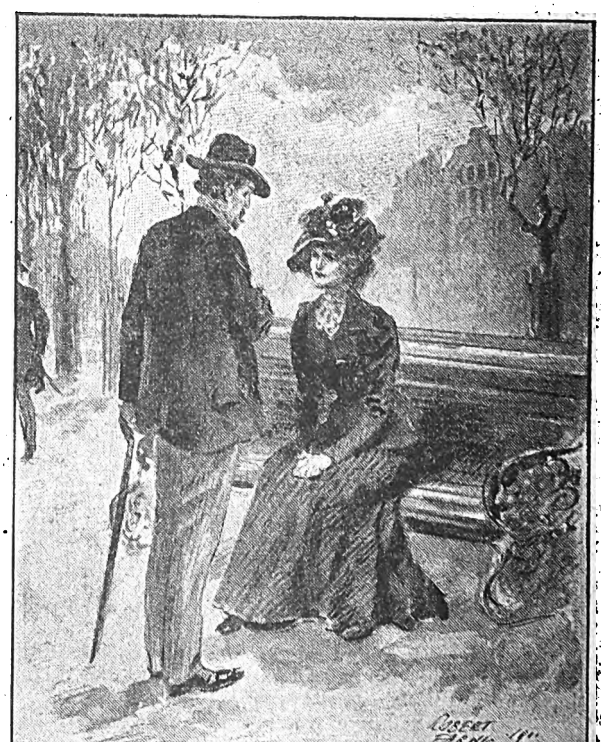
And now, reader, while painter and model (the attitude was a trying one) have "knocked off" work for a little rest, while he lights a pipe, and she, yawningly, stretches her stiff and weary limbs, let us look round us at the delicious litter of a painter's studio.

The house is old, and dates, probably, from Queen Anne's days. It has, no doubt, been the habitation of nobles of that period. You cannot see much of the walls, but look at the doors, at the painted ceiling, at the splendid marble mantelpiece. Look at the deep window-places and tall, thick-sashed windows. It is a house which Hogarth might have used for the residence of Lord Squanderfield.

The studio is a large three-windowed room, cold and bare of aspect. The backs of canvases framed with deal lie about like bits of scenes out of use, and suggest somewhat the coulisses of a theatre. A lay figure with a wooden fixedness of aspect, its head reminding one of a ship's figure-head, sits in a renaissance chair, and wears a thirteenth century costume. This figure forms the principal still-life object in the room. In one corner reposes the major part of an old suit of armour, the dull and dinted breastplate surmounted, in a rather drunken way, by a rust-red helmet. A bell-hilted rapier, temp. Elizabeth, which, says Frank, might have belonged to Raleigh, leans against the wall, and near it is a small sword which suggests the tea-cup times of Anne, the flowing wig and stiff skirts, the figure of Addison, or the brawling Mohocks who stopped Swift's chair.

From the open door of a richly carved dark armoire depends a Japanese robe. Plaster casts of feet and hands, busts, masks, and a torso, with the muscles strongly accented by dust, are sprinkled about, and contrast chalkily with the colour of the hangings, bits of silk dresses, and a remnant of tapestry. Two old foils, one broken, and both grievously damaged, lie across the arms of a magnificent antique chair, which has a seat of faded crimson velvet, on which rest a Spanish mandolin and one boxing glove; while a strip of yellow Chinese silk has slipped down on to the floor. A stuffed monkey, with a perennially diabolical smile upon a swollen visage, balances uneasily upon legs with a padded look about them, while a stuffed owl stares glassily in sullen gravity.

The bust of one Roman emperor is crowned with a



He spoke to her, and proposed that she should come and sit to him.

Digitized by Google

Vandyke hat, and a white petticoat is supported by two Velasquez boar-spears. A very handsome oak table, with massive legs, is covered with Venetian glasses and Flemish bottles, with "pots" of various sorts, comprising Gris de Flandres, Satsuma jars, and the blue lange Lizen, or six-mark Japanese ware, while an exquisite little Japanese cabinet is crested by a handful of peacock's feathers.

Sketches in charcoal and in oils, copies of world-renowned pictures, studies, unfinished paintings, are strewn about in picturesque and grotesque confusion; and, finally, at one end of the room, with the best light falling full upon it, stands the guillotine-like easel on which rests the picture of the hour, the canvas which absorbs all Frank Ormond's thoughts and is freighted with all his ambition, the picture upon which he is now working.

And so the happy painter works from year to year — labour, completion, weariness, fruition, recommencement. His whole work and hope are concentrated, for the time, upon the picture with which he remains face to face for many lonely months.

It is finished at last, finished just when it must be completed in order to be sent in to the Acadamy; and then the reaction of lassitude after long tension begins. His work has gone out from him; the painter feels weary of the picture over which he has felt so many fluctuations of depression and delight. It has absorbed so much of himself that he cannot judge it truly; he alternates between confidence and despondency; he sighs half with regret half in relief, as his distracting darling is carried forth from his doors. Then he relaxes the long strain of anxious labour; he amuses himself, and half forgets his art; he works but little, if at all.

She shook hands cheerily, and then shut the studio door for the last time.

The picture gets well hung; then comes the private view, with the critics; then the public crowding about the shining rows in the splendid gallery; then follow the favourable notice, the praise of friends, the sneer of "brother" rivals; then all this passes away, until, after due relaxation, the painter recommences with renewed ardour his work so beautiful and loved.

A painter, by the way, has one great advantage over an author—he is sure of his spectators, of his public. If his work be hung in a good exhibition it is sure to be seen by all those whom the painter would wish to see it. An author has to go to his readers; but his spectators always come to a painter.

Meanwhile Frank, twisting his moustache as he gazes on his picture, and now and then throwing in a deft and rapid touch of the brush, is waiting until his model shall have rested in order to go on.

"Bother the skirt!" cries that young person, who, with a view to warming herself, has been dancing about the studio trying a burlesque pas which she had seen on the previous evening at the theatre. "There, Mr. Ormond, I'm rested now. On we go again."

The little model interested me, both in her individualism and as a member of a class which furnishes to the artist the materialism of the romantic. I tried to learn something of her history, but I succeeded only sketchily and in a piecemeal manner.

Her name was Polly Brown. She was distinctly pretty and piquante. She possessed, among her various merits as a model, very long and beautiful brown hair, which she knew how to dishevel and tumble down far below her waist in a flow of romantic distress.

Her eyes, brown also, were large and full of soft fire; and the little monkey had a trick of rendering them plaintive and pathetic in expression, so that she was particularly valuable as a model for young heroines in distress, virgin martyrs, betrayed beauties, and the like. Her complexion was that of a light brunette; had she lived more in the country her cheeks would, it is probable, have shown a little flush of tender red through the pale, soft olive of her tient. She had a nice little nose; the mouth was good, though perhaps a little large, but she knew how to purse it up, and to draw the corners down so as partially to conceal this little defect.

The shape of the little half-arch, half-tender face was a fine oval, and the head was remarkably well set on. She was good in profile, but better as a three-quarter face with up-turned eyes. Her hands and feet were small, and the figure, though a trifle petite, was round and well shaped. Her manner was always merry, but never boisterous, and the girl had innate tact and taste.

"Yes," observed Frank critically, "she is a first-rate model in her line. It is only when you see a good deal of her that you detect the least little soupçon of vulgarity, which comes no doubt from her mother. Do you know I rather like that little suspicion of plebeianism; it shows that her base touches the people. She is good, you know, for historical heroines. She is fit, in fact, for what actors call the juvenile tragedy line of business. Do you remember my Olivia in the Vicar of Wakefield? Well, she sat, and did splendidly, for that. She's always punctual and pleasant to deal with; she's lively and frisky but never rude, and she's really a good little girl. Out of all the mode's I know, she's about the best. I like little Polly; if you want to please her you've only got to send her to the play."

Digitized by Google

The little model had considerable imitative and dramatic talent, and readily picked up the trick of her trade. She quickly caught a painter's idea, and produced the expression, or caught the attitude which his purpose required. She had a little feminine voice, almost as exquisitely dainty as Marie Wilton's, and had conquered that difficulty, so great to one of her class, of a good pronunciation.

Polly's mother was housekeeper in a set of chambers. She had been on the stage in her youth, and retained a strong passion for the theatre. Of her father I could learn nothing.

Polly, herself, in her early girlhood, had been theatrical. She danced as a fairy in pantomimes, and formed one of a child group of peasants, or what not, as required by the ballet master, but to her disappointment she never could obtain a "speaking part." One winter a severe illness threw her out of her usual employment.

When she recovered she found no opening in the theatre, and she was for a short time driven to resort to sewing. She was then engaged in the extensive and prosperous outfitting establishment of Messrs. Abednego and Menchisadek; but this miserably paid drudgery did not long suit Miss Polly. She was unhappy, and grew desperate, or rather determined.

Sanguine in her youthful hopefulness, she suddenly discharged herself, and trusted to the chapter of accidents. One day, when very poor, Polly strolled into the Park.

Sitting down upon a bench, still and quiet as an Arctic winter night, she thought and thought what she could do to earn her living.

It was early spring; the painters were hard at work for the Academy, and good models were scarce. Frank Ormond happened to be passing by. He wanted a girl-model, and his painter's eye was struck by little Polly's face and figure. He spoke to her, and proposed that she should come and sit to him. Polly consented, and went the next morning to his studio. She had found a new trade, which she rather liked, and which, as she gradually acquired a connection among painters, paid her moderately well.

She grew attached to the free and easy Bohemian ways of the studio, and was soon launched as a well-known and popular "model," in which capacity, while sitting for Joan of Arc, I first made her acquaintance.

Polly, by the way, always had a superstition about the Park, and believed that it was a place which "brought her good luck."

"I first met you, Mr. Ormond, in the Park," she used at times to say, "and I am sure that some day some great good fortune will happen to me in that dear old Park. I often sit upon that bench where you first saw me. Ah, I was badly off then!"

The life of a model is not without perils and temptations to a young girl; but Polly trod safely her rather dangerous path with a firm, light step. Her innocence was not ignorance; for she saw and heard a great deal, and understood all that she saw or heard.

Without protectors or advisers, lonely but self-reliant, the girl walked along the edge of unfenced precipices circumspectly and shrewdly. She was ardent, and perhaps ambitious, but had a certain integrity of will and quiet force of character which held her upright. Very unconsciously, the little lowly thing was a sort of worldly heroine.

Natural character and the influence of the circumstances which surrounded and moulded it, produced some rather complex contradictions and problems in our model. Seen in some aspects, you would have pronounced her to be a little good-for-nothing; merry and pleasant, indeed, but worthless. Yet you would have judged her wrongly had you based an opinion upon the superficial trivialities which she turned outside.

She never made any pretence of goodness; she rather took pains to show her worst side, to appear much worse than she really was. She had naturally a light side to her character, and she emphasized her levity in all that she showed of herself to others.

Nor was she, at times, wholly free from passing thrills

"By Jove!" cried Frank, "but women are wonderful creatures."

of temptation; but, like the needle of the compass, which, though it vibrates tremulously yet ultimately points always rightly, she gravitated back infallibly to good.

A creature by no means too bright or good for human nature's daily food, there was in her that "mystic sense of right" which so stirred the enthusiasm of the German philosopher. Exposed to so much danger, sustained by so little help against evil, some unseen power kept this girl always really pure and good.

She had, no doubt, a tendresse for Frank Ormond, but then her shrewd practical sense showed her that there was, as she termed it, "no use" in indulging such a feeling; and, taught by the hard lessons of her life, she had learned to repress, to restrain, and to forego.

One morning, when Frank was just finishing his well-known picture of the execution of Lady Jane Grey, in which Polly, of course, "sat" for the victim Queen, the young lady, at the conclusion of the sitting, said very quietly:

Digitized by Google

"You won't want me any more, Mr. Ormond. You've finished that picture, head and all, now. I'm glad of it; because I shouldn't be able to come to you again."

"Not come again, Polly—why not? I suppose you are very full of engagements just now; but you mustn't throw me over. I shall want you next week for my 'Dorothea.'"

"I'm sorry, Mr. Ormond, but I shan't ever be able to come again."

"Not be able to come again—what the deuce do you mean, Polly?" asked Frank rather pettishly, as he relieved the headsman with a deft touch. "I suppose you're getting too rich?—no, it can't be that. You must come. There's no model at all like you for some of my work. Ah, I see! you've been spooning with some fellow; or in trouble, eh, Miss Poll?"

"No," replied the young lady with demure dignity, "no trouble, thank you, Mr. Frank. The fact is—I can't come be'ause—because I'm going to be married."

"Married—whew!" cried the painter, facing round from the easel and taking his pipe out of his mouth. "Married, Polly! I never heard about that—who is it? What sort of fellow? A good one, I hope, for your sake."

"Never mind. Mr. Frank," responded Miss Polly composedly. "Perhaps you'll know some day, but not now. Thank you for all your kindness, Mr. Ormond. You've always been very kind to me, and I—I like you very much. Yes; I'm doing very well, thank you. He is a good fellow—I like him and I mean that we shall be very happy. But when I am married I can't sit again any more, if you please."

Frank Ormond growled discontentedly. He did not like losing his model, and he felt a vague jealousy of the unknown. There was a sneer in his tone as he said:

"I suppose, Polly, you have caught some old fool, who is taken with a pretty face, and your union will be about as incongruous as woodbine twining round a wooden leg."

"Think what you like, Mr. Ormond," said little Polly calmly. "I know what you do think; but never mind that. I shall tell you just nothing about it. I only came to-day" (Polly was tying on her bonnet) "because I knew you wanted me to finish your 'Lady Jane Grey.' That's done now, and I must say good-bye. I'm very grateful to you, Frank, I am, indeed, for all your kindness. I'm sorry to have to give up coming to the studio—I liked the life—but it's all over now. Thank you—six shillings; yes, that's right. My career as a model is ended. Once more—good-bye, Mr. Frank."

She shook hands cheerily, and then shut the studio door for the last time.

The strange thing was, that the little witch had made a good marriage. She had won the affections of a good man, of position and property.

The reticent little monkey never told anyone about her courtship, or the progress of it; but once, some time after, she betrayed herself so far as smilingly to tell Frank, when she met him in society, that the whole thing began "in the Park, in that dear old Park; on the old bench—you know"; and this was the alpha and omega of her confession.

Many studios were for a time corroded by curiosity; but time had to wear this feeling away without other artificial solacement. Some painters expressed anger at losing their little model; others expressed perplexity at her rise in life; but no one could drop a hint about her fair fame, and, as she had been generally liked, many good wishes accompanied her change of position.

Like that Mattie, sometime a "near cousin o' the Laird of Limmerfield's," and who, when elevated to the position of Mrs. Bailie Nicol Jarvie, "behaved excellently in her exaltation," little Polly made a model wife. She had all a woman's pliability, adaptability, and tact; and she soon picked up the style and manners necessary to her new position.

She was naturally graceful, and she had a little touch of woman's pride; pride in herself, and pride for her husband. She wished to make her husband happy, and was determined that he should not have to blush for his choice. She set to work, too, to educate herself in her way.

Having a strong motive to impel her, and great natural quickness, she soon succeeded in acquiring a respectable veneer of culture; and Frank Ormond, who meets her from time to time, told me that she had developed and improved in an altogether surprising manner. I believe that she succeeded, without apparent effort, in educing from Mr. Frank the respect due to her new position, rather than the familiarity likely to arise from their old relations, and yet she was quite frank, and kind, and natural, with him.

"By Jove!" cried Frank, "when I took her down to dinner the other day at the Howards', I could hardly believe that the self-possessed, lady-like woman by whom I was sitting had ever been the little monkey that used so often to dance burlesque dances about my studio! But women are wonderful creatures, sir. Their knowledge of the world beats ours. If they were only a good actresses on the stage as they are off it, the dramatic art would be in a fine way."

Success ripens and improves some natures; and little Polly was decidedly improved by good fortune. She was always pretty, but as I saw her the other day in the Park (looking out, probably not without thoughts, for a certain bench), reclining easily in her carriage, she appeared positively elegant and distinguée. She was particularly well-dressed, and had a piquante touch of grande dame in her manner.

Does anyone who has ever really belonged to Bohemia pass out of it into Philistia, or even into higher regions, without an occasional retrospect of regret, and a backward glance, coupled with a sigh?

Did our Polly, lolling upon her easy carriage cushions, ever look back with a little tinge of sadness to the days in which she used to trudge on foot, through mud and rain, to the stage-door, or to the painter's studio? What does she think when she visits the Royal Academy? How does she feel when she goes to the theatre?

Does she ever speculate upon the new model (the golden-haired one) who now sits to Frank Ormond?

Does she, as she gazes upon the "Amaranthine Bowers of Boundless Joy," recall the feelings of the figurantes who, clothed in sheeny tinsel, float ethereally upon iron supports in the ideal atmosphere of blue and red lights?

I do not know; I have no hint which would enable me to solve the problem; but I am assured that she is gratefully happy in her married life; and that, as a wife, she is still a model.

H. Schutz-Wilson.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES THAT MAKE YOU LAUGH.

We devote every week two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "The Keepers of the People," by Edgar Jepson, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, February 25th. Post-cards only, please.

The Prize of One Guinea for the best Storyette has been won this week by Mr. W. BARROW, of 16 St. John's Terrace, Lewes.

Ideal and Real.

SMITHE was about to pop the momentous question to the girl of his choice, and was trying to decide how he should do it.

First, he thought of the knightly proposal in the style of the Middle Ages.

"By my halidame, fair maid, say thou wilt be mine, and the holy friar shall unite us ere another sun gilds the turrets of yonder castle?"

Then he considered the theatrical style:

"I have long loved you in secret, g-ur-r-l, and, though I am not rich, I can offer you the true and unselfish devotion of me whole ha-a-r-r-t!"

He thought, perhaps, the easy conversational style might do:

"Well, Alicia—I may call you 'Alicia,' mayn't I?—everyone thinks we are going to be married. Suppose we do get married, just to please 'em, you know?"

But, when the critical time came, he did it thus:

"Er—Miss Alicia—er—excuse the familiarity, but—er—er—will you—er—oh, by Jove!"

And then she came to the rescue, and said:

"That'll do, Billy, dear boy; it's all serene, and I know the old folk will be pleased." W. B.

The Left was Right.

"WEEL, John, how are you to-day?" said a Scotch minister to one of his parishioners on meeting him on the road.

"Gey weel, sir; gey weel," responded John cautiously, "gin it wa sna for the rheumatis' in my richt leg."

"Ah, weel, John, be thankful, for there is no mistake you are getting old, like the rest of us, and old age, you know, doesn't come alone."

"Auld age, sir!" returned John; "I won'er tae hear ye. Auld age has naething tae dae wi't. Here's my ither leg just as auld, an' it's quite soond and soople yet." C. R. F.

War and Peace.

A WELL-KNOWN dramatist, calling a friend's attention to the thinness of the house at one of his own plays, added that he supposed it was "owing to the war."

"No," replied the latter, "it is owing to the piece." T. J. W.

A Good Brand.

ONE morning during the siege of Ladysmith, the Boers on the heights commanding the town heliographed the following message to the men of the Naval Brigade:

"Good-morning, shipmates, got any bacca?"

To which the tars promptly signalled back:

"We've got plenty of Lambton's Navy Cut in prime condition, come down and get a pipeful."

But the Boers weren't having any. H. E. L.

Zeal Rewarded.

A POLICEMAN in a country village, whose "cases" were rare, one day came across his landlord in an incapable state. The chance was too good to be missed and the landlord was summoned and fined to the amount of fourteen shillings and sixpence.

The fine was paid, but the policeman's feelings can be better imagined than described, when, on reaching home, he found his rent had been raised sixpence per week, and so it continued for twenty-nine weeks, when the landlord coolly informed him that "he had paid the fine and could have his house at the former rent."

E. L.

Satisfied.

AT a rifle range a clerical gentleman rode up, and, addressing the sergeant in charge, complained that bullets had fallen into his garden, in a village a mile or so in the rear of the butts. The "old soldier," with a wink to his comrades, replied:

"I'll see that it doesn't happen again, sir; I'll put a man on the top of the hill with special orders to stop the bullets from going over."

"Oh, thank you, very much!" responded the ecclesiastic with a satisfied smile, and rode off with the air of a man relieved of a mighty anxiety.

H. R.

Through the Telephone.

"ARE you there?"
"Yes."
"Who are you, please?"
"Watt."
"What is your name, please?"
"Watt's my name."
"Yes; what is your name?"
"I say my name is Watt."
"Oh, well, I'm coming to see you this afternoon."
"All right. Are you Jones?"
"No; I'm Knott."
"Who are you, then, please?"
"I'm Knott."
"Will you tell me your name, please?"
"Will Knott."
"Why won't you?"
"I say my name is William Knott."
"Oh, I beg your pardon!"
"Then you'll be in this afternoon if I come round, Watt?"
"Certainly, Knott."

They were cut off by the exchange, and Knott wants to know if Watt will be in or not.

T. A. F.

Digitized by Google

What Struck Him Most.

An Irish soldier, lately returned from Africa, and who was at the Battle of Spion Kop, had been relating his experiences at the engagement. After enlarging on his many hairbreadth escapes to his listeners, one of them asked him:

"Now, all throughout the desperate fighting, will you please tell us what struck you most forcibly when you came to think it over?"

"I can truly say, sor, that what sthruck me most forcibly was the bullets that missed me."

C. D.

His Distinguishing Mark.

A boy employed by an itinerant showman—who was noted for his bullying—had a rough time of it, and there was no love lost between them.

One day while busily employed scrubbing a performing dog belonging to the show, he was accosted by a stranger, who inquired where his master was.

"Oh," said the boy, "he's just gone into the monkey's cage—and—I say!" he shouted, as the man was walking off in the direction indicated, "you'll know him, 'cause he's got white whiskers!"

A. A. L.

Hint Not Taken.

A certain farmer in the Midlands dispatched his Irish servant with a note to his neighbour.

"Did you take the note, and did you see Mr. Thompson, Pat?"

"Yes, sor."

"And how was he?"

"Why, he looked pretty well; but shure he's very bloind."

"Blind? What do you mean?"

"Why, while I wur in the room he axed me where moi hat were, and sure it was entirely on my head, and myself straight in front of him all the whoile."

F. W.

"Good Gracious!"

A young soldier had gone to the theatre with a friend.

The play dragged, and he fell asleep. An hour later he was awakened by the voice of an actor, saying:

"We have been here five days!"

The infantryman got up in a fright, and said to his friend:

"Good gracious! and I had only leave to stop out till midnight!"

W. T.

It Brayed.

The other evening an individual of the know-everything type was airing his infinite knowledge in the presence of a number of rustics in the village inn.

Presently the subject turned upon superstitions, and after a lengthy discourse upon the various popular beliefs, such as spilling the salt, breaking up looking-glasses, etc., which was alleged to bring bad luck, our would-be oracle said:

"Again, gentlemen, when a donkey brays it is a sure sign of rain."

"Then, for goodness' sake, shut yer darned mouth," roared a bluff old farmer, "for I haven't got my crops in yet!"

W. L.

Tried to Please.

"Good gracious, Maria, another millinery bill? Why on earth you want so many new things I can't understand. Look at me. I have had nothing new on for the last three months."

"But men are different to women, and besides, you surely would not like your wife to look a fright before other people?"

"Certainly not, but at the same time you might get something tasty and pretty. It seems to me that the women of the present day exert themselves with more industry than sense in their efforts to be beautiful. Their insane efforts are simply outlandish."

"But one must follow the fashion; you know that, Will."

"Nonsense. Give me taste first. Why, Maria, you do not look nearly so pretty as you did when I first married you fifteen years ago."

"Oh, that's because I've grown older."

"Oh, no, it isn't that. I liked you in the simple dress of days gone by. You never look so pretty as you did then."

"Well, I will do my best to please."

The husband sat down with his paper whilst his wife bustled off to her boudoir to dress for a drive.

Shortly afterwards the voice of the latter was heard saying: "Are you ready, dear?"

"Great Scott!" exclaimed the husband as he looked up from his paper. "What in the name of goodness have you been doing? Don't you know we're going out driving?"

She wore a very small hat, a large chignon, and strangely-proportioned masses of millinery, for which his vocabulary could find no phrase. A diminutive parasol completed the absurdity.

"I am only trying to please you, dear," she quietly replied.

"To please me?"

"Yes," was the reply. "It's the way I dressed fifteen years ago when we were married!"

P. B.

4d. 4d.

Above is a reduced facsimile of the Cover and Poster.

4d. 4d.

Ready Friday Next, Feb. 22nd.

Digitized by Google

One Week at Ardlene.

ARDLENE was a picturesque little village, nestled in the bosom of a lovely valley, upon the border-line between Monmouthshire and the Principality.

Surrounded, especially on the Welsh side, by hills, or rather mountains, and approachable only by a circuitous, and fairly dangerous road, leading from the nearest railway station, thirteen miles away, it was as sequestered and peaceful a spot as the heart, even of the most confirmed recluse, could desire.

There were not more than two dozen buildings in the place, inclusive of the church and school-house, the latter a small barn-like structure, with a little cottage attached.

Here, for nearly two years, had lived Alice Maylin, the schoolmistress and organist, with a child, a fine boy of six, known as Mervyn Stapleton, and supposed by the neighbourhood to be the delicate offspring of an old friend, consigned to her care.

Alice had been recommended to the vicar by a lady, to whose daughters she had formerly acted as governess. This lady, a personal and old friend of the Earl of Grassmere, a local magnate, had been greatly surprised at receiving from Alice Maylin a sudden notice to leave her charge, without the assignment of any reason whatever.

It was singular, too, that her departure was coincident with that of Viscount Harbleton, Lord Grassmere's eldest son, from Cardew Castle the family seat. The young nobleman left ostensibly for the Continent, while Alice disappeared altogether out of ken and knowledge.

When the Viscount returned, which he did in about twelve months' time, he had the usual "travellers' tales" wherewith to regale the dinner-table and the smoke-room. Some there were who thought that they could detect a false ring about them, for the eldest son of the house had a somewhat unenviable reputation for "long-bow" practice.

He was unpopular, too, both in and outside his family, the servants detesting him, while taking his tips. He had a distinct liking for "low life," so that with a certain class he was known as a "fine fellow," a "generous gentleman," and so on. Extravagant, vain, and some said vicious, he was the plague of his father's life, by reason of his debts, and disregard of family dignity and tradition.

All this occurred about seven years before the period of the present relation. The Viscount was now out in South Africa with his regiment; Alice Maylin, in her little restful nook at Ardlene, many miles from Cardew, and former associations.

There remained nearly five years of the girl's life unaccounted for, but she was silent concerning it, and all in her little retreat among the border hills respected her reserve.

No one in Ardlene questioned her claim to be other than she professed, more especially as she was a favourite with both young and old, rich and poor.

To sharp eyes it sometimes seemed that she had a mental trouble, but it was also noticed that when more than ordinarily depressed she would seek the old oak-panelled organ-loft across the road and there with soft impromptu, lay the spirit that oppressed her.

It was on one of these occasions that two gentlemen, with tourist knapsacks, and other and sundry signs, which marked them as a pair of indefatigable pedestrians, sat, lazily comfortable, upon a half-sunken altar tomb in the little churchyard, listening to the dreamy melody that floated out at open door and window upon the hot summer air.

"Say, Brent, that's a woman playing, I'll lay my life," said the elder of the two, a fair-featured, tallish man, with a pleasant smile, and apparently about thirty years of age, "what she is playing is better than a hymn, and quite as holy, if not more so."

"Yes," replied the other, "it's evidently a woman, and —a pretty one, I should say, if musical expression, and its impression upon the hearer mean anything at all."

"Nonsense! and yet, you may be right, for there's a good deal, I believe, in the influence of sweet sounds."

"Savage breast—charms—and all the rest of it. Oh! there's something in it, no doubt. Hullo! where are you off to George?"

The other had risen from the stone, and moved slowly towards the door of the church.

Hesitating a moment he entered.

The interior was dark to anyone coming in out of the bright sunlight, and for a short while he could distinguish nothing plainly.

Presently, almost immediately, indeed, the music ceased, and he saw a slight figure, with dark hair and eyes coming towards him.

"I beg your pardon," he said. "I hope I have not disturbed you?"

"Oh, no!" she answered him, "I have been here too long; come Mervyn!"

The boy, who had lingered behind to exchange certain

Digitized by Google

mysterious confidences with the organ-blower, came running up to her.

"Did you say Mervyn? Curious! That is an uncommon name, rather, isn't it? It is an hereditary one in my family."

"Indeed!" she said politely, but a little coldly, perhaps, for she was quite alive to the fact that the conversation was getting a trifle confidential as between strangers.

"Yes," he continued, affecting not to notice her manner, "our eldest sons are always named Mervyn. What a fine little chap!"

They had by this time strolled down the miniature aisle, and were standing in the porch. He could see that his travelling companion had vanished, probably in the direction of the inn.

"This is a quiet, beautiful little place," he ventured, seeing that she appeared disinclined to initiate conversation. "I and a friend are but passing through it on our way to Chester, but I think a week among these hills would do me good, and render me more fit to encounter the trials of London and the 'season.'"

This was a proposition Alice could not well assent to or appear to encourage. She merely inclined her head courteously, and made as if to cross the road to her own home.

The lad at her side here looked inquisitively up at the stranger, for strangers were rare in Ardlene.

George Stapleton-Cardew was by no means a fatalist, and certainly not superstitious, but he could not repress an exclamation of surprised interest.

"I fear," he said, "you will think me rude and intrusive, but will you tell me this little fellow's surname?"

"Stapleton," answered Alice, quietly, "and now we must leave you, for school is assembling."

With another inclination of the head, she, and the child, who turned his head more than once to look back at him, were gone.

He stood for some minutes, leaning against the porch front.

"Mervyn Stapleton! It can't surely, and yet must be chance. The boy's cast of feature is Cardew all over. He's the image, too, of Harbleton. But there, it's absurd! It can't be! Harbleton's a queer stick, I own, but I fancy even he would draw the line at matrimonial underhandedness. Well, I'll stop here, and try to fathom the mystery. Stop here a week at least. Brent may do as he chooses. If he leaves me here alone, so much the better."

On his way to the inn he cogitated still further with himself, this time Alice being the prevailing thought.

"A sweet girl that; and—a lady. Evidently the schoolmistress. How did she come to take that on, I wonder? Yes, I'll stay."

He found his friend, Brent, as he expected, at the inn, hungry, impatient, and curious; found him also to be quite disinclined to a prolonged stay at the primitive little spot.

"I'd be dead in twenty-four hours, George let alone a week. No, my boy, I'll get on to Chester to-morrow morning; though I do think it a bit shabby of you to desert your chum on the last "lap."

He was as good as his word, and was up and away while the day was young.

Much may be done in a week, and assuredly George made good use of the time.

Alice could not well escape meeting him within such narrow limits, and so it was that ere long she had to confess to herself to a decided liking for him. He was one of those reliable and strong natures which invariably attract women, (women worthy of the name that is). She was conscious long before the week was out that he loved her, while she began to feel that she could love h m, if only——

Ay! the "if" was large and ugly.

One evening after dinner he went out across the fields towards a fir wood that covered the lower slope of the hillside.

Half way he met her.

"Don't go home yet," he said, with just a suspicion of entreaty in his voi e. "I want to say something to you."

"Yes!" she answered, in that inartificial, simply-direct way that he so admired in her.

"Shall we go through the wood?" he asked.

"No, it seems freer in the fields. Besides it is getting late, and I must not wander too far from home."

"Miss Maylin! the fact, perhaps, may not interest you greatly, but I leave here to-morrow evening."

"I am sorry—I mean——"

"You are sorry, that is good to hear. Miss Maylin, Alice! I will not insult you by a long story, or fine language. What do you imagine my week here has taught me?"

"I cannot say."

"There you are wrong, and untrue to yourself. You know, you must know that this week has been a revelation to me, that during it, I have learned to love you. That——"

"Mr. Cardew, you are right; I am, and have been wrong. Wrong in listening to you, wrong in leading you to believe that which is altogether untrue."

"Impossible! I do not understand. My meaning was other than your interpretation of it. You would tell me, maybe, of obstacles, hindrances; is that so?"

"Yes, and I am sorry."

"What are they?"

"Is this not cruel of you? I should not have allowed you to say or to imply even so much had I not cared—a little—I mean——"

"That is enough!" he interrupted her masterfully. "Tell me all about it, and let me be the judge."

Then she told him.

How that seven years before, when, as a governess she lived in the neighbourhood of Cardew Castle, she met with, was wooed and won by Mervyn, Lord Harbleton.

Immediately after their private marriage, she threw up her engagement, and they left for a small house in the Upper Thames Valley.

For a time all went well. Then her husband developed habits of intemperance and savage irritability, which, on a certain occasion, soon after the birth of their son, broke out into open brutality.

He struck her, leaving a mark upon her forehead, (she raised her hair and showed it him) which she would carry to her grave.

George here stooped down and reverently kissed the spot; and she did not attempt to repel him.

All love for her husband, (for she had loved him) died upon the day that he lifted his hand to her. Disillusioned, desperate almost, she wrote him a letter during one of his many absenses from her, announcing her departure with her child.

From that hour she had never seen him, but George would of course now see how absolutely impossible was the realisation of his hopes.

Digitized by Google

One thing, and one only had weighed upon her mind, and continued to trouble her, her boy's future. By right he was next in succession to his unworthy father, and yet she dreaded the ordeal which must naturally follow upon a prosecution of his claim.

"Alice!" said George, "you must let me have the lad, that I may show him to his grandfather. I will so plead his cause that the Earl, who is a just man, must recognise his right to be considered a son of the house, as he must also render you that justice denied you by my cousin. Tell me, why is the boy named Stapleton only?"

"Because on our marriage, my husband, persuading me that to be wedded in the name of Cardew would jeopardise his position with his father, should he come to hear of it, wished us to be known as Mr. and Mrs. Stapleton, the license being in that name, and we also signing the register so."

"Alice, my cousin is a scoundrel. But there is no time to lose, my uncle is in bad health, and he must see the boy before it is too late. You must let me take him up to London, where the family now are, to-morrow. Trust h m with me; he shall come to no harm; remember, though he is my cousin's child, he is also yours; and as such his welfare and his safety are sacred charges for me."

"Oh, I cannot part with him; he is my all!"

"Have I not said that I will guard him as my own life, and bring him safely back to you? Trust me!"

She yielded at length to his earnest entreaty, and consented to his proposal, promising that the boy should be in readiness to accompany him on the following evening.

It was a difficult task that he had set himself, and he was, in his own mind, by no means confident of success. Still, in the boy's interest; for the mother's sake, it must be attempted, good chance or ill.

George was a favourite with his uncle, and when a day or two after, he put the matter before him, the old earl, although not exactly sympathetic, was disposed to do the right thing.

But he made it clear to his nephew that his motives were purely based upon a sense of justice and family honour, and absolutely untinged by sentimentality or mere feeling.

"If Lady Harbleton," he said, "was so foolish as to be deceived by Mervyn's, tongue, I've no pity for her; she must suffer for her folly. The boy, of course, cannot be held to blame, and it is solely because it is his right, that I shall make arrangements at once for his proper education and so on. You may, however, inform Lady Harbleton that a sum of £1,000 per annum will be at her disposal from this date, but that all exp nditure on account of my grandson will be borne by me, and quite exclusive of her allowance. Have you heard from Harbleton lately? I have received nothing from Africa for months."

"No, he must be either ill or wounded. I am going up Pall Mall presently, and will call in at the War Office to see if I can hear anything."

But he was spared the journey.

While putting on his hat and gloves a cablegram was handed to him:

> Captain Lord Harbleton, 2nd Life Guards, succumbed to entoric last night.—BLOEMFONTEIN.

* * * * *

She had heard briefly from him this morning, that he and Mervyn would arrive mid-day; and she was at the door watching the road, which, at the distance of half-a-mile, disappeared round the lower slope of the hill.

He had said no more than that he had news for her. She at once connected this with her little Mervyn's meeting with his grandfather, and what the latter had said and done.

That a cloud had been lifted for her, the cloud of her later life, she did not dream, and that because the memory of a great mistake had worked out its certain and only conclusion.

At last she saw the little dog-cart from the inn turning the hill corner, and the vigorous waving of a handkerchief. Within a few minutes she had her treasure in her arms again.

George stood looking at the picture, and she noticed a brightness, a hopefulness in his eyes that was lacking when they last parted.

She extended her one free hand to him (the other was round her boy) and he ?—he just, without a word, placed the cable message in her hand.

* * * * *

Twelve months afterwards he journeyed again to Ardlene.

His object was but to hear one word from Alice's lips, and, as a faithful chronicler, I am bound to record that word was spoken.

RALPH ENDERBY.

BEAUTIFUL MEMENTO

OF

HER LATE MAJESTY.

A LIFELIKE ORIGINAL BUST,

Specially modelled from sittings given by the late Queen to the celebrated sculptor, Miss Geflowski. This bust, in which the Queen's features are reproduced with realistic fidelity, is in the finest hard plaster, pure white, and is the work of an eminent firm of mo ellors and sculptors. The bust itself is seven and a half inches in height.

THE OFFER IN BRIEF.

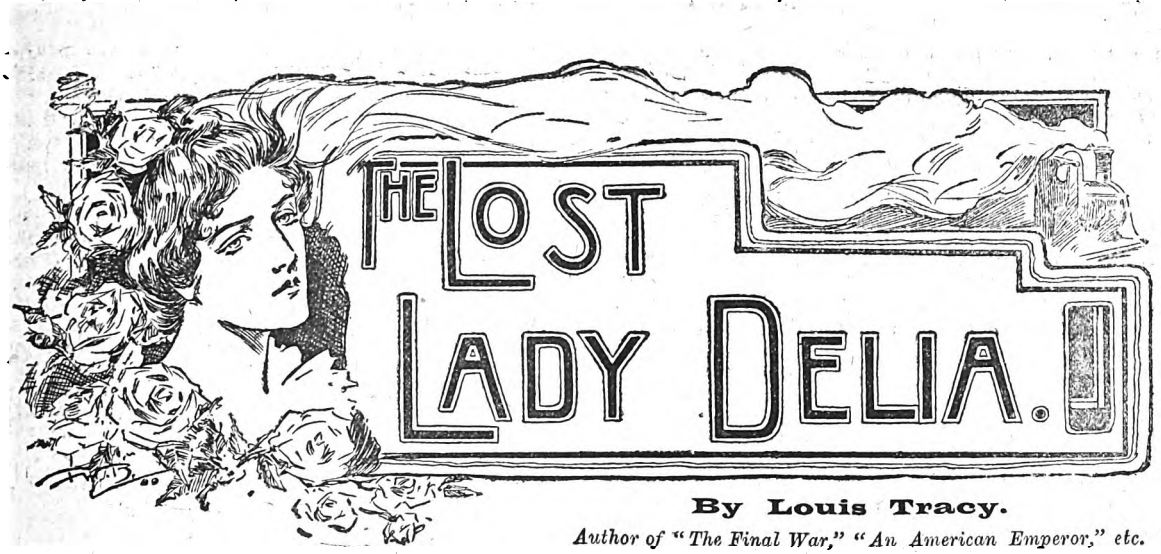
The price of the bust, carefully packed and carriage paid to any part of the United Kingdom is

HALF-A-CROWN.

We have only been able to secure a limited numb r of these busts, and it is advisable, therefore, for those who wish for one of these beautiful reminders of our late Queen, to send in their orders immediately. Postal orders only will be accepted in payment.

Address: Room 38 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



By Louis Tracy.

Author of "The Final War," "An American Emperor," etc.

THIS TELLS THE STORY FROM THE START.

LADY DELIA LYLE leaves her house one foggy November afternoon saying she is going to see her sister at Richmond, but from that time she is not heard of.

Her husband, Sir Charles Lyle, puts the matter into the hands of detectives, Inspector Winter taking charge of the case.

Reginald Brett, a barrister friend of the Lyles, also promises to do all he can, and he finds out that Lady Delia, on the night of her disappearance, instead of going to Richmond, alighted at Sloane Square, and went to a block of flats called Raleigh Mansions.

Towards the end of the month the body of a woman, evidently murdered, is found wedged beneath a drain-pipe in the Thames at Putney, and, though Sir Charles does not identify the body, Brett imagines it to be that of Lady Delia. Shortly after this discovery Lady Delia's maid, Jane Harding, disappears. She is afterwards found to have gone on the stage.

Brett now starts investigations at Raleigh Mansions, and he fixes on two residents there as being likely to have been connected with Lady Delia. These are a Mr. Sydney H. Pyne, who is not at present in residence, and a Mrs. Hillmer, whom he finds to be Pyne's sister.

It had transpired that Pyne had gone to Monte Carlo, and thither Brett goes, and he discovers that though letters are addressed to Pyne at the Hotel du Cercle he is not known there.

During his stay at Monte Carlo Brett becomes acquainted with an Englishman, named Albert Mensmore, whom he helps out of some money difficulties, but he does not discover anything about Pyne.

After his return Brett finds out that Sir Charles Lyle knows Albert Mensmore, but in what connection does not transpire.

A few days later Brett goes into the City, to the office of Dodge and Co., with whom he had had some speculative dealings, and from remarks made by Mr. Dodge, he thinks that Pyne and Mensmore must be one and the same man. In the evening Brett and Winter go to Raleigh Mansions and search the flat occupied by Pyne. Brett finds that a piece of one of the fire-dogs is missing, and that it exactly corresponds with the piece of iron which was found imbedded in the head of the body found at Putney.

It is shown by this time that Mensmore (who is at Genoa) had previously adopted the name of Pyne. The real Pyne (his mining partner) writes him that their property is likely to bring them much wealth

Pyne arrives in England and takes Mensmore's flat, where the detectives surprise him.

CHAPTER XX. (continued).

"I DON'T know what you're talking about, gentlemen," said Pyne, pocketing his revolver; "but it dawns upon me that I shan't be required either to shoot anybody or sleep in gaol to-night."

Winter turned on him fiercely:

"Why didn't you answer my questions properly, and save all this nonsense?"

"I'll tell you why, sir. The name of a friend of mine has been mentioned. Herbert Mensmore has been more than a brother to me. I allowed you meant mischief to him, as you thought you were talking to him all the while. I don't know much about you, but I hope that your first action would not be to give away your chum if he was in trouble."

The detective did not answer, though his look of astonishment at Pyne's declaration of motive was eloquent enough.

"Before we quit this business," went on the American, "Let me say one thing. Any man who tells you that Herbert Mensmore murdered a woman is telling you a lie. I don't know anything about this Lady Delia or how she may have died, but I do know my friend. He's rare good in a tight place, but, to think of him killing a woman—Jehosh, it's sickening."

Mrs. Robinson burst in, with face aflame:

"Is this palaverin' to go on all night?" she demanded angrily. "Here's the dinner spilin', after all me worry and bother, with the head of me vexed to know who is the masther and who isn't."

"All right, mother," laughed Pyne. "Bring in the whole caboodle."

"Mr. Pyne," said Brett, "I hope you will come and have lunch with me to-morrow, at this address," handing him a card. "I want to have a talk with you. Mr. Winter, if you will come with me I will explain a good deal to you of which you are now in ignorance."

"Surely Mr. Pyne will answer a few questions first," said the detective.

"Don't you think you have troubled him sufficiently for this evening? Besides, he can tell us nothing. All the explanation is really due to him, and I propose to give it to him to-morrow. Come, Winter, this time I promise you that a considerable portion of your inquiry shall be cleared up, and I do not speak without foundation as you have often learnt hitherto."

So the mysterious Sydney H. Pyne was left in undisturbed possession of his flat and his dinner, whilst the trio passed out into the quietude of the streets.

CHAPTER XXI.

How LADY DELIA LEFT RALEIGH MANSIONS.

MR. WINTER was actually inclined to preserve silence whilst they walked to Victoria Street. The events of the preceding hour had not exactly conduced to the maintenance, in the eyes of his brother officer, of that pre-eminent sagacity which he invariably claimed.

His companion rubbed in this phase of the matter by saying: "I should think, Jim, you will give Raleigh Mansions a wide berth for some time to come, after making two bad breaks there."

But it was no part of Brett's scheme that Winter should be rendered desperate by repeated failures. "It is not Mr.

Digitized by Google

Winter's fault," he said, "that these errors have occurred. They are rather the result of his pertinacity in leaving no clue unsolved which promises to lead to success. When this case ends, if ever it does end, I feel sure he will admit that he has never encountered so much difficulty before in unravelling the most complex problems within his experience."

"That is so," chimed in the senior detective. "The thing that beats me in this affair is the want of a beginning, so to speak. One would imagine it the work of a lunatic if Lady Delia herself had not contributed so curiously to the mystery of her disappearance."

"There you are, Winter; that is the true scent. Find the motive and we find the murderer, if Lady Delia was wilfully put to death."

"If she was, Mr. Brett? Have you any doubt about it?"

"There cannot be certainty when we are groping in the dark. But the gloom is passing; we are on the eve of discovery."

At Brett's residence Winter's colleague left him. Soon the barrister and the policeman were sitting in Brett's sitting-room before a good fire.

There Reggie took him step by step through each branch of his inquiry as it is known to the reader.

He omitted nothing. The discovery of Jane Harding and of Mensmore, the latter's transactions with Dodge and Co., his dramatic coup at Monte Carlo and its attendant love episode—all these were exhaustively described. He enlarged upon Mrs. Hillmer's anxiety when the tragedy became known to her, and did not forget Sir Charles Lyle's amazement at the suggestion that his old playmate might prove to be responsible for the death of his wife.

He produced the waxen moulds of the piece of iron found on the body at Putney, and the ornamental scroll from which it had been taken.

At this bit of evidence Mr. Winter's complacency quite forsook him. Thus far he had experienced a feeling of resentment against Brett for having concealed from him so much that was material to their investigation.

But when he realised that a powerful link in the chain of facts had all along been placidly resting before his eyes his distress was evident, and the barrister came to his rescue.

"You are not to blame, Winter," he said, "for having failed to note many things which I have now told you. You are the slave of a system. Your method works admirably for the detection of commonplace crime, but as soon as the higher region of romance is reached it is as much out of place as a steam-roller in a lady's boudoir. Look at the remarkable series of crimes the English police have failed to solve of late, merely because some bizarre element has intruded itself at the outset. Have you ever read any of the works of Edgar Allan Poe?"

The detective answered in the affirmative. He well remembered the murders of the Rue Morgue and the mystery of Marie Rouget.

"Well," went on Brett, "there you have accurate examples of my meaning. Poe would not have been puzzled for an hour by the vagaries of Jack the Ripper. He would have said at once—most certainly after the third or fourth in the series of murders—'This is the work of an athletic lunatic, with a morbid love of anatomy and a morbid hatred for a certain class of women. Look for him amongst young men who have pestered doctors with outrageous theories, and who possess weak-minded or imbecile relatives.' Then, again, take the murder on the South Western Railway. Do you think Poe would have gone about questioning bartenders or inquiring into abortive love affairs? Not he! Jealous swains do not carry pestles about with them to slay their sweethearts, nor do they choose a four-minutes' interval between suburban stations for their frenzied methods of avowing pass on. Here you have the clear trail of a clever lunatic, dropping from the skies, as it were, and disappearing in the same erratic manner. That is why I tell you most emphatically that neither you nor I have yet the remotest conception as to who really killed Lady Delia."

"Surely, Mr. Brett, things look black now against this Mr. Mensmore?"

"Do they? How would it have fared with an acquaintance of one of the unfortunate women killed by the Ripper had the police found him in the locality with fresh bloodstains on his clothes? What would have resulted from the discovery of a chemist's mortar among the possessions of one of Elizabeth Camp's male friends? Come, now, be honest, and tell me."

But Mr. Winter could only smoke in silence.

"Therefore," continued Brett, "let us ask ourselves why, and how, it was possible for Mensmore to commit this crime. Personally, notwithstanding all that we apparently know against him circumstantially, I should hardly believe Mensmore if he confessed himself to be the murderer!"

"Now, why on earth do you say that, Mr. Brett?"

"Because Mensmore is normal and this crime abnormal. Because the man who would blow out his brains on account of losses at pigeon-shooting never had brains enough to dispose of the body in such fashion. Because Mensmore, having temporarily changed his name for some trivial reason, would never resume it with equal triviality with this shadow upon his life?"

"Then why have you told me all these things that tell so heavily against him?"

"In order that, this time at least, you may feel that the production of a pair of handcuffs does not satisfactorily settle the entire business."

"I promise you there shall be no more arrests until this affair is much more decided than it is at present."

"Good. I shall make a detective of you after my own heart in time."

"Yet I cannot help being surprised, Mr. Brett, at the very strange fact that his own sister should seem to suspect him!"

"Ah. Now you have struck the true line. Why did she have that fear? There I am with you entirely. Let us ascertain that and I promise you an important development. Mrs. Hillmer and Mensmore are both concerned in the disappearance of Lady Delia, yet neither knew that she had disappeared, and both are deeply upset by it, for Mrs. Hillmer flies off to warn her brother, and the brother posts back to London the moment it comes to his ears through her. There, you see, we have a key which may unlock many doors. For Heaven's sake let it not be battered out of shape the instant it reaches our hands."

But Mr. Winter was quite humble. "As I have told you, Mr. Brett," he said, "I have done with the battering process."

"I am sure of it. And now listen to the most remarkable fact that has yet come to light. Lady Delia's body was taken from Raleigh Mansions to Putney in a four-wheeler. The cabman was forthwith locked up by the police and clapped into prison for three months. He was released yesterday, and will be here within the next quarter of an hour."

The detective's hair nearly rose on end at this statement, "Look here, Mr. Brett!" he cried, "have you any more startlers up your sleeve, or is that the finish?"

"That is the last shot in my locker."

"I'm jolly glad! I half-expected that the next thing you would say was that you did the job yourself!"

"It wouldn't be the first time you thought that; eh, my friend?"

Winter positively blushed. "Oh! that's chaff," he said. "But why the dickens did the police lock up this cabman—the only witness we could lay our hands upon? Why, I myself questioned every cabman in the vicinity several times."

Digitized by Google

"Because he got drunk on the proceeds of the journey, and subsequently thought he was Phaeton driving the chariot of the sun. But, there, he will tell you himself. I met him yesterday morning outside Holloway Gaol, and persuaded him to come here to-night, provided that he has not gone on the spree again with disastrous results."

The entrance of Smith—obviously relieved to see his master and the "'tec" on such good terms—to announce the arrival of "Mr. William Marsh," settled any doubts as to the cabman's intentions, and his appearance established the fact of his sobriety. Three months "hard" had made the cab-driver a new man.

Recognition was mutual between him and Mr. Winter.

"Hallo, Foxey," cried the latter. "It's you, is it?"

"Me it is, guv'nor; but I didn't know there was to be a 'cop' here." This with a suspicious glance at Brett and a backward movement towards the door.

"Do not be alarmed," said Brett. "This gentleman's presence means no harm to you. We want you to help us, and if you do so willingly I will make up that lost fiver you got for driving two people to Putney the night you were arrested."

The poor old cabman became very confused at this staggering remark. Up to that moment he regarded Brett as the agent for a charitable association, and there was no harm, he told his "missus," in trying to "knock him for a bit."

He stood nervously fumbling with his hat, but did not answer. Winter knew how to deal with him.

"Sit down, Foxey, and have a drink. You need one to cheer you up. Answer this gentleman's questions. He means you no harm."

"Honour bright?"

"Honour bright!"

"Well, I don't mind if I do. No soda, thank you, sir. Just a small drop of water. Ah, that's better stuff 'n they keep in Holloway."

Thus fortified, Marsh had no hesitation in telling them what he knew. Substantially, his story was identical with the version given to Brett by the ticket-collector.

"Can you describe the gentleman?" said Brett.

"No, sir. He was just like any other swell. Tall and well-dressed, and talked in the haw-haw style. It might ha' been yerself for all I could tell."

Brett smiled.

"Do you think it was I?"

Foxey scratched his head.

"No, p'r'aps it wasn't, now I come to rec'llect. He 'ad a moustache, and you 'aven't. Beggin' yer pardon, sir, but you 'ave a bit of the cut of a parson or a hactor, an' this chap wasn't neither—just an everyday sort of toff."

"Could you swear to him if you saw him?"

"That I couldn't, sir. I am a rare 'and at langwidge, but I couldn't manage that."

"Why?"

"Because that night, sir, I were as full as a tick when I started. Lord love you, it must 'ave poured out of me afterwards when I started fightin' coppers. Mr. Winter, 'e knows, I ain't no fightin' man as a rule."

"And the lady? Did you see her?"

"No, sir. Leastways, I seed a bundle which I took to be a lady, but her face was covered up with a shawl, and she was lyin' 'eavy in 'is arms as though she was mortal bad. He tell'd me she was sick."

"Did he? Anything else?"

"No, sir."

"Are you sure it was a shawl?"

A vacuous smile spread over Foxey's countenance as he answered: "I ain't sure of anythink that 'appened that night."

"But were you not surprised when a man took your cab under such peculiar circumstances, and paid you such a high fare?"

"We four-wheelers are surprised at nothink, sir. You

KING PHILIP AND OTHERS.

"King Philip," says a Spanish historian, "was liable to die any day from one of the violent attacks of indigestion and biliousness to which he was subject."

Well, if he had died nobody would have cried; yet better men than he was have died by myriads of the same complaint. Yes, and men who were a loss to their fellows too.

"With great and high folks," said Douglas Jerrold, "whenever a sickness shows itself in a family, it is treated with so much pomp and ceremony it can't make up its mind to leave."

Perhaps so; yet those of us who have a living to earn always want the sickness to leave just as soon as we can coax it or compel it to go.

On this very matter of biliousness it is Mrs. Sarah Binks who says:—"For fifteen years I have been liable to bilious attacks and had to be very careful about my eating.

"If I catch cold or get run down a bit I am almost sure—or used to be sure—to be bilious and sometimes very sick.

"I can always tell when one of these spells is coming on; my tongue gets furry and tastes nasty, and I feel good for nothing.

"Only those who are bothered with a sluggish liver know how miserable and wretched an attack of this kind makes one feel."

(Exactly. It is, as Prior says, "the solid stroke of the stomach and the liver that tells us what's o'clock." When they go wrong! Ah!)

"But," continues Mrs. Binks, "no matter how bad I feel one dose of Mother Seigel's Syrup always puts me right,—especially if I am able to sit down quietly for an hour after I have taken it.

"The Syrup settles my stomach and not only makes me hungry but helps me digest whatever I eat. It seems to get right whatsoever is wrong inside and then I feel fit and well again.

"I have often given a dose of Seigel's Syrup to girls suffering from sick headache and it has never failed to relieve them.

"Whatever else comes and goes there is one thing I keep in the house all the time—a bottle of Seigel's Syrup." Sarah Binks, 14 Lennox Street, Kirkstall Road, Leeds, February 23rd, 1900.

Mr. George Smith is a grocer and carrier, and lives at Garton, near Driffield, Yorks. He is constitutionally troubled with wind or gas, from indigestion. The only thing, he says, that does him any good is Seigel's Syrup. With care in his diet it will soon make him a young man at sixty.

Digitized by Google

don't know all wot goes on in kebs. Why, once crossin' Waterloo Bridge——"

"Never mind Waterloo Bridge, Foxey," put in the detective. "Keep all your wits on as much as you can remember of November 6."

"Where did he tell you to drive to?" went on Brett.

"Just Putney. I was to drive my hardest. 'I rec'llect wantin' to pull up at the Three Bells, but 'e put 'is 'ead out an' said, 'Go on, driver. I'm awfully late already.' So on I went."

"Where did you stop?"

"I don't know no more than the child unborn. By that time the drink was yeastin' up in me. The fare kept me on the road 'e wanted by shoutin'. When we pulled up, 'e carries 'er into a lane. There was a big house there. I know that all right. After a bit 'e comes back an' tips me a fiver. With that I whips up the old 'oss and gets back to the Three Bells. You know the rest, as the girl said when she axed the Bench to——"

"Yes, we know the rest," interrupted Brett, "but I fear you are not able to help us much."

"This isn't a five-pun job, eh, guv'nor?" said Foxey anxiously.

"Hardly, at present. We shall see. Can you say exactly where you drew up your cab when the lady was carried into it?"

"Sure as death," replied the cabman, in the hope that his information might yet be valuable. "It was outside Raleigh Mansions, Sloane Square."

"We know that——"

"It seems to me, sir, as ye know as much about the business as I do," broke in Marsh.

"Were you in the Square or in Sloane Street?"

"In Sloane Street, of course. Right away from the Square."

"Not so very far away, surely?"

Foxey was doubtful. His memory was hazy, and he feared lest he should be mistaken. "No, no," he said quickly, "not far, but still well in the street."

"Were there many people about?"

"You could hardly tell, sir, it was that foggy and nasty. If the lydy 'ad bin dead nobody would have noticed her that night."

"Did anyone beside yourself see the gentleman carrying the lady into the cab?"

"I think not. I don't remember anybody passin' at the time."

"Did the gentleman keep your cab waiting long at the kerb before he brought the lady out?"

"It might ha' bin a minute or two."

"No longer?"

"Well, sir, it's 'ard for me to say, especially after bein' away for a change of 'ealth, so to speak."

"Did not the lady speak or move in any manner?"

"Not so far as I know, sir."

"And do you mean to tell me that, although you had been drinking, you were not astonished at the whole business?"

"I never axes my fares any questions 'cept when they say 'By the hour'. Then I wants to know a bit."

"Yes; but this carrying of a lady out of a house in such a fashion—did not this strike you as strange?"

"Strange, bless your 'eart, sir. You ought to see me carting 'em off from the Daffodil Club after a big night—three and four in one keb, all blind, paralytic."

"No doubt; but this is not the Daffodil Club at daybreak. It was a respectable neighbourhood at seven o'clock, or thereabouts, on a winter's evening."

"It ain't my fault," said Foxey doggedly. "What was wrong with the lydy? Was it a habduction?"

"The lady was dead—murdered, we believe."

The cabman's face grew livid with anxiety.

"Oh, crikey, Mr. Winter," he cried, addressing the detective, "I knew nothink about it."

"No one says you did, Foxey," was the reply. "Don't you get frightened. We just want you to help us as far as you can, and not to get skeered and lose your wits."

Thus reassured, Marsh mopped his head and said solemnly:

"I will do wot lies in my power, gentlemen both, but I wish I 'adn't bin so blamed drunk that night."

"You say you would not recognise your fare if you saw him," continued Brett. "Could you tell us, if you were shown a certain person, that he was not the man. You might not be sure of the right man, but you might be sure regarding the wrong one."

"Yes, sir. It wasn't you, and it wasn't Mr. Winter, and it wasn't a lot of other people I know. I think if I saw the man who really got into my keb, I would be able to swear that he was like him, at any rate."

"All right. That will do for the present. Leave us your address, so that we may find you again if necessary. Here is a sovereign for you."

When Marsh had left them, Brett turned to the detective.

"Well," he said, "if Mensmore were here now, I suppose you would want to lock him up."

"No," said Winter, "the more I learn about this affair the more mixed it becomes. Still, I don't deny but I shall be glad to have Mensmore's explanation of his movements at that time. And so will you, Mr. Brett."

CHAPTER XXII.

A Wilful Murder.

Brett sent a telegram to Mrs. Hillmer at Paris. "Matters satisfactorily arranged pending your arrival," he wired, and early on Monday morning he received a reply.

"Due Charing Cross 7.30 p.m. Will drive straight to your chambers with my brother.—Gwendoline Hillmer."

He forwarded the message with a note to Mr. Winter, asking him to be present.

About one o'clock Pyne turned up.

"Guess I slept well last night after the excitement," he said with a pleasant smile. "You seemed to skeer those chaps more with a few words, Mr. Brett, than I did with a revolver."

"The English police are not so much afraid of revolvers as they are of making mistakes," was the answer.

"Now, is that so? On our side they wouldn't have stopped to argy. Both of 'em would have drawn on me at once."

"Then I am glad for everybody's sake, Mr. Pyne, that the affair happened in London."

"Why, sure. But tell me. Has my friend Mensmore been getting himself into trouble?"

"Not so much as it looks. Others appear to have involved him without his knowledge, and he has lent colour to the accusations by his involuntary actions of a suspicious nature."

"Well, if it is permissible, I should like to hear the straight story."

Under the circumstances Brett felt that this stranger from America had a right to know why he was in such danger of being arrested during his first twenty-four hours' residence in the country, so he gave him a succinct narrative of the prima facie case against Mensmore.

Pyne listened in silence to the recital. When it ended he said:

"Mr. Brett, my friend was incapable of murdering any woman. He was equally incapable of conducting any discreditable liaison with any woman. I have known him for years, and a straighter, truer, more honourable man I never met. I don't know what his reason was for assuming my name, which he undoubtedly did, as the agent called this morning, and I find the flat is taken in my name."

"What did you say?"

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

A FREE GIFT.

500 40-EGG INCUBATORS.

Ladies and Gentlemen can greatly increase their incomes by POULTRY BREEDING, thus converting 1d. Eggs into 1s. Chickens. To encourage this industry we intend supplying each applicant during the next 28 days with one of our 40-Egg Incubators.

Write for Free Gift Form to POULTRY BREEDERS' APPLIANCE CO., 3 Clarence Road, SOUTHEND-ON-SEA.

THE ENGLISH & WELSH COAL Co.,

GLOBE SHIPPING OFFICE,
81 BRIDGE STREET, MANCHESTER.

Deliver in Truck Load. Prices on application.

Purveyors to The Licensed Victuallers by special appointment.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 125 Oxford Street, London, W.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.

THE MARSTON CO.,
59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.

GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS,
148 Old Street, London, E.C.

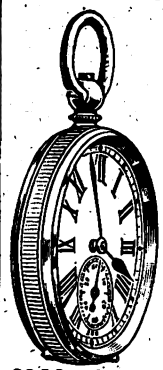
HAVE YOU TRIED KEATING'S LOZENGES FOR YOUR COUGH?

ANY DOCTOR WILL TELL YOU "there is no better Cough Medicine."—One gives relief: if you suffer from cough try them but once: they will cure, and they will not injure your health; an increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1½d. tins.

£50 CASH PRIZE

SEND NO MONEY WE TRUST YOU.

FREE.



£2 10s. £2 10s. REAL SILVER

WE GIVE YOU YOUR CHOICE of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1s. 6d. each. (Regular price, 2s. 6d.)

WE DO NOT WANT YOUR MONEY.

JUST WRITE US A POST-CARD

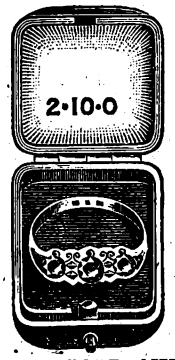
saying that you will either sell the Jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it with your name and address clearly written. On receiving your post card we will at once post you the Jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13s. 6d. you have received for same, and we will at once send you (no waiting), Absolutely Free, our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A Written Guarantee for Ten Years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1s. 6d. each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

FREE.



REAL GOLD AND REAL DIAMONDS

SEND NO MONEY. SEND NO STAMPS.

WRITE US TO-DAY. ONLY A POST-CARD.

WHAT THE PUBLIC SAYS:—

KNOCKING OTHERS IN THE SHADE ALTOGETHER.

100 High Street,
Mountain Ash, South Wales,

Dear Sir,—Just a line to acknowledge having received the beautiful present; it was beyond expectation. There are a lot of goods from a Glasgow firm but nothing compared with the British Goldsmiths Company's goods. We are knocking them in the shade altogether. Everyone who has bought our goods speak very well of them. I will do my best for your Company in little Wales.—Yours fraternally,
WILLIAM WILLIAMS.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS:—

"We have received some samples of the jewellery now being sold by the British Goldsmiths Co., the value of which is really wonderful considering the low prices asked for the goods. The British Goldsmiths Co. send out their goods to be sold by those who wish to put their spare time to good advantage. We should think there would be little difficulty about selling the goods we have before us. They are substantial, well finished, and cheap. The company offers a handsome present free to all persons selling a certain number of these articles."—HOME SWEET HOME, Jan. 5th., 1901.

BRITISH GOLDSMITHS CO. (DEPT. 29), 48 GRAY'S INN RD., LONDON.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

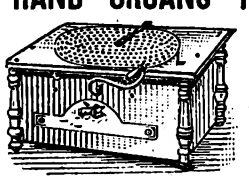
COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

TO SUFFERERS OF INDIGESTION

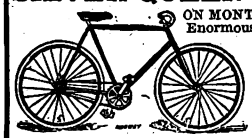
A cure of Indigestion is guaranteed in a few Weeks by the use of REES & CO'S. INDIGESTION CURE. If not, money will be returned. A Trial will convince. Price 1/9 per bottle.—REES & Co., Narberth, Pem.

HAND-ORGANS FROM 20s.



Made in three sizes, in black and gold case. Full tone. Six metal tunes, plays all songs, hymns, or dance music. Sent on receipt of 4s. P.O., if desired, balance 4s. monthly. Send for list of tunes, prices, &c. ATLAS CO., 182s High Street, Camden Town, London; 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; and 14 High Road, Kilburn.

SILVER QUEEN CYCLES.



ON MONTHLY PAYMENTS
Enormous Stock. New and second-hand. From 10s. MONTHLY. Carriage paid. ILLUSTRATED PRICE LISTS POST FREE any address. SILVER QUEEN CYCLE CO. LTD.,
221 Tottenham Court Road, London, W.

A CHILD'S SLEEPING SUIT

can be made by any lady who follows carefully the Paper Pattern and instructions

GIVEN AWAY

with every copy of

HOME NOTES

Published on Friday,

The Best and Daintiest of Ladies' Weeklies. You should order a Copy at once.

ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

AN IMPORTANT BUSINESS ALLIANCE.

A 20th Century Library temporarily within reach of all.

WITH pleasure we announce that an arrangement has been effected securing for a limited time the co-operation of the well-known publishing house of W. & R. CHAMBERS Ltd., Edinburgh, with the Daily Express.

The public has long known Chambers's Encyclopædia as the most practical and the most popular of all libraries of reference in the English language. At the suggestion of the Daily Express the publishers have been engaged for months in thoroughly revising their excellent publication in accordance with the newest statistics, events, and discoveries. The result of their painstaking labour in this connection is now presented to the public in the form of

The 20th Century Issue of

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA

The first impression of 10,000 sets of this great work has been secured by the Daily Express for distribution at a remarkably low price and upon such easy terms of payment that the most modest purse string is not strained: the complete set in ten volumes will be delivered to the subscriber all at one time, immediately upon the receipt of a preliminary payment of 3s., to be followed by nine monthly payments of 8s. 6d. each. The subscriber thus enjoying the full use of all the volumes while he is completing the purchase in this easy manner.

A special book offer by an enterprising newspaper is not a novelty. The Daily Express has made several offers that have proved very acceptable to its readers. In this way, it has been able materially to assist its readers in building up libraries in their homes. But never before in the history of journalism has any newspaper been able to announce an offer so liberal and attractive as the present special offer by the Daily Express. The only regret is that a larger number of sets could not be secured for distribution on these liberal terms. 10,000 sets of so valuable a work are sure to be subscribed for in a very short time by the thousands who have long felt the need of a thoroughly modern encyclopædia. Those who desire to avail themselves of this offer should therefore lose no time in cutting out the application form printed on the following page, and handing it, with the preliminary payment of 3s., to the most convenient bookseller or newsagent for transmission to the Daily Express.

CUT OUT APPLICATION FORM PRINTED ON FOLLOWING PAGE.

Digitized by Google

Daily Express

Makes a remarkable offer (see announcement on preceding page) in respect of

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA

20th CENTURY ISSUE.

The only truly modern work of its kind. It is International in character. Its ten imperial 8vo volumes contain more than Thirty Thousand Articles, nearly Four Thousand Engravings, Fifty-three Coloured Maps, all based on newest statistics, events, and discoveries.

The complete set is delivered to the subscribers all at one time, immediately upon receipt of a preliminary payment of 3 shillings. After the subscriber has received the entire set, he completes his purchase by nine monthly payments of 8/6 each.

THREE WAYS TO PROCEED.—Chambers's Encyclopædia is so well and favourably known, and this offer so remarkable, that the distribution of these 10,000 sets may be only a question of a few days. Although we have no desire to press a decision, we feel bound to urge most seriously the propriety of immediate application by everyone who desires one of these sets. There is no better time than the present, and a later day may be too late.

Cut Out this Application Form and hand it at once with 3s. to your Bookseller or Newsagent for transmission to the DAILY EXPRESS. Cheques payable to order of Lloyds Bank Ltd.

To the General Manager, DAILY EXPRESS, Date.....1901.
17 Tudor Street, London, E.C.

I enclose 3s. Please send me Chambers's Encyclopædia (20th Century Issue).

[Strike out one of these lines.] (a) Cloth, for which I agree to make to you, or to anyone you may appoint, nine further payments of 8s. 6d. each,
(b) Half Morocco, for which I agree to make to you, or to anyone you may appoint, nine further payments of 13s. each,

my next payment upon delivery of the complete ten volumes, and my succeeding payments on the corresponding day of each month following. Until such payments are completed, I engage that the volumes remain your property, and shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise. I further agree that if, owing to unforeseen circumstances, of which you shall be the judge, the volumes cannot be delivered, the return of this deposit of 3s. shall cancel this agreement.

[Signed].....

[Rank or Occupation].....

[A9SS23021] [Address].....

CARRIAGE FREE TO ANY PART OF THE UNITED KINGDOM.

CASH PAYMENT.

Subscribers who elect to pay for the set in one payment should use this form. Cheques should be drawn to the order of Lloyds Bank Ltd., and handed to a reliable Bookseller or Newsagent for transmission to the DAILY EXPRESS.

To the General Manager, DAILY EXPRESS,
17 Tudor Street, London, E.C.

[Strike out one line.] Enclosed £3 15s., for which please send me Chambers's Encyclopædia (20th Century Issue), bound in cloth, carriage paid to the following address.
Enclosed £5 12s. 6d. for which please send me Chambers's Encyclopædia (20th Century Issue), in Half Morocco, carriage paid to the following address:

[Name].....
[A9SS23021]
[Address].....

YOUR OWN BOOKSELLER OR NEWSAGENT

can doubtless give you any further desired information regarding Chambers's Encyclopædia or the present special offer; or, the DAILY EXPRESS will answer as promptly as possible all inquiries, but since the sale is limited to only 10,000 sets no definite continuance of this offer can be promised.

INQUIRY FORM.

To the General Manager, DAILY EXPRESS,
17 Tudor Street, London, E.C.

Please send me illustrated pamphlet of Chambers's Encyclopædia (20th Century Edition), with full particulars of your special offer.

[Name].....
[A9SS23021]
[Address].....

Digitized by Google

THE EDITOR'S PAGE.

LAST week I announced briefly that I had several new features in contemplation for Short Stories. I should like to say a word or two about them here.

In the first place, I have been fortunate enough to secure for exclusive publication in this country a series of stories by Mr. R. Norman Silver, whose last novel, "A Daughter of Mystery," was recently followed day by day by eager hundreds of thousands in the Daily Express.

The tales which Mr. Norman Silver has written for Short Stories will appear under the general title of and will deal with incidents in the life of the late Mr. Hugo Pontifex, the famous West-end solicitor.

"A Keeper of Secrets,"

These stories, which will begin next week, will be complete in each number, and will be found to be of a most engrossing nature. Indeed, in my humble opinion, the doings of Hugo Pontifex will seize the popular mind with a hold as tenacious as did the characters of Sherlock Holmes and Dr. Nikola. The character, indeed, although a quite distinct type from those famous creations of the novelists, has all the intense, almost uncanny, fascination which they possessed. Dramatic and romantic enough to suit the most exacting reader, the stories have the added merit of being founded on fact.

Here is the author's foreword regarding Hugo Pontifex, which will give the reader some inkling of the kind of stories he may expect:

A KEEPER OF SECRETS.

Being Days in the Professional Life of the Late Mr. Hugo Pontifex, the Famous West-end Solicitor.

To those who had only met him casually in Society, the late Mr. Pontifex was a good-tempered mystery. Bluff, handsome, and in spite of his middle-age, a little of a dandy, he seemed the last man in the world to deserve his reputation, which was that of the keenest, most audacious, and unerring of family lawyers. Fair-haired, and powerful as an athlete, his striking appearance was increased by his eyes, one of which was grey and one blue.

In reality, however, Hugo Pontifex had a wide and almost exclusively aristocratic practice. He seldom briefed a barrister, seldom set foot in a court of justice, but single handed he hunted down, captured and safely buried, mystery after mystery of terrible import to Ma fair and Belgravia.

An expert in strangling scandal, he lived a life of enthralling interest and died a rich man. When his executors went through his papers they found nothing to satisfy their curiosity, though plenty to excite it. Hugo Pontifex knew the value of fire—and the dangers of ink. But from time to time he related to the writer, who enjoyed a certain measure of his confidence, the incidents which form the basis of the following stories. In speaking of these strange fragments of drama, Mr. Pontifex himself employed fictitious names, the present author being left to guess vainly at the identity of the genuine actors.

Another series of stories which is bound to prove popular will be "Tales Told Off Duty."

These will be told by various people, and will comprise stories by soldiers, sailors, detectives, prison-warders, doctors, divers, firemen; indeed, every kind of person into whose lives there enters a large element of adventure and excitement.

As with the other series, so will these tales be complete in each number.

And now I wish to seize what seems to me a fitting opportunity to make a request to you. I want you to help Short Stories by securing new readers. Widely known as the paper is, there are still some people who do not read it with that regularity which I should desire. It is within your power to help me in this connection, and I shall feel much obliged if you will do so by bringing the paper under the notice of your brother or sister, or somebody else's brother or sister. One of the chief charms of Short Stories is that it appeals equally to both sexes. I am sure I can rely on your doing your best.

FENCING

Is the fashionable pastime for ladies. See No. 2 of the LADY'S MAGAZINE, now on sale, for a splendidly illustrated article on this subject.

No. 2 BETTER EVEN THAN No. 1.

Crammed with interesting stories and articles, besides a large instalment of Hall Caine's great story.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Part I. of

THE HOME ARTS SELF-TEACHER

(Complete in twelve fortnightly parts), which, among many other things, tells you how to teach yourself Drawing, Painting, Modelling, Wood Carving, Poker Work, &c., &c., with over 500 illustrations and designs.

On sale at all Booksellers, Newsagents, and Bookstalls; or of the Publishers, C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Henrietta St., London, W.C.

Price 7d. Each Part. Part II. Ready on February 15th.

SHORT STORIES ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double " " "	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page " "	5 0 0
Quarter-page " "	2 10 0
Eighth-page " "	1 5 0
Front page, whole " "	12 10 0
" half "	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Feb. 26th, if intended for the issue on sale March 12th, and dated March 16th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

WONDERS OF FACE TRANSFORMATION

READ "The Most Remarkable Work of the Century."—(Vide the Press.)

Professor Boyd Laynard's Great Book

"SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, and LONG LIFE."

Published by HAMMOND, HAMMOND & Co., 19, 21, & 23 Ludgate Hill, London.

The Publishers have much pleasure in announcing the issue of the popular edition of Professor Boyd Laynard's great work, "Secrets of Beauty, Health, and Long Life."

This remarkable handbook to the three subjects embraced in the title has been a long period in preparation by the author; being, in fact, the labour of many years of diligent research and earnest investigation. The work is arranged in 127 chapters, the whole of which (in the popular edition now offered to the public) is bound in one volume. The book, although published at Two Shillings, will, if ordered direct from the Publishers, be forwarded to readers of Short Stories, carriage paid, at the low discount price of

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

Amongst the numerous subjects dealt with, the following are but a few; a complete syllabus, showing the contents of the whole of the 127 chapters, enumerating upwards of 500 subjects and divisions of subjects, can be had free on application to the Publishers:

The way we make our own faces - Secrets of face transformation—Changeableness of beauty and its causes—Various influences that tend to mar good looks—Some strange facts concerning the variableness of beauty—"Odd-faced" beauty—The countenance the counterpart of the mind—How pleasing expressions become permanent—How a person's habitual look is acquired—How permanent expressions can be transformed—Metaphysical secrets of keeping young and preserving a youthful appearance—The author's investigations into the causes why some individuals look younger than others at a certain age—Discovery of a great metaphysical secret—Natural means by which a youthful appearance can be retained until late in life—Wonders of the skin—Effects of mental emotions upon the skin—Bad complexions and their causes—Diet that spoils and diet that improves the complexion—General care of the complexion—How various passions act upon the complexion—How skin diseases can be induced by strong mental emotions—Construction, growth, and wonders of the hair—Why hair falls out, and its remedy—Premature greyness; its causes and prevention—Superficial hairs—Wrinkles, and how to treat them—Oily skin, dry skin, and loose skin—How the nose may be improved—Protruding ears and their treatment—Offensive breath—General care of the teeth—Tallness, and how to attain it—Diet that assists the development of the human form—Round shoulders and how to cure them—How to acquire a full chest—Perfect form and figure: their proper proportions—How nature works on a mathematical system—What the measurements of each part of the human body ought to be in accordance with its right proportions—Thinness, and its treatment—Excessive stoutness—Care of the hands—Care of the feet—Physiognomy; or, the art of reading character from the face—Mental influences upon health—Power of the mind over the body—Influence of the mind in curing diseases—how the mind can induce disease—How violent passions injure health—Laughter as a medicine—Ailments cured by laughter—Wonders of digestion—Relative value to our bodies of the principal articles of food—Fruits and vegetables as medicine: their various influences upon the physical system—Health preserving diet, and its consistency—Diet favourable to mental exertion and intellectual culture—Influence of various foods upon our passions and propensities—The influence exerted by the mind upon the appetite and digestion—Some perilous articles of food—Light, and its influence upon health—Exercise and its relations to health—Baths and bathing: their influence upon health—The way we breathe, and how it affects our health—The marriage state, and its influence upon health—Statistics showing the comparative vitality of married and single persons—100 professions, trades, and occupations: their respective influences upon health and long life—Sleep, and its relation to health—Conditions for healthy sleep—Insomnia, and its treatment—The eyes, and how to preserve them—The ears and hearing: how to prevent deafness—The voice: its cultivation and preservation—Memory, and how to improve it—Stammering, and how to cure it—Prevention of disease—Colds: their prevention and treatment—Constipation—Neuralgia—Nervousness—Headaches—That rebellious organ, the liver—Blushing: its physiology and treatment—Rules of life for attaining longevity—Compendium of the mental, moral, physical, and external influences that lessen the years of our earthly existence—How to live to a hundred—Premature old age and its causes—Short biographies of 30 modern centenarians, whose ages range from 115 to 185 years—Attainment of long life under physical disabilities—General principles that can be laid down for the anticipation of longevity—The Eight Signs of long life.

ORDER FORM. 796,773.

To HAMMOND, HAMMOND & Co.,
19, 21, and 23 Ludgate Hill, London.

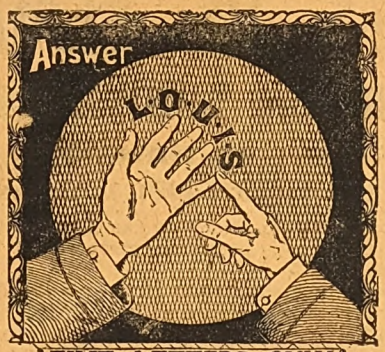
Please forward me Professor Boyd Laynard's complete work, "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE" (carriage paid), for which I enclose the sum of One Shilling and Sixpence.

Name.....

Address.....

Digitized by Google

HOW DO YOU SPELL VELVETEEN?



FIVE LETTERS ONLY.

Don't Forget this when You Buy.

Every Yard is Stamped L-O-U-I-S

WHEN BUYING A CHEAP BICYCLE,

look at the tyres. If they are not the machine is not cheap at any price.

DUNLOP TYRES

Trade Mark.

The DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE CO., Ltd.,
Factory: Alma Street, Coventry;
160 Clerkenwell Road, E.C., London.

Branches: Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Nottingham, Manchester, Glasgow, Dublin, &c.

NATURE'S AID TO THE SKIN

Icilma

Icilma is the modern Fountain of Youth Wéjary

THE OXYGENISED NATURAL WATER.

The only Natural and absolutely Safe Remedy for the Complexion, for the Nursery, for Cuts, Bruises, Nettlerash, and all Irritations of the Skin. "ICILMA" stops bleeding immediately, and with a magnifying glass the skin can be actually seen to grow over a cut or wound. Never be without it; and if a Clear, Smooth, Transparent Skin is desired, use always

ICILMA SOAP MADE WITH ICILMA WATER.

(N.B.—"Icilma" has been examined at Somerset House, and as a Natural Mineral Water is exempt from the Patent Medicine Stamp.)

"ICILMA" ACTS AT ONCE AND LIKE MAGIC. Shilling Bottles (Scented 2s.)

Of all Chemists or from Barclay & Sons Ltd., 95 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

An elegant Table Decoration & perfect protection from hot dishes and plates.

Oroco Mfg Co Wigan

OROCO TABLE MATS

TEN FOR ONE SHILLING POST FREE.

Consisting of:-

6 Plate, 2 Meat dish, & 2 Vegetable dish sizes.

Reckitt's PARIS Blue.

The Best is the Cheapest.

Digitized by Google

ROYAL MAGAZINE NOW ON SALE. PRICE 4D.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 635. FOR WEEK ENDING MARCH 2ND, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

Cadbury's cocoa

"THE STANDARD OF HIGHEST PURITY."—The Lancet.

Free from drugs or any admixture.

The Editors of THE LANCET, June 16th, 1900, say:

"We are glad to find that Messrs. Cadbury draw attention to the fact that there are strong grounds for objection to the addition to cocoa of certain foreign substances. This resource is quite unnecessary, and, indeed, pernicious, especially having regard to the fact that cocoa alone is an excellent food as well as a stimulant, having a salutary action upon the nerve centres."

CADBURY'S IS THE PURE COCOA

Entirely free from Drugs, Kola, Malt, or Hops.

Digitized by Google

A TRUE HAIR GROWER.

A London business man makes a remarkable offer to readers of "Short Stories." He will send his preparation on trial.

FREE TO YOU.

A FEW YEARS AGO THE TOP OF MY HEAD WAS ENTIRELY BALD. My father and grandfather were bald-headed. My mother's hair was naturally very thin also. I was quite reconciled to being bald-headed myself. One day, during a trip through Switzerland, I met with a learned elderly gentleman, who, in the course of conversation, asked if I were desirous of possessing a LUXURIANT GROWTH OF HAIR UPON MY HEAD. Naturally I was interested, and replied in the affirmative. He therefore stated to me that he had been a life-long student of chemistry, and that he had made a feature of hirsutal matters. He gave me a formula, and suggested that I have it compounded, which I did when I reached Geneva, and continued to use the preparation for a short time. In three weeks hair began to assert itself, and within FORTY DAYS my head was quite covered. I supplied some of the preparation to two friends, one of whom was a lady whose hair had been nearly lost, AND THE RESULTS IN EACH CASE WAS ASTONISHING.

SINCE THEN I HAVE BEEN SELLING THE PREPARATION, HAVING OBTAINED PERMISSION TO DO SO FROM THE SAVANT WHO MADE THE DISCOVERY. I can testify to hundreds of other successful instances; in fact, it is most wonderful in effect. Equally potent with either sex. This is not a patented medicine. I have no fancy labels for it, nor is it sold at chemists' shops. To any reader who will write to me enclosing two stamps to pay for postage, &c., mentioning that he or she saw this announcement in this journal I will gladly send a sample box of the preparation, without charge, for the purpose of demonstrating its real value. Then, when you find that the hair has begun to grow, I will sell you a further quantity at a small charge. Address:

JOHN CRAVEN-BURLEIGH, 110, St. Martin's Lane, London, W.C.

Y-U-U-Z-I-T. THE NEW DENTRIFICE. THE ONLY WAY DISCOLOURED TEETH can be RESTORED to their original colour WITHOUT SCALING is by using this Tooth-powder, the proprietors of which guarantee the return of your money in full if the powder does not do what is claimed above. No other Tooth-powder in the world is sold under such conditions. Obtainable from all Chemists. Price 1/1. per box, or direct from the Proprietors and manufacturers.

BLATCHFORD ROGERS SYNDICATE, Moorgate Station Chambers, E.C.

JUNO CYCLES FOR LADIES AND GENTS. FREE OR FIXED WHEELS.

LISTS POST FREE

THE VERY BEST. Carriage Paid. Discount for Cash.

Monthly
£3 10s. ... 14/3
£10 10s. ... 17/6
£12 ... ... 20/-
£12 12s. ... 21/-
£14 14s. ... 24/6
£15 15s. ... 26/3

Road Racer ... £3 10s. 15s. 10d. Monthly. Write for New Light Roadster, £10 0s. 10s. 8d. Monthly. Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories, over 100 pages, sent post free. Scorcher Brake, 1/-; Octagon Cyclometer, 10,000 miles, 1/6

METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS CO. Ltd. Juno Cycle School & Works, 75, 76, Bishopsgate Street, Without, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

A CHILD'S USEFUL SLEEPING SUIT can be made by any lady who follows carefully the Paper Pattern and instructions

GIVEN AWAY with every copy of THIS WEEK'S HOME NOTES

The Best and Daintiest of Ladies, Weeklies. You should get a Copy at once.

ONE PENNY.

The Only Efficacious Substitute for Cod-liver Oil.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

Really Genuine. In Patent Air-tight Tins. ½lb., 1/4; 1lb., 2/4; 2lb., 4/-; including Tin and Postage.

Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

FREE. FREE. Our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch (with chain), or A Real Gold Ring Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

SEND NO MONEY.

NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money.

Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

Send no money. Write to-day

BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 5). 282 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 635.] For the Week Ending March 2nd, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

A Keeper of Secrets

Being Days in the Professional Life of the late Mr. Hugo Pontifex, the Famous West-end Solicitor.

To those who had only met him casually in Society, the late Mr. Pontifex was a good-tempered mystery. Buff, handsome, and, in spite of his middle-age, a little of a dandy, he seemed the last man in the world to deserve his reputation, which was that of the keenest, most audacious, and unerring of family lawyers. Fair-haired, and powerful as an athlete, his striking appearance was increased by his eyes, one of which was grey and one blue.

In reality, however, Hugo Pontifex had a wide and almost exclusively aristocratic practice. He seldom briefed a barrister, seldom set foot in a court of justice, but single handed he hunted down, captured, and safely buried mystery after mystery of terrible import to Mayfair and Belgravia.

An expert in st. angling scandal, he lived a life of enthralling interest, and died a rich man. When his executors went through his papers they found nothing to satisfy their curiosity, though plenty to excite it. Hugo Pontifex knew the value of fire—and the dangers of ink. But from time to time he related to the writer, who enjoyed a certain measure of his confidence, the incidents which form the basis of the following stories. In speaking of these strange fragments of drama, Mr. Pontifex himself employed fictitious names, the present author being left to guess vainly at the identity of the genuine actors.

I.—THE FATE OF THE BANTRY PEERAGE.

"THE Marquis of Bantry, sir."

Mr. Pontifex's clerk—a tall man in rusty black, with the stoop of a clergyman and the voice of a butler—announced the great solicitor's latest client and then squeezed himself respectfully against the massive door of the private room as the Marquis passed in. He drew it to and latched it before regaining his seat at a desk which practically guarded the approach to Mr. Pontifex's sanctum.

The clerk himself was rather deaf and made both a safe and determined sentry. Not that anything less than a scream or a pistol-shot could have penetrated to the outer world through the stout walls and door of Mr. Pontifex's apartment.

The solicitor had risen to meet his visitor. The card sent in by the Marquis lay on the writing-table; he had just put down a swan quill in a gold and cornelian holder.

The Marquis of Bantry took in at a glance the solid yet tasteful luxury of the room, the rare old steel prints in their handsome frames, the Afghan carpet, the antique oak furniture. He noticed the easy self-possession of the lawyer's bearing, the elegance of his dress, the value and beauty of his jewellery. When, therefore, an instant later, the peer bowed to the solicitor, it was not the salutation of a superior to an inferior, but the bow of one gentleman to another.

"Mr. Pontifex," he said, accepting the seat which the lawyer suggested with a smile and a silent gesture, "I come upon a singular errand."

"Most of my clients, Lord Bantry," observed Mr. Pontifex, reassuringly, "have the same confession to make."

"So I understood," answered the Marquis, "indeed, that is why I am here—attracted, if I may say so, by your remarkable reputation. You are doubtless a busy man, Mr. Pontifex, and I will come to the point at once. You may have heard that my daughter, Lady Julia Ennis, is to be married shortly to Mr. Cecil Stratton, the son of Mr. Lucas Stratton, who will be known to you in connection with the Stock Exchange."

"The wedding is expected to prove one of the most brilliant of the season," rejoined the solicitor, courteously. He was studying the grey-headed soldierly figure before him.

The marriage to which the Marquis had referred was furnishing materials for endless gossip in smart circles. Lord Bantry was an Irish peer, who, as a youth, had inherited a splendid title and a wrecked fortune. Now, in his old age, he was stooping to ally his blue blood with the gold of a mushroom millionaire. He acknowledged Mr. Pontifex's compliment with a sigh.

"Julia is young, pretty, and really in love," he said gloomily, "and Cecil Stratton is a good fellow who worships the ground she walks on. But it is necessary for me to confess to you, Mr. Pontifex, that his father has only consented to the marriage because he believes that Julia will, one of these days, be a peeress in her own right, with remainder to her children. My daughter was to become the wife of Cecil Stratton in virtue of her position as the last of the Ennises, her husband was to take the name of Stratton-Ennis, and the Stratton millions were to restore prosperity to the house of Bantry."

Digitized by Google

Mr. Pontifex chose a small revolver and pocketed it.

"Pardon my observing, Lord Bantry," interposed the solicitor; "that you speak in the past tense. Am I to conclude that some obstacle to the marriage has arisen or may arise?"

The Marquis leant towards his questioner. "You have guessed rightly," he replied, in a low tone; "whether you can help me or not remains to be seen. Yet it is in that hope I have sought you."

Mr. Pontifex played with his ring—a ring that mounted a superb emerald. He did not speak—it was his habit to wait for confidences.

"Most people have forgotten by now," went on Lord Bantry; "that I had once two sons, Valentine, Viscount Athlone, and Stephen his younger brother. The Ennis blood ran in their veins, they were both wild—as wild as their great-grandfather, the Black Marquis of the Georges. Their passion was hunting—hunting and steeple-chasing. Valentine was just past his majority, Stephen nearing it, when, in a steeple-chase in which both were riding, their horses collided at a bad wall-jump and came down together. Stephen was picked up dead and frightfully crushed."

The Marquis faltered and turned his face away. Mr. Pontifex was watching him closely.

"Soon afterwards," murmured Lord Bantry, "Athlone left Ireland for the East. He ceased to communicate with us, drawing his allowance through an agent in Cairo, and leading a wandering, adventurous, misanthropic existence. Ultimately we heard of his death. That was the way in which Julia became the heiress of Bantry."

As the Marquis described the fate of his elder son his tone grew hard and dry—there had been grief in it when he mentioned the death of his younger one.

"A melancholy story, Lord Bantry," said Mr. Pontifex; "but why recall it now?"

The Marquis of Bantry looked furtively about the quiet private room, into which the chill February noon sent a pale and unusual gleam of sunshine. Then he whispered slowly:

"It was a mistake about Athlone—a ghastly mistake; he still lives, lives! Oh, the horror of it! the horror of it!"

A flicker of shrewd interest shot across the solicitor's countenance.

"My dear Lord Bantry," he expostulated, gravely; "the Viscount is your own son. Even if his return to life should interfere with your plans for Lady Julia, you will find a welcome for him when the first shock of your—your surprise is past."

The Marquis stared at the lawyer with a strange incredulity.

"Find a welcome for Athlone!" he muttered; "you don't understand—can't you see the accident at the wall-jump was no accident at all—Stephen was murdered! murdered! and by his own brother! The whole county suspected it, Athlone had backed his horse desperately and it was first favourite. Stephen rode a weedy chestnut he had trained himself and the brute had a marvellous turn of speed. At the wall the chestnut was going easy, with everyone but Athlone beaten and distanced, and it was plain that even Athlone's horse had made his last challenge. It was then that Athlone, who was the better rider, fouled the chestnut and brought his own horse and himself on top of Stephen. You would say he did it in a sudden fury and repented it in sackcloth and ashes. So said I, once."

Digitized by Google

He twisted his silk handkerchief into a knot and wiped his trembling lips.

"I pitied Athlone," he said, sternly, "for I thought it was my hot temper coming out in the lad and ruining his life for ever. So I sent him abroad—for all the county cut him after that—and I starved the estate to make him an allowance. Then my Julia fell sick—she had ailed since Stephen's death—and in her delirium she betrayed the awful truth, for it had preyed on her mind long and sore."

Mr. Pontifex was certainly interested in this, nor did he take the trouble to disguise the fact. He had thrown one foot over his knee and sat with his arms folded and his brows knitted. His peculiar eyes glittered as they only did when he was, in his cold fashion, a trifle excited.

"It was no mad fury that led Athlone to kill his brother," said the Marquis, with a harsh directness that forbade sympathy; "he had sworn to do it if the chestnut was ridden in the Bantry Steeplechase. They had tried horses together and Stephen won with a stone in hand. Athlone asked him to withdraw from the race and was refused. Julia heard them quarrelling over it.

"'Very well,' Athlone told his brother, 'as sure as you ride in that race it will be your last. I'll kill you at the wall, if I do for myself into the bargain.' And he did it, as he had sworn, and earnt the curse of the father he had bereaved and dishonoured."

Lord Bantry wiped his forehead—it was dripping with perspiration.

"When I knew of it," he added, "I wrote and forbade him ever to see me again. For Julia's sake I did not tell him how I had become cognisant of his guilt, but I stopped his allowance and warned him he was as dead to me henceforth as he had made Stephen. After that I heard no more of him until there came the news, apparently accurate, of his death. And now, now he has come back—to England, to London, a miserable, broken wretch. All other sources of income have failed him, and, a criminal apparently in more lands than one, he demands money from me with menaces, threatening to ruin Julia's marriage if I refuse it."

The Marquis scanned eagerly the solicitor's expression, but not yet did Mr. Pontifex choose to indulge in any comment.

"How can I deny his demands," pursued Lord Bantry, "without shattering my last hope of restoring the Bantry fortunes, how can I in honour—even if I could bribe Athlone to silence—permit the marriage to take place under false pretences? Answer me these riddles, Mr. Pontifex, and I will give you, in three months, a blank cheque which you shall fill in as you will."

The solicitor twisted the emerald ring upon his long, firm finger—round and round it went—then stopped suddenly. Mr. Pontifex had made up his mind.

"Let me know," he said, "where I can see your son."

Lord Bantry coloured deeply.

At the sound of the solicitor's footsteps, the figure got up.

"Athlone writes," was the peer's embarrassed reply; "that he is masquerading as an Indian attendant seeking an engagement. He gives an address in Soho and insisted that I should bring or send him money. Alarmed by his threats, I yielded, and made an appointment. Had it not been for hearing your name and remarkable abilities mentioned at my club, I should have been on my way to Soho by this."

"With your permission," said Mr. Pontifex, "I will keep that appointment for you, Lord Bantry. May I know the address?"

Digitized by Google

"The top floor at Number Five, ——— Street, Soho," explained the Marquis; "ask, he says, for Muley Hassan."

Mr. Pontifex rose and the peer followed his example, taking up his silk hat from the lawyer's writing-table.

"One moment!" desired the solicitor; he paused himself, gazing intently at the Marquis. "You have no thought in this matter but for your daughter, Lady Julia?" he inquired; "you believed that Viscount Athlone was dead—your one wish is that he had not returned to life?"

Lord Bantry shivered as he encountered the piercing scrutiny of the solicitor. But he stiffened himself coldly and declared:

"I have already said so—could I endure a fratricide to become Marquis of Bantry? If I had no daughter, sir, I should still wish that Athlone were dead."

Mr. Pontifex bent his head as if he had received the answer to some important question. His clerk entered, to stand inquiringly on the threshold.

"The Marquis' carriage," said the solicitor, and bowed to his client. "You have given me a difficult task, Lord Bantry," he observed; "in twenty-four hours you shall know if I have been able to help you."

The Marquis returned the salute with an old-world courtesy and passed out of the apartment. As for Mr. Pontifex, he stepped to a cupboard, took from it a dark overcoat, by no means smartly made, selected a felt hat from the half-dozen which hung in the species of closet, pushed off his patent-leather boots and donned a rougher pair.

As a last feature in his toilet he laid aside his rings and pin, locking them up in his private safe. From among several such articles in this receptacle, he chose a small and extremely plain revolver, loaded, and pocketed it. Then, unfastening a second door to the apartment, he slipped out into a gloomy corridor that reached a bye-way of St. James Street. These unceremonious disappearances were familiar to Mr. Pontifex's clerk, who was, in fact, as discreet as he was deaf.

Mr. Pontifex walked up St. James Street and strolled into Soho by way of Golden Square. He found ——— Street without trouble and made for Number Five.

It was an old and much-battered house of three stories, whose panelled door stood wide open, showing a carpetless lobby and rickety stairs.

The solicitor marched in and was investigating the entrances on the loftiest landing before anyone could have noticed his presence in the neighbourhood of Number Five.

Two out of the three entrances were bolted or otherwise secured.

From the other, which stood ajar, came certain sickly fumes that caused Mr. Pontifex to shrug his shoulders. They were those of stale opium smoke. He thrust the door inward and passed through.

On a mattress that occupied a corner of the garret lay outstretched a thin and wasted figure, clad in the limp black garments peculiar to the Indian servant in England. On its head was a cotton turban. The skin of the face was sallow and had doubtless been dyed.

The miserable wretch clung to the knees of Mr. Pontifex.

At the sound of the solicitor's footstep the figure got up.

Although the place reeked of opium and there were the instruments for smoking it on a splintered box that served as table, the occupant was not under the influence of the drug.

"Well," Mr. Pontifex was told, "I suppose you're from my lord of B. No one comes here in a month of Sundays, except on business. Now you've arrived, cut the cackle and get to the horses. What are the terms? I warn you the old man will have to stump up something handsome if he doesn't want me to cook his goose about Julia and Stratton. Peeress in her own right—ha-! ha!" And the figure on the mattress shook with painful laughter.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Pontifex answered with studied calmness but actual anxiety. He was about to stake his whole game on the issue of a single throw.

"I have not come to offer terms," he replied, "the Marquis is a man of honour and a law-abiding citizen. It is not easy to blackmail such a man. As his solicitor I am instructed to inform you of his decision and to prepare you for the worst. In a few moments you will be arrested and charged with the wilful murder of your brother, Lord Stephen Ennis, on the Bantry racecourse, by deliberately fouling him at an obstacle while riding in a steeplechase."

The sham native sprang up—he had turned white under his dye and his limbs were shaking.

"You are mad!" he whispered, fiercely, "mad! My father daren't do it—I tell you he daren't."

The solicitor turned away, as if indifferent to this outburst.

"He can, and will," was his retort, "or, rather I will for him. Men who take my advice, adopt a short way with such as you, Viscount Athlone, the police are already informed of your whereabouts and the nature of your crime."

Pontifex held his breath as he watched the effect of this announcement—with one hand in his pocket he was fingering the little revolver. The disguised viscount fell back in a state of shuddering collapse.

"It's a lie!" he muttered brokenly. "a lie. Stephen died by accident—it was brought in at the inquest."

"Yours is the lie," said Mr. Pontifex, mercilessly; "you swore to kill your brother at the wall-jump if he rode the chestnut. Premeditation is wilful murder all the world over."

A paralysing terror had seized upon Valentine, Viscount Athlone. But he strove desperately to maintain a defiant front.

"What—what evidence," he gasped, "has been trumped up in support of this fantastic charge?"

"None has been invented," responded the solicitor, still trifling with the revolver in his pocket, "because there was no need. Your words were, 'As sure as you ride in that race it will be your last—I will kill you at the wall, if I do for myself into the bargain.' Those words fell upon the ear of your sister Julia."

A peculiar cry, like the yelp of a shot rabbit, burst from the lips of the figure on the mattress. Mr. Pontifex stooped over it, whispering sentence after sentence of determined brutality.

"You are a dead man, Valentine Ennis," he said; "your life is forfeit to the gallows, and your sister Julia, rather than incur her father's curse, will place the rope about your neck. It would have been well for you and yours if you had died abroad—anywhere, anyhow, save by the white cap and the noose. But Justice must be done upon you to the utmost, for all your blue blood, fratricide that you are. You had better go quietly with the police whom I am about to summon."

The miserable wretch that had once been the dashing Viscount Athlone dragged himself up and clung to the knees of Mr. Pontifex.

"Don't let them take me," he wailed; "save me from that—it's all true. I did swear to Stephen to kill him if he didn't withdraw the chestnut, I did ride him down at the wall and put my horse on top of him. But don't let them hang me, anything but that! If only for the sake of my sister Julia; anything but that!"

As he grasped the solicitor's knees imploringly, Mr. Pontifex slipped the revolver from his pocket, shielding it ostentatiously in the palm of his hand.

The Viscount's eye caught it and he threw himself upon it, wrenching it from the fingers that held it, and concealing it instantly. Yet he flung at Mr. Pontifex such a look of imaginary comprehension and gratitude that the stern heart of the solicitor sickened for a moment at the part he was playing.

"You have five minutes," he said significantly, and with that crept away down the uneven stairs.

In the lobby below he halted—he himself was trembling, somewhere in the recesses of his iron frame. What seemed an eternity stole by, and then came a curious and distant sound, faint and crisp, like the crack of a whip-lash on a frosty morning or the noise of a cork drawn in a large hall.

For a second Mr. Pontifex closed his eyes; when he opened them his face bore its usual cool expression. He walked out into the street and passed southwards across Soho.

Mr. Pontifex re-entered his private room by the door at the back, which was reached by a gloomy corridor from a bye-street. He hung up his outer garments, and resumed his rings and pin.

Afterwards, as he had some unimportant business letters to write, Mr. Pontifex began to write them.

* * * * *

At noon the following day the Marquis of Bantry called at the office of Hugo Pontifex.

The solicitor greeted him impassively and handed him an early edition of an evening paper.

Mr. Pontifex's thumb was on a small paragraph, it was headed:

STRANGE SUICIDE!

A man was found dead last evening in a room in —— Street. He was known in the neighbourhood as Muley Hassan, and was supposed to be an Indian servant out of employment. He had committed suicide by shooting himself with a miniature revolver, which he still clutched tightly. The doctor who examined the body says that it is that of a European, the face and arms having been dyed yellow as a sort of disguise. He was believed to be in extremely poor circumstances, and doubtless this was the reason for the rash act.

The Marquis raised himself sternly to his full height. It seemed as if a great weight had been rolled from his shoulders.

"Fortune, I see, still watches over the house of Bantry," he said, with an attempt at cheerfulness, "I regret I troubled you to no purpose, Mr. Pontifex."

The solicitor frowned, almost imperceptibly.

"No one ever does that, Lord Bantry," he answered, "I persuaded your son that you had placed the matter in the hands of the police—that they were, in fact, at his very door. But be reassured, I will not include in my bill—the cost of a 'miniature revolver.'"

The Marquis of Bantry shrank from Hugo Pontifex.

"They told me truly," he murmured; "when they said that you had never failed a client yet. But you are a strange man, Mr. Pontifex, a strange and terrible man. Nevertheless, I am greatly your debtor."

"Quite so," replied Mr. Pontifex, drily, for he had noticed the Marquis's involuntary shudder, "but I think I acted as much in the Viscount's interest as yours. He was, I discovered, an inveterate opium-smoker. As it happens, I once saw the death of an opium-maniac. If I tricked your son, it was into a less painful end than Nature had in store for him."

And, with characteristic curtness, he rang the bell for the peer to be shown out.

Digitized by Google

Algy Lennon's Promotion.

By Edna S. Gamble.

Go to your work and be strong, halting not in your ways –
Baulking the end—half-won—for an instant dole of praise.
—KIPLING.

"It's no fault of Algy's that he's a bit of a duke—fellows can't help these things, they're born so; but where Algy shows his sense is that he keeps it in the background—doesn't let it worry him you know, sir, and that's why he's such a favourite on the Pegasus."

The R.M.S. Pegasus, laden with mails, frozen mutton, and some two hundred odd passengers, ploughed her way up North from Sydney.

She had called at Brisbane for the Queensland mails that morning, and now, some few hours later, she steamed on in the teeth of a stiff breeze that had "slewed round from Southerly to the Eastward out of pure cussedness."

At least that was how the slangy and somewhat cheeky young Third explained matters, as he tied his long legs into a knot, and prepared to make himself entertaining to one of the most interesting passengers so far, of the trip.

Ex-Admiral Copley was on his way home by the Western Route and the Canadian and Pacific Railway.

After the manner of the man retired from the services, he was inclined to be reserved and taciturn. He had a characteristic way with him too of setting his mind in true British bull-dog fashion on a thing, and "seeing it through."

Just now, the object of his interest was the Second of the Pegasus, in whose interests he was allowing himself to be talked to in a fatherly sort of way by the irrepressible Third, Tony Harrowby, a young Australian but newly joined, and with all the free and easy dash of his undisciplined nation.

It was that dog-tired time of day on ship board, the interval between lunch and afternoon tea, and the object of their special attention kept his middle watch on the bridge.

Algy Lennon was a universal favourite. Of a medium height, well knit, with the true blue eyes of the sailor, the fresh, cold tub English complexion on his clean-shaven face, and that quiet air of assurance in manner and movement that is the mark of his class, Algy Lennon was a man to attract the most casual observer.

"Um!" muttered the Admiral, as he looked up at the calmly immovable features of the man on the bridge—his keen eyes piercing, as though gifted with an extra sense, what appeared to the uninitiated but a grey, foam-flecked waste—"um! so that's Mr. Algy Lennon—well, in plain English, Mr.—er—ah——"

"Tony," explained the irrepressible Third, "Tony Harrowby."

"Ah, yes, Mr. Harrowby—what do you know of Mr. Lennon's family?"

"Well, you know, sir, his aunt is the famous Duchess of Montsevern; for his mother was one of the three beautiful daughters of Sir James Raynham—only—there's a sort of family scandal or something that Algy's mother was mixed up in—and, well, he's a bit touchy on the point, and shy of mentioning her. He left home, so he told Morton, (Morton's our chief, you know) when he was thirteen—cut the whole family in fact. You see Algy has got some rum ideas on family honour and pride and all that sort of thing that a fellow out here doesn't understand exactly."

"No, I suppose not," interpolated his patient listener. "Well, go on, I'm interested in Lennon."

"Oh, well, you know he served through the usual apprenticeship on a sailing ship, and that, combined with sausage and mash at fourpence for lunch, and less than that for dinner didn't improve his temper, but it did him a lot of good some ways though, came in handy when he was wrecked on the Falklands some two years later."

"They do not indulge in 'sausage and mash at fourpence' on the Falklands, young man," the Admiral interposed rather testily.

He had the true British love of solidity, and the flippant tone and seeming levity of the Third irritated him.

Tony Harrowby looked sideways at him, as though he had unconsciously touched a dangerous explosive. He shifted his position uncertainly, and untied his long legs preparatory to making a hasty retreat if necessary.

"Go on," commanded the upper deck voice of the Admiral.

"Oh—er—yes," went on Tony, "he had funny experiences in London; sitting on doorsteps, and all that sort of thing; watching his beautiful mamma drive by in her victoria; he used to sneak round by Hyde Park Corner and watch her—she didn't see him, of course."

"So I should suppose," muttered the Admiral, pulling complacently at his well-trimmed Navy beard, "the young dog's got some grit in him, I thought I wasn't mistaken. Well," (in louder tones) "and you say he had fever in the Falklands?"

"Oh, yes; he was laid up there about six weeks, and had a pretty bad time, all the nurses in the convent lost their hearts to him. You can fancy Algy looking like a fallen angel to order, can't you?"

Digitized by Google

"He's got a bit of temper, though, this idol of yours, Harrowby, or I'm much mistaken."

The cautious old sea-dog was feeling his way—taking soundings all along the run.

"Should just jolly well think he has," cried Harrowby. "I've only had the luck to see him in a real scot once, and that was about a photo—photo of a girl, you know," he added in a confidential aside.

"Not at all unusual," muttered his listener, "gay young dog. I like that in a boy."

The latter half of his sentence was not intended for the ears of Harrowby.

"Yes, it was last voyage, he was Third then and I was Fourth—had only just joined. We were a day out, and Lennon was getting out things and faking up the cabin a bit. He had heaps of photos; but one, a girl in a silver frame, was different from all the others. She looked as plain and simple and solid as the frame itself. 'She's no Sydney girl,' I said to myself when I saw it. I was looking at it when Algy came down to turn in from his watch at twelve. I ought to have been asleep, but I had been doing Logarithms till late and couldn't get off. The girl in the silver frame was the only thing I couldn't take my eyes off. She made a fellow feel good, somehow—as if his mother wasn't far off."

"I know," muttered the Admiral. "Go on."

He was of the type of man who never allowed himself to feel—he "did things."

"Well, I said, just in a joky way like: 'Say, Lennon, that's the bestest girl, I suppose, the one in the silver frame?' I had not seen his face as he came in, but it seemed he had been grizzling, and no wonder, it was a filthy night, a real picnic. I didn't want to look long when I turned round. 'You cheeky young ass,' he thundered, 'what business on earth is it of yours who my photos are?' He apologised in the morning—said he was in a scot with the boy who had been sent down for his oilskins and was pretty well half-an-hour finding them—raining in sheets all the time."

He paused—his listener was rubbing his hands as if enjoying the little incident.

"Of course I asked no other questions, but next day the photo was missing from the place where it hung over the head of his bed—and I've never seen it since."

Ex-Admiral Copley drew out his watch.

"When does Lennon come off duty?"

"In an hour's time—at four—I must be off too."

"Well bring him along here, will you, to tea with me?"

Lennon's comment on the invitation was characteristic of him.

"Wonder what the old Shellback wants with me?"

But he went.

A steward had carefully placed a tray to the Admiral's order near his deck chair on the poop aft, under the awning. The quartermaster, with the regularity of a machine struck eight bells. A minute later two fine specimens that made the old sea dog's heart swell with pride, swung along the glistening white decks towards him.

"Admiral Copley—Mr. Lennon, sir," cried Harrowby in his snap-shot voice—and for once, to his credit be it told, he retreated tactfully.

"Happy to know you, Mr. Lennon—sit down, sir," said the Admiral with his fine old-fashioned courtesy, as he indicated a chair on his left. "Sorry there are no ladies to meet you, don't think many of 'em have turned up yet, so perhaps you will put up with a crusty old bachelor for once, eh? Tea—then may I trouble you to officiate."

"You cheeky young ass! What business is it of yours?"

"Thank you—yes—delighted," answered Lennon with that frank directness of tone that attracted most people to him, and his present host in particular.

They spoke of much, and of many things in common, and Richard Copley's opinion of Algy Lennon grew more and more confirmed.

It was little more than a week since he had asked him to tea on the poop, and the Pegasus lay alongside the wharf at Honolulu. It was evening, the mails were aboard, and a festive band of natives who were seeing off some friends, were making merry on deck.

Digitized by Google

The native instruments, and still more native dances were not to the taste of the Admiral, especially when copious libations of whiskey added esprit to the proceedings. He had gone below to look the surgeon up.

He stood by the door of his cabin, which joined on to the surgery and library, and enjoyed a quiet smoke with Vircoe, who was not at all a bad fellow, he had found. He had been laying neat little plans all day, and it was as much to those as to the Bacchanalia on deck that Vircoe owed the pleasure of his visit. He had tried every wile he knew to get an invite into Lennon's cabin, for he owned to a singular curiosity about the girl in the silver frame that Harrowby had mentioned.

No mention of anyone answering that description had passed Lennon's lips in the course of their many conversations in the smoke-room or on deck. Lennon loved to get the Admiral to talk of the old days of his cadetship in the gun-room of the Briseus and how they had come out on top in the manœuvres of '68.

Vircoe's room was in an alley way leading off the main deck where the officers' cabins were, and Lennon's was the one immediately opposite. By careful inquiry of his steward the Admiral had found out that the Second was in his room.

"The young dog's as proud as Lucifer—he won't ask me in for fear of risking a refusal of my patronage—yet I like him all the better for it."

"This is—er—I presume—"
"My wife, sir!"

This was very much how Richard Copley's thoughts ran as he sent the smoke rings from a fine Manilla curling to the roof.

Vircoe, who had the camera mania, was, just then, too absorbed in developing photos of some fine angolas on board to notice the abstracted mood of his guest.

The handle of the door that he had been watching so carefully turned quickly, and the object of his thoughts swung out as if to walk down the main deck unaware of the presence of his friend.

"Hi, Lennon!—excuse me, Vircoe, but I want to see Lennon," and the old sea-dog blundered over the brass bound doorsill nearly into the arms of the astonished Second.

"I say, Lennon, don't you think it's about time you returned the compliment, and asked me into your room for a smoke?"

Lennon flushed. The Admiral's determination was too obvious to be ignored this time. He rose to the occasion.

"I did not know, sir, that you would care to. I shall be most happy to welcome you now if you care to come in."

His late excellency Admiral Copley, enjoying a quiet smoke in the room deputed to the use of the Second Officer of a mail boat was perhaps an anomaly; but I have before remarked he was not a man to feel or think things—he did them.

"Plenty of photographs I see, Lennon—like to see a young fellow fond of the girls," he remarked, seating himself comfortably and puffing out clouds of smoke on the faces of pretty brunettes in pale tinted theatre wraps, and fair sorceresses in fancy costumes.

Lennon glanced casually round.

"These are mere chance acquaintances, sir, that one meets once, or perhaps twice in a life-time, in a life like ours—some passengers and most of them colonials."

He hesitated while the colour mounted high on his clear forehead.

"There is one I'd like to show you, Admiral Copley. I think you would appreciate it. It is not for the chance visitor who does not."

He drew out the drawer from beneath his bed and took from it the silver frame, handing it almost reverently to his guest.

The latter coughed—like most sailors he was sometimes at a loss for a word.

"This is—er—I presume——"

"My wife, sir," answered Lennon.

And for once Richard Copley's self-possession nearly forsook him—he gripped the frame more firmly to assure himself of the tangibility of something.

His host was idly fingering the things on the little writing-table near the wall—his back to his guest.

With a mighty effort Richard Copley recovered speech.

"You sly young scamp, why didn't you tell me before—I congratulate you, Lennon, with all my heart and soul,"—he glanced again at the photo—"you ought to be a happy man."

Digitized by Google

Algy took the photo from him almost jealously, smiling a bitter little smile that his guest had often noticed there before.

"Aye, sir—and would if I were not continually feeling what a fool a poor devil of a mail-boat Second is to allow himself to be human—on his pay."

A look of pain drew a thin sharp line where the lips with their easy curves closed.

The inscrutable face of Ex-Admiral Copley betrayed nothing—he waited, having found the root of the canker worm—to see its length.

"You see, sir, promotion is—well you know what it is in the services, it's no better here, and rather worse if anything, and a fellow gets sick of waiting for his R.N.R. Commission, badly as they say the Navy wants recruiting—and the odds are he doesn't even get it at all."

"How long have you sent in your application?" queried Admiral Copley.

"Eighteen months," and Lennon passed his hand wearily over his young face that seemed to have suddenly grown years older as he sank on his bed behind him. "And the worst of it is there's another promotion waiting for me when I get back that was to have been conditional on the other—I know she wanted it so."

He paused with a hard, dry lump in the throat.

The Admiral, who knew his book of human nature very well, did not ask who she might be; he merely glanced at the drawer where Algy had carefully laid the photo, locking it after him.

He also made a very shrewd guess at the nature of the other promotion—the promotion that fate seemed to be so prodigal with—deserved or undeserved.

"Where do you expect to get the cable, Lennon?"

The question might have seemed irrelevant to a novice in the school of life, but the two men understood.

"At Brisbane, sir, on the way back. I've been on the rack coming up, it will be far worse going down."

The undemonstrative man of the sea laid his hand on the arm of his young friend.

"I say, Lennon, cheer up, there's a good sort of chap; why, there might be a double promotion when you get down again, old man, the Admiralty is a slow going machine but sure; it takes a bit of starting, that's all."

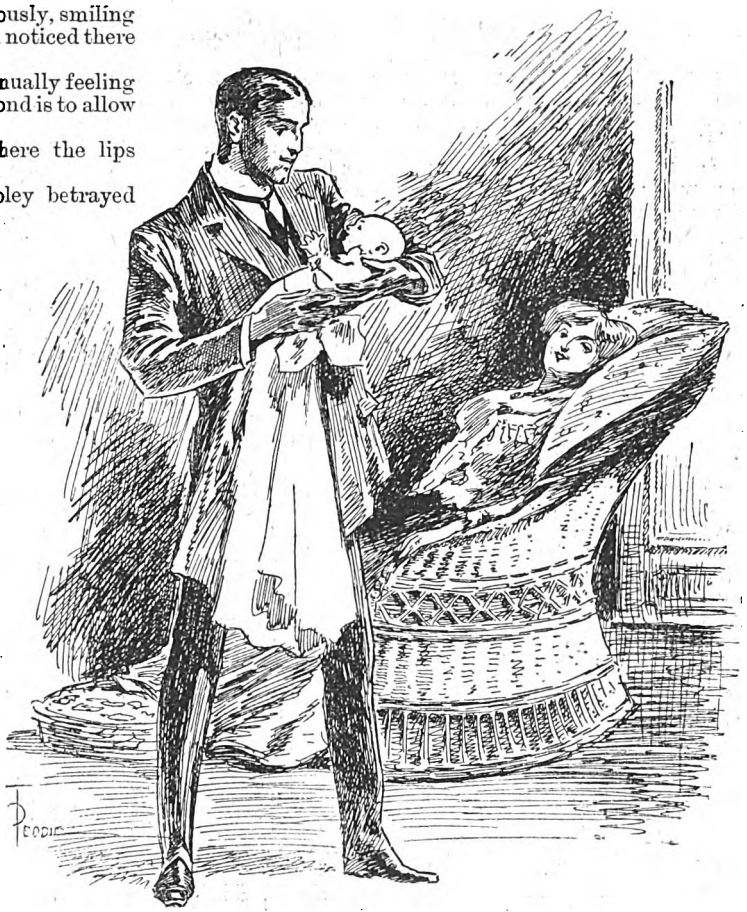
And as the smoke rings curled upward, Richard Copley pondered in his slow-moving brain how best one could "do things," whether from New York or Vancouver.

His roving eye caught the clock.

"I say, young fellow, if you're going to be fresh for the middle watch, it's about time you turned in; and—I say Lennon, send me a cable just to say how things turn out, will you? The Senior Navy Club, New York, will find me."

And the two men parted with a better appreciation of each other that increased daily till the end of the voyage.

Ex-Admiral Copley, late of the South Pacific Fleet, sat in the smoke room of the Senior Navy Club N.Y.



"Seems to me, Mabel, he hasn't the Lennon phiz at all."

He was pondering over the wording of a cable, an answer to one he had just received. It ran:

"Promoted to father and Lieutenant R.N.R. Boy and mother splendid."

He filled up the form before him at last to his own satisfaction and handed it to the coloured boy who waited by the door.

"H'm—so the machine has worked at last," he reflected as the door closed; "only wanted a little oiling, I suppose. Wonder if Lennon will guess I had a hand in it?"

And a complacent smile crept over the weather-beaten, kindly old face of Richard Copley as he thought of another satisfactory cable he had received.

"To think that after all these years I should have found little Kate and her bairns—suppose there'll be a batch of boys who want to get into the Navy, too—let me see, Sprigg does not say how many there are"—he referred to the cable he had received from his lawyer—"ah, well, Fate plays us strange tricks, and I know now why I was so struck with the girl in the silver frame."

A few hours later, as he paced the deck of the Campania bound for home in the teeth of a snow-laden wind, a couple, in a very different clime, were reading his answer with an expression of puzzled bewilderment.

Digitized by Google

It was summer with them—an Australian summer's day in December, and a moist, sultry heat, the heat that is most trying in Sydney, hung over all. The thermometer in the room that led off the wide balcony where the heat had driven them, registered, and had done for some hours, 98°.

Through the joints of the loosely strung Jap blinds, a slight breeze from time to time swept in a little purer air from over the horse-shoe bay at their feet.

Algy Lennon, in a flannel suit, a smile of ineffable content of his clear cut face and a new air of condescending patronage towards the world in general—that is, the poor unfortunate beings who happened to be living outside his world at that moment—was on duty, a new duty, and there were many observations to be taken.

He had told the nurse who had gladly retired that, "He'd take that watch and she'd better turn in when she had the chance."

The object of his observations, judging from the remarks he made at intervals, was not a thing of beauty.

"Seems to me, Mabel," he said, addressing a rather wan and white edition of the girl in the silver frame, "seems to me he must be a Playfair, he hasn't the Lennox phiz at all—not even his father's nose as a redeeming feature—and really, Mab, he's just the colour of those mud pies we used to make when we were nippers—in the half-baked stage you know."

He ducked his head to avoid the missile aimed at him by his wife and went on pacing his "quarter-deck" as she called it, singing lustily at intervals snatches from "Pinafore."

At about the fifth repetition of "stick to your desks" etc., the slandered lump of humanity he carried gave vent to a prolonged howl and was as promptly seized by his indignant mother.

"H'm, doesn't seem to appreciate Gilbert and Sullivan."

"Of course not, you stupid boy, how can you expect an infant of two weeks old to appreciate or understand Pinafore, why, it's what someone in the Bible, I forget who, calls 'strong meat for babies.' You must commence with nursery rhymes and work up gradually."

At this point they were disturbed by the advent of Biddy, the Irish maid, with the cable that caused such consternation. For a few moments the then summum bonum of their lives was relegated to a second place as they read the brief wording of the telegram:

"Congratulations on both counts from yours cordially,

"Uncle Dick.

"Senior Navy Club, New York."

"But who can it be from, Algy?" gasped Mabel Lennon at last.

"Why, it's from old Copley—Admiral Copley I told you about from Honolulu—didn't I mention his name? sorry—we took him up last time and a very decent old fossil he was, too; but why 'Uncle Dick'—has he adopted us, I wonder?"

And it was Mabel Lennon with her quick woman's instinct that solved the problem.

"Copley, did you say, Dick, why that was the Little Mater's name. She had a brother who was in the Navy, too, and we as children nearly worshipped him as a sort of mythical fairy godfather, from whom poor mother had expectations, when the family cut her off without the shilling for marrying Maurice Playfair, a curate, with no living. Uncle Dick and she were great chums, she told us, and she always felt he would have understood and been kind; but he went abroad. Oh I see it all now as plain as daylight."

"And," said Algy, slipping down on to the floor of the verandah, his head very near the one disengaged hand that rested on the ledge of the long cane chair, "and her daughter did another foolish thing and married a poor beggar of a mail-boat man, eh?"

The hand slipped down on to the head with the protective gesture that is a part of some women.

"I used to think you were the sillier of the two, dear, but you're the very cleverest goose in the wide world, for you've 'struck' uncle Richard, the family gold mine."

There was a restless movement from the flimsy looking bundle that lay on the other arm and two pairs of eyes were immediately turned on him in penitence.

"I'm afraid you've been horribly neglected, old man, but we must have an innings sometimes you know," said his proud father, "and besides we don't discover the family gold mine—and a godfather—and an uncle for you all in one, every day. Say, Mabel, we won't quarrel over the name anyway will we now, eh?"

"No, I suppose it will have to be Dick—Richard Algernon Lennon, R.N.—it fits rather well, doesn't it, Algy?"

General Approval

From places all over the United Kingdom letters have been coming to us expressing appreciation of the beautiful and lifelike bust of Queen Victoria, which we are offering to our readers.

THE KING HIMSELF

has expressed the opinion that "it is the best likeness he remembers ever having seen."

The Bust is an original and copyright work of art; it has never been exhibited; it is the last Bust made of her Majesty; it was modelled from life by the celebrated sculptor, Miss Geflowski; and the original bronze was to have become the possession of her Majesty.

HOW TO GET IT.

The Bust, in the finest hard, pure white plaster, and 7½in. in height, will be sent, carriage paid, to any address in the United Kingdom for 2s. 6d. Postal orders only will be accepted as payment.

Address: Room 38 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE LION'S WARS

The Crimean War.

1854-6.

IT has been said that nations never realise the causes of their wars.

This may be true at the moment when the war is being waged, for party passion, and the craft of ministers seeking to disguise their real objects may keep the truth back for a time.

But the mists, as a rule, clear when the tangled threads come to be unravelled by the historian later on.

A study of the Crimean War confirms this conclusion. In France, a very large number of intelligent people believe that the war was precipitated by Napoleon III. to strengthen the crumbling foundations of his throne.

In this country, it is held by some that it was a wholly unjust war and would never have occurred had we taken the trouble to make our aims clear to Russia, others share the opinion entertained by the late Prince Consort, who, for some reason, thought it was in every way a most just war.

There is still, or rather there was, another section who considered that the Czar was justified in taking up a firm position on the question of the Holy Places as champion of the Orthodox Greek Church.

The public in general regarded the Holy Places as a transparent pretext, and declared that the Russian object was much more practical.

That indeed it was geographical, and that the emperor of the frost-bound region of the north was longing to transfer the capital to the Bosphorus in order to procure a free outlet to the Mediterranean.

One other point still lingers in the controversial region.

Did we drift into the war? Most people say we did and yet that seems doubtful, for the Emperor Nicholas had already shown his hand when his armies crossed the Pruth.

Then it was that our statesmen saw that we must fight or let Russia have her way.

How could we have drifted into war when Russia had ample time to recede months before hostilities commenced? The expedition we dispatched reached Malta, and Russia made no sign.

By the time the troops landed at Gallipoli and Scutari the attitude of the Czar was more defiant than ever. We again ask how can we be said to have slipped into war when weeks elapsed before the allied generals received orders to take Sebastopol, the fortress in the Crimea which was regarded by the Turks as a menace to the safety of Constantinople.

War having been declared, the troops embarked at Varna, landing on the shores of the Crimea in the middle of September, 1854. The British infantry was divided into five divisions of which the Duke of Cambridge commanded one, and consisted of about 26,000 men.

The cavalry, a magnificent corps, exceeded 2,000 under the command of the Earl of Lucan and the dashing Earl of Cardigan. The guns numbered sixty. The entire force was under the command of Lord Raglan, an officer who had served with distinction under Wellington in the Peninsular War.

Digitized by Google

Equally as experienced was Marshal St. Arnaud who commanded the French troops numbering 30,000 men with sixty-eight guns. The gross total of the allied forces was 64,000 inclusive of the Turkish contingent 6,000 strong.

Splendidly situated as Great Britain is for the peaceful pursuits of trade, the advantages of our insular position in times of war are not so clear. We are safe from invasion, it is true, but the problem of how to feed and supply an army sent across the sea had never been mastered till a later time in history. How the ill-clad, half-starved soldiers who fought for us in the Crimea ever contrived to win a battle is a much greater mystery than the causes of the war.

On September 19th, the allied forces, under the protection of the fleet, marched along the coast till they reached the heights of Alma. Here they came in touch with the Russian army comprising 36,000 infantry, 4,000 cavalry, and ninety guns under Prince Mentschikoff.

The heights which ran from 100ft. to 600ft. high constituted in themselves a series of natural fortresses, but their strength was added to by redoubts, trenches, and skilfully placed batteries.

Had Alma been fought towards the end of the war when the commissariat had utterly broken down it is certain we should have been defeated, but each man, according to Kinglake, carried sufficient ammunition for two battles and the means of subsistence for three. Feed the British soldier well and he will do anything and go anywhere, so with plenty of food in his knapsack, Mr. Atkins did not inquire why the heights of Alma had been selected as the point of attack.

As none of the Crimean generals have ever condescended to enlighten the world why they fought the battle of Alma we are driven to the conclusion that we engaged the Russians there because the Russians wanted us to.

It is extraordinary that Lord Raglan the moment he caught sight of the great Redoubt on the heights, with its twelve heavy guns and four batteries of field artillery to say nothing of sixteen battalions of infantry and a large force of sailors, did not exclaim:

"Not here, we will try lower down."

We had been shepherded there but no one seemed to think so.

The French on our right were so pleased at having the support of nine ships of war that they actually thought their position admirable. And so it was.

Although the heights were terribly hard to climb, the Russian engineers had omitted to strengthen them as they had done those confronting our men by artificial works. To still further increase their chances of success the guns of the French war vessels searched the heights before the troops began to scale them. As defeat would have ruined the expedition it was perhaps as well that the burden of the day should rest on our shoulders.

The Russian generals being ignorant of the quality of the British soldier never dreamt of defeat. Their Commander-in-chief, it is said, gazed just before the fight at the steep cliffs rising almost sheer above the shore, and exclaimed:

"Devils might get up here, but British soldiers never."

The French attack had already commenced when the order was given for ours to begin. The men had been formed into two lines, with cavalry on their flanks, some hours before and were greatly relieved when the order to advance was given.

To this day historians are sorely puzzled to account for the troops being dispatched in close formation instead of being widely extended in skirmishing order.

We can answer the question. The generals did not understand their business.

An extended line would have enabled the troops to swing round and envelope the Great Redoubt. But huddled together, we soon, owing to the rugged surface of the ground, got into disorder, melting into a confused mob, regiments mingling with regiments, brigades with brigades, long before the summit was reached.

When the mob in red arrived at the top they were so delighted, especially as it had all been done without orders from their officers, that they resolved on a fresh experiment.

So they gave the Russians a taste of what they could do in the fighting line minus commanders, by charging a dense column comprising several thousand men.

The Russians, never having fought us before were so surprised at the daring of charging in line, that they ran away.

Greatly elated, the leaderless soldiers stormed some intrenchments not far off and bayoneted all impudent enough to remain.

When the officers did intervene it was to order the retreat of the Light Infantry, who were gallantly holding a position they had won under a heavy fire. It was not necessary we should, and why the bugle was sounded is another of the mysteries of the Crimean War still awaiting solution.

Its effect was to precipitate the retreating force right into the centre of the Grenadiers who were coming to their assistance and so threw it into confusion.

Still no harm was done. The Grenadiers climbed the heights; the troops ordered to retreat crept after them and, aided by some Highland regiments who got to work on the flanks of the Russian columns, drove them back.

Lord Raglan seeing that matters were going in our favour pushed up another brigade, which, coming in contact with a Russian column hurrying to the assistance of comrades who were faring so badly at the hands of the Grenadiers and Highlanders, were assailed so fiercely that they fell back in great confusion.

When our men came in touch they formed up and with a great rush and much hurrahing carried the Great Redoubt. A galling fire from a couple of well-handled Russian guns forced us to retire, but we soon came again and the battle was won.

The French had not done so well. They had clung all the afternoon in isolated bodies to some positions on the slopes of the cliff. When the Russians retreated the French bounded gaily to the summit of the cliff in the belief that Alma had been won by them.

Truly a most extraordinary battle.

The Russians escaped with a loss of 5,700 killed and wounded, five Generals, and twenty-three Field Officers. That of the Allies was not so heavy. The French loss was sixty killed and 500 wounded, ours 362 killed and 1,400 wounded. In all with officers about 2,000.

After resting, the Allies resumed their march, the cavalry pushing on to Belbec, a small village eight miles from Sebastopol.

On the following day the allied armies took possession of some hills hard by. The fortifications already reared on the northern side of Sebastopol seemed so formidable

Digitized by Google

Captain Nolan galloped after the men and frantically signalled.

Digitized by Google

that Lord Raglan marched his army right across the country to the southern side in utter ignorance of the danger to which he was exposed from a flank attack.

But the Russians let the opportunity slip allowing the Allies on September 28th to take up a strong position in front of the port and town of Balaclava.

Even then a bold assault might have carried Sebastopol, but the wrangle which the proposition gave rise to between General Cathcart, General Burgoyne, Admiral Lyons, and Lord Raglan, was so prolonged that the council of war separated without a decision having been come to.

When an assault was seen to be hopeless the siege train was landed. Then commenced the most ridiculous siege of which history has any record. Indeed, for a long time it was not a siege at all for we could not obtain access to the harbour owing to the Russians having sunk some vessels at the entrance, and one side of the town was not invested at all, leaving the Russians free to come and go as they pleased.

The only portion of Sebastopol we could invest was less than four miles in extent, and, to crown all, the defending force was considerably larger than the investing, which is, of course, a reversal of the facts usually associated with sieges.

October 5th is the date of the celebrated battle of Balaclava. The charge of the British cavalry at this battle is acknowledged to be one of the most daring to be found in the annals of warfare. Rash as was the enterprise, its execution was somehow accompanied by much method. It may have been a folly, a sacrifice, the very madness of heroism, what you will, but it achieved the most momentous results.

The squadrons who dashed into, and fought their way out of the rain of death saved the town of Balaclava from being captured by the Russians.

Balaclava was necessary to us as the base from which we drew our supplies, and the Russians knowing its value made a bold bid for its capture. To resist the coming attack all we could muster was some 4,000 infantry, 1,200 cavalry and 40 guns. The Russians had massed for the enterprise over 40,000 men.

The battle commenced by an attack on the lines held by the Turkish forces. The French becoming alarmed at the increasing masses of Russians pouring out of Sebastopol sent the Ottoman troops some aid. For all this the Turks gave way the moment they were pressed, which led to Sir Colin Campbell pushing forward some regiments of Highlanders to stiffen their defence.

The moment the Turks retreated, the Russians swiftly pursued till they found their progress barred by the thin red line two deep. Against this thin red streak, which Sir Colin declared he did not think it necessary to reinforce, the Russians hurled their choicest troops, but in vain. The Russian horse galloped madly at the line a dozen times and every time retreated with scores of saddles empty, whilst an irate Scotch laird was railing at and beating the retiring Turks to the intense amusement of the Highlanders.

A message to Sebastopol had brought on to the hill a dense cloud of horse which at once descended into the valley. As they rode they came in touch with six squadrons of our Light Horse. The edge of the ridge above us was so thickly clustered with Muscovite horse that General Scarlett who had been sent by Lord Raglan to the assistance of the retreating Turks resolved to dislodge them. It was a hazardous thing to attempt, but General Scarlett knew the sort of men he had under him. Lord Lucan who rode up at the moment must also have had a high opinion of our cavalry for he approved of General Scarlett's decision.

Scarlett and his little band of 300 dashed up the green hill side, gave one great cheer, and then disappeared in the dense mass of Russian horse over 3,000 strong. To aid their comrades who were too hard at work emptying Russian saddles to cut their way back, some Dragoons and Royals charged the Russians in flank. A few minutes later the enemy were in full flight.

No one can accuse the Russian soldiers of cowardice. They are probably as brave a race as any in the world, and yet 3,000 of their picked horsemen were hustled and driven off the field by some 600 British troopers. Nothing, of course, came of this magnificent achievement. Had General Scarlett or Lord Cardigan known anything of war they would have followed up the retreating Russians. Had they done so their annihilation would have been certain.

Seeing that the retreat of the Russian horse provided an opportunity of recovering the heights which had been abandoned earlier in the day, Lord Raglan gave orders for the cavalry to advance. As Lord Lucan, misunderstanding the order, did nothing, Lord Raglan, to prevent the Russians from carrying off as trophies the British guns they had taken from the Turks, sent Captain Nolan with a note peremptorily ordering him to prevent the enemy from carrying off the guns.

"What guns, sir?" cried Lord Lucan.

Lord Raglan, of course, meant the guns the Russians had taken from the Turks, of which fact, it seems, Lord Lucan knew nothing. Nolan, instead of clearing up matters, exclaimed warmly:

"There is the enemy and there are the guns, my lord," and rode away.

Lord Lucan looked in the direction of the Russian cavalry and seeing a battery of guns in the valley behind which the Russian horse had reformed after their recent defeat, instructed Lord Cardigan to capture them.

Poor soldier as he was, Cardigan saw that to charge a battery a mile off protected by riflemen and other batteries on either flank meant destruction.

"I know it," said Lucan, "but Lord Raglan will have it so."

A moment later the trumpet sounded and the British cavalry rode into the valley of death. Captain Nolan galloped up after the men had started and frantically signalled that they were going the wrong way, but no one heeded.

The historic charge of Balaclava is so well known that there is no need to recapitulate it in these pages. Suffice it to say that under a tremendous cross fire they rode straight for the guns. A volley, when they got close, tore great gaps in their ranks, but our brave fellows held on, galloped past the guns and plunged right into the Russian cavalry in the rear.

The fight which followed should have ended in the complete destruction of the daring band, but thanks to the surprise of the Russians and a timely attack by the French Chasseurs d'Afrique against the Russian left enabled the few remaining troopers, not more than 220 unwounded men, to re-form and charge back with even more impetuosity.

It was lucky they did, for their momentum was so great that they literally rode over some Russians Lancers who had stolen round to the rear to cut them off.

"Hurrah!" they cried, "the road is clear."

Digitized by Google

Our cavalry rode into the fatal valley 673 strong, and of these 163 were killed and 134 wounded.

The day after Balaclava the Russians made a most determined assault on the division under General de Lacy Evans. The attack was repulsed, but its delivery revealed such a weakness in our position at Mount Inkerman, the key of the allied position, that the Russians secretly massed a huge force of 40,000 men to attack us, the garrison at the same time making a sortie to engage the attention of the French. The Russian plan was bold and ably conceived. Had it succeeded, the French army would have been destroyed; for Inkerman taken, the huge Russian army would have had the French between two fires.

The ardour of the Russian troops having been inflamed by appeals to their faith and the dishonour of allowing invaders to occupy their soil, the force of the Russians on November 5th was hurled against the position occupied by us.

Favoured by the grey mist of the early morning, the enemy climbed the steep ascent and had driven in our outposts before we became aware of the danger. To prevent them from working round our rear the thin red line became so lengthened, that it was with the most difficulty our brave fellows kept it intact.

Again and again dense masses of grey-coated Russians were hurled against us. Regiment after regiment were hurried up and the most desperate efforts made to beat down our resistance by sheer weight of numbers, but with the dogged courage the British infantry have ever displayed in moments of supreme danger, they held to their position.

Our generals, it is true, hurried up troops as soon as the real object of the Russians became apparent, otherwise there was no attempt to defeat the enemy by well-devised counter-attacks.

In fact, Inkerman might be described as purely a soldier's battle.

When our lines were broken, which they often were by sheer weight of numbers, the troops without any orders from their officers, at once formed into a number of compact little bodies and pushed the Russians back to their old positions.

From first to last there was no manœuvring. Up and down the mountain, in glens and valleys, ridges and plateaux we fought the Russians with such determined courage that for all the vastness of their numbers they began to yield.

A combined movement or a charge of cavalry might have given us the victory sooner, but as the confusion was too great to permit of this we had to trust to the effect of a number of isolated victories. When the ammunition gave out we threw stones. When these in their turn were exhausted we invoked the bayonet.

The battle commenced at 5.45. a.m., and Tommy was still hard at work at eight in the evening. Shortly after the Russian attack collapsed, and by nine they were in full retreat.

As might be supposed from the fierceness of the fighting the death-roll was very great. Our forces at the commencement of the fight were 7,464 infantry and 200 cavalry. Yet this handful inflicted on the Russians a loss of 10,729 killed, wounded and missing. Our own casualties amounting to 597 killed and 1,760 wounded.

The Russians having realised that their troops were no match for the British in the open, now devoted their energies to strengthening the defences of Sebastopol. The elements, too, now ranged themselves on their side. The winter of 1854 was so terribly severe that disease soon made its appearance.

Without good food, warm clothing, and comfortable housing no troops could expect to withstand the hardships of a siege with the thermometer frequently at zero. The War Office knew perfectly well what would happen if the comforts of the men were not attended to, but their system was so antiquated and swathed in red tape that with its defects increased by the incapacity of the officials they nearly wiped out the British Army altogether. Whilst Whitehall was squabbling with the Horse Guards on questions of routine the soldiers were left without clothing and food.

During 1855 Sebastopol was bombarded five times, the guns of the French, which numbered over 200 pieces of large calibre, doing great damage. But we were not idle, for our gunners fired no fewer than 89,540 round shot and 12,723 bombs.

After we had stormed the Redan and taken the Malikoff the Russians blew up the remaining forts and evacuated the city.

Russia, now finding herself sorely crippled in the Baltic as well as the sea, asked for an armistice.

In March, 1856, peace was signed at Paris, to the joy of the nation, who were weary of the fearful blundering of the War Office, which in 1854 was so shocking that thousands of our best troops perished from want of food and clothing.

[Next Week: THE SCINDE WAR, 1842-43.]

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES THAT MAKE YOU LAUGH.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "Guilty Gold," by Headon Hill, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, March 4th. Post-cards only, please.

The Prize of One Guinea for the best Storyette has been won this week by Mrs. E. REES, 15 Airedale College Terrace, Undercliffe Lane, Bradford, Yorks.

Then Everybody Laughed.

SOME time since a counsel engaged in a case in which property of various descriptions was involved, made a long and rambling speech referring to each kind in turn. His monotonous delivery had sent nearly everyone to sleep, when he suddenly startled them all by abruptly changing his voice as he exclaimed to the judge:

"My lord, I will now address myself to the furniture!"

"You have been doing that for some time, I think, Mr. X," remarked the judge sweetly, amid universal tittering.

Now, there was another judge who had heard this anecdote, and was storing it up for use on some future occasion.

At last his opportunity seemed to have arrived. He was trying a case in which the circumstances were somewhat similar, but the property involved was live stock.

In due course, one of the counsel said:

"My lord, I will now address myself to the donkey."

"You have been doing that for some time," was the prompt response, whereupon a regular roar of laughter followed, which highly gratified the judge until its true reason dawned upon him.

E. R.

The Army from Within.

A CERTAIN Irish Militia regiment had to furnish the main guard in a large garrison. On the field-officer of the day visiting the guard, to his surprise he found no sentry on the post, and, wrathful at his discovery, entered the guard-room to ascertain the cause.

The guard-room was empty, with the exception of one Militiaman crouching over the glowing ashes of the fire, who turned on his seat and gazed at the irate field-officer with mingled curiosity and admiration.

The Field-Officer: "Where the dickens is the sentry?"

Militiaman: "The sentry, is it? Bedad, he's away beyant" (with a vague wave of a clay pipe) "kicking football."

Field-Officer: "Oh! Where's the guard?"

Militiaman: "The guard? Begor, they're kicking football, too."

Field-Officer: "Oh! Where's the sergeant of the guard?"

Militiaman: "The sargint? Never a know I knows, unless" (as a bright idea strikes him) "he's kicking football, too."

Field-Officer: "And who the dickens are you?"

Militiaman: "Me, is it? Begor! I'm the prisoner."

R. F.

Took Offence.

SOME time ago the play of Hamlet was performed at a provincial theatre.

In the scene with Polonius the crafty old courtier asks:

"Do you know me, my lord?"

And the Prince responds:

"Excellent well; you are a fishmonger?"

On hearing this, an old fishwoman stood up, and shaking her fist, shouted excitedly:

"Well, and s'posing he is? That's better than play-acting any day."

J. T.

Sharp Boy.

A BOARD schoolmaster had been giving his class a lesson in the mysteries of forming the degrees of comparison of the different adjectives.

He finished the lesson by making them repeat some of the things he had told them over again.

Amongst other questions he asked:

"Now, what is the superlative of the adjective 'nice'?"

A little lad instantly put up his hand to show that he knew the answer.

"Well, Harry," said the master, "what do you think is the superlative of nice?"

"Jam pudden!" promptly responded Harry.

D. J.

Any More?

A FRECKLE-FACED girl stopped at the post-office and yelled out:

"Anything for the Murphys?"

"No; there is not."

"Anything for Jane Murphy?"

"Nothing."

"Anything for Ann Murphy?"

"No."

"Anything for Tom Murphy?"

"No."

"Anything for Bob Murphy?"

"No."

"Anything for Terry Murphy?"

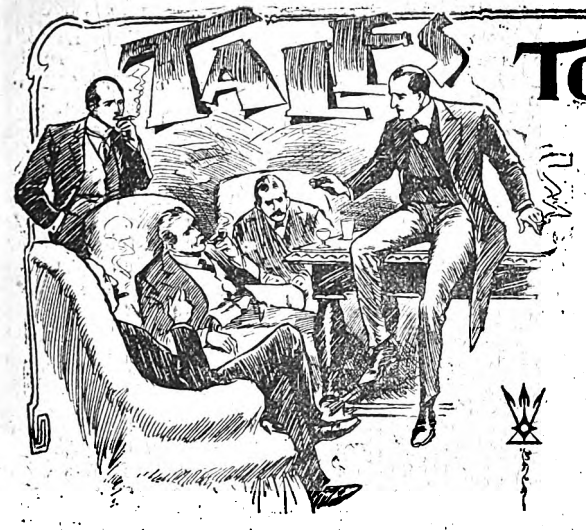
"No; nor Pat Murphy, nor Paul Murphy, nor Pete Murphy, nor Denis Murphy, nor for any Murphy—dead, living, unborn, native or foreign, civilised or uncivilised, savage or barbarous, male or female, black or white, franchised or disfranchised, convicted or otherwise. No; there is positively nothing for any of the Murphys, either individually, jointly, severally, now and for ever, one and inseparable."

The girl glanced at the postmaster in astonishment and said:

"Please to look if there is anything for Clarence Murphy."

C. F.

Digitized by Google



TOLD "OFF DUTY."

[You probably don't know the "Stand-Easy" Club. It isn't in the directory, and you might live next door to the place for years without knowing of its existence by that name. It isn't a conventional club; there is no subscription, and there is no register of members. It is merely a room in a quiet, orderly, and select hostelry in Westminster, where, by common consent, a number of officials of all kinds meet when "off duty." There you may find detectives from Scotland Yard, near by; firemen, commissionaires, a soldier or two, and maybe a doctor from St. Thomas's Hospital or elsewhere. A motley crowd they would be if they wore their uniforms, but at the "Stand-Easy" uniforms are a rarity, "mufti" being the unwritten rule. The result is a gathering of quiet, well-behaved, and well-dressed men. Saturday night is the time when one sees the biggest muster, for then it is the custom for one member to regale the company with a story, the story being, as a rule, an account of some incident in the teller's own career. Here is a story told by Inspector Nicholls, a detective of great reputation.]

A West End Mystery.

Told by INSPECTOR NICHOLLS.

I.

A Frightened Conscience.

There is nothing so remarkable as the way in which a clue will sometimes come to a detective in a most indirect manner, that will enable him to solve a mystery that otherwise would baffle all human skill. Perhaps there is not so much credit due to the detective who receives such aid, but I think the reader will allow that the alertness of mind and the faculty for putting remote and seemingly disconnected incidents together, and at a time and place far removed, deserve a fair share of commendation.

There are several cases I know of that would have remained unsolvable mysteries to this day, but for such fortunate accidents. One was the Allibone murder. I was enabled to solve it by one of these fortuitous circumstances, and as it happened a good many years ago, there will be no harm in giving the facts of the case here, though I shall not mention the right names because one branch of the family still figures prominently in the public eye.

I had been living in the Westminster Bridge Road for three weeks or more at a lodging house, the respectability of which was suspected. It was directly opposite a house the disrespectability of which was known, and it was this place and its inmates that I had under surveillance.

I was supposed to be a clerk out of employment, and I came and went at all hours. I was just setting out about two o'clock one afternoon to follow a character who had emerged from the opposite house, when one of the young chaps who occupied the next room to myself, and who seemed to live pretty well by doing nothing, came in in such a state of terror and collapse that I involuntarily offered him assistance as far as his room. We had met on the stairs.

It was not drink I could see at once, though to an inexperienced eye it might have seemed that the fellow was suffering from delerium tremens. He strode forth and back in the room, flinging out his arms for a time and then sinking into a chair and moaned.

"He's done it! He said he would, poisoned! O-o-o-grh-grh!"

An indescribable gurgle ended each exclamation.

"What is it? Has your mate shuffled off?"

I tried to pacify and obtain from him some idea of his trouble, but I could get no other expression from him, so I left him, and hurried out to see if my quarry had escaped me.

I was chagrined to find that he was not in sight, and I walked towards Westminster Bridge in anything but a pleasant mood.

There were some matters I had to report at the first opportunity at Scotland Yard so I made my way there.

A special edition of the afternoon papers were just out as I crossed the Bridge, and the boys were screaming out:

"Terrible sensation! West End murder!"

I bought a paper and was shocked to find an account of the murder of Richard Allibone, M.P. at his residence in Russell Square. I knew the man well and it was a painful surprise.

When I arrived at the Yard I learned from the chief the few facts that had been wired and telephoned in, and that Inspector Quaritch had been despatched to the scene.

As a personal friend of the popular M.P. I asked to be put on the case at once and the chief gave me the opportunity.

I hurried to the scene as fast as a cab could take me. On the way I thought of many things, but scarcely dwelt upon the murder and what I should find when I arrived. My mind did revert briefly to the unfortunate chap I had left in a bad way in my temporary lodging-house, but not to connect him in any way with this tragedy.

Digitized by Google

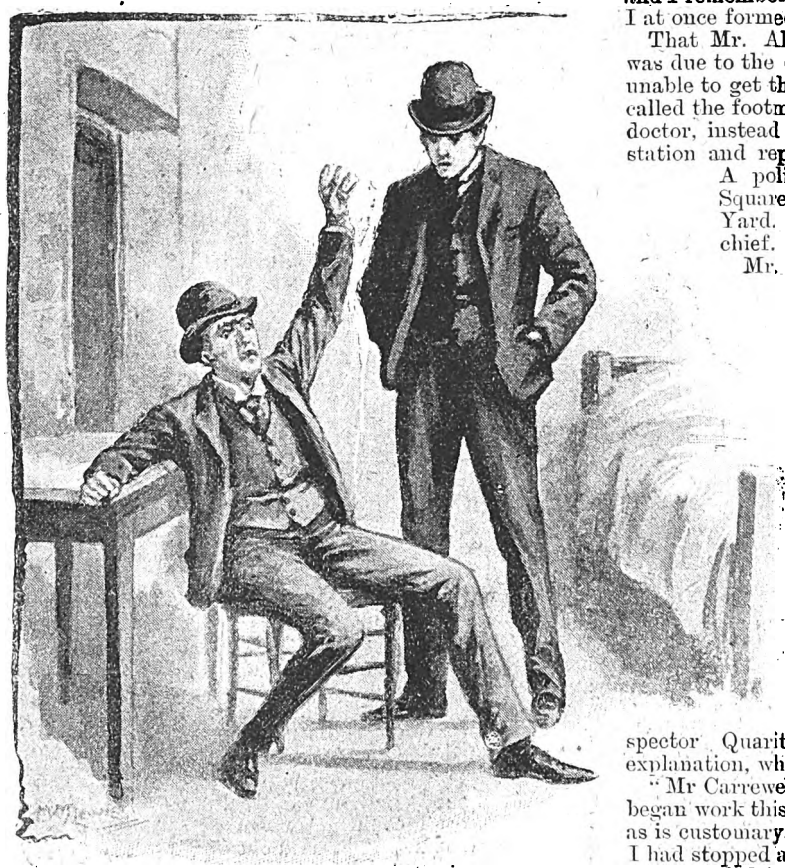
When I arrived at Allibone House I was ushered into the drawing-room and was cordially received by Richard Allibone!



"He's done it! He said he would. Poisoned! O-o-o-grh-grh!"

II.

Was It An Accident?

When I say that he greeted me cordially, I mean that he recognised me and gripped my hand tightly, though he said nothing.

His eyes shone with tears, and I knew he could not then trust himself to speak.

He walked away, and presently came back again and pointing to the next room, the door of which was closed, he burst out:

"Great Heavens! Nicholls, my poor child lies in that room dead! My only child, my all, my beautiful girl!"

He wrung my hand again, and though his voice quavered, he manfully restrained himself from giving way to his grief. I tried to comfort him as best I could.

As I entered the room, the Inspector nodded to me. He was sitting at one end of a little table in the centre of the room. On one side the servants were ranged, five in all, and on the other side, seated at a writing-table was a young man who seemed indifferent to all that was taking place.

It was Henry Carrewe, the nephew of Mr. Allibone, and his private secretary. I had never met him, and I found myself glancing at him furtively several times, and I remember distinctly the sub-conscious dislike that I at once formed for him.

That Mr. Allibone had been reported as murdered was due to the excitability of the servants. The butler, unable to get the family physician on the telephone, had called the footman and sent him out to fetch the nearest doctor, instead of which he had gone to the nearest station and reported that his master had been killed.

A police-officer was at once sent to Russell Square, and the report was sent in to Scotland Yard. This had been corrected since I left the chief.

Mr. Allibone regretted the presence of police. It was not a case which demanded them. He explained to me that it was all an accident. Had the physician arrived before any word had reached the police, it is terrible to think—in the light of after events—how different would have been the ending.

When the Inspector arrived he found the girl dead, and a physician did not arrive until a few minutes later. There was clearly nothing for him to do but investigate the case.

Quaritch was a careful man, and it is to this partly that I owe my success on the case. If he had hurried and bungled the job he would have had it all over before I arrived.

After Mr. Allibone had explained to me the nature of the accident, the servants having been examined, Inspector Quaritch called upon Mr. Allibone for an explanation, which he seemed disposed to make now.

"Mr Carrewe here is my secretary," he began. "We began work this morning as usual. I was dictating and as is customary, I was walking up and down the room. I had stopped a moment to pour myself out a glass of water and drink, when suddenly my daughter, burst into the room, screaming, 'father, father, don't!'——

"I am at a loss to say what it was she tried to warn me not to do, but at that instant she caught her foot upon the liassock, stumbled and fell heavily on the floor.

"I stooped to raise her. I had been alarmed at the terror that was depicted upon her face. It was awful. What was my grief to find that she was unconscious.

"Violent as the fall had been, I did not think it could have been fatal. I thought she had fainted. I took the glass of water from which I had drunk and dashed it in her face. She opened her eyes for an instant, whispered, 'father, father,' and fell back dead.

"I did not then believe it though, and continued to moisten her face with water from the pitcher, and sent the butler for a physician. Dr. Hardyce and Dr. Hale arrived as you know some few minutes after you."

At this moment the door of the next room opened, and the two physicians entered. Mr. Allibone turned to them eagerly. They shook their heads.

"We have done all we can," said Dr. Hale, "there is no hope. There are symptoms of poisoning, though they are obscure and rare. An autopsy."

"No, no," exclaimed Mr. Allibone. "It cannot be.

Digitized by Google

How can she be poisoned? Spare me that. My beautiful girl. Dead! Dead!"

He buried his face in his hands and wept with that grief of the aged who, in bereavement such as this, have no hope save in death and the reunion that shall follow it.

It was discovered now that Miss Allibone's maid was missing, that she had not been examined. This was suspicious and significant, and the butler was sent at once in search of her.

III.

What the Maid Saw.

The butler returned presently supporting the maid, who seemed to be in a state of collapse, weeping hysterically. She had been hiding in a closet in her mistress' room, and being neither mentally nor physically strong, the tragedy had driven her to the verge of insanity.

She gave a piece of evidence, however, that sent everyone present into consternation.

"I saw him do it—I saw him do it," she wailed, her face buried in her hands and a handkerchief.

I went over to the maid and took her out of the butler's care; sat her down and talked gently and soothingly to her. I soon got her to look at me and she gained confidence, and stopped weeping somewhat, though she was still shaken with convulsive sobs.

"Saw him do what?" I asked.

"Put it in the water—it was poison—I told Miss Allibone—she tried—to warn her father—now she's d-e-a-d!"

She broke off into a despairing wail as the thought came to her that her mistress was dead.

"How did it occur?" I urged. "When did you see this? Who did it?"

The last question seemed to nerve her. She took her hands from her face and leapt to her feet.

"He!" she screamed, pointing an accusing finger at Mr. Carrewe.

He must have been a clever scoundrel in a way, for he never turned a hair.

"Oh, I say, uncle, this won't do," he said rising, and addressing Mr. Allibone. "The girl has gone daft."

"Certainly, this is too absurd," exclaimed Mr. Allibone. "Take the girl away——"

"Pardon me, Mr. Allibone," I interrupted, "we must hear what the girl has to say."

I stood beside her now, supporting her with an arm about her waist.

"Try and tell us what you know from the beginning," I asked her quietly.

"I was in there," pointing to the door of an adjoining apartment, "I happened to look in the mirror and could see Mr. Carrewe in here. His face was terrible, pale and frightened, and he looked around the room as though afraid someone was watching him.

"Then I saw him put something from a bottle in the glass jug of drinking water. I should not have thought anything of this if he had not looked so scared.

"Mistress had gone out for her morning constitutional, and I was dreadfully worried till she came back. I wanted to tell her what I had seen. When I heard the front door close and knew she had returned, I rose and would have rushed to her, but I could not keep my feet, and I fell in a faint. She found me so in her room, and as soon as I was brought to, I told her. She screamed and ran downstairs to warn her father, you know what happened then."

The telling of her story had quieted her nerves somewhat.

She stared at the man she accused.

"This evidence will necessitate your being searched, Mr. Carrewe," said Inspector Quaritch. "Mr. Nicholls, will you perform the duty?"

"He!" she screamed, pointing an accusing finger at Mr. Carrewe.

Digitized by Google

I deposited the maid in the chair and stepped forward.

"But that is all rubbish," interposed Mr. Allibone. "I have drunk of the water and it is quite harmless. The girl must be under a delusion."

"Never mind, uncle," said Mr. Carrewe, "let them proceed with the search. What's more I'll have some of this poisoned water myself."

He filled a glass and drank it off and a part of another glass.

Some of the servants present no doubt expected him to drop dead where he stood. But he only smiled grimly, and allowed me to proceed with the search.

It came to me while doing this that there was a mystery here that would baffle all solution so slender were the clues, and then there occurred, like a flash, the memory of that pitiable frightened creature I had left in his room in Westminster Bridge Road.

"Do you happen to know a Mr. Pollidge?" I asked casually, as I had about finished the search.

"Never heard the name," he replied.

But I had fixed my eye upon him too attentively, and I detected a quiver of the eyelid and the faintest change of expression which would have been invisible had I stood five yards from him, and they aroused my suspicions.

I informed Inspector Quaritch in a few whispered words of the conclusions I had formed.

He did not think there was any basis for them, but as I seemed convinced, and there was a bare possibility of turning up a valuable bit of evidence, he agreed that I should go and fetch this man while he finished the examination of those present.

Little did I dream of the tragic dénouement that was to follow. I don't know that I deserve any special credit for this, but if it had not been for my meeting that frightened man in the house I was about to leave earlier in the day, it is safe to say that this West End Mystery would very likely have remained one of the unsolved crimes of this great city.

Within the hour I was back again in a cab with my man beside me. I had no difficulty in getting him to come with me, but when he saw we were in Russell Square he became excitable, and when we stopped in front of Mr. Allibone's house he was unmanageable, and I had to get assistance to force him into the house. His actions confirmed my suspicions. When he was led into the room and his eyes fell on Mr. Carrewe he was all of a tremble.

"That's him," he cried, "he said he'd do it!"

Mr. Carrewe never winced despite this direct charge.

"Why do you bring this man here? I never saw him before," he said.

"It's a lie," exclaimed the new witness. "Ask him," pointing to Mr. Allibone, "if he knows me."

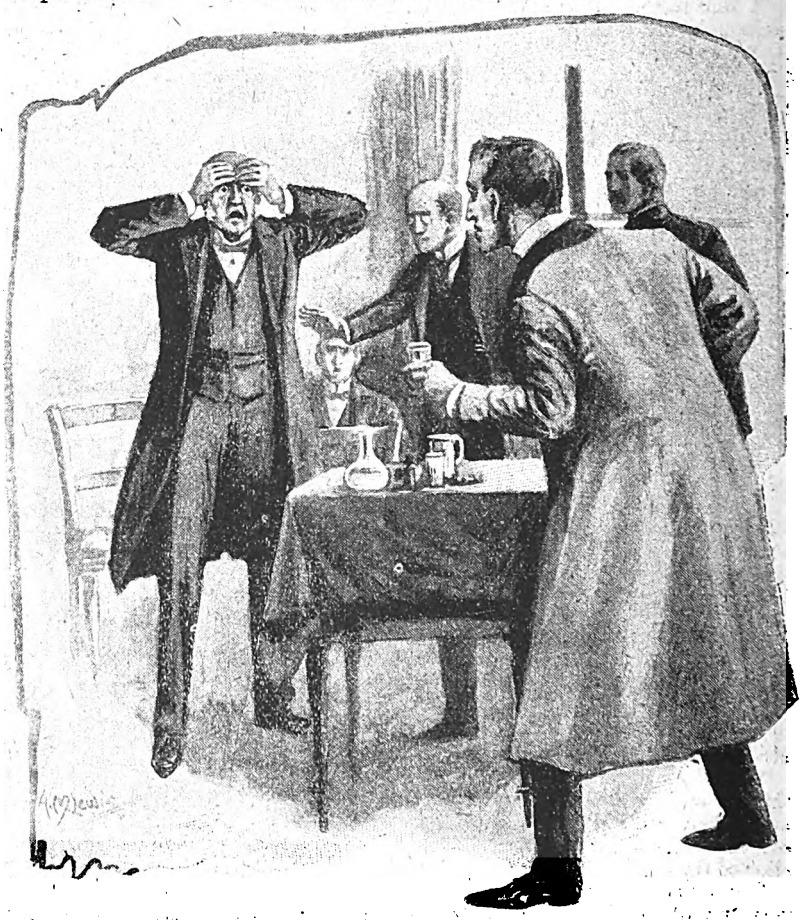
Mr. Allibone reluctantly confessed that he had submitted to a systematic blackmailing by this man for the past year, but he added that that did not imply that his nephew knew the wretch.

"Don't it!" cried the weak creature. "He put me up to it. He took half the rhino, and last night he told me he was going to finish you; that there was more in you dead than alive!"

"Impossible!" ejaculated Mr. Allibone.

There was nothing at all impossible in it to me, and I went to the fireplace and began raking among the ash.

"The evidence, however, is sufficient to warrant the arrest of Mr. Carrewe," said Inspector Quaritch, dismissing all the servants.



Mr. Allibone was staring as though his eyes would start from their sockets.

Raking at the coals in the fire I probed out some bits of ash that were welded together with what looked very much like glass. Next I found the neck of the bottle with the glass stopper still in it; as it was still hot, I arose and directed the attention of Mr. Allibone, Mr. Carrewe and the Inspector to what I had discovered.

When it had cooled somewhat, I picked it up with my handkerchief. It was a peculiar bottle of foreign make. I had the butler called again and sent him for a special drug at the chemist's. Then I took what remained of the water in the jug and glass.

Digitized by Google

"I have made a considerable study of poisons," I explained. "I will tell you in a few minutes whether this water is poisoned and what it contains."

The man Carrewe still maintained a stolid indifference. On Mr. Allibone, however, the scene was telling terribly. His face was becoming haggard.

"Henry, Henry, say something," he pleaded. "Henry deny all this."

He sank into a chair, helpless.

The butler returned with the drug he had purchased for me, and I prepared for the experiment I was about to make.

I kept to the far side of the table for I could see that although Mr. Carrewe controlled himself admirably, there was a gleam in his eye as though he would have liked to leap upon me and spill that water, which if it contained the poison I thought it did, would prove such damning evidence against him.

The family physician, Dr. Hale, who was present, and had taken but slight part in the proceedings save to answer such questions as were put to him, now showed the greatest interest in what I was about to do.

I called for a little fresh water and a glass.

"I will take first this water which has just been brought to me," I said, "and dropping some of this fluid into it will assure you that it will remain unchanged in colour."

Sixty minims had fallen into the water and it remained unaltered.

"I will take a glass half-full from this pitcher. I must tell you," I explained slowly, "what I expect, and it will serve as an added proof if I am correct. This bottle stopper I recognise as part of a bottle in which very rare and deadly drugs are sometimes put in India. You will see almost its counterpart at the British Museum. There is a deadly drug the natives obtain from a species of adder. It can be administered internally and it takes from a month to six months to bring about death, but there is no tracing the cause. If, however, it gets into the blood or touches an open wound it brings death almost instantaneously by paralysing the heart.

"Thus a man could drink great quantities of this safely enough, for he could a few hours afterwards or next day apply an antidote." Here I looked steadily at Mr. Carrewe.

"You said, I believe," I remarked to Dr. Hale, "that there was a slight abrasion beside the ear, sustained most likely by Miss Allibone in falling? Just so. You see the water that was dashed on her face would have allowed this poison to get into her blood."

I was exasperatingly deliberate, I know, but I felt very sure of my point. I uncorked the little phial and held it over the glass that was half-full of water from the pitcher. Mr. Allibone leant forward in his chair.

"If I am right in my surmise the fluid I am about to drop in will turn this water a pale violet," I said.

And then one, two, three, I began to drop it in minims into the glass. Twenty had fallen and no change had come and I could see a leer of malice and triumph in the eyes of Mr. Carrewe. Then twenty-one, twenty-two—I was not at all daunted. I knew that according to the quantity of the poison placed in the water, it would require just so many minims to bring about the change.

At the twenty-fourth drop the water changed almost instantly to a pale purple as I had predicted. I glanced hastily at each face present.

Then a cry of anguish rang out that brought me to my feet like lightning.

"Heavens, Nicholls, what have you done?" Mr. Allibone was staring as though his eyes would start from their sockets. "You make me my child's murderer. It was I—who dashed that water in her face! My girl—my—poor—girl—I—I—" his hand went to his throat, before any one could catch him he was lying in a heap upon the floor.

Dr. Hale did all he could for him on the instant, but it was little that could be done for the poor old man, heart-broken and conscience-stricken as he was.

He lingered a month and died, recovering consciousness for just sufficient length of time to make a new will and destroy the old one in which his nephew had been remembered to the tune of one hundred thousand pounds.

I had the satisfaction of taking Mr. Henry Carrewe into custody there and then, and putting him in safe keeping. Clever as he undoubtedly was in crooked work, he was not clever enough to choose equally clever men to carry out his dirty work.

At the trial Mr. Pollidge, his tool, showed that the nephew had deliberately led his uncle into compromising situations and then levied a heavy blackmail by means of Mr. Pollidge. This had been enough for a time, but so easy is it to fall into evil ways, after the first few steps, that the knowledge that a hundred thousand pounds awaited him when his uncle died, aroused in him no sense of gratitude, but only the fiendish desire to help him shuffle off this mortal coil.

He went up for life for it, and few cases have given me so much satisfaction as this, for I know that the man is still expiating his crimes at the hardest kind of labour in Portland Prison.

I took up my work of tracing the rogues whom I had been watching in the house in Westminster Bridge Road, and was soon rewarded with an adventure, which if not so tragic was very exciting, but that of course is another story.

NOW READY.

Sixpenny Edition of a World-famous Novel,

THE ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN KETTLE.

By C. J. CUTCLIFFE HYNE.

Bound in a stout and attractive yellow cover, printed on good paper, and in "get up" equal to a 3s. 6d. novel.

PRICE 6d., or POST FREE 8d.

"The reader of fiction who has not made the acquaintance of Mr. Hyne's fascinating sea captain is to be pitied."
—Daily Telegraph.

At all Booksellers and Bookstalls, or of

C. ARTHUR PEARSON Ltd., HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

Digitized by Google

The Lost Rose.

WITH many wild whoops, much leaping and tumbling, the children hurried out of the weather-beaten school-house and took their several ways toward their homes in the sparsely-settled neighbourhood.

A moment later Millie Forrest, the teacher, came out and hurrying across the playground turned into the long lane, flanked by "stake and rider" fences, overrun here and there with wild morning-glory vines.

Small, slender, with big brown eyes, an oval face with irregular features, the young "teacher" was not what one would call pretty, but there was a piquant arch to the red lips, and the heavy mass of nut-brown hair that overhung her brows was a glory in itself sufficient to have awakened envy.

She walked rapidly along the lane and turned through a gate into a grove of trees on the rise. Following a winding path crossed by deep shadows cast from the trees by the declining sun, she was halfway through the wood when Edgar Sommers, a neighbour's son, came from a clump of bushes and, with a show of bashfulness, joined her.

"Evening, Millie," he said, after an embarrassing silence. "Had a good day at school?"

"Much the same as all other days," replied the girl with a defiant lifting of her head. "I am tired of it all. I wonder if everyone finds life such a dreary round? Sometimes I wish I might fall into the old mill-pond yonder with no one near to rescue me."

The young man's eyes grew moist and his lip trembled perceptibly.

"Is it so dull and stupid for you here, Millie?" he said slowly. "I—I wish I might do something to make things brighter and—sweeter for you."

The girl turned her face away that he might not see the sudden light that came into her eyes and the flush that coloured her brown cheek.

"I'm rough and awkward," he continued, lengthening his stride to keep up with the girl's quickening pace, "not worthy of you in any way; Millie, Millie—I love you, love you more than my life, more than a thousand lives. If you would only give me the right, I would do as much as any man could do to make you happy."

She was going forward rapidly, nervously, her head lifted, and a look of gladness in her eyes,

Had he seen it he would have taken her in his arms, then and there, and settled the question. But he did not see it and her silence was like death to his hopes.

A wild rose nodding and blushing beside the patch caught his eye, and stooping, he plucked it from the bush.

"See, Millie, the last of the season; let the flower plead for me. I won't ask you to decide now, but you are going to the dance over at Major Barlow's to-night. If you think you could trust me and let me love and care for you, wear it in your hair."

He held out the rose to her and she took it demurely from his big, brown fingers.

"If you wear the flower to-night, you will make me the happiest man in the world," he said in a half-whisper. "If you don't, you will break my heart."

He stood for a moment gazing with longing eyes upon the slender figure of the girl going on, with the warm sunlight turning her bronze hair to gold. Then he went back heavily along the path and passed through the meadow lands lying beyond the grove and by the old water-mill in the ravine.

As he passed the mill he saw Frisbie, the new miller from the city, standing in the door, his curling hair white with flour dust.

Edgar could not but acknowledge him a handsome fellow, and remembering how often he had been a visitor at the Forrest home since he came to the neighbourhood, he answered the miller's hearty greeting gruffly and passed on.

Millie went through the woods softly humming:

"Give me a kiss, that going home,
My feet may walk on air."

She dressed herself with unusual care for the evening and when she was ready put the wild rose in her hair. The dance was to be only a neighbourly party, and she would go over early and be with the Barlow girls when the others came.

As she tripped into the little sitting room she met her mother going with the pitcher for water. Millie took the vessel from her mother and ran lightly down the slope. Stooping she dipped the pitcher into the spring. In the dusk the clear, undisturbed waters shone like silver. As she lifted the full pitcher and turned to retrace her steps the rose slipped from her hair and falling into the spring brook was carried swiftly out of sight. The happy girl did not miss the pretty token until well on her way to Major Barlow's.

It was too late then to go back to look for it and she went on framing many pretty excuses for not having the rose in her hair to be seen when Edgar should come.

Digitized by Google

It was nearly nine o'clock and the full moon was shining when Edgar Sommers, on his way to the dance, reached the narrow foot-bridge that crossed the spring brook. He was anxious and despondent. His great love made him timid and cast a halo about the object of his affection. It seemed impossible that she should care for him. He stood for a moment on the bridge looking down into the moonlit water.

A bright object dancing on the ripples caught his eye. It whirled over the tiny rapids and lodged against the roots of a willow. Edgar sprang over the low rail of the bridge and snatched from the water the rose he had given Millie a few hours before. Here, then, was her answer to his pleading.

She had thrown it away, and the spring brook brought it to save him the humiliation of meeting a more direct refusal from her lips.

He was dumb with the sudden overthrow of his hopes and walked on aimlessly, the rose crushed in his hand.

Suddenly the strain of a violin playing the "Blue Danube" fell on his ears. He had come unconsciously to where she was.

He would have turned back, but could not. A desire to look upon her face once more before he went away forever drew him on until he stood in the shadow of a vine that ran over the doorway of the Barlow home.

The door was open and he saw the gay couples floating about the big dining-room. Millie was dancing with the new miller, and they glided on to the rise and fall of the music, the handsomest couple in the room. How Edgar hated the man! He longed to stretch out his hand, take the white throat of his rival between his strong fingers and crush out his life. It was for this unknown, smooth-voiced stranger that she had thrown him over.

But she did not love him, so what matter who claimed her. He turned away and was soon hidden in the shadow of the woods that skirted the stream below the house.

Millie waited impatiently for Edgar's coming. She had determined to go to him as soon as he arrived and tell him of the loss of the rose and acknowledge her intention to have worn it.

He would forgive her seeming carelessness when he knew she loved him; she felt sure of that.

But as the hours wore on and he did not come, she became restive and frightened. What could have happened to detain him.

At last the people prepared to go home and the miller offered to escort her across the fields. She would have refused him, but there was no good excuse. There was no one else to accompany her, and so the two went out across the meadows. He gay and confident, she sad and apprehensive. As they were going over the rustic bridge where Edgar had found the rose, the young man suddenly threw his arm about Millie's waist, and, drawing her close, cried: "Toll, little one, that is the country custom, isn't it? Come, give me a kiss for toll."

"Let me go," she cried, and struggled to free herself.

"Not until I have taken toll," he replied, bending over her. "It is my right, you know."

Before the now frightened girl could cry out there was a quick step on the bridge, and a big, brown hand fell on the shoulder of the young miller, and he turned to face the tall young farmer. The girl ran to the end of the bridge and stood trembling with fright.

The two men faced each other on the narrow bridge. The moon, far down in the west, cast a mellow light on the scene.

Edgar was the first to speak, and his voice had in it the ring of steel.

"Millie," said he, "has this—fellow the right to offer to kiss you?"

"You know he hasn't." She stood straight now, and her brown eyes flashed, then her manner suddenly changed. "Don't strike him, Edgar. Let him go. You are to blame. If you had come as you promised this would not have happened."

"And the rose," he said, "I found it here in the brook."

"It was in my hair when I left home. Oh, Edgar, I understand; you—you thought I threw it away."

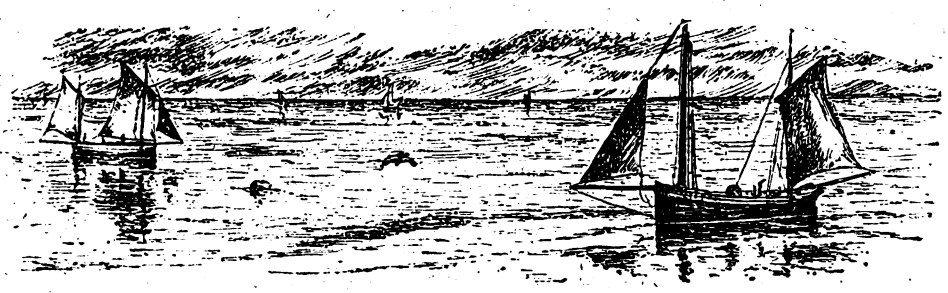
She was close by his side now.

"And you didn't?"

"I would have sacrificed my life first."

"Thank Heaven."

And when they looked again they were alone.



Digitized by Google

LANGLEY'S BURGLAR.

HE was a clean, venerable-looking old fellow, with a snowy white tuft of hair on his chin and a pair of steel-rimmed spectacles astride of a nose that was coloured just a trifle deeper than the rest of his face. His expression was mild and benevolent. A folded rule was sticking out of his waistcoat pocket, and a thick, stubby pencil protruded from his ear, and he carried a hammer.

"Good-morning, marm," he said, as Mrs. Langley opened the kitchen door. "I'm the carpenter."

"Oh!" said Mrs. Langley, vaguely.

"The agent sent me to look at the windows and see what was wanted for them," pursued the old man.

"Not our windows, surely," said Mrs. Langley. "There's nothing in the world the matter with them. There must be some mistake."

"It's the casings I want to look at," explained the carpenter. "I want to see whether the weather stripping is set tight or if it wants new anywhere. We're going to have a cold winter, once it starts, and we don't want to have you freezing to death."

He looked so particularly benevolent as he said this that Mrs. Langley felt quite grateful. She invited him in and he inspected the kitchen windows, the bedroom and parlour windows, and even the transoms. He did everything in a very conscientious, painstaking fashion, and it was nearly half-an-hour before he folded up his rule and took up his hat to go.

"There ain't really much to do," he said, with a modest air of deprecating his efforts in Mrs. Langley's behalf in order to stem an anticipated flood of thanks. "I suppose there's about an hour's work altogether. That there door is sprung badly, and I might as well put that right with the rest. Let the tail go with the hide—hat's what I say. There's no use spoiling the ship to save a pot of pitch. He didn't tell me to put the door right, but I ain't a man who likes to do things by halves."

Mrs. Langley commended these statements.

"Now, marm, if you'll let me know what day to come I'll fix it so's I won't have to bother you when it's not convenient," concluded the old man. "I don't like to come in with my tools messing up a house when a lady ain't expectin' me. How'm I goin' to know but she's got company, or something of that sort?"

Mrs. Langley said he was the most considerate man she ever saw.

Langley was suspicious from the start.

"Told you the agent sent him round, did he?" he asked. "That does settle it! The agent! Sent a carpenter round! Unsolicited—actuated by a kind concern for our comfort! I didn't go down on my knees half-a-dozen times to implore him to have those windows altered. I didn't finally take a big stick and go round to his office and make threatening demonstrations. No, he thought some of us might sit in a draught and catch cold, so he sent a man to do the work. That's the worst I ever heard."

"Sounds rather fishy," said Plummer, who was over for the evening.

"What would the man want to come round for if he wasn't sent?" asked Mrs. Langley. "He said the agent sent him, most distinctly and positively. He wouldn't say a thing like that and go to all that trouble unless it was so."

"What have you missed since he went away?" asked Plummer.

"What have I——? Why you don't mean——? No, that would be absurd. He couldn't have taken anything without my seeing him. I was with him the whole time. Besides, he wasn't at all that kind of a man."

"Do you mean that he didn't look like a burglar? That don't signify anything."

"I think I can tell a burglar when I see one," said Mrs. Langley, indignantly. "This man was as nice and pleasant and chatty as he could be."

"Some of the most confirmed and inveterate burglars I have known have been pleasant, chatty men," remarked Langley.

"'When the enterprising burglar's not a-burgling he loves to lie a-basking in the sun,'" quoted Plummer.

Digitized by Google

"Did he wipe his feet on the mat when he came in?" inquired Langley.

"I think you are both of you absurd," said his wife. "If he had been a burglar why wouldn't he have stolen something while he was in the house? Another thing, he wouldn't have spoken about the broken fastening on the pantry window and said he would bring a new one."

"That's easily explained," remarked Langley. "He probably thought there was a chance that we would put on a new fastening ourselves if he didn't say that he would. He wanted to make sure of an opening."

"An opening for a person of experience," added Plummer.

"That's the idea exactly, I think we can make up our minds that we are going to have what they call a nocturnal visitor. I distrust these philanthropic persons with silvery whiskers."

"Were there any valuables in sight, Mrs. Langley?" asked Plummer.

"There was my watch on the dressing-table and my bracelet and things, and there was baby's little silver mug and the cream jug and the rest of the things on the sideboard. I couldn't go round and gather up everything before I brought him in. I wouldn't have let him in at all if I hadn't known he was all right."

"How did you come to know he was all right?" asked Langley.

"Because I did," answered his wife, conclusively.

Langley, however, refused to be convinced. He felt rather nervous about leaving his wife alone the next morning, and borrowed Plummer's little 22-calibre revolver, which he wanted her to carry in her pocket.

His own pistol was a wide-muzzled, stubby affair, that held flat, squat cartridges calculated to stop an elephant in his rush.

Mrs. Langley said she thought she would manage to get along without any of those horrible things.

Later in the day Langley was inspired by the recollection that he paid taxes and was entitled to police protection. He thereupon called at the neighbouring police-station and informed the inspector of his fears.

That functionary seemed to take the same view of the matter as Langley did. He said he thought he recognised the description of the self-styled carpenter, whom he believed to be the leader of a dangerous gang. He assured Langley that he would have the house watched.

When Langley returned home that evening he saw a man strolling along on the side of the street and looking so supernaturally unconcerned and casual that anybody would have known he was a plain-clothes man on guard. This gave Langley a certain sense of security, but at the same time rendered him decidedly nervous. Plummer did not come round or Langley would have asked him to stay all night.

Langley told his wife what the police inspector had said. He was unwilling to alarm her, but he felt that what he called her "cock-sureness" needed some rebuke For some reason, however, she did not seem to be impressed, and she laughed at him in a particularly aggravating way, when he balanced a tea tray and a couple of flat irons against the pantry window.

It was about midnight when the trap was sprung. It went off with a crash, clatter and bang that made Langley sit bolt upright in bed, with his heart beating like a steam-hammer, before he quite realised what had happened. There was an instant of awful and profound stillness. Then Langley heard his wife's voice. She said:

"I thought that would happen. The cat has knocked down that arrangement of yours, William."

Langley deigned no reply, but lifted himself cautiously out of bed, and, groping for his revolver, found it and stole softly and fearfully down the noisily creaking stairs.

He reached the pantry at last and found his tray and flat irons on the floor. A cold current of air that instantly communicated its chill to his spinal column told him that the window was open. Slowly and cautiously he peered out.

A subdued cough came from the back yard, and Langley drew his head back with a suddenness that brought it into violent contact with one of the pantry shelves. He felt the bump later, but hardly noticed the shock at the time.

Reproaching himself for cowardice, he nerved himself for the effort, and, again looking out of the window, he called:

"Who's there?" the pulsations in his throat imparting a tremor to his voice.

"We're police-officers," came the reply, and two shadowy forms loomed up from the darkness. "Sorry we disturbed you, but we were trying the windows and knocked something over."

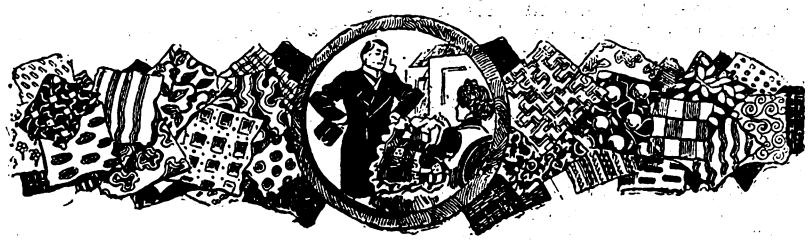
"I believe you did," said Langley bitterly.

"It wasn't anybody," said Langley returning to his room.

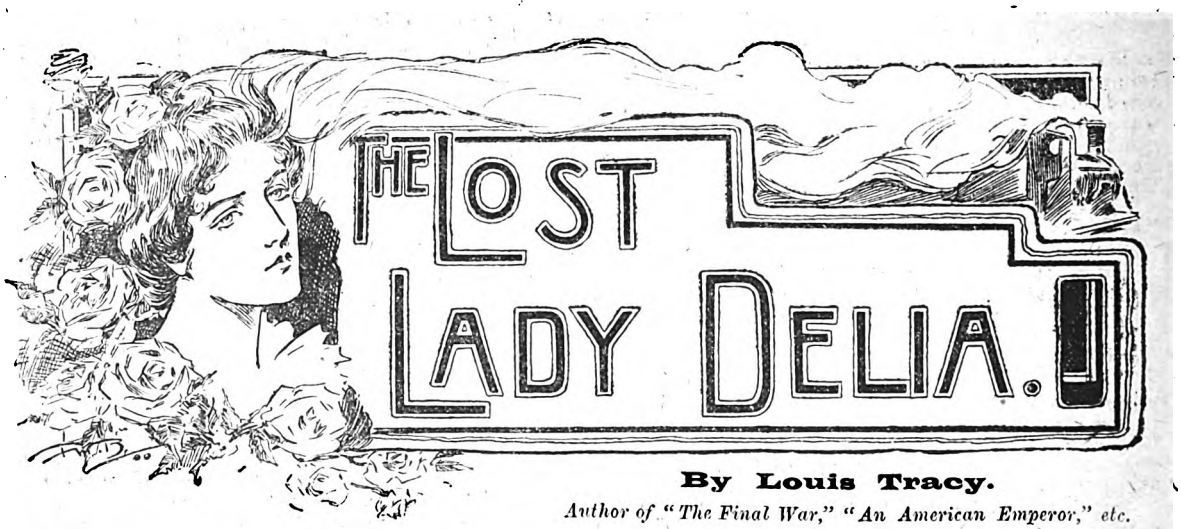
"What is it?" asked his wife, sleepily. "I wish you'd go to bed and stop prowling round, William. Of course there wasn't anybody. I knew that perfectly well."

"I'd like to know how you knew it," said Langley, cowering beneath the bedclothes and shivering.

"I'd have told you before if you hadn't been so smart about it," replied Mrs Langley. "I went round to the agent's this afternoon and he said he had sent the man round. He was just as nice—. Why William Langley, I'd be ashamed."



Digitized by Google



By Louis Tracy.

Author of "The Final War," "An American Emperor," etc.

THIS TELLS THE STORY FROM THE START.

LADY DELIA LYLE leaves her house one foggy November afternoon saying she is going to see her sister at Richmond, but from that time she is not heard of.

Her husband, Sir Charles Lyle, puts the matter into the hands of detectives, Inspector Winter taking charge of the case.

Reginald Brett, a barrister friend of the Lyles, also promises to do all he can, and he finds out that Lady Delia, on the night of her disappearance, instead of going to Richmond, alighted at Sloane Square, and went to a block of flats called Raleigh Mansions.

Towards the end of the month the body of a woman, evidently murdered, is found wedged beneath a drain-pipe in the Thames at Putney, and, though Sir Charles does not identify the body, Brett imagines it to be that of Lady Delia. Shortly after this discovery Lady Delia's maid, Jane Harding, disappears. She is afterwards found to have gone on the stage.

Brett now starts investigations at Raleigh Mansions, and he fixes on two residents there as being likely to have been connected with Lady Delia. These are a Mr. Sydney H. Pyne, who is not at present in residence, and a Mrs. Hilmer, whom he finds to be Pyne's sister.

It had transpired that Pyne had gone to Monte Carlo, and thither Brett goes, and he discovers that though letters are addressed to Pyne at the Hotel du Cercle, he is not known there.

During his stay at Monte Carlo Brett becomes acquainted with an Englishman, named Albert Mensmore, whom he helps out of some money difficulties, but he does not discover anything about Pyne.

After his return Brett finds out that Sir Charles Lyle knows Albert Mensmore, but in what connection does not transpire.

A few days later Brett goes into the City, to the office of Dodge and Co., with whom he had had some speculative dealings, and from remarks made by Mr. Dodge, he thinks that Pyne and Mensmore must be one and the same man. In the evening Brett and Winter go to Raleigh Mansions and search the flat occupied by Pyne. Brett finds that a piece of one of the fire-dogs is missing, and that it exactly corresponds with the piece of iron which was found imbedded in the head of the body found at Putney.

It is shown by this time that Mensmore (who is at Genoa) had previously adopted the name of Pyne. The real Pyne (his mining partner) writes him that their property is likely to bring them much wealth.

Pyne arrives in England and takes Mensmore's flat, where the detectives surprise him. Brett partially explains the situation, and has a talk with Pyne.

CHAPTER XXII. (continued).

"Oh, just that Mensmore had acted for me. The man seemed a bit puzzled, but he didn't kick when I offered to pay up the rent owing since Christmas, and another quarter in advance."

"I don't suppose he did. The rent was due, then?"

"Yes. It seems that Mensmore, writing in my name, sent a letter from Monte Carlo a month ago saying he would return about this time and settle up."

"Thus proving his intention all along to come back to London. It is a queer muddle, Mr. Pyne, is it not?"

"Very, but you will pardon me as an outsider saying one thing—you all appear to have overlooked a clear trail."

"And what is that?"

"What about Mrs. Hilmer? Who is she? Who are her friends? Who maintains her in such style? Bertie was with me four years and never mentioned her. She could not have been rich by inheritance, as it was on account of their father going broke that Mensmore had to leave the Army and come out to the States. It strikes me, Mr. Brett, that the woman knows more about this affair than the man."

"You may be right. But do not forget the absolute proofs we possess that the crime occurred in Mensmore's chambers, and the extraordinary coincidence that he left England immediately afterwards."

"I am not forgetting anything. These facts tell both ways. Just because he quitted the country at the time somebody may have tried to throw the blame on him."

The theory was plausible, though Brett could not accept it. Nevertheless, after Pyne had taken his departure he could not help thinking about his references to Mrs. Hilmer. That there was force in them he could not deny, and with the admission came the unpleasant thought that perhaps he, Brett, was in some sense responsible for the neglect to clear up her antecedents.

However, a few hours might explain much.

With unwonted impatience the barrister awaited the coming of night. He tried every expedient to kill time, and found each operation tedious.

He dined early, and as half-past seven came and passed he wondered why the detective did not appear.

But his doubts on this point did not last long.

"Winter has gone to Charing Cross to make sure of their arrival," he said to himself.

At ten minutes to eight the detective came in hurriedly to say: "They will be here directly. A servant has taken their luggage to Mrs. Hilmer's place, and they are evidently driving straight here after taking some refreshment at the station."

"Have you no faith in human nature, Mr. Winter? Could you not trust their words?"

"Well, sir, my experience of human nature is that you can very seldom trust anybody's word."

At last Smith announced "Mrs. Hilmer and Mr. Mensmore."

When they entered Brett was for the moment at a loss to know exactly how to receive them.

But Mrs. Hilmer settled the matter by coming with a quiet "Good evening," and seating herself, and Mensmore stood near the door, very pale and stern-looking.

"It appears, Mr. Brett," he said, "that we met in Monte Carlo under false pretences. You were, it seems, a detective on the track of a murderer, and you were good enough to believe that I was the person you sought. It would have saved some misconception on my part had you explained our roles earlier. However, I am here to meet the charge."

Digitized by Google

Reggie was not unprepared for this attitude on Mensmore's part. But he was determined that it should not continue if he could help it.

"When we parted at Monte Carlo, Mensmore," he said, "we parted as friends."

"Yes."

"Then tell me what has happened since to cause this obvious change in your opinion of me."

"Is it not true that you suspect me of murdering Lady Delia Lyle?"

"No."

"But why has my sister been told that I ran serious risk of being apprehended on that count?"

"Because we certainly did suspect a mysterious personage who called himself Sydney H. Pyne, and whose behaviour was so unaccountable that the authorities required a reasonable explanation of it."

"Do I understand, Brett, that we meet with no more suspicion between us than when we last saw each other?"

"Most certainly."

"Then I ask your pardon for my manner and my words. I have suffered keenly during the last three days from this cruel thought. Let us shake hands on it."

As their hands met they both heard Mrs. Hilmer stifle a sob. Mensmore turned to her.

"Now, Gwen," he said, "don't be foolish. We will soon clear up this miserable business. So far as we are concerned all we need do is to tell the truth and fear nobody."

"That's it," said Winter. "If you adopt that course the matter will soon be ended."

Mensmore turned to the speaker. He guessed his identity, but Brett introduced the detective by name.

"Well," said Mensmore, "I have come here to answer questions. What is it you want to know?"

Mr. Winter glanced at the barrister, and Reggie explained:

"I have, as you may already realise, taken more than a passive interest in this inquiry, so the questioning largely devolves on me. First, tell me why you adopted the name of Pyne?"

"Simple enough, though stupid, I now admit. When I returned from the States I was very hard up, but managed to pick up a subsistence by writing for the sporting press, and occasionally backing horses. But I knew that this could not last, so I tried to get some financial interests in the City. In doing so I made the acquaintance of a man named Dodge, and committed myself to the underwriting of a new venture named the Springbok Mine. This fell through at the time, and with this collapse came other demands. I hate being worried with creditors, so when my sister offered to take and furnish a flat for me, near her own, I thought I would live quietly for a time and conceal my name so as to have peace there at any rate. Therefore, I took the name of a friend in America, little thinking that I should land both him and myself into such trouble by doing it. That is the explanation. By the way, what has happened to Pyne?"

"He is all right. He expects to see you to-night. You know Sir Charles Lyle, do you not?"

"Yes."

"Intimately?"

"Well, no, not exactly. He and I were at school together at Brighton, at Childe's place."

"At Brighton?"

"Yes. I was a little chap when Lyle was a senior. After he left the headmaster changed the school to a place called Seton Lodge, at Putney, on account of cramming operations for Army exams."

"Then you were at Putney?"

"Yes, for two years."

"And Lyle was not?"

"No; that I am sure of."

"Have you and Sir Charles been friendly since?"

Mensmore's face hardened somewhat as he answered: "I have seen very little of him, and have hardly ever spoken to him."

"Why? Did you quarrel?"

"N-no, but we just did not happen to meet. Bear in mind I was in business some years ago, and I am not yet thirty."

"Did you know Lady Delia?"

"I have never, to my knowledge, seen her."

"How, then, can you account for the fact that she visited your flat at Raleigh Mansions on November 6?"

"I say that such a statement is mere nonsense."

"But if it can be proved?"

"It cannot."

"I assure you, on my honour, that it can."

"But look here, Brett. Why should she come to see me? I question greatly if she knew of my existence."

"Nevertheless, it is the fact."

"I can only tell you it is not. I left London on November 8, and on the two previous evenings I dined alone. Mrs. Robinson, my housekeeper, can tell you that not another soul entered my flat for a week prior to my departure, except my sister and—and—I had forgotten—some workmen."

"Some workmen?"

"Yes; some fellows from a furniture warehouse."

"What were they doing?"

"Well, don't you see, I told you I was not well off, and my sister furnished my flat for me, in August last that was, but the drawing-room was left bare for a time. Just before I left for France she decided to refurnish her drawing-room, and she gave me the whole fit-out. The things were brought in by the men who came with her purchases."

At this astounding statement Brett and Winter were utterly taken aback. It was with difficulty that the barrister enunciated his next words clearly.

"Can you tell me with quite absolute certainty, the date of this change of the furniture?"

"Oh, yes. It was the day before I started for the Riviera that must have been November 7th."

"Are you positive of this?"

"Undoubtedly. Is it a matter of importance? Gwen, you know all about it. Besides, the bills for your new furniture will show the date of delivery, and it was the same day."

Mrs. Hilmer's face was hidden by her veil, but she nodded silently.

Three people in the room knew the terrible significance of Mensmore's straightforward words; but as yet he was personally unaware of the direction towards which the investigation now tended.

"Let us analyse the matter carefully," said Brett, who had recovered his self-possession, though he was almost terrified at the possibilities of the situation. "Did the whole of the contents of your drawing-room come from your sister's flat?"

"Every stick. There was nothing there before but the bare boards."

"Do you remember a handsome ornamental fender being amongst these articles?"

"Perfectly. My housekeeper said the men broke it during the transit. They denied this, and looked for the piece chipped off, but could not find it. She told me about it that night."

"Did you mention it to Mrs. Hilmer?"

"No. To tell the honest truth, Gwen and I had quarrelled a couple of days before. That is to say, we disagreed seriously about a certain matter, and it was this which led to my making off to Monte Carlo. Therefore it was hardly likely I should mention such a trivial matter to her."

"May I ask what you quarrelled about?"

Digitized by Google

"I have told her since that it ought to be made known, but she has implored me not to reveal it, so I cannot. But she will tell you herself that we agreed I should be at liberty to make this guarded explanation."

Brett and the detective again exchanged glances of wondering comprehension.

"I do not think we need question Mr. Mensmore further," said the barrister to Winter.

"No," was the reply. "The matter is clear enough. Mrs. Hillmer must tell us how that furniture came to be transferred from her premises on the morning of the 7th."

"If she chooses."

Brett's tone was sad, and its ominous significance was not lost on his hearers.

Mrs. Hillmer raised her veil. Her face was deathly pale and tense in its fixed agony. But in her eyes was a light which gave a curious aspect of resolve to her otherwise painful aspect of utter grief.

"I do not choose," she said quietly, looking, not at Brett or the detective, but at her brother.

For a little while no one spoke. Mensmore at last broke out eagerly:

"Don't act absurdly, Gwen. I cannot even guess where all this talk about the furniture is leading us, but I do know that you are as innocent of any complicity in Lady Delia's death as I am, so it is better for you to help forward the inquiry than to retard it."

"I am not innocent," said Mrs. Hilmer, her words falling with painful distinctness upon the ears of the three men. "Heaven help me! I am responsible for it!"

Her brother started to his feet, and caught her by the shoulder.

"What folly is this?" he cried. "Do you know what you are saying?"

"Fully. My words are like sledge-hammers. I will for ever feel their weight. I tell you I am responsible for the death of Lady Delia Lyle."

"Then how did she die, Mrs. Hilmer?" said Brett, whose glance sought to read her soul.

"I do not know. I do not want to know. It matters little to me."

"In other words, you are assuming a responsibility you should not bear. You were not even aware of this poor lady's death until I told you. Why should you seek to avert suspicion from others merely because Lady Delia is shown to have met her death in your apartments?"

"But how is it shown?" interrupted Mensmore vehemently, for he was more disturbed by his sister's unaccountable attitude than he had ever been at the serious charge against himself.

"Easily enough," said Winter, feeling that he ought to have some share in the conversation. "A piece of the damaged fender placed in your rooms, Mr. Mensmore, was found in the murdered lady's head."

"Was it?" he cried. "Then, by Heaven, I refuse to see my sister sacrificed for anybody's sake. She has borne too long the whole burthen of misery and degradation. I tell you, Gwen, that if you do not save yourself I will save you against your will. That furniture came to my room because——"

"Bertie, I beseech you, for the sake of the woman you love, to spare me." Mrs. Hilmer flung herself on her knees before him and caught hold of his hands, whilst she burst into a storm of tears.

Mensmore was unnerved. He turned to Brett, and said:

"Help me in this miserable business, old chap. I don't know what to say or do; my sister had no more connection with Lady Delia's death than I had. This statement on her part is mere hysteria arising from other circumstances altogether."

"That I feel acutely," said the barrister. "Yet someone killed her, and, whatever the pain that may be caused, and whoever may suffer, I am determined that the truth shall come out."

"I tell you," wailed Mrs. Hilmer between her sobs, "that I must bear all the blame. Why do you hesitate? She was killed in my house, and I confess my guilt."

"This is a rum business," growled Mr. Winter aloud, but half-unconsciously.

At that moment the door opened unexpectedly, and Smith entered.

Before Brett had time to vociferate at his astounded servitor the man stuttered an excuse:

"Beg pardon, sir," he said, "but Sir Charles Lyle has called, and wants to know if you will be disengaged soon."

CHAPTER XXIII.

The Letter.

Quick on the heels of the footman's stammered explanation came the voice of Sir Charles himself:

"Sorry to disturb you, Brett, if you are busy, but I must see you for a moment on a matter of great importance."

There was that in his utterance which betokened great excitement. He was not visible to the occupants of the room, but during the audible silence that followed his words, they could hear him stamping about in the passage, impatiently awaiting Brett's presence.

Mrs. Hilmer quietly collapsed on the floor. She had fainted.

Brett rushed out, calling for Mrs. Smith, and responding to Sir Charles Lyle's proffered statement as to the reason for his presence by the startling cry:

"Wait a bit, Lyle. There's a lady in a faint inside. We must attend to her at once."

Mrs. Smith, fortunately, was at hand, and with the help of her ministrations, Mrs. Hilmer gradually regained her senses.

After a whispered colloquy with Winter, the barrister said to Mensmore:

"You must get your sister to her residence as quickly as possible. She is far too highly strung to bear any further questioning to-night. Perhaps to-morrow, when you and she have talked matters fully together, you may be able to send for us and clear up this wretched business."

For answer Mensmore silently pressed his hand. With the help of the housekeeper he led his sister from the room, passing Sir Charles Lyle in the hall. The baronet politely turned aside, and Mensmore did not look at him, being far too engrossed with his sister to pay heed to aught else at the moment. As for Mrs. Hilmer, she was in such a state of collapse as to be practically unconscious of her surroundings.

She managed to murmur at the door:

"Where are you taking me to, Bertie?"

"Home, dear."

"Home? Oh, thank Heaven!"

They all heard her, and even the detective was constrained to say:

"Poor thing, she needn't have been afraid. She is suffering for someone else."

Sir Charles Lyle took Brett's arm.

"What on earth is going on?" he said.

"Merely a foolish woman worrying herself about others," replied Brett, grimly.

"But those people were my old friends, Mensmore and his sister?"

"Yes."

"What are they doing here?"

"Mensmore has been brought back to London by Mrs. Hilmer to face the allegations made against him with regard to your wife's disappearance. They came here by their own appointment, and——"

"Did I not tell you that this charge against Mensmore was wild folly on the face of it?"

"So it seems, when we have just discovered that your wife was killed in his sister's house, and then Mrs. Hilmer persists in declaring that she was responsible for the crime."

(Continued on page 286.)

Digitized by Google

A Cluster of Fruit Farms.

Could you but witness the conditions under which Chivers' famous Gold Medal Jams and Jellies are prepared, you would not be surprised at their great popularity and high reputation. It is in the pretty Cambridgeshire village of Histon that the process of manufacture takes place. The freshly gathered fruit, chiefly grown upon Messrs. Chivers' own farms (covering many acres of land at Histon, Haslingfield, Haddenham, and Impington), is made into Jam, or the Juice extracted for the flavouring of the Table Jellies. The various processes are carried on in a model Factory, equipped with every modern convenience. Throughout the whole process the most watchful care is exerted to insure strict cleanliness and purity. Pure, ripe fruit Juices are employed to flavour the Jellies, and absolute freshness of material is always insisted upon. Thus Chivers'

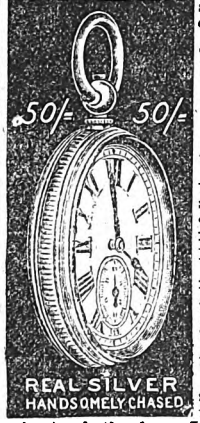
Jellies have earned such a reputation for consistent excellence and purity that the public have perfect confidence in them. The Edinburgh Medical Journal says: "A perfect form of Table Jelly. The Orange tasted exactly as if a squeeze of fresh orange had been added." A Yorkshire Vicar writes: "Your perfect success will, I trust, remove for the future all those prejudices which people had previously cherished with regard to ready-made jellies. That your great success may reach every sick room as well as hospital ward is my earnest wish." The Charity Record says: "A remarkably delicate aroma. We safely predict an increasing popularity as time goes on."

Chivers' Gold Medal Jams and Table Jellies are sold by Grocers and Stores throughout the United Kingdom. Insist on being supplied with Chivers'. A free sample packet of Jelly will be sent on receipt of post-card. S. CHIVERS & SONS, Histon, Cambridge.

£50 EASILY EARNED

Send No Money, We Trust You.

FREE.



WE GIVE YOU YOUR CHOICE of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1s. 6d. each. (Regular price, 2s. 6d.)

WE DO NOT WANT YOUR MONEY.

JUST WRITE US A POST-CARD

with your name and address clearly written, saying that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your post-card, we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13s. 6d. you have received for same, and we will AT ONCE send you (no waiting) ABSOLUTELY FREE, our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch, with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire. A Written Guarantee for Ten Years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1s. 6d. each article. We have thousands of testimonials and press notices as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents. With each packet we send you particulars of how you can easily earn £50, and remember to try. Herewith we append copy of receipt from the lucky winner of the £50 prize offered during January, 1901:—

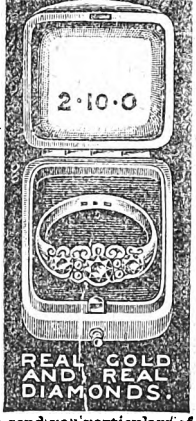
FREE



IT COSTS YOU NOTHING

Received from the British Goldsmiths Co., Bank of England Note for Fifty Pounds in payment for Cash Prize, in addition to the Presents offered for selling the largest number of their packets of jewellery during the month of January, 1901.
Feb. 5, 1901.

22 Cory St., Resolven, near Neath, S. Wales.
(Signed) JOHN SANDERS.

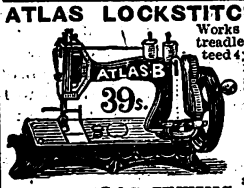
SEND NO MONEY. WRITE US TO-DAY.
SEND NO STAMPS. ONLY A POST-CARD.
BRITISH GOLDSMITHS CO. (DEPT. 29), 48 GRAY'S INN RD., LONDON.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 184s High St., Camden Town, London, N.W., 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.

THE MARSTON CO.,
59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

PHOTOS. PHOTOS. PHOTOS.

From Carte or Cabinet.

One Permanent 12 by 10 Enlargement, Mounted on Plate sunk mount, measuring 20 by 16, with six highly-glazed cabinet Portraits of same for 10/6.

3 Cabinets 2/6; 6 for 3/6; 12 for 6/-. 6 Cartes 2/-; 12 for 3/-; 24 for 5/6. All sent carriage paid. Send to-day P.O. to H. BRADBURY, Photographer, The Chase, SOUTHGATE.

TO SUFFERERS OF INDIGESTION

A cure of Indigestion is guaranteed in a few Weeks by the use of REES & CO'S. INDIGESTION CURE. If not money will be returned. A Trial will convince. Price 1/6 per bottle.—REES & Co., Narberth, Pem.

A FREE GIFT.

500 40-EGG INCUBATORS.

Ladies and Gentlemen can greatly increase their incomes by POULTRY BREEDING, thus converting 1d. Eggs into 1s. Chickens. To encourage this industry we intend supplying each applicant during the next 28 days with one of our 40-Egg Incubators.

Write for Free Gift Form to POULTRY BREEDERS' APPLIANCE CO., 3 Clarence Road, SOUTHEND-ON-SEA.

Don't Cough-use

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves.
Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

Keating's Lozenges

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.

GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS
148 Old Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"Look here, Brett. Don't you go and lose your head like everybody else mixed up in this wretched business. My wife is not dead."

"What!" The cry was a double one, for both Brett and Winter gave simultaneous utterance to their amazement.

"It is true. She is alive all the time. I have had a letter from her."

"A letter. Surely, Lyle——"

"I am neither mad nor drunk. It reached me by this morning's post. I came here with it as fast as I could travel. I have been in the train all day, and am nearly fainting from hunger."

"Where is it?" cried Winter. "Is it genuine?"

"I could swear to her writing amidst a thousand letters. Here it is. I have brought some old correspondence of hers for the purpose of comparison, as I could hardly believe my eyes when I first received it."

Brett was so dumfounded at this remarkable development that he could but mutely take the document produced by the baronet and read it.

He himself recognised Lady Delia's handwriting, which he had often seen—a clear, bold, well-defined script, more like the caligraphy of a banker than of a fashionable lady.

The letter was dated "February 1st," bore no other superscription, and read as follows:

My Dear Charles,—I have just seen in the newspapers the announcement of my death, and the theories set on foot to account for my disappearance on November 6th. This seems to convey to me the strange fact that you have not received the explanation I sent you of my reasons for leaving London so suddenly. Otherwise you must have kept your own counsel very closely. However, I do not now desire to reopen the question of motive; let it suffice to say that no one save myself was responsible for my disappearance, and that neither you nor anyone acquainted with me will ever see me again. Do not search for me; it will be time wasted. If you have legal proof of my death and wish to marry again, be satisfied. Tear up this letter and forget it. I am dead—to you and to the world. You can neither refuse to accept the genuineness of this letter nor trace me by reason of it, as I have taken such precautions that the latter course will be impossible. Let me repeat—forget me.

Delia.

The barrister carefully refolded the sheet after scrutinising the water-mark against the light, and noting that the paper was British made; he then examined the envelope. The obliterating post-mark was "London, February 4, 9 p.m., West Strand." The office of delivery was "Wensley, February 6."

"Posted at the West Strand Post Office on Saturday night," he said. "Detained in London all Sunday, and delivered to you this morning in the north."

"Exactly."

"It was written three days earlier, if the date be accurate. So the writer is somewhere in Europe."

"That's how I take it," said Sir Charles.

"Unless the whole thing is a fraud."

"How can it be a fraud? I am sure as to the handwriting. Why, even you yourself, Brett, must have a good recollection of my wife's style."

"Undoubtedly. No man born could swear that this was not Lady Delia's production."

"Well, what are we to do?"

"And what did Mrs. Hilmer mean by kicking up that fuss when we spoke to her?" interpolated Winter. "I'll take my oath that some one was killed in her house, else how comes it that a woman found in the Thames at Putney is carrying about in her head some of Mrs. Hilmer's ironwork? I wish she hadn't fainted just now. Why, she said herself that she was the cause of Lady Delia's death, and here Lady Delia writes to say she is alive. This business is beyond me, but Mrs. Hilmer has got to explain a good deal yet before I am done with her."

The detective's wrath at this check in the hunt for a criminal did not appeal to Sir Charles Lyle. "You can please yourself, Mr. Winter, of course," he said coldly; "but so far as I am concerned, I will respect my wife's wishes, and let the matter rest where it is."

"My dear Lyle," said the barrister, "such a course is impossible. Assuming that her ladyship is really alive, why did she leave you?"

"How can I tell? She herself refuses to give a reason. She apparently stated one in a letter which never reached me, as you know. She has selfishly caused me a world of suffering and misery for three long months. I refuse to be plagued in the matter any further." Sir Charles was excited and angry. He was in bitter revolt against circumstances.

"Do you intend to show this letter to Lady Delia's relatives?" said Brett, at a loss for the time, to discuss the situation coherently.

"I do not know. What would you advise? I trust fully to your judgment. But is it not better to obey her wishes?—to forget, as she puts it?"

"We must decide nothing hastily. I am perplexed beyond endurance by this business. There is so much that is wildly impossible in its irreconcilable features. I must have time. Will you give me a copy of the letter?"

"Certainly, keep it yourself. We have all seen it."

"Thank you." Brett placed the envelope and its contents in his pocket-book. Then, turning to the detective, he said:

"Now, Mr. Winter, I want to ask you a favour. Do not worry Mrs. Hilmer until you hear from me."

"By all means, Mr. Brett. But am I to report to the Commissioner that Lady Delia has been found, or has, at any rate, explained that she is not dead?"

"There is no immediate necessity why a report of any kind should be made?"

"None."

"Then leave matters where they are at present."

"But why?" put in Sir Charles. "Is it not better to put an end to all inquiries, at least so far as my wife is concerned? It is her desire, and, I may add, my own, now that I know something of her fate."

"Of course, if you wish it, Lyle, I have no valid objection."

"Oh, no, no. Do not look at it that way. I leave the ultimate decision entirely to you."

"In that case, then, I recommend complete silence in all quarters at present."

The detective left them, and as he passed out into Victoria Street his philosophy could find but one comprehensive dictum. "This is a rum go," he muttered, unconsciously plagiarising himself on many previous occasions.

The baronet now sat down, and meditatively chewed the handle of his umbrella.

"What is this nonsense Mensmore's sister talked about being responsible for my wife's death?" he said.

"I do not pretend to understand," answered Brett. "Little more than a week ago she learnt for the first time of your wife's supposed murder. Of that I am quite positive. She then feared that her brother was implicated, and without trusting me with the reasons for her belief, she took such steps as she thought best to safeguard him."

"Took steps! What steps?" Sir Charles jerked the words out impetuously.

"She went off after him to the south of France, and found him in Florence. What she said I cannot guess, but the result was their visit here to-night. During our interview it came out, quite by accident, that some furniture was taken from her place to her brother's on the morning of November 6th, thus shifting the venue of Lady Delia's death—or imagined death I must now say—from No. 12 Raleigh Mansions, to No. 61. This discovery was as startling to Mrs. Hilmer as to us, for she forthwith protested that the whole affair arose from her fault, and practically asked the detective to arrest her on the definite charge of murder."

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

Don't Miss This Opportunity.

Readers of "Short Stories" who are ready to act promptly now have an opportunity of securing the most remarkable bargain ever offered by any publishing house. We say THE MOST REMARKABLE because what is offered is not an out-of-date reprint of some once valuable work, but the newest, most complete, and most practical of all works of general reference.

The 20th Century Issue of Chambers's Encyclopædia.

There is no need to dwell on the surpassing merits of this great library. The earlier editions of Chambers's Encyclopædia are well known to the public. Users of reference works, wherever the English language is spoken, know it as the most convenient and most satisfactory of all encyclopædias, and will hail the advent of this new edition.

The 20th Century Chambers has neither peer nor competitor, for all other encyclopædias are made on an old and cumbersome plan. The 20th Century Chambers alone meets the requirements of the man of this day and age. It is exhaustive, yet condensed; its information is universal, yet readily accessible; it is made for the busy and practical man of to-day, who wants complete and exact information, but is unwilling to run over a 30-page article when the same facts can be condensed—perhaps into a single page, column, or paragraph, as in Chambers's.

Readers of "Short Stories" now have the opportunity of securing the first impressions of this great reference library at a very low price and small monthly payments—

An initial payment of Only Three Shillings, the purchase to be completed after the subscriber is in full possession of the entire ten volumes, by nine monthly payments of 8s. 6d. each.

But it must be remembered that this offer is necessarily of only temporary duration. Only 10,000 sets can be had for distribution on these liberal terms. Chambers's Encyclopædia is so favourably known, and the 20th Century Edition will be so generally desired, that the distribution of these 10,000 sets may be only a question of a few days. That is why you need to act promptly if you wish to share in the benefits of this offer.

How to Proceed:

Your own Bookseller or Newsagent will doubtless be able to give you full information regarding the 20th Century Chambers, and the temporary offer of the "Daily Express"; or the "Daily Express" will be glad to furnish fuller details upon application. But you probably know all you need to know regarding this popular reference library, and it only remains to give you the following Application Form for your immediate use:—

Cut Out this Application Form and hand it at once with 3s. to your Bookseller or Newsagent for transmission to the DAILY EXPRESS. Cheques payable to order of Lloyd's Bank Ltd.

To the General Manager, DAILY EXPRESS,
17 Tudor Street, London, E.C. Date ..... 1901.

I enclose 3s. Please send me Chambers's Encyclopædia (20th Century Issue).

[Strike out one of these lines.] (a) Cloth, for which I agree to make to you, or to anyone you may appoint, nine further payments of 8s. 6d. each.
(b) Half Morocco, for which I agree to make to you, or to anyone you may appoint, nine further payments of 13s. each,

my next payment upon delivery of the complete ten volumes, and my succeeding payments on the corresponding day of each month following. Until such payments are completed, I engage that the volumes remain your property, and shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise. I further agree that if, owing to unforeseen circumstances, of which you shall be the judge, the volumes cannot be delivered, the return of this deposit of 3s. shall cancel this agreement.

[Signed] .....

[Rank or Occupation] .....

[Address] .....

[B9S802061]

CARRIAGE PAID TO ANY RAILWAY STATION IN THE UNITED KINGDOM.

Digitized by Google

THE EDITOR'S PAGE.

First of all I want you to read the two new series of stories which start in this number under the respective titles of "A Keeper of Secrets," and "Tales Told Off Duty." I think you will find them to your liking. When you have finished them, and also the other stories in the number, you might hand the paper to your friends. Incidentally, you will thus do a double favour, first to your friends, who will be provided with a budget of good reading which they might otherwise miss, and secondly to myself by making Short Stories known to them and thus securing potential new readers.

❦❦❦

Writing from Arbroath, "E. W."—who is a lady—regrets the "alteration made of late with regard to the 'Anecdote Competition' in Short Stories.

"Till a few weeks back anecdotes had to deal with a certain subject, but now they may deal with any subject.

"I am sure numbers of your readers will agree with me that the competition is far more interesting when just dealing with a given subject.

"Hoping that I don't give any offence, and with all good wishes for S.S."

❦❦❦

Of course, there's no offence, dear madam. You do me the greatest kindness by criticising the paper. It is by such means that I get to know what readers like or dislike.

I am quite ready to alter the conditions of the Storyette Competition if it is so desired. Perhaps other readers will let me have their opinions on the matter.

❦❦❦

"Walter," who is seventeen years of age, has a disappointment to chronicle. It is that the maidens of real life do not equal the damsels of fiction in physical beauty "by long chalks." For some months he has been a diligent reader of Short Stories and has allowed himself to fall in love with some of the heroines he has read of therein. "They are sometimes described as being so sweet and charming that it is impossible to help loving them," he says, "but, unfortunately, one does not meet their like in actual life. Here in Manchester, at any rate, there seems to be a dearth of even passably pretty girls."

I hasten to disclaim all participation in this opinion of "fair Mancunians." Manchester has certainly its fair share of feminine beauty. Many years ago when I was staying at Chorlton-cum-Hardy, I remember meeting the most charming girl I ever——but that's another, and purely domestic story.

No, "Walter" you are not right in what you say. The world contains plenty of pretty and charming girls if you have an eye for them. Doubtless, you will meet one all in good time, and when the inevitable does happen, say in ten years, don't forget to send me a piece of cake.

❦❦❦

Strangely enough, a subject akin to the foregoing is raised by "Admirer," who maintains that Norwich (his place of residence), in his opinion, contains more pretty girls than any other city of its size.

I don't know Norwich very well, but, speaking generally, this strikes me as being rather a sweeping statement. Feminine charms abound in every place, and no one town can lay claim to anything like a monopoly. At the same time, I am bound to admit that one seems to meet more pretty faces in some places than in others. Speaking off-hand, I should place Richmond and Brixton in the place of honour among London's suburbs; while, so far as provincial towns are concerned, Bath and Eastbourne have quite their share of beauty. But, then, one's experience is necessarily limited, and with wider knowledge would inevitably come modification of opinion. Probably readers whose experience has differed from mine will have different ideas on the subject. As far as space allows, Short Stories is willing to give such opinions an airing.

❦❦❦

"E. Elton" (Leicester) is proud of his country's flag, and is especially delighted with our series, "The Lion's Wars," which he says have taught him more than he ever knew before of events which have had so much to do with the building up of our glorious Empire. He thinks that this series ought to be very widely read, to which I say most heartily, "Hear, hear!"

❦❦❦

"Minnie" is anxious to know whether her lover loves her or no. They were engaged, and their parents forbade them to have anything to do with each other; so they parted, promising to wait and be true. Now, whenever she goes into the town, she sees him talking and walking with other girls. She asked him to return her photograph, and he declined to do so. There is someone else who loves her, but she does not know what to do, as she promised to wait for James. ——— He is not treating you as he should, "Minnie." Ask him what he means; and if you find that he is not keeping his promise to you, I should tell him that you do not wish to have anything further to do with him.

TO CONTRIBUTORS.

I am open to consider original stories of any length from 1,500 to 5,000 words. The character of stories required may be best ascertained by a careful reading of the contents of the paper. All MSS. are dealt with promptly, and every effort is made to return rejected stories which are accompanied by stamped addressed envelopes. At the same time, I cannot hold myself responsible for MSS. accidentally lost. Communications of this kind should be addressed The Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, Strand, W.C.

SHORT STORIES ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	30 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ,,	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,,	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,,	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,,	12 10 0
,, half ,, ,,	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, March 5th, if intended for the issue on sale March 19th, and dated March 23rd. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

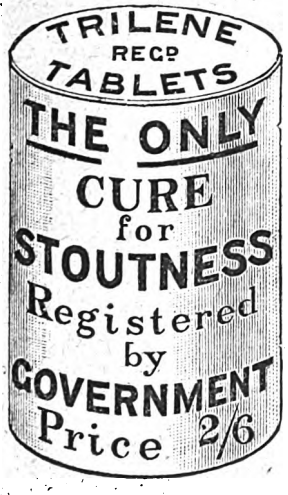
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

MRS. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st. and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 21lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me. "Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Risholme Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

MRS. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

MR. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

MRS E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes "I am reduced from 12st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

MRS. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2-3 and am sufficiently reduced."

Mrs. DREW, of 1 Bellevue Gardens, The Nursery, Devizes, writes: "I took Tablets some years ago; they soon reduced me and I have not got stout since. Send me a box for my mother."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

Shilling packets
Kaputine "the" safe
Remedy For Headache

WARNING. Instead of using the common White Headache Powders, which generally consist entirely of a crude drug, which has been condemned as dangerous by the medical papers, insist on having a bona-fide anti-quack remedy, recommended by such eminent medical authorities as Dr. RAMAGE, L.R.C.P., Dr. THURSTIN, L.R.C.P., late Dr. BOYD-WILLIAMS (Liverpool), the Editor of the Medical Journal, "Health," etc., etc. The name of this safe remedy is KAPUTINE.

ALL LEADING CHEMISTS SELL IT, OR CAN GET IT FOR YOU IN A FEW HOURS.

Sold by BOOT'S, TAYLOR'S, DAY'S, WHITE'S and other Stores. Most Co-operative Stores sell it.

PACKETS, 1/-. SAMPLES ONE PENNY,

or KAPUTINE LIMITED, HUDDERSFIELD,
will send it FREE for 12 stamps.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

A FREE TRIAL FOR 2/6

THE SET consists of Violin, Bow, Resin, &c.

VIOLIN OUTFIT COMPLETE.
Price £1 10s. 0d.

We will supply any reader of SHORT STORIES with one of these VIOLIN OUTFITS on Monthly Payments, as follows:—

You send us 2/6, with your Name and Address, and we will send one on approval.

If you approve of it you send us 2/6 on receipt and 5/- each month for 5 months, making the full 30/-.

BUT OUR NETT CASH WITH ORDER PRICE IS 27/- only.

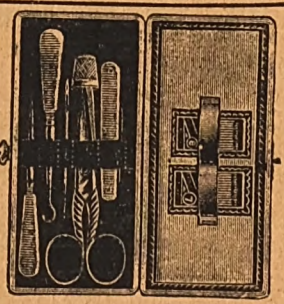
And if you do not approve of the Outfit, we will refund the cash sent, if you return the Outfit at once.



LADY'S COMPANION.

Containing 7 useful articles, exactly as illustrated, with Hall-marked Silver Thimble, in fine Leather Covered Velvet Lined Case.
Price only 4/3.

MASTERS' 'FAVOURITE' MELODEON 12/6.

We will supply any reader with this Melodeon on receipt of 2/6. If you approve of it you send us 2/- on receipt and 2/- each month for 4 months. Nett Cash With Order Price 11/- only. If you do not approve of it we will refund the cash if you return the Melodeon at once.

Watches & Clocks Alberts Medals Pendants Wedding rings Gem rings Signet rings Cutlery Cruets Electro-Plate Carvers Tea-pots Field glasses Pins Brooches

CATALOGUE

J.N. Masters, Ltd., Jewellers, RYE, Sussex.

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE NOW ON SALE. PRICE 6D.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 636. FOR WEEK ENDING MARCH 9TH, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

ANOTHER LIGHTERMAN AND DR. TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

"I ALWAYS HAVE TWO OR THREE PACKETS OF VI-COCOA IN MY CABIN."

Mr. T. PHILPOTT, 33 St. Margaret's Court, High Street, Borough :

"I write to speak of the good qualities of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa. I am a Lighterman by trade, and Captain of a Sailing Barge, and in my cabin I always have two or three packets of Vi-Cocoa. On winter nights I say to my mate, 'Get some of the old stuff ready, I can just do a cup.' I always recommend it to my fellow workmen. You are at liberty to use this as you like."

"Undoubted purity and strength."—Medical Magazine.

DR. TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

"In the front rank of really valuable foods."—Lancet.

FAVOURED BY THE HOMES AND HOSPITALS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

ADDRESS: DAINTY SAMPLE TIN FREE TO ANY ADDRESS.

Dr. TIBBLES' VI-COCOA Ltd., 60 Bunhill Row, London, E.C.

DAINTY SAMPLE FREE.

Digitized by Google

KAPUTINE

The Best & Safest Remedy for

HEADACHE.

NURSE HILL, of the London Association of Nurses, writes:

"I have seen Kaputine administered to many patients, and can truly say it is a remedy which should have a place in every household."

All Leading Chemists sell KAPUTINE, 1/-. Samples One Penny.

If your Chemist has not KAPUTINE send his name and address to

KAPUTINE, HUDDERSFIELD,

and we will send you a SHILLING PACKET FREE.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

U. R. IN LUCK

in seeing this advertisement, which will put you into communication with one of the most liberal firms in Europe — from whom you will be able to Purchase the Finest Goods at

ABSOLUTELY WHOLESALE PRICES.

Send your Name and Address to H. SAMUEL (a post-card will do) for a copy of

H. Samuel's Bargain Book

Nearly 200 pages, adorned with over 3,000 illustrations and descriptions of Gold and Silver Watches, Jewellery, Diamonds, Plate, Cutlery, etc., etc.

FREE BONUS REWARDS

Ten Lists of Presents for Selection.

H. Samuel's Lady's 'Acme' Watch

contains special inventions protected by Royal Letters Patent, and obtainable only in H. Samuel's Watches. Fine Three-quarter Plate, Jewelled, Richly Decorated Dial (plain if preferred), and Highly Engraved Case. Warranted for Five Years, and sent with BONUS FREE GIFT on receipt of 25s.

A FULL MONTH'S FREE TRIAL is allowed with every article.

H. SAMUEL (Dept. 29),
95, 97, 99, 101, 89, and 121 Market St., MANCHESTER.

CROSSE & BLACKWELL'S

4 PLATES OF SOUP FOR SIXPENCE

SOUP TABLETS

SOLD BY ALL GROCERS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(Really genuine.) In Patent Air-tight Tins. ½-lb., 1/4; 1-lb., 2/4; 2-lb., 4/-, including Tin and Postage.—Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

TO SUFFERERS OF INDIGESTION

A cure of Indigestion is guaranteed in a few Weeks by the use of REES & CO'S. INDIGESTION CURE. If not money will be returned. A Trial will convince. Price 1/6 per bottle.—REES & Co., Narberth, Pem.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

NEW AUTOMATIC KNITTER

FOR HOME WORK.

"The machine that knitted the hosiery and comforts for the troops in Africa."—See what The Times said.

Knits Socks (a pair in 35 min.), Stockings, Fancy Goods, &c. Easily learned. Lessons Free.

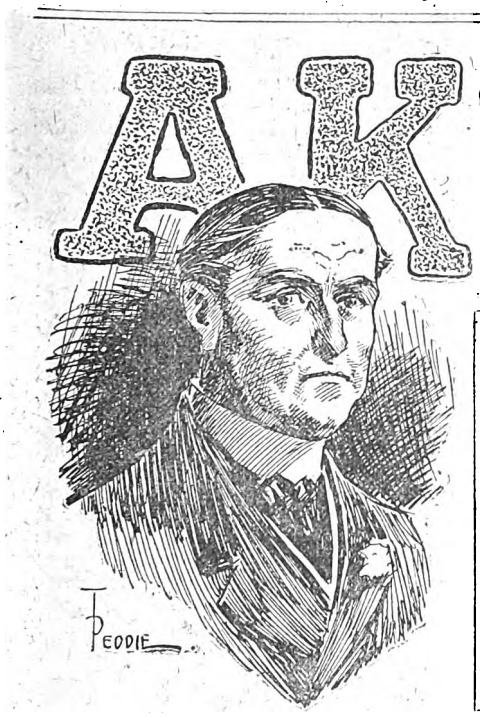
15/- to 30/- Weekly

Cash, hire, and Work Terms from "Sorres" depts.: 67 Southwark St., S.E.; 55 Oxford St., W.; 192 Upper St., London, N.; 105 Nicolson St., Edinburgh; 58 Union St., Glasgow; 132 Stephen's Green, Dublin; 62 Great Hampton St., Birmingham; 31 Stokes Croft, Bristol.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 636.] For the Week Ending March 9th, 1901. [ONE PENNY.



By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Being Days in the Professional Life of the late Mr. Hugo Pontifex, the Famous West-end Solicitor.

To those who had only met him casually in Society, the late Mr. Pontifex was a good-tempered mystery. Bluff, handsome, and, in spite of his middle-age, a little of a dandy, he seemed the last man in the world to deserve his reputation, which was that of the keenest, most audacious, and unerring of family lawyers. Fair-haired, and powerful as an athlete, his striking appearance was increased by his eyes, one of which was grey and one blue.

In reality, however, Hugo Pontifex had a wide and almost exclusively aristocratic practice. He seldom briefed a barrister, seldom set foot in a court of justice, but single handed he hunted down, captured, and safely buried mystery after mystery of terrible import to Mayfair and Belgravia.

An expert in strangling scandal, he lived a life of enthralling interest, and died a rich man. When his executors went through his papers they found nothing to satisfy their curiosity, though plenty to excite it. Hugo Pontifex knew the value of fire—and the dangers of ink. But from time to time he related to the writer, who enjoyed a certain measure of his confidence, the incidents which form the basis of the following stories. In speaking of these strange fragments of drama, Mr. Pontifex himself employed fictitious names, the present author being left to guess vainly at the identity of the genuine actors.

II.—THE TRUE STORY OF THE AMBERLEY MARRIAGE.

"GET me a hansom."

Mr. Pontifex uttered this brief command into the mouthpiece of the speaking-tube at his elbow. Then he replaced the whistle, hung up the tube, and began to copy on to a slip of paper one of the many curt memoranda contained in a small red note-book which he took from a locked drawer. When he had finished and put away the note-book the scrap of scribbling-paper held a name and address. It read:

"Colonel Denis Amberley, V.C.,
The Towers,
Hailey,
Bucks."

The solicitor rose, and picking up a smart kit-bag of cow-hide from a corner, walked out to the St. James' Street exit of the block that held his offices. He took with him, carefully folded, the slip of paper on which he had copied the address in Buckinghamshire.

"Paddington," he said to the driver of the cab that was in waiting, and entering it with his kit-bag, was borne off through the West-end a cool, almost indolent figure, lounging in the open hansom, and gazing dreamily at the crowded streets and the early afternoon sunshine, through the half-closed lids of his singular eyes.

The appointment which was carrying Mr. Pontifex towards Buckinghamshire on this June day, had been made some day or two previously, in a short and formal communication that had asked him to leave town, should it be possible, without a moment's delay. That note was endorsed "Private," and signed "Denis Amberley." The addition of the writer's military rank and distinctions in Mr. Pontifex's memorandum was the result of that gentleman's own cautious investigations. He had been detained in London for some forty-eight hours, and had profited by them to acquaint himself with certain details of Denis Amberley's career.

A brilliant officer, still in the first prime of a vigorous life, admittedly handsome, almost the last of an old county family, the life-tenant of a fine estate and fortune, and—a bachelor; such was Mr. Pontifex's most recent, and as yet unseen client. Some three months before, the Colonel had returned from South Africa with a Boer bullet through his shoulder, and had settled down at the historic home of the Amberleys—that is to say, at The Towers, near Hailey. To the surprise of his friends, although that popular person, a gallant soldier, home from the wars, Colonel Denis Amberley had been practically invisible during the season that was just closing.

Mr. Pontifex enjoyed his railway journey through the drowsy afternoon, and still more the spanking run to The Towers in a comfortable dog-cart. His destination proved to be a pleasant country house, of ancient date

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

but fairly modern adaptation. A lawyer's scrutiny is keen, and as Mr. Pontifex surveyed The Towers and the fine park and estate surrounding it, he decided mentally that he would not be required to advise upon any financial problem. Colonel Amberley had plainly money and to spare.

The butler received him with practised ease, and Mr. Pontifex and his kit bag were escorted to a bright sleeping room, where he made a rapid toilet, for the Buckinghamshire roads had been dusty. As he descended the galleried staircase to join the servant who was to show him to Colonel Amberley's apartment, Mr. Pontifex heard the rustle of skirts and g'anced round.

On the level upper landing that he was passing there moved a woman, young and beautiful. She was a brunette of brunettes, dark-eyed, dark-haired, dark-skinned. Her lips were scarlet, but peculiarly thin and compressed, her gaze piercing and critical, her features small, regular, and determined. When she disappeared into a corridor that opened from the massive landing, she left upon Mr. Pontifex's mind the impression of a personality both powerful and selfish. Also, he felt certain that she had been watching for him, and that in her single instant's observation she had taken a profound and comprehensive review of the new-comer.

Mr. Pontifex started. A little hand had been laid upon his arm.

Reflectively the solicitor pursued his descent. Traversing a second and lower landing, he crossed the extremity of a narrow lobby, arched and dimly lighted. Mr. Pontifex started—a little hand had been laid upon his arm.

"Please," said a sweet voice; "you are the surgeon that Colonel Amberley expected, aren't you—may I speak to you a moment?"

The solicitor did not disclaim the character with which he had been so unceremoniously invested. He was looking admiringly at the speaker; save for her youth and beauty she was the antithesis of the woman Mr. Pontifex had seen upon the upper landing. Fair and sunny, with wilful curls of a golden-brown, and tender blue eyes, she had a complexion of snow, warmed by the tiny blushes that ebbed and flowed to her soft cheeks. Mr. Pontifex noticed that she wore the prettiest of walking-costumes and a large and summery hat. He bowed gravely, as if to grant the request she had preferred.

His petitioner, colouring hotly, drew him into the dusky entry. The solicitor perceived that she had taken a hasty survey of the staircase, as if afraid of an interruption.

"I—I am Gladys Ansell," she said simply; "I am engaged to be married to Denis—to Colonel Amberley. I know it's shamefully unconventional my speaking to you like this on the sly. But I wanted to see you before anyone else to—to ask you if you wouldn't urge Colonel Amberley to leave Hailey and go abroad for a while. I'm sure it's his only chance of getting better, and the other doctors say he mustn't risk it. And if he stops here he will die."

The tears sprang to her blue eyes and her low tones faltered.

Mr. Pontifex studied her in silence—he had begun to twist the emerald ring on his finger.

"A woman's instinct is a thing to be reckoned with," he told her; "and yet the doctors are sometimes in the right."

Gladys Ansell shook her head—she was struggling with her grief and could not speak. Some words broke from her lips at last.

"It's not instinct," she sobbed; "I know. They are all blind, every one of them, and Denis will be killed."

She hid her face in her palms.

"I can't lose him," she moaned; "I can't lose him—oh, what shall I do!"

The girl checked herself to listen apprehensively.

"There's someone coming downstairs," she whispered; "go, quick!" and she herself darted into the gloom of the passage.

Mr. Pontifex strode on to the galleried landing in a second and resumed his descent with the greatest unconcern. But, absent-minded as he seemed, he had remarked in a lightning glance that the dark-eyed girl was leaning over the loftiest of the carved oak balustrades. Her expression was more absorbed and masterful than ever.

Reaching the hall, the solicitor was ushered by the impassive footman into an attractive apartment, all French windows, settees, sweeping curtains and bric-à-brac.

Digitized by Google

"Mr. Pontifex, sir," announced the servant.

Someone rose from a lounge—someone with a stooping frame and who walked with a stick. Yet the face of this person was still clean-cut and military, the shoulders square and strong. The stoop was that of the invalid and not the aged.

A trembling hand was held out to the solicitor. "I am glad to see you at last, Mr. Pontifex," he was told; "I am Colonel Denis Amberley. Pray be seated." The solicitor accepted the invitation; his host motioned to a stand placed conveniently.

"You smoke?" he inquired; "here are cigarettes, if you prefer them—Havanas and my own choice, Trichinopolies—I never smoke anything else. The box is almost empty, as you see; but be reassured I have ample reserves."

He rang as he spoke and ordered a fresh box of his favourites.

Mr. Pontifex, rejecting the Trichinopolies, took a Havana. The Colonel relighted his own cigar.

"I ought just to explain to you, Mr. Pontifex," said Denis Amberley when the door had finally closed behind the footman, "that my household regard you as a distinguished surgeon, whom I am consulting informally on the score of an old friendship. I did not wish it to be known that I was having recourse to a lawyer, and one, at that, of your exceptional reputation."

The solicitor nodded—he comprehended some little of the proceedings on the staircase.

"I am," went on the Colonel, 'tenant for life of The Towers and its rent-roll, and at present a bachelor." He sighed, and touched the ash from his cigar. "The next heir," he continued, "is my cousin, daughter of my father's sister, who married in France a French physician. Both died some years ago, and I had the girl brought here and taken care of, setting up a chaperone for the purpose. Julie is extremely good-looking, a brunette of a most striking kind, and for a while I had a secret fancy to marry her. If I married anyone else, and had had children, Julie would be practically disinherited. Well, the best laid plans—you know the proverb. I met someone else. I came back from South Africa to recuperate and found a new rector at Hailey. His nineteen-year-old daughter was my fate—I fell in love with Gladys Ansell."

Denis Amberley puffed at his cigar troublously.

"Julie took it quietly," he said. "Of course, I told her that I would have her provided for, in spite of my marriage; but I could see that she had expected to be mistress of The Towers, either as my wife or successor. Young as she is, she is cool, fierce, passionate, ambitious. Almost since the day she learnt of my engagement to Gladys Ansell, I have felt that I was a dying man."

The Colonel had finished his statement in a nervous whisper. Mr. Pontifex did not vary the small cloudlets that were stealing from his nostrils. The lids were lowered over his curious eyes.

"My marriage draws near," murmured Denis Amberley, "but my doctors insist that it must be postponed. They warn me against excitement. My complaint puzzles them hopelessly. Yet, even with my life and Gladys' happiness at stake, I dare not tell them that I am being poisoned—poisoned, and by Julie Lepage."

The instrument was a phypodermic syringe. Mr. Pontifex had seen enough.

Mr. Pontifex laid down his Havana.

"You have reasons for your belief, I suppose?" he commented drily.

The Colonel leant forward to whisper.

"Once," he said, "when I was, to all appearance, asleep upon this very couch, she came and looked at me—looked at me and smiled—a terrible, significant smile, as I saw through my lashes. And then she put out her hand and touched the pulse in my wrist and smiled again. That smile awakened me to my danger. Since then I have guarded my food and drink in ways that have made those around me think me mad, and yet I have grown worse, even when she spent, at my insistence, a fortnight in town. The only signs of improvement I have shown were during a pretended quarrel with Gladys. Yet I have not dared to breathe my knowledge to a soul, even to my darling, for I have no proof. If I could but get away from Hailey! But they say that my heart is so weak that it would be certain death to face travelling."

Digitized by Google

He was interrupted by the sound of a gong beaten in the hall outside.

"That is the dressing gong," explained the Colonel; "never mind, we will finish our talk later. I want you to see the woman I suspect so gravely, Mr. Pontifex; that is why I have arranged to dine in company to-night, invalid as I am. If she is to be unmasked and defeated it is you who must do it, and without publicity—I cannot send my father's niece to gaol." He bowed the solicitor out of the apartment and summoned his attendant to help him to his own dressing-room.

Mr. Pontifex went thoughtfully about his toilet. Yet he performed it with his usual rapidity and returned in the gathering twilight to the hall. The dinner-gong proper had not gone and he stepped into the room in which he had had his interview with the Colonel.

As he entered, moving in the silent fashion natural to him, he saw that it was not empty. By the Colonel's smoking-table, under the vague glow of the electric pendant, stood the girl he had first passed on the staircase and whose black eyes and resolute type of beauty he had since decided could be none other than those of Julie Lepage, Denis Amberley's suspected cousin. But now she was gorgeous in a gown of crimson silk, with a train like that of a court robe.

She was unconscious of his presence and absorbed by her occupation. In one hand she held a bundle of the Trichinopolies from the freshly-opened box, in the other some instrument that she was applying to each of the cigars in turn.

Mr. Pontifex started violently. The instrument was a hypodermic syringe with a long needle! Mr. Pontifex had seen enough.

He regained the door and passed out—he knew now the reason why Denis Amberley's powers had so strangely failed him during the last three months, and knew, too, why the Frenchwoman had smiled so terribly as she stole to her victim's side to feel his enfeebled pulse. But how to act on that knowledge—this was the problem.

As the solicitor pondered, the dinner-gong sounded and he moved towards the dining-room.

The party at the oval table resolved itself into one of five—Gladys Ansell, whom the near neighbourhood of the rectory had enabled to change her costume and return for dinner in a simple white frock, Julie Lepage, blazing like a poppy in the gown that only a Frenchwoman and a brunette dare wear, the Colonel, Mr. Pontifex, and a gentle old lady in a rustling black silk. She was Julie's chaperone and more than half afraid of her. The solicitor had taken the seat on the Frenchwoman's right, glancing significantly at the colonel as he did so. Julie Lepage studied her neighbour with covert hostility—it was plain that she was on her guard against this supposed surgeon who was a friend of Colonel Amberley.

Mr. Pontifex exerted himself to draw her into conversation—he was a skilful entertainer and, though his own brain was busy with the task before it, he soon succeeded in casting the spell of his animation upon his fellow-diners. Even Denis Amberley grew less wan and frail, and the sweet, sad countenance of Gladys Ansell brightened to see her betrothed so unwontedly cheerful. Occasionally she looked across at Mr. Pontifex, perplexed yet encouraged by his high spirits.

A daring idea had taken possession of the solicitor's mind. He pretended that the wine-glasses at the Frenchwoman's elbow were too near his own, and moved them, with a slight apology. He had seen that she liked champagne and had emptied her glass once already; it had just been refilled. He sighed inaudibly as he watched her drink from it again and again. The sigh was one of relief—he had laid the first stone of his plot.

When the dessert was reached he had decided upon the exact manner in which he would lay the second one. His own glass had been replenished—he raised it and bowed to the delicate figure at the head of the table.

"Your health, Colonel Amberley," he said clearly, and as the Colonel's eyes met his, the solicitor shot a warning glance that puzzled the gallant officer not a little. He murmured a sentence of thanks. Mr.

"Save me! Save me!" she implored. "Don't let me die! I'm afraid to die!"

Digitized by Google

Pontifex put his glass to his lips, held it there an instant, and set it down with the liquor untouched.

"A thousand pardons," he cried. "I forgot that the wine was champagne; I never drink healths in champagne. Once I could have done so, now the wine seems to me unlucky."

"Oh, why?" asked Gladys Ansell, putting down her own glass heavily. Mr. Pontifex shrugged his shoulders; the second stone of his plot was in position—what would happen when he began upon the superstructure?

"It is associated in my mind," he answered, meeting kindly the blue orbs of the Colonel's betrothed, "with a curious tragedy in which I took part." He turned to the Frenchwomen at his side. "Singularly enough," he added, "the heroine, or, rather, the female villain of the piece, was a compatriot of yours, Miss Lepage. She was a relation of a client of mine—she—she tried to—to poison a man; a man she had once loved."

Julie Lepage started, despite herself. She veiled the motion by lifting one of her white shoulders cynically and putting her champagne-glass to her mouth.

"She tried to poison him," went on Mr. Pontifex, deliberately, "in a most ingenious and original way." He paused to give the next few words their full effect. "That way was to poison a brand of cigars of which he was particularly fond, and of which he kept a stock, as he smoked them regularly."

Denis Amberley's face had become very white; his fingers were clutching at the edge of the chair on which he sat.

But Julie Lepage was looking down, steadily, at a cluster of grapes upon her plate. She might have been transformed to stone, so still was she sitting.

"The secret was discovered—fortunately for my client's life," went on Mr. Pontifex quietly, his grey eye marking her every feature; "and, in order to do justice upon the wretched creature without bringing scandal on an old and honourable family, I had a proportion of the poison extracted from a number of the cigars.

"One evening—at her cousin's house, the man she had tried to kill was her cousin, I don't think I said that——"

He hesitated, as if to increase the tension at the table—Gladys Ansell's lips were set and her face as white as that of her betrothed.

Only the pleasant chaperone, in her black silk dress, was listening to the story as to some interesting anecdote.

"This proportion of concentrated poison was introduced dexterously, by myself," added the solicitor, still with his grey eyes on Julia Lepage, "into the Frenchwoman's wine-glass—a champagne glass, as it happened. The poison in its concentrated state was deadly; the would-be murderer had but a few hours to live."

A piercing shriek broke into the narrative, which Mr. Pontifex had so cunningly woven. Julie Lepage had sprung bolt upright and was clutching at her throat.

The next moment she was crouching at the solicitor's feet.

"Save me! save me!" she implored; "don't let me die, I'm afraid to die, I deserve it. I know, I did try to kill Denis because he had ceased to love me and because I was going to lose The Towers and all the money. But I will atone, I will atone, if you will only save me. I can tell you what will counteract the poison—save me, save me, for pity's sake."

Mr. Pontifex stepped back—the diners had risen and were staring at the tall figure and the writhing form of the woman his genius had so effectually unmasked. Fearful for the physical consequences of the Frenchwoman's terror—she was bent double and shuddering violently—he said sternly:

"Listen, you are not poisoned, only tricked. Your wine-glass was as innocent as mine. I only discovered your crime to-night—I have had no time to extract the poison or to ascertain its nature. Rise, and calm yourself."

Julie Lepage leapt to her feet—a paroxysm of fury distorting her countenance. An instant she stood thus clenching her hands and gasping for breath. Then turning on her heel, she burst from the room.

* * * * *

That was the last of Julie Lepage, so far as the dwellers at The Towers were concerned. The same night, by stealth, she left the house and vanished into the unknown. Nor did all Denis Amberley's well-meant inquiries ever bring him the slightest news of her. Though she had done her best to kill him he would have seen that she did not want. But whether she lived or died they never heard.

How she had learnt the hideous lessons which she carried into practice upon Colonel Amberley cannot now be known. Mr. Pontifex, however, found that Victor Lepage, her father, had been familiar to the French police as a brilliant, but unscrupulous authority upon poisons, so that doubtless her skill was but the reflection of an even greater one.

Denis Amberley, freed from her devastating shadow, swiftly regained his health and vigour, and Mr. Pontifex was an honoured guest at his wedding. As he sat by the bride at the merry meal which followed, he ventured to ask her what reason she had had for urging upon him in their stolen first interview that Colonel Amberley should go abroad.

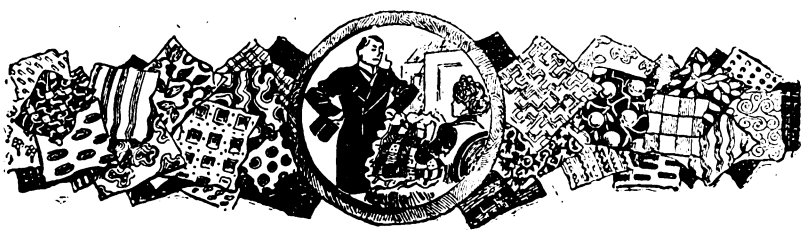
Gladys Amberley shook her head and peeped at him out of her pretty blue eyes. "I had no reason but instinct," she said.

"But you told me you knew," objected the solicitor deferentially.

"A woman always knows—when she is sure!" was the retort; "and I was sure that Julie—but don't let us speak of it. It was too terrible."

"Humph!" said Hugo Pontifex. "Well, he's going abroad now—specially conducted." And Gladys Amberley blushed.

R. NORMAN SILVER.



Digitized by Google

JULIA.

His name was really Samuel Thomas Brooks; but among his fellow employés at Messrs. Podmore and Smythe's, he was known as "Julia."

It was Jack Norris, one of the cashiers, who thus nicknamed him.

"He is so precious green! so jolly meek and mild!" observed Norris, a day or two after the arrival of the new assistant. "Whenever I look at him, I always think of an aunt of mine who lives down in Devonshire. She's a spinster, and wears spectacles. This chap Brooks certainly ought to meet her; he's turned three and twenty (told me so himself, the innocent!) and Aunt Julia's only a trifle over thirty—an ideal match!"

After that, Brooks was invariably addressed and spoken of as "Julia."

He winced slightly, when, at breakfast, Norris first hailed him by the cognomen; but by the end of the day he was used to the name, and didn't seem to mind it in the least.

Ere he had been a week at Podmore and Smythe's, he was "Julia" to everybody—from the head shopwalker down to the youngest apprentice.

There certainly wasn't much of the man about Samuel Thomas Brooks. Meekness, and a mild, even temper are excellent attributes in their way, but Brooks was meek and mild to that degree which, in this hard, unfeeling world of ours, generally earns for a man the epithets "soft" and "sawney."

Brooks had come straight from a small provincial drapery shop to the mammoth West-end emporium of Podmore and Smythe. His accent was broad, and his "greenness" in most matters something to marvel at. But he was an excellent counter-hand, thoroughly well up in his business, willing, hardworking, punctual, and never grumbled when it was necessary to put in an hour or two's labour after closing time.

Naturally, therefore, Brooks suited his employers, and naturally also, his fellow-assistants imposed upon his good nature. Unpleasant tasks among the dustiest of the top shelves, seemed always to fall to "Julia's" share; and when he had no customer to serve, he was generally to be found lending some colleague a hand. "Will you do me a favour, Julia?" was a constant query, and Brooks was never known to refuse; which was, of course, weak on his part. He got small thanks for his many kindnesses; indeed, favours from "Julia" soon came to be accepted as quite in the natural order of things, and, consequently, were not regarded as favours at all.

But if, in the shop, Brooks led the life of a slave, his existence after business hours was still worse.

The domestic arrangements of a big retail establishment, where the employés live "inside," resemble in some respects those of a boarding-school. The assistants eat their meals at long tables, presided over by the heads of departments; whilst, except that their bedrooms contain about half-a-dozen beds instead of a score or so, the school dormitory system may be said to be in vogue. Another point of resemblance is, that there are generally a few bullies, who operate with impunity on their victims. The tortures meted out by the said bullies are more of a verbal than a physical nature, albeit brute force is not entirely unknown, as new apprentices know to their cost.

As might be expected, Brooks had much to endure in an establishment like Podmore and Smythe's. He was the butt of the dinner-table; the bullies openly insulted him; the practical-jokers were continually devising fresh traps for his benefit; and the would-be wits made quite a reputation for themselves at "Julia's" expense.

Brooks never attempted to retaliate, either by word or deed. Occasionally a remark would hurt, and he would flush to the roots of his straw-coloured hair; but, as a rule, he grinned sheepishly, and affected not to mind. Altogether, what with his pallid, innocent face, his mild blue eyes, and his gentle, timid ways, Brooks was a perfect specimen of the genus "milk-sop."

One of the worst of his tormentors was Jack Norris, the cashier, who, as already related, had first dubbed the new assistant "Julia."

Now, Norris wasn't by nature a bully; as a matter of fact, he was at bottom rather a decent fellow. But being

The bullies openly insulted him.

Digitized by Google

one of the muscular, good-looking, dashing sort himself, he couldn't, as he was often wont to declare:

"Stand namby-pamby chaps at any price."

To deal kindly with milk-sops was, in Norris' opinion, a big mistake.

"It only makes 'em softer," he would say. "Treat 'em roughly—have no mercy, that's the only way to make men of 'em. You know what I mean, slang 'em right and left! When the meek innocents get to know that they've left their mothers' apron-strings, they now and again pluck up a bit, and learn to take their own part in the world. Now, this chap Julia hasn't the spirit of a mouse. He doesn't smoke nor drink, never goes to a music-hall, and allows every youngester in the place to insult him. He's twenty-three, and is as timorous as a girl of half his age. Bah! it's downright disgusting."

Norris lost no opportunity of practising the treatment he recommended for the cure of milk-soppiness. He was forever badgering Brooks, and, as they both slept in the same room, the victim's sufferings commenced first thing in the morning, and only ended when Norris dropped off to sleep at night.

In addition to verbal persecution, Brooks had to endure "apple-pie" beds, hair-brushes between the sheets, and various other tricks of the school-dormitory order.

Nothing served, however, to rouse him into a display of spirit. He suffered every indignity to be heaped upon him with a patient meekness which exasperated Jack Norris to such a degree, that he became more brutal in his methods. Frequently he aroused "Julia" by douching him with ice-cold water; while, on more than one occasion, he hurled a boot at his victim with highly-painful results.

But it was no good. Brooks simply could not be induced to retaliate, nor even to show a momentary flash of temper. And never once did he lodge a complaint against Norris or any of the others by whom he was so systematically persecuted.

* * * * *

Brooks had lived this dog's life for about three months, when a change began to be noticed in Jack Norris. Usually of a vivacious, not to say noisy, disposition, the cashier suddenly grew moody and taciturn. He stayed out at night later than ever, and frequently returned somewhat unsteady on his legs; but instead of relating his evenings' adventures and boasting of his conquests, as was formerly his wont, he now rarely opened his lips. He even neglected "Julia," a lack of attention for which that individual was duly grateful.

The general opinion was, that the course of Norris' love affairs was not running too smoothly; and as he grew more and more reserved, Podmore and Smythe's young men whispered to each other that the cashier must have been very badly hit indeed.

Meanwhile, life became a trifle more endurable to Brooks. He was, it is true, still badgered at the dinner-table and imposed upon in the shop; but in the bedroom, at any rate, he enjoyed peace. For Norris had always ruled the dormitory, and now that he was in a perpetual state of gloom, the other assistants who slept there, generally went to bed in silence.

One night Brooks retired to rest at the early hour of nine. No one else was in the dormitory, and from past experience Brooks knew that the five neighbouring beds were not likely to be occupied until midnight or thereabouts.

For it was Wednesday, a day on which Messrs. Podmore and Smythe's huge establishment was practically deserted between the hours of 3 and 12 p.m.

As, however, Brooks had no friends to visit, and did not patronise places of amusement, early-closing day

"Hand over that revolver!"

simply meant for him an afternoon stroll, an evening devoted to writing home, and an early retirement to rest.

On this night, he was lying in bed, thinking of nothing in particular, and waiting for Morpheus to overtake him, when the door suddenly opened, and someone entered.

There was only a feeble glimmer of gas burning in the room, and for a moment Brooks failed to recognise the intruder. But when the latter halted and sat down on the second bed from the door, Brooks saw that it was Jack Norris.

The cashier presently stooped, and pulled from beneath the bed a small portmanteau. This he hastily unlocked and opened, and took out something which he placed in his pocket; then he re-locked the bag, shoved it under the bedstead again, and, apparently oblivious of Brooks's presence, went out, leaving the door wide open.

Brooks watched him traverse the passage, and commence the ascent of a flight of stairs which led to the attic regions.

Then, like a flash, he sprang out of bed, drew on a few articles of clothing, and followed. He had caught a glimpse of the glittering "something" which had gone into Norris' pocket.

Digitized by Google

Reaching the landing above, he halted a moment; then, hearing a footstep, he stealthily crept on until he came to an attic that was used as a place of storage for all sorts of lumber. The door was open and the room was flooded with the moonlight which poured through the window.

And, facing the window, stood Norris, his right arm raised, and the shining muzzle of a revolver pressed against his temple. His finger was already on the trigger, when Brooks the timid made a spring, clutched at Norris' wrist, and dexterously snatched the weapon from his grasp.

"Here, I say; this won't do, you know," he coolly remarked. "Suicide's cowardly."

"Julia!" gasped the cashier in astonishment; then added hoarsely: "Give me that pistol, Julia, and clear out. It's all up with me—I've nothing to live for."

"I shan't," retorted Brooks, very firmly. "Don't be a coward, Norris. What's the matter?"

"Hand over that revolver, d'you hear?"

Norris was now trembling violently and clutching at the window-sash for support.

"I won't!"

"You must!"

"I won't!" repeated Brooks. "Come! tell me what's the matter. Perhaps I can help you, Norris."

"You're a likely one to help me, even if you could, after the way I've treated you."

"Never mind about that. Tell me what's wrong."

And straightway Norris blurted out his miserable story.

His cash—or rather Podmore and Smythe's cash—was £18 short, and on the following day his accounts were going to be audited. For some time past he had been "borrowing" occasional sovereigns from the cash-box, manipulating the entries in his books in such a way that, in the ordinary course of events, the shortage in his balance might have gone undetected for years. But about twelve months ago, one of Podmore and Smythe's cashiers had been "found out," and since then audits had been of more frequent occurrence than formerly.

During the last few weeks, Norris had lived in constant dread of discovery, and now he had received a hint that a "surprise audit" would take place on the following day. Unless he could make good the deficit, prosecution for embezzlement was inevitable; but although he spent the afternoon in trying to borrow the amount from various acquaintances (a publican or two among them) he had failed to secure the requisite loan.

"Every man-jack refused," moaned the wretched Norris, "although most of them could have have easily spared the money. Nice friends!" he added bitterly.

"The audit will take place to-morrow, you say?" asked Brooks.

"Yes, old Crosby, the ledger-clerk, told me. So give me that revolver, Brooks, and go. I'm sure to be found out, and Podmore is certain to prosecute; he had no mercy on young Fuller, and he'll have none on me. It's ruin—disgrace! I can't face it, and—and it would kill my mother!"

Brooks was silent a moment; then he observed:

"If I let you have the money between ten and half-past to-morrow morning, will it be in time?"

"Yes; but surely, Ju—Brooks, you don't really mean that you—"

"Let's go to bed," interrupted the other, "I'll get the money for you without fail."

And Brooks kept his promise. Obtaining an hour's leave of absence next morning, he rushed to the nearest post-office, and drew out by telegraph the sum of £18 from his savings bank account. He handed the money to Norris without a word, and, a few minutes afterwards the auditors appeared on the scene.

* * * * *

There are no two closer friends in Podmore and Smythe's emporium, than Brooks and Norris. The latter repaid the loan long ago, now lives strictly within his income, and is steadily saving money. Brooks is no more known as "Julia"—Norris quickly put a stop to that, and when the pair suddenly became so chummy, the assistants deemed it prudent to let Brooks alone. Some day the two mean to run a business of their own in partnership.

F. C. D.

NOW READY.
Sixpenny Edition of the
ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN KETTLE.
By C. J. CUTCLIFFE HYNE.
Price 6d. Post free, 8d.
On Sale at all Booksellers, and Bookstalls, in the United Kingdom, or of
C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED,
Henrietta Street, W.C.

Everyone who Has Seen It

Says that the bust of Queen Victoria which we are offering to our readers is the most beautiful and lifelike thing of the kind possible.

HIS MAJESTY THE KING

has expressed the opinion that "it is the best likeness he remembers ever having seen."

The many letters which we have received from readers who have bought the bust all testify to the striking likeness which it bears to her late Majesty.

The Bust is an original and copyright work of art; it has never been exhibited; it is the last Bust made of her Majesty; it was modelled from life by the celebrated sculptor, Miss Geflowski; and the original bronze was to have become the possession of her Majesty.

The Bust, in the finest hard, pure white plaster, and 7½in. in height, will be sent, carriage paid, to any address in the United Kingdom for 2s. 6d. Postal orders only will be accepted as payment.

Address: Room 38, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE LION'S WARS

The War in Scinde.

1842-1843.

WHATEVER our merits and demerits as a nation may be, it must be confessed that in the erection of that noble fabric known as the British Empire we have been greatly favoured by fortune. By the war of 1842-3 we added the important province of Scinde to our dominions in India.

Scinde is bounded on the south by the Arabian Sea, and would have constituted, had it passed into the hands of a foreign power, a serious danger to our position in India. We have much cause, therefore, to be grateful that its conquest had not to be undertaken by us to-day.

The great province of Scinde, which has for its neighbours Beluchistan and the Punjab, has had a chequered career. Centuries ago it formed part of the great Mohammedan Empire of the East. In 1756 it was conquered by the Afghans, but in 1829 the Beluchis, aided by some hill tribes who called themselves Ameers, recovered their freedom, and raised the leader of the Taipur tribe to the position of authority.

To secure his dynasty this chief divided his dominions amongst his brothers and kinsmen, and the rivalries and jealousies to which this arrangement gave rise led to the boundaries of the country being gradually extended till they touched the frontiers of British India. These encroachments would not have been resented had they not placed the entire navigation of the Indus in their hands.

So many historians have been wont to denounce our conquest of Scinde in language of which "No fouler blot stains the pages of our history than the conquest of Scinde," is a fair sample, that one naturally expects to find that the war we are about to deal with was deliberately entered on for the purpose of annexing the country. The facts, however, show that the exact contrary is the truth.

Even if Britain had provoked the war, she might easily have shielded herself behind the plea that the conquest of the country was necessary, on account of the turbulence of the inhabitants imperilling the peace of India; but the Juts and Beluchis brought the war on themselves by deliberately breaking the treaties into which they had entered, the violations being of so grave a character, that a great blow would have been struck at our prestige if we had allowed the infringement to go unheeded. Not that we declared war on them for their perfidy. As a matter of fact they anticipated us by commencing hostilities themselves.

It is only fair, however, to state that the Beluchis had what they considered a great grievance against us. To protect our merchants residing in the country we had insisted on the Beluchis receiving a British Resident at the capital.

Now, whilst it is true that the people greatly resented the presence of this official, regarding him not as an envoy, but as a spy, they had had ample proof that he was nothing of the kind.

Our intercourse with Scinde was no new thing. In 1799 the people agreed to receive our representative, and till 1830, although his presence provoked some friction, no actual outbreak occurred. In 1830 the Residency was besieged, and after a desperate fight our envoy was forced to quit the country.

Digitized by Google

Although the Beluchis by this time knew perfectly well what the presence of a diplomatic representative implied, they agreed in a treaty entered into two years later to again receive a Resident at Hyderabad. By this treaty they also bound themselves to assist the peaceful trading of our merchants, and full power to trade and navigate the Indus.

The Beluchis, it would seem, conceded these privileges not out of any love for the British, but because they feared the consequences of a refusal.

When disaster overtook us in Afghanistan, the Beluchis, never dreaming that we should recover from such an overwhelming calamity as the destruction of an entire army, thought they could now defy us with impunity. They ill-treated our merchants, seized their goods, and stopped the navigation of the Indus.

The breaches culminated at last in 1842 in an unprovoked attack on the Resident's house. For over four hours a handful of British soldiers kept at bay a howling mob, who, maddened by their hatred of the British, dashed again and again up the inclosures leading to the house, only to be hurled back with tremendous loss by the steady fire of our men.

Matters now assumed so threatening an aspect that the settlement of the affair was placed in the hands of Sir Charles J. Napier, an officer of invincible determination, and of the very highest military capacity. The first thing Sir Charles did was to insist that, as the existing treaty had been broken, Mir Ruskuin, the aged Prince of Upper Scinde, must as a punishment sign a more drastic treaty, the penalty of refusing being deposition and banishment.

The enemies of Britain declare that Napier induced Ali Mourad, the Prince of Lower Scinde, to persuade Mir Ruskuin to refuse to sign the treaty on the understanding that if he supported British interests Ruskuin should be deposed and Ali Mourad recognised as the head of the Ameers of Scinde. But unless it can be shown beyond the possibility of a doubt that Charles Napier was privy to the plot which led to Ruskuin seeking refuge in flight, the charge falls to the ground.

Napier in due course did depose Ruskuin and recognise as his successor Ali Mourad, but that does not prove he had been playing a double game. If Ali Mourad was his confederate it is strange that the moment Ruskuin disappeared, Napier, in anticipation of a rising, should have decided on attempting the capture of the desert fort of Emamghur, which the Beluchis declared was as "Impregnable as Heaven." Napier's enemies point to his seizure of this place as further evidence of his guilt. We consider it a proof of his innocence.

If Ali Mourad was his confederate, why should he plunge into the heart of a wilderness so drear that he had to take his own water with him lest the wells were poisoned. Napier knew that the garrison at Emamghur was four times as numerous as any force he could bring, and unless he regarded Ali Mourad as a traitor, this desert expedition was an act of stupendous folly.

The greatest hardships were experienced by the little force as they journeyed through the lonely wilderness. Their water skins soon gave out, and they had to dig wells, and nearly all their food was stolen. But as Napier wrote, "there never was such a fellow as the British soldier, he laughed and joked all the way."

At last the eight days' march came to an end. The soldiers braced themselves up for what they thought would prove a stiff piece of work, and were greatly disappointed when they found there was no enemy to fight. The garrison had evacuated the place two days before.

The fortress which consisted of a strong inner fort surrounded by walls forty feet high and flanked by towers, Napier blew up. The troops, having come thus far, would have liked to have continued the march on the chance of coming up with the garrison, but Napier, thinking that the news of what he had done would strike terror into the Beluchis, at once set out for the Indus.

During Sir Charles' absence, events had reached a crisis in Hyderabad. The Beluchi chiefs, who hated Ali Mourad, offered to sign the obnoxious treaty if a clause were inserted, admitting that Ali Mourad had betrayed Mir Ruskuin. The promptness with which the Resident declined this proposal so angered the chiefs, that he had to literally fight his way back to the Residency, which was situated about three miles from the city.

Being informed that the Beluchis had sworn on the Koran to fight the British, he barricaded his house. It was well he did so. At dawn next day all the roads leading to the Residency were crowded by a yelling mob of fanatics, who soon let it be known that if the inmates fell into their hands no mercy would be shown.

Fortunately the Resident had taken the precaution before Sir Charles Napier's departure to borrow a few soldiers of the 22nd. For over four hours this handful of British redcoats kept at bay a mob composed of perhaps the greatest desperadoes in all Asia. After spending the entire day in vain attempts to blow up the place, the Beluchis at length lost heart and retired.

As such an outrage, if overlooked, would have greatly lowered our prestige, war was at once declared.

Knowing the value of time, Sir Charles Napier made up his mind to strike promptly and strike hard. By a forced march he arrived at Muttaree on February 16th, 1843, and, ascertaining that the Ameers and their forces were posted at Meanee, ten miles off, he rested a few hours and marched through during the night hoping to take them by surprise in the morning. It was a hazardous enterprise even if he succeeded, for his little force only numbered 2,800 men with twelve guns, whilst of the Ameer army of 40,000, over 20,000 were cavalry. But Sir Charles Napier was a general with brains, and brains count in war.

He had the most profound belief in himself, and the greatest confidence in the British soldier, and therefore regarded defeat as out of the question. He laughed when an officer told him during the night that the Beluchi horde was nearly 30,000 strong.

"Well," he said, "have we not got 802 cavalry, all good men who understand their business? They are in good spirits, so am I. They will fight on a smooth plain. They love a smooth plain, as the Beluchis will soon discover. Only 40,000 Beluchis? Why the triumph is certain. Three hours' sleep and then prepare for victory."

What a dauntless soldier this great general was. He sauntered out of his tent next morning, and although a long survey convinced him that the Beluchis held a position of extraordinary strength, he chatted and laughed with his staff during the hasty morning meal, as if the victory were already won.

Surely the enemy could not have been more securely

Digitized by Google

Drawn by] [C. Lawson Wood.

British and Beluchis, horse and foot, rushed in one confused mass down the steep sides of the river bed.

Digitized by Google

posted. For 1,200 yards, the Beluchi front lined the deep nullah or dry bed of the Fullailee, and to storm the position it would be necessary to cross the dry bed and then climb a steep bank in face of a heavy fire. The flanks were not so strong. Screened by heavy jungle they afforded good cover for an attacking force. The Beluchis, conscious of their weakness, posted the bulk of their force at either end, leaving but few men to guard the centre.

As each wing was six miles from the centre, Sir Charles calculated that a couple of feigned attacks at both ends might keep the enemy sufficiently busy to enable him to break through the centre. To accomplish this, he planted his waggons at a spot about a mile to the right of the centre, just opposite the village of Kaltree, and placing behind them all his native troops, instructed them to occasionally show themselves, in order to lead the Beluchis to imagine that an attack might be expected at that point.

Taking advantage of a dip near the river bed, Sir Charles then stole with his British soldiers to where the Beluchis had built a long high wall, evidently in the belief that a wall had only to be high enough to constitute secure protection.

Sir Charles Napier determined to make his attack here, because he judged from the fact of the wall not being loopholed that no resistance would be offered. The moment the order was given our men bounded into the river bed, up the bank, across the intervening space, and scaled the wall like cats, thus cutting the enemy's position in two.

We have dwelt on these details as they show what an enormous saving of life can be effected in war if the conduct of operations is intrusted only to generals of proved capacity. Nineteen out of twenty British generals would have assailed the wings and lost hundreds of lives. Napier being a general of the brainy type effected a lodgment without losing a man.

The Beluchis, of course, bore down on us when they learnt the truth. Indeed they pressed on us in such numbers, that the 22nd, weary of killing and driven back at last by the crushing pressure, began to give way, but when Napier rode up the lost ground was recovered.

Having got into their position, it was Napier's plan to drive the enemy from the river bank on to the plain, so that his cavalry might take them in hand. The British force was now reduced to 2,500 men, and to drive the enemy from a position twelve miles long it was necessary that the men should be formed into line. The Beluchis were good fighters, but such was the prestige of the British that long and attentuated as the line was we steadily drove before us on that eventful day the whole of the vast Beluchi army till they debouched on to the plains.

Then Napier let loose his 800 horse. For two hours our troopers rode up and down and in and out of the vast Beluchi horde till the plains were drenched in blood.

Napier's object was to so disorganise the force as to compel it to surrender. He did not succeed in this. Our cavalry, after plying their swords for a couple of hours, struck at last such deadly terror into the hearts of the dark-skinned warriors that greatly to Napier's annoyance they took to flight. We lost about 250 men, the Beluchis over 8,000.

Failing to capture their army, Napier was resolved that no time should be given for them to recover. So he sent word to the Ameers that unless they surrendered unconditionally he would storm Hyderabad and hand over the city to his soldiers to sack.

The chiefs knew that our Army was ridiculously small, but was not their general, as one of the Ameers pointed out, equal to 100,000 more. So they humbly promised to submit. The Ameers sent him the keys of their fortress and waited on him in person in order to lay at his feet their jewelled swords. With that high born courtesy which has always distinguished the Napiers the swords were returned.

A little later the British Army marched through the streets of Hyderabad. The Union Jack was hoisted, the Army sang "God Save the Queen," and then if report is to be believed whiled away the evening by a little looting. They would not have been able to indulge that weakness had not Napier's attention been directed elsewhere.

One of the Ameers, Sheer Mohammed, the Lion of Meerpur had not submitted.

Knowing that the triumph of the British could not be considered complete so long as any of the Ameers remained in the field, and especially one with an army of 20,000, Sir Charles at once—to the disgust of his men who were getting intensely interested in the valuables of the city—determined to march against the unconquered chieftain. So, after sending for reinforcements which came in such numbers that he was able to leave a garrison of 1,000 men in Hyderabad, he left the city in March 1843 at the head of 5,000 men.

At Dubba, six miles from the capital, he came in touch with Mohammed and 35,000 dusky warriors. The Beluchis with an instinct as keen as the Boer for a strong defensive position had again availed themselves of the dry water courses with which Scinde abounds. Their wings as before were protected by thick jungles, and on the edge of the bank skirting the river bed, which was 8ft. deep, a strong rampart had been erected.

Napier, after reconnoitring the position, held converse with a native, and learnt to his annoyance that were the Beluchis driven from their fort position they could retreat behind another river bed 42ft. wide and 17ft. deep in the rear. As the village of Dubba is in the centre and all the houses were loopholed it was rendered unsafe to assault, Napier determined before ordering an advance to lay it in ruins.

Anticipating that the force occupying the village would retreat on its becoming untenable to the right, General Napier sent his cavalry in that direction. Our troopers, with their sabres gleaming in the sunshine and uttering loud shouts, galloped to where the Beluchi soldiers were streaming away from the village, and burst on them with such force that in their wild flight they ran at headlong speed to the second nullah, in the belief that our men dare not gallop down into a river bed 17ft. deep and up again the other side.

But we did. British and Beluchis, horse and foot, rushed in one confused mass down the steep sides of the bed, but the ascent on the other side was so precipitous that the Beluchis had time to line the parapet at the top before our men appeared in sight. The fight here was so desperate that Napier himself joined in the fray. His escapes were wonderful; a bullet shattered the hilt of his sword without injuring the hand that gripped it, another passed through his headgear, and the explosion of a Beluchi magazine close to where he was fighting singed his clothes. Yet he escaped without a scratch.

But the issue had grown uncertain. A general advance had been delayed owing to the enemy reoccupying the dismantled village for the sake of the cover afforded by the débris. It took the detachment sent to rout them out so long to accomplish their task that Napier began to think that they had failed.

Digitized by Google

The British soldier is an extraordinary person. He either rushes at the foe at headlong speed, hurrahing loudly, or marches on to the battle field with the calmness and steadiness associated with sham fights, drills, and parades. On this occasion our men marched, after clearing the village, back to the scene of battle in complete silence. They descended the bank, crossed the bed of the river, and mounted the other side before their comrades were aware of their presence. It was the sudden and precipitate retreat of the Beluchis which caused the delighted general to turn round and ask:

"Have you all been struck dumb?"

The fugitives endeavoured to make for the Indus but our troopers shepherded them with the nicest skill in the direction of the wilderness.

The completeness of the victory was not to be estimated by the number of the slain, although the casualty lists where heavy. The Beluchi killed amounted to 5,000. The demoralisation which set in after the battle was due to our having captured twenty-seven standards and all their guns. Our own casualties were trifling, being under 300 officers and men.

Unfortunately the Lion of Beluchistan escaped and managed to reach Meerpur.

He was hard at work reorganizing his force when Napier, hearing of his whereabouts, marched straight from the battlefield, to which he had returned after the rout, to Meerpur, forty miles away and burst on the Lion with such suddenness that Sheer Mohammed and his followers had only just time to leave the city by the west gate as our troops entered by the east.

The courage of the Lion being now somewhat shaken he fled precipitately with his followers to Omercote, his fortress in the desert.

But Napier was quickly on his track, the pursuit becoming so hot as soon as our men had struck the trail, that Sheer again took to flight leaving the fortress in our hands.

This happened exactly four days after the battle of Dubba during which time our men (although the heat wave had risen) covered over a hundred miles of ground. One incident of this march has a splendid significance for us to-day.

It shows that although we are a conquering race, so beneficent is our sway that the people we rule over do not regard us as most natives do their conquerors.

The heat of the wilderness in which the Lion had reared his fort was so intense, and water so scarce, that the native soldiers voluntarily offered to carry the muskets and kits of their white companions.

When the little army came, on the third day's march, on a water carrier, not a native soldier would touch a drop till the thirst of the British had been assuaged.

After the capture of Omercote, the army was formed into flying columns, the scattered bands of the Beluchis being hunted down with such vigour that all resistance gradually died away.

A few months later Scinde was formally annexed, thus adding another stone to that stately edifice, Our Indian Empire.

[NEXT WEEK: "The Great Sikh Wars."]

SHORT STORIES THAT MAKE YOU LAUGH.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "Guilty Gold," by Headon Hill, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, March 11th. Post-cards only, please.

The Prize of One Guinea for the best Storyette has been won this week by Mrs. EATON, of 42 Hartington Road, West Derby, Liverpool, for the Storyette entitled "Ingenuous."

Ingenuous.

HE was a charming little fellow of four, pretty in his ways, good to look at, but as naughty as could be. He sat on the bottom step kicking his fat little legs, and refusing utterly to obey his father, who had told him to go upstairs several times in increasing degrees of severity.

After a few minutes of this clashing of wills, his exasperated parent picked him up somewhat suddenly, carried him, sat him down very firmly on a chair in his room, and then went out and shut the door.

Silence reigned. Not a sound from him for at least half-an-hour.

Then the door was opened, and a sweet little voice called out:

"Father, have you got over your tantrum yet, for I should like to come down?"

MRS. E.

A Notice.

THE churchwarden's quarterly meeting will be held every six weeks instead of half-yearly, as usual.

Next Tuesday being Ash Wednesday, an open air meeting of the congregation will be held in the vestry to determine what colour the church shall be white-washed.

C. R. S.

Tackling a Difficulty.

DURING the railway strike a new hand was driving a passenger train which should have stopped at Berwick. But, being unable to use the air-brake, he passed the platform. Having reversed the engine, he started back and passed it again. Reversing once more, he made a similar mistake.

"Let her stand, Jock," shouted the station-master. "Let her stand, we'll shift the station."

F. L.

Digitized by Google

Not a Bull.

A member of a certain company of the Imperial Yeomanry, who had been born within the sound of Bow Bells, and was accustomed to hold forth to his comrades in the choicest Cockney dialect, was one day engaged in scouting with another member of the force. He was expressing great contempt for Boer marksmanship, and had just given the opinion that "they couldn't make a bull's-eye at fifty yards," when a Boer bullet, fired at over 1,000 yards, suddenly grazed the side of his head and stretched him senseless on the ground.

His only remark to his friend on regaining consciousness was: "Ahter!" which, being interpreted, was understood to signify "Outer," and thus to convey a further reflection on the skill of the Boer!

J. G. B.

All that Glitters is not Gold.

Some soldiers just returned from South Africa were discussing the character and deeds of ex-President Kruger, when one of them, a somewhat pompous and self-important sergeant, said:

"I don't suppose there's a man in the world who is as fond of money as old Kruger; he doesn't care what it is or how he gets it, so long as it's money, money, money."

"I'll bet you a shilling," retorted an Irish private, "that ye're wrong. There are some kinds of money he doesn't like at all, at all."

"Done!" cried the other, "prove it."

"Well," replied the Hibernian, "He's just got a sovereign from England, and a check (cheque) from the Emperor of Germany, an' I'm blowed if he wished for either of 'em."

The sergeant had to pay up.

R. F.

He Helped Himself.

A gentleman was driving along a lonely country road the other day, when he heard loud cries for help proceeding from a neighbouring wood. He hitched his horse and ran to the assistance of the person who seemed to be in distress. Upon entering the wood he was surprised and shocked to find a man who was securely tied to a tree.

"What is the matter here?" he said in astonishment.

"Oh, sir," replied the poor fellow, "I'm so glad you have come. A few hours ago I was knocked down by some tramps who rifled my pockets, and after stealing everything I had except a pocket-book in my inside vest pocket, which they fortunately overlooked, bound me to this tree and decamped."

"The scoundrels!" ejaculated the new-comer. "And so the wretches robbed you, eh?"

"Yes, sir."

"Took everything you had except one pocket-book in your inside pocket, eh?"

"Yes, sir."

"The villains! And then they tied you tightly here—so tightly that you cannot escape?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then I think I'll take the pocket-book the other fellows left."

And he did.

D. R.

Paid Better.

Saturday morning and the barber very busy.

"I'd rather shave ten Germans than one Englishman."

The rubicund foreigner in the chair smiled broadly through the lather.

"Goot," he chuckled. "Dot vos right; but vy?"

The barber took a firmer hold upon his victim's nose as he replied:

"Ten Germans pays me one and threepence—one Englishman only 1½d."

And you could have heard the thermometer drop.

A. K.

Had Him There.

A commercial traveller walked into a Post Office the other day, and scribbling off a telegram of eighteen words, handed it, together with ninepence, to the clerk. The latter rapidly scanned the telegram, and took from his drawer two stamps, 6d. and 3d., respectively, which the traveller was to affix to the form.

The traveller, however, did not affix them, but stared at the clerk.

"You must affix the stamps on yourself, sir," exclaimed the clerk.

"Oh, no, I musn't," retorted the commercial, in feigned annoyance.

"You have to, sir, I can show it you in print."

"Nonsense; let me see, then."

"Here you are!" and the clerk read from a large book that the "sender of the telegram must himself affix the stamps to the form."

"Ah! there you are," vociferated the commercial. "The stamps must be stuck on the form, not on myself. See?"

As the roars of laughter issued from the other end of the room the abashed clerk muttered words of deadly import in a low tone to himself.

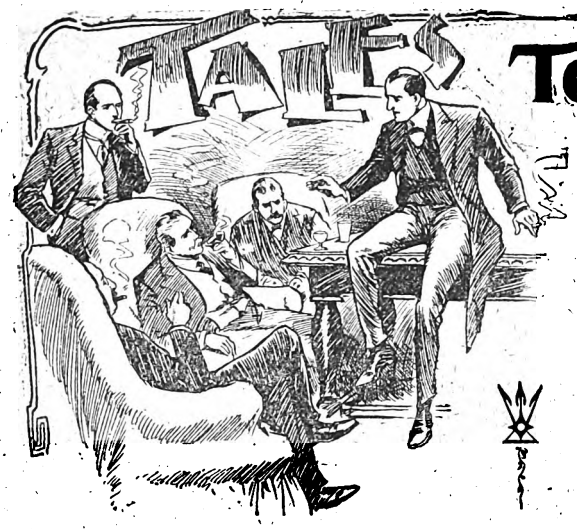
F. W.

AN ELEGANT AND CHOICE PRODUCTION.

THE LADY'S MAGAZINE.

March Number Ready. 6d.

Digitized by Google



TOLD "OFF DUTY."

[You probably don't know the "Stand-Easy" Club. It isn't in the directory, and you might live next door to the place for years without knowing of its existence by that name. It isn't a conventional club; there is no subscription, and there is no register of members. It is merely a room in a quiet, orderly, and select hostelry in Westminster, where, by common consent, a number of officials of all kinds meet when "off duty." There you may find detectives from Scotland Yard, near by; firemen, commissionaires, a soldier or two, and maybe a doctor from St. Thomas' Hospital or elsewhere. A motley crowd they would be if they wore their uniforms, but at the "Stand-Easy" uniforms are a rarity, "mufti" being the unwritten rule. The result is a gathering of quiet, well-behaved, and well-dressed men. Saturday night is the time when one sees the biggest muster, for then it is the custom for one member to regale the company with a story, the story being, as a rule, an account of some incident in the teller's own career.]

An Actor's Madness.

Told by the LIMELIGHT MAN.

WHEN, a few evenings ago, a yarn was vociferously demanded of Sam Phipps, that individual looked exceedingly astonished, and, had there been a clear course to the door, he would probably have made a bolt for it. But there wasn't a clear course, and from the way in which the other members had managed to hedge Mr. Phipps in, and from the suspiciously-unanimous manner in which they had called upon him for a story, it really seemed as though the whole thing had been arranged.

"It's a put-up job, I reckon," observed Phipps, with a good-humoured grin.

"Quite right, Sam—so it is," candidly retorted one of the members. "You see, it 'ain't often we have the pleasure o' your company early enough in the evenin' for a yarn. Midnight's your usual time for droppin' in—just when most of us are thinkin' about goin' home to bed. This is the first chance you've give us since the 'Pantheon' was shut up for alterations, pretty nigh a twelvemonth ago. If the new piece you're bringin' out catches on, you'll most likely dodge us for another twelvemonth—and that's why the wink went round directly you came in this evenin'. My motto is: 'never miss opportunities—' speshully rare 'uns!"

Sam Phipps was attached to the theatrical profession. His name did not figure in the "cast," and audiences never saw or heard him; but, nevertheless, he held a post of some responsibility at that popular home of melodrama—the Pantheon Theatre.

He was, in fact, "Mr. Limes," the gentleman who, perched aloft in the wings, supplies the "conflagration's ruddy glare," in fire-scenes, and follows the persecuted heroine, the gallant hero, or the dastardly villain about the stage with a most accommodating stream of rather unnatural moonlight. Pending the production of a new play, then in rehearsal, the "Pantheon" was closed; so Sam Phipps, having an evening to spare, had decided to spend it at the Club.

Seeing he was fairly trapped, and there was nothing for it but to "oblige," Sam cleared this throat and began:

"Ever since I was a lad, I've earned my living in theatres. My father was a stage carpenter, and my mother a 'dresser'; so I may say I was born in the profession. I started as call-boy at the old Universe Theatre, and when I grew too big for the job, helped in the property-room for a time.

"When I was promoted to the 'limes,' I felt mighty important, I can assure you; for at the 'Universe,' they went in for nothin' else but sensational dramas, and limelight of all colours was used most liberal. A man wants his wits about him to work the limes as they should be worked. He's got to follow things very carefully indeed, and very often he can fairly mess up a scene through picking up his cues a second too late or two soon.

"So I had some excuse for fancyin' myself a trifle when I became 'Mr. Limes' at the Universe Theatre. It was a responsible job, and a tryin' job; but I very soon cottoned to the business, and after my first night in the wings, when I made a blunder or two owin' to nervousness, I gave the boss every satisfaction.

"At that time the Universe company was one of the best in London. If the piece we put on was of the excitin' sort they wanted some actin', let me tell you. Some folks think fit to sneer at melodramas—well, all I says is, the plays at the old Universe was plays, with plenty o' body in 'em, not the milk-and-watery stuff that's reckoned so jolly clever nowadays.

"Every member of the Universe company was a real artiste. There was Mr. Herbert Verney, who always played the hero, a fine, manly young chap, as clever as he was good-lookin', and without a morsel o' conceit about him.

"Miss Lambert—Inez Lambert she was on the bills—was the leadin' lady. She had barely turned twenty, but, on her first appearance in public at a trial matinée, had made a big hit, and was at once snapped up by our manager to play principal parts. And splendid she played 'em too! the way she held the audience by her actin' was a caution. Off the stage she was a quiet sweet-tempered young lady, with a pleasant word for everybody—very different from some leadin' ladies I've known.

Digitized by Google

"The chap as played the villain styled himself Dudley Mostyn. Now in my experience I've generally found that actors who, on the stage, play wicked characters, are, in real life, the most affable gents you could wish to meet. But this Mostyn was a scowlin', surly sort both on and off the boards. He'd bully and storm at us stage-hands for the least little thing, and the look that used to come into his queer, dark eyes when he was in his tantrums often made me feel quite creepy and uncomfortable.

"You may guess Dudley Mostyn wasn't very popular with the other members o' the company. In fact, with one exception, it was a rare thing for him to speak a word to any of 'em when he was off the stage. That one exception was Miss Inez Lambert. Her, he was always a-pesterin' with his attentions. He would stand at the wings, waitin' for her to make her exit, and try to do the agreeable in his surly way. But it was easy to see that she not only disliked the chap, but was reg'lar frightened of him.

"However, nothin' particular happened until one night, when Mostyn stopped Miss Lambert just as she was leavin' the theatre, and, takin' her a bit rough by the arm, told her he meant to say all that was in his mind. With that, he starts to talk about lovin' her madly, and then bluntly asked her to be his wife. The stage-door keeper overheard it all, and told us afterwards.

"'Release my arm, sir!' was all the frightened young lady could reply.

"'Not till you promise!' says Mostyn. 'I can't live without you, Inez! If you refuse me, I swear no one else shall have you. Promise! promise!'

"'Are you mad, Mr. Mostyn?' answers Miss Lambert, strugglin' to free herself.

"Then she caught sight of the man's face, and somethin' in its expression must have terrified her, for she gave a cry for help.

"The stage-door keeper thought it about time to interfere; but, just then, out comes Herbert Verney, the 'juvenile lead.' Seein' how matters stood, he rushes up to Mostyn, and catching him by the collar, says:

"'You cowardly brute! What d'you mean by this?'

"Mostyn instantly lets go o' Miss Lambert, and hits out at Verney. But the young chap was too quick for him, and next moment Mostyn was sprawlin' on the ground, Verney havin' landed him one just between the eyes.

"By the time he got on his feet again, several members of the company had gathered round, I saw Mostyn myself; he face was white as a sheet, and his eyes flashed with fury. All he did, however, was to look hard at Verney, and say very quietly:

"'You shall pay for this, you cur!' after which he walked away just as he might have done in a blessed drama.

The next moment Mostyn was sprawling on the ground.

"Of course, the manager of the Universe heard about the affair, and at first he thought about sackin' Mostyn. But Mostyn was a grand actor, and it wasn't easy just then to find a man to fill his place. So he stayed on, and as he didn't attempt to molest Miss Lambert again the matter gradually blew over.

"Two or three months went by, and at last notices went up for Secret Foes, which piece had been runnin' for nearly a year. About the same time, the news went round that Herbert Verney and Inez Lambert had agreed to get spliced as soon as the play was withdrawn, and then go honeymoonin' until they was wanted for the new autumn production.

"The news didn't affect Dudley Mostyn much—at least, if it did, he didn't show it. He went through his part in Secret Foes in fine style—and what a part his was, to be sure! The character he took was that of a mysterious Frenchman, named Leon Girard, who was such a murderin' sort o' fiend that he was also known as 'The Destroyer.'

"All through the piece this precious villain was busy makin' trouble for Cecil Forster, the handsome young English hero, and of course, as generally happens in dramas, both of 'em loved the same beautiful gal. I don't need to mention that Mr. Verney played the hero, and Miss Lambert the beautiful gal.

"Now, in the last act of Secret Foes Leon Girard and Cecil Forster have a big scene to themselves, which ends in the villain dashin' what he thinks to be vitriol into the hero's eyes. But it isn't vitriol, for a foreign lady whom 'The Destroyer' has wronged, has managed to substitute a little bottle of harmless water for the one containing the vitriol.

Digitized by Google

"Well, the last night of 'Secret Foes' arrived, and there was a tolerable-full house to witness the performance. There wasn't none o' the slackness you sometimes see at such a time. Actors and actresses did their work as though it was the opening night of the piece. Dudley Mostyn, especially, was in tip-top form.

"But, as the play went on, it suddenly struck me that there was somethin' very strange about the chap. He acted first-rate, as I've said, but there seemed to be somethin' more than actin' in the expression of his eye and the curious twitchin' of his features.

"The curtain went up for the last act, and I was gettin' my limes ready for use, when I noticed Mostyn standin' just underneath me, a-waitin' to make his entrance. There wasn't anythin' unusual in that, o' course; but about his behaviour there was. Forgettin' that 'Mr. Limes' was only a few feet above him, Mostyn kept on sayin' softly to himself: 'She shall marry a blind man!—she shall marry a blind man!'

"Over and over again he repeated them words, and I could see that, under his 'make-up,' his face was workin' like a maniac's.

"Presently, he gets his cue and goes on for his big scene with the hero. It was a dark scene—that is to say, the footlights was lowered and I had to turn the white 'lime' on the pair as they faced each other in the middle o' the stage.

"As they stood there quarrellin', I happened to catch a glimpse o' Mostyn's eyes. The look there was in 'em almost made me drop my box. I ain't no hand at descriptions—all I can say is, that if ever there was murder in a man's eyes, there was in Mostyn's.

"A minute or two passed; then, as the end of the scene approached, 'The Destroyer' gave a screech of laughter, and whipped out of his pocket the little bottle which he supposes to hold vitriol.

"It may have been the laugh that did it. He had never laughed in that awful way before. But whatever it was, I no sooner heard the laugh and see him with the bottle in his hand, than I understood the true meanin' o' them words as wasn't in the play—'She shall marry a blind man!'

"He had his fingers round the cork, and, in another moment, he would have pitched the contents o' the bottle into Verney's eyes; but before he could do so, I suddenly turned the red limelight full on his face.

"The strong glare dazed him, and he took a step or two backwards to escape it. But I kept the light full on him, and whispered to one o' my mates below:

"'Ring down, Joe, and collar that chap Mostyn!'

"The curtain came down with a rattle, and a couple o' the scene-shifters got hold of Mostyn, who shouted and struggled like a madman. Then I was called upon to explain my queer conduct."

The strong glare dazed him, and he took a step backward to escape it.

Sam Phipps paused a moment, and resumed:

"It turned out to be exactly what I thought. The bottle was found to contain not water, but vitriol—enough of it to eat away a dozen pair of eyes!

"Mostyn was taken straight from the theatre to a lunatic asylum. He died a few months after—raving mad.

"This ticker o' mine," concluded "Mr. Limes," as he proudly displayed a massive gold repeater, "was a present from Mr. Herbert Verney. He's still a leading actor, as most of you know. Miss Inez Lambert retired from the profession shortly after she became Mrs. Verney."

Digitized by Google

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL WOMAN IN THE WORLD.

I.

"And they tell me, Jack, that you are married," I said, after the slight embarrassment of a meeting between old chums who had not seen each other in ten years was over and we were comfortably seated before a noble fire in his handsome library.

"Yes," he answered quietly.

I laughed long and heartily.

"The idea!" I exclaimed. "You, the cynical bachelor, the scorner of domestic bliss, the scoffer at women; you of all men—you married."

He did not reply, and I thought, correctly, that I had offended him, so presently I continued:

"Tell me how it came about?"

"A case of love at first sight," he answered.

"Nonsense," I answered. "Every man who falls in love calls it a matter of love at first sight. It is a pretty compliment that he likes to make his wife, and there is a little bit of vanity in the statement—shows what a susceptible heart he did have, after all. Nonsense! According to Gautier there is recorded in the books of the sages but one case of death from love—they have still to record an authentic case of love at first sight. Nonsense, again I say, because there is but one woman in the world with whom any man of your intelligence, experience, and ideas could fall in love at first sight, and that woman all men fell in love with. A fleeting glimpse of her, even though her face be hidden by a veil, and the man is mad for ever after. I have seen her once. I have spent eight years hunting for her all over the world. I am mad."

"Who is she?" he asked.

"I know her by no other name than The Most Beautiful Woman in the World. That is what we called her, we Bohemians, ten of us, who saw her at the opera in Paris one night eight years ago. Not a man in the house saw or heard the opera from looking at her; not a woman from jealousy of her. Verily, I believe the conductor would have requested her to withdraw had he not looked round and caught sight of her himself. Villars—you remember Villars, the cleverest artist among the youngsters when we were pretending to study art—Villars made sketches of her on his cuffs and went crazy trying, with their aid and his memory, to reproduce her face on canvas——"

"Absinthe," said Jack, laconically.

"Never more mistaken in your life," I answered; "absolute despairing love. De Lessac, the poet—he was one of us—has been trying to write a poem about her ever since. Has the inspiration, you know, but there are not words in the three languages he speaks which can interpret it. Not one of the ten of us who were together that night speak to each other from jealousy of the others. Your wife, no doubt, is most beautiful, and worthy of the love of a fellow as noble as you, but I hope for her sake, you will never see The Most Beautiful Woman in the World."

"You have not seen my wife yet," he answered, quietly.

"I have seen no woman since that day," I replied. "I have been conscious of their existence. I have conversed with them. I have danced with them. I have called on them and done my best all round to make myself as agreeable as possible to them under the circumstances, but I have never seen them. There is a vision of a queenly, golden-haired woman before my eyes. I can see her now as she sat in her box languidly waving an ostrich-feather fan, the only person in the house, saving her escort, who was paying any attention to the music."

"And her escort—who was he?"

"An ordinary-looking fellow whom none of us had ever seen before—a young man. At first we all of us feared that he was her husband, as he appeared to pay very little attention to her except to attend upon her, but of late I have come to the conclusion that he was merely a hired attendant."

"And they disappeared entirely?"

"As though from the face of the earth. They had never been seen before; they have never been seen since. I myself ransacked Paris for another sight of her. I hired detectives, I consulted with the police; it was all to no purpose. Finally I came to the conclusion that she must have been a mere visitor in Paris. I determined to seek her in the cities of Europe. I have searched them all. I can find no trace of her. I have travelled through the East. I even visited the capitals of Asia. Finally I have come to London, hopeless, but with the intention of making my search complete, at any rate."

"Perhaps she is dead."

"Don't suggest it—although I have thought of that myself. Either dead or in a convent."

"Poor fellow," he said, "I have been all through it myself; but the cases are somewhat different. I could not have escaped seeing my wife had I tried my best. In fact I didn't even have to propose to her."

"Lucky dog," I exclaimed. "I suppose the circumstances must have been more or less romantic?"

"Decidedly romantic," he answered.

"Tell me about them."

"I will," he said, "for several reasons. In the first place it will be a short history of my life since we parted and it will prepare you——"

"Prepare me for what?"

"Prepare you for a first meeting with my wife."

"Proceed," I said.

II.

"Well," he began, "you know I came to London for the purpose of settling up my father's estate. When that had been accomplished I found myself in the possession of a modest income. I had promised you, you may remember, that as soon as the estate was settled I would return to our delightful old student quarters in Paris. But his affairs were complicated. It had taken a long time. I had become rather used to London society, and, frankly I liked it. The fellows at my club were pleasant, and the town is certainly gay enough for any man. Of more weight than either of these considerations, however, was the fact that I was alone in the world, and had arrived at that time in a man's life when he begins to feel the domestic impulse. In other words I wanted a wife and a home. If I were to marry anyone I wanted to marry some sweet English girl, and London was the place for me to find her in.

Digitized by Google

A vision of a queenly, golden-haired woman sitting in a box.

"She was not so easily found, though. I had made up my mind that I would never marry except for actual affection. At the same time, I wanted to choose my wife from the best society, and I confess that I rather hoped she would prove to be a girl with a moderate fortune. Several years rolled away. I made the rounds of Society, but I could not find the girl. Perhaps it was because there were too many who were equally beautiful and equally rich. Perhaps it was because I could not get well enough acquainted with them. I wanted rather more knowledge of the woman I was to marry than it appears men ordinarily do. I wanted to know her character thoroughly. I wanted to make sure of happiness.

"But another thought struck me one day. Perhaps it was because I myself as a parti was not especially attractive. Personally I would do, perhaps. My family was an old one and a good one; I was well educated and all that; but I was not by any means well off. I had enough to support me—that was all. I brooded over the thought, and the more I brooded the more I became convinced that I was being slighted more or less by my Society acquaintances.

"I know now that I was entirely wrong, but I began to take offence at fancied slights, and in a little while began to retaliate. Then, of course, my friends became one by one a little cool, and the first thing I knew I had determined that Society was even more cold and heartless than it is ordinarily supposed to be, and I began to be angry with it.

"I thought I was unlucky. I ought to have been left a fortune sufficient to carry me in the society where I belonged. For the first time in my life I thought disagreeably of my father and his ability, and for the first time in my life I was unhappy.

"In this frame of mind I made another mistake. I concluded that if money were the object in life I might as well have none at all as a paltry sufficiency. I concluded to speculate—to gamble. If I won I would make Society come to me. If I lost—well, you would have seen me again in Paris making sketches, not for amusement, but for a living. I had no difficulty in carrying out my purpose. I soon spoke of my broker in the matter-of-fact way of a man used to speculation for years. I had all sorts of luck. Now I was on top of the wave bounding along to the shore for which I had started my little craft—now I was down in the depths with but little chance of keeping her afloat. I became nervous—I lost my head. I determined on a bold stroke. I did some things that were more than questionable; and one day I did not go down to my brokers—it was unnecessary.

"On that day I lay in bed trying hard to determine what to do—trying hard to regain my reason, my mental balance. I was sure of but one thing, which was, that I was not only ruined financially, but if I could save my honour I would consider myself lucky. I went out into the country and stayed a week at a farmhouse. Then I came back quite as unstrung as ever. I found on my return that a certain messenger, who would not state his business, had called for me regularly three times a day since my departure. I knew what that meant. It was about my business affairs. My creditors were after me, and there was no escape except an ignominious flight to the Continent.

"I tell you, old man, it was awful! I had almost determined on flight to get out of the dilemma when the messenger was announced again. At first I thought of sending him away with the information that I had not returned. Then the cowardice of the act occurred to me, and I had him sent up to my room. I was a trifle surprised when I saw him. He was a house-servant, and spoke with a strong French accent. He handed me a note which proved to be a polite but urgent invitation to call as soon as possible at the residence of the writer—a gentleman by the name of Du Tasi—on a matter of importance both to him and to me.

Digitized by Google

"At first I suspected that it was some matter of business connected with my unfortunate downfall. But surely I had never met nor had any dealings with a man of that name. I looked in the directory. His name was not in it. I began to be interested in the affair, and told the messenger that I would call that evening.

"Accordingly, after my dinner I strolled up to the number mentioned in the note, and found the house to be in the most fashionable neighbourhood of the West End. I was politely shown into the parlour, and before I had time to really appreciate the magnificence of the furnishings of the room was confronted by a tall, white-haired man, who was strikingly handsome. I at once attempted to determine to what nationality he belonged, but found it impossible. He had many of the graces of a Frenchman and the haughtiness of an Englishman, while his name was apparently that of a Pole. Although a man of advanced age, and somewhat weak, he bore himself erect and commandingly.

"It was a queer meeting. I looked at him wonderingly as he looked critically at me, and there was not a word spoken for several minutes by either of us. Finally, in my embarrassment I asked him what had given me the honour of an introduction to his house, and you may imagine my amazement, when he replied, in a most matter-of-fact way:

"'I wish you to marry my daughter.'

"I looked at him in such astonishment that he went on to say, in rather a haughty manner:

"'You need not consider me insane. I am fully aware that I am startling you, but I have my own reasons for presenting the matter to you in this manner.'

"'I feel,' said I, replying with a little haughtiness myself, 'that you offer me a great and'—sarcastically—'unusual honour; but I had not been intending to marry for some time yet, and really had intended, when I did choose a wife, to marry a woman whom I loved. It may have occurred to you that I have never seen your daughter, that such an extraordinary marriage would result very unhappily for both of us, that perhaps I may not be worthy of her, that, perhaps, humble as I am, she may not be——'

"'That will do,' he broke in, angrily. 'Do not say anything for which you may feel sorry in the future. I agree with you that I do not think you worthy of her, but as she loves you I intend that you shall marry her.'

"'Loves me?' I said, in astonishment.

"'Loves you,' he repeated.

"'But,' I exclaimed, 'I have never even met her!'

"'That is true,' he answered, 'and you never shall even see her until you have decided whether or not you will accept this offer of her hand in marriage.'

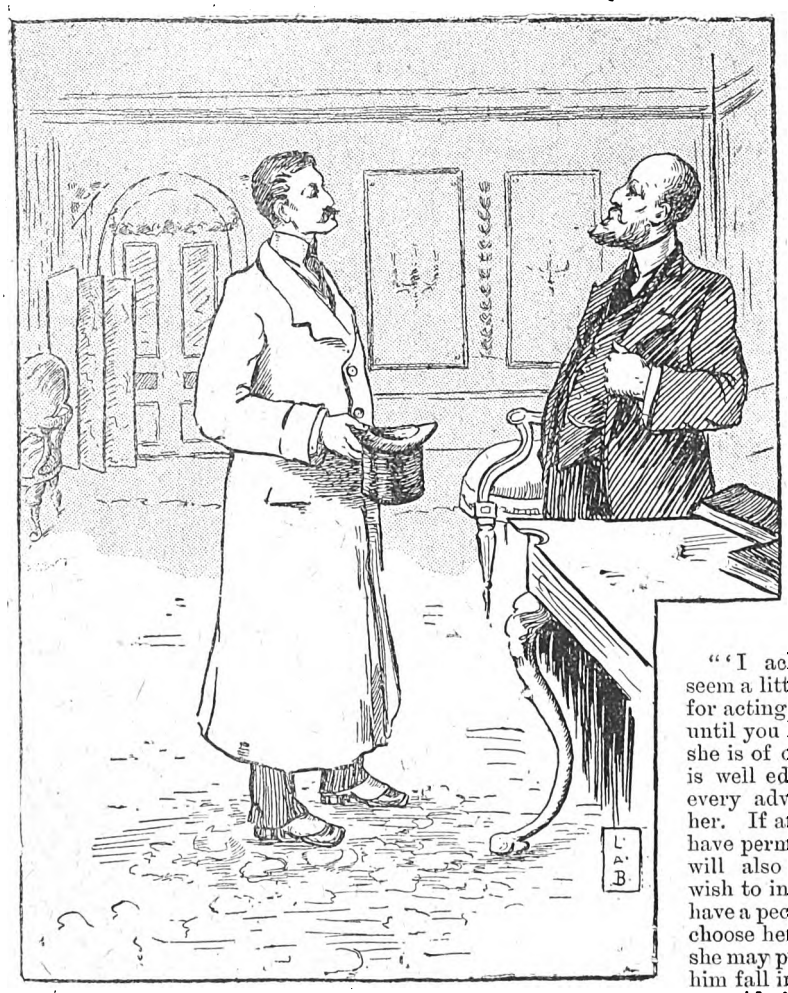
"'I decline emphatically,' I said.

"He did not appear to notice what I said, but continued:

"'I acknowledge that this proceeding may seem a little strange to you, but I have my reasons for acting as I do. While you may not see her until you have decided, I will tell you this much; she is of one of the best families in Europe; she is well educated, young, an heiress, and has had every advantage that immense wealth can give her. If any of these things are not true you will have permission to break the engagement. You will also be furnished every opportunity you wish to inquire into them. I will also say that I have a peculiar reason for wishing her husband to choose her before he sees her—in other words, that she may pick out the man whom she loves, and let him fall in love with her afterwards if he can——'

"'Ah, if he can,' I echoed. 'Suppose she is not beautiful.'

"'That is precisely the point I wish to keep



"I wish you to marry my daughter."

Digitized by Google

from you. If she loves her husband she will be easily governed by him, and she will be happy——'

"'While if he loves her——'

"'And she knows it, she may not.'

"'But suppose the husband she chooses in such a remarkable manner falls in love with her after the marriage?'

"'She need not know it.'

"'Frankly,' I said, 'I believe you are a trifle insane.'

"'No,' he answered, 'not in the least. I merely know a great deal about human nature. I know what heredity

She was standing there.

and circumstance did when they united in my daughter and I know what is best for her. I wish her to be happy and——'

"'And you are willing to sacrifice the happiness of the man she loves in order to make her happy.'

"'The man who marries my daughter, sir,' he answered, will be very happy.'

"'That may be,' I said, 'but I decline to be a party to any experiment in marriage.'

"Again he did not seem to notice what I had said.

"'The offer of her hand, her choice of you is a great compliment. I have taken her round the world. She has seen men of every description, and has known the history of the life of every man in whom she took any interest. Although none of them talked with her, thought of her, she has known them as thoroughly as it is possible for detective skill to find out the actual character of a man. She knows every step you have taken, everything you have done for the past three months, when I may add, we arrived in London.'

"I blushed hotly. Did she know—did he know—the verge of ruin on which I was standing? Was it possible that any young girl could love a man who was so hopelessly in the depths of despair as I? I tried to hide my embarrassment by asking:

"'Where, if you please, did she ever see me?'

"'In many places and at many times,' he answered.

"'I do not see,' I laughed in rather a shamefaced way, 'what she can see to love in me.'

"'Love is decidedly the strangest thing in the world,' he answered.

"'Does she know that I am—that I am penniless!' I asked.

"'She does.'

"'Does she know that I am worse than penniless—that I am almost dishonoured?' I cried.

"'But you are not dishonoured,' he answered, 'although I must confess that you have been as imprudent as most young men are at some time or other in their lives.'

"'Ah! she does not know it all then?' I said.

"'More than you do,' he answered.

"'What do you mean?'

"'I mean that your debts have all been paid—that you have money in the bank—that your credit has been restored. By the way'—here he put his hand in his pocket—'here are some papers, cancelled notes and a cheque that was dishonoured. They belong to you. Take them.'

"I was—well, you may imagine the condition of my mind. I began to think that I had suddenly become insane. I could not speak. He saw my condition, and kindly taking me by the arm led me to the door.

"'Go back to your club and think it over. Come to-morrow and tell me your answer. There is one thing, by the way, that you need not fear. I am playing no trick upon you. If you do not find that I have told you the truth in every particular you need not consider yourself under obligation to marry her.'

III.

"I WENT back to my club, and I tried to think it over. But what can a man think under such circumstances as those?

"It all seemed like a sixteenth century romance. Why did he want me to marry a woman I had never seen? I repeated the question a thousand times as I paced back and forth in my room.

"Was she repulsive in appearance? Was she—well, there were a thousand things that suggested themselves to me. At last, however, I came to my senses. Of course, I would not marry her. The proposition was absurd. Why should I go blindfolded into a marriage? Why should I permit myself to be bought with a few cancelled notes? I would make him take them back. I would see that he got back his money. And I would tell him again that I would not consider such a proposition.

"This conclusion brought back my equanimity, and I went to bed and slept soundly. The next morning I called on him again. He greeted me with a smile, and for some time evaded the subject of the marriage. He gave me time to appreciate the beauty of the room, the taste with which the furniture was arranged, the elegance of the whole, and last, to notice that a portrait—a life-size portrait—was turned towards the wall, a fact that I had indistinctly noticed the day before. It was a picture of his daughter, of course. I would have given ten years of my life to have had a glimpse of it. I began wondering if, after all, she were not beautiful. I began picturing her to myself. Surely they would not put in that room a portrait of a homely girl. I began to feel just a little bit romantic. I thought I heard the rustle of a dress behind a curtain at the end of the room. I was sure I heard it. Beyond a doubt she was there. She who—well, it was hard to believe—but she who had fallen in love with me before I had ever spoken a word to her or thought a word of her. She who wanted to dower me with wealth and position, and perhaps beauty. It was the most tantalising situation imaginable. What was it to her I began to wonder? If she actually loved me what were her feelings as she stood behind that portière waiting for me to say yes or no? Would her heart throb with pleasure if I said yes? Would she go to her room and weep if I said no? Surely I had the better of the position, because so far as the heart was concerned, at least it was a matter of indifference to me. All these things flitted through my mind as I tried to carry on the conversation with her handsome father.

Digitized by Google

"Finally, however, I concluded that it were better to bring the thing to a conclusion at once.

"I arose. He understood merely from the action that I had concluded to decline, and he turned and looked away, almost sadly, I thought, and I fancied I heard him sigh. Again, too, I heard the rustle of the dress.

"'I feel deeply honoured,' I began, 'by your remarkable offer. I am truly grateful for your generosity in giving me financial assistance, but I can——'

"There had been no other sound than that of my own voice, but I knew, I was conscious of the fact that the portière at the end of the room had been drawn aside, and I knew that she was standing there revealed. I looked quickly in her direction. Well—I don't know how to describe it. I don't know how to describe her beauty. I don't know how to describe the sensation that came over me, except that it was love—love at first sight. She was standing there with her beautiful eyes beseeching me to say yes. I could read it just as plainly as though she had spoken the prayer in words. Her arms were outstretched to me, and she was blushing. I tell you, it was irresistible. I turned to her father and said:

"'I accept.'"

Here Jack ended his story.

"What was her father's reason for acting as he did?" I asked him.

"A very sensible one," he replied. "She was so rich and so beautiful that any man would have married her, and any man would have pretended love for her in order to marry her."

"But I thought he did not want her husband to love her?"

"Not at all. He did not want her husband to fall in love with her, or to say he was in love with her until after he had practically become possessed of her fortune and her hand. In other words, he wanted honest love on both sides, and he got it."

"When shall I see her?"

"Now. I can always tell the rustle of her dress after that experience, and I hear it in the next room. She is going into the conservatory to cut some flowers. We will take a look at her before she sees us. Come."

We tip-toed cautiously into the next room. A door from it opened into the conservatory. Standing in that doorway we saw her as she stooped slightly over a rose almost as beautiful as herself.

"Well old man," said Jack, "What do you think? Is she as beautiful as The Most Beautiful Woman in the World?"

Fortunately he did not see me tremble. I made a supreme effort, and said calmly:

"Quite as beautiful."

But I did not tell him that she was indeed the woman—The Most Beautiful Woman in the World.

The Romance of Elizabeth.

By RAWSON REED.

Her name, Elizabeth Friedheim, was German. Her blue eyes and flaxen hair were German. But there was nothing of the Teutonic repose in her manner, and her way of whistling at her work and executing little dance steps across the kitchen when she thought Mrs. Pratt was not looking, did not indicate Teutonic solidity of character.

Mrs. Pratt was afraid at first that she would not do by any means, particularly when, on the second evening of Elizabeth's engagement, she found a young man in the kitchen, whose cleanliness and almost shininess left no doubt of his character of "beau."

Still, Elizabeth seemed to be conducting herself with the utmost propriety, the young man left early, so Mrs. Pratt said nothing at the time.

The next day, however, she thought she would mention it, and she said, in a mild, motherly sort of way, that she did not want the young man there too often—not oftener than once a week at any rate.

Elizabeth laughed, and said that she did not want him too often, either, and she thought that once a week was too often, so Mrs. Pratt went away feeling satisfied.

So far as the work was concerned she certainly had nothing to complain of. Of course the girl was a new broom, but the way she took hold of things, the quickness and thoroughness with which they were done, and the neatness and order that seemed to descend upon the flat were exceptional.

Mrs. Pratt had been suffering from a long series of transient incompetents, who had lined her brow with care and turned three hairs nearly grey. She still felt apprehensive, though, and her foreboding was increased when in the course of the afternoon she found Elizabeth out on the back porch chatting pleasantly with the caretaker, who appeared to be enjoying the conversation immensely.

Digitized by Google

That evening Mrs. Pratt heard a sound of laughter proceeding from the kitchen, and, having some natural feminine curiosity, she went out to see what was happening.

It was another clean and shiny young man sitting on the kitchen table and swinging his heels, while Elizabeth swung hers from a seat on the table and ate chocolates out of a paper bag.

Mrs. Pratt went back into the parlour in a frame of mind, and told Mr. Pratt that he would have to call at the registry-office the next morning and see if he couldn't find another girl.

"Why, what's the trouble, now?" asked Pratt.

"Well, she's got the second one in there now; one isn't enough for her and I simply will not have that sort of thing going on every night, anyway. She can't carry on with young men and give proper attention to her work, and, besides, it isn't proper for a young girl. I spoke to her about it yesterday, and that seems to be all the good it did."

"Now, look here," said Pratt, "perhaps it isn't the girl's fault at all. To look at her I should say that it wasn't; you know how that is yourself."

"I don't know anything of the kind."

"Perhaps you don't. I know it was a cold night when I first went to see you and didn't find anyone there, and I know that you told me that you couldn't help it, so I'm making the same allowance for the girl."

Mrs. Pratt said he was talking nonsense, and he didn't make allowances at all, and it wasn't anything of the kind, anyway; but she was mollified to a certain extent, and said she would take her husband's advice and wait a little while before she did anything rash.

She was glad that she had come to that decision the next morning, for the breakfast was punctual and everything was so nicely cooked that even Pratt expressed his satisfaction, and as a general thing Pratt is hard to satisfy at breakfast time.

Then the subsequent sweeping, dusting, washing and scouring were all as well done, as it is possible to do those things, and through it all Elizabeth whistled like a nightingale.

It was that way from that time forth. Work was done to perfection, and the young men came with regularity, but Elizabeth never let them interfere with her domestic duties.

There was one young man for nearly every night in the week, and it seemed that those whose turn fell on the off nights when the Pratts had company were apparently accorded the privilege of the Sunday afternoon walk.

How the girl managed them so well Mrs. Pratt confessed was a mystery to her, and Pratt said that if it was a mystery to her it must be a mystery indeed.

Then subsequent benefits were derived from the pretty little maid's knack of managing.

If anything that the groceryman or the milkman brought to the house was not what Elizabeth considered it should be, that groceryman or milkman or other man took it back with absolute enthusiasm and was forthcoming with the proper article within the shortest possible space of time. It was simply marvellous.

Sometimes Mrs. Pratt felt it her duty to remonstrate with the girl concerning her coquetry, but Elizabeth only laughed.

She was always laughing.

"It does them good," she said. "If they did not like it they would not come any more, so it is good for them and good for me."

When Mrs. Pratt told her husband about this he was seriously concerned.

"I should have thought you would have known better than that," he said. "Just as long as she keeps the lot going we are all right. If she had only one I should be frightened. Let her alone; she's all right. And I think, by the way, that we might manage to put another ten shillings a month on her wages."

That, Mrs. Pratt said, was just the way you might expect a man to look at such things—just as long as he was comfortable he was willing to wink at iniquity. Nevertheless the lady did begin to think she might have said too much and the prospect of Elizabeth settling to a "one and only," marrying and leaving them, was not pleasant. So she felt impelled to express to her domestic the hope that she would not let one of those young men run away with her.

"You need not be afraid," laughed Elizabeth. "Now, I have a good time, and if I marry—well, I have seen some people who have married and I am not in a hurry. I have my good time first, anyway."

Sometimes one of Elizabeth's beaux dropped off, either discouraged or dismissed, but there was always another to take his place, and it afforded the Pratts quite a little amusement to note the changes.

One evening Mrs. Pratt went into the kitchen and found a newcomer, who seemed to be of a different stamp from the others—not so clean or neat, and older, but a good-looking fellow enough, and of a breadth and stature that seemed to make the kitchen shrink. He rose to his feet at the lady's entrance and made an awkward bow, and Mrs. Pratt noticed for the first time that Elizabeth blushed.

For two or three weeks this giant called at his appointed time; then he came twice in one week. The second time this happened the Pratts heard voices raised in anger—male voices—and then the sound of a scuffle and a scream from Elizabeth.

Pratt jumped up and ran into the kitchen just as the outer door slammed, and found Elizabeth with the bloom fled from her face confronting her latest admirer, who stood with his back to the door scowling at her.

"What does this mean?" demanded Pratt.

Elizabeth began to cry and the giant stood sullen and silent.

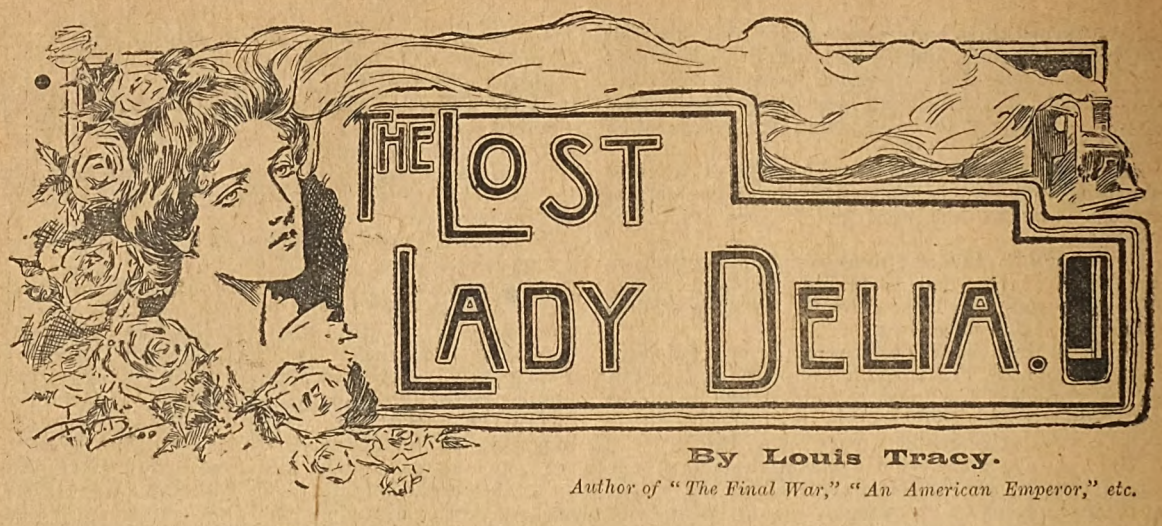
"Whatever it is," continued Pratt, "I won't have it. Get out of this house and don't let me find you here again. I don't want to have any trouble with you, but I tell you to get out."

For an instant the big man hesitated; then he turned, and with a parting scowl at the girl opened the door and disappeared.

Pratt attempted to question Elizabeth, but she would do nothing but cry, and at last he gave it up and went back and told his wife that he thought Elizabeth's management had failed for once, and two had called at the same time with the result of the survival of the fittest.

It is probable that he was right.

Digitized by Google



By Louis Tracy.

Author of "The Final War," "An American Emperor," etc.

CHAPTER XXIII. (continued).

"Pooh! The mania of an hysterical woman!"

"Possibly!"

"Why 'possibly'? Do you for a moment believe the monstrous insinuation?"

"No, not in that sense. But her brother was about to make some revelation regarding a third person when she appealed to him not to speak. What would have happened finally I do not know. At that critical moment my servant announced your arrival."

"But what can Mrs. Hilmer have to conceal? She and her brother have been lost from Society since long before my marriage. Neither of them has, to my knowledge, ever set eyes on my wife during the last seven years."

"Yet Mrs. Hilmer must have had some powerful motive in acting as she did."

"Is it not more likely that she had a bad attack of nerves?"

"A woman who merely yields to nervous prostration behaves foolishly. This woman gave way to emotion, it is true, but it was strength, not weakness, that sustained her."

"What do you mean?"

"There is but one force that sustains in such a crisis—the power of love. Mrs. Hilmer was not flying from consequences. She met them half-way in the spirit of a martyr."

"'Pon my honour, Brett, I am beginning to think that this wretched business is affecting your usually clear brain. You are accepting fancies as facts."

"Maybe. I confess to feeling unequal to form a logical conclusion to-night."

"Why not abandon the whole muddle to time? There is no solution of a difficulty like the almanac. Let us both go off somewhere."

"What, and leave Mrs. Hilmer to die of sheer pain of mind? To let this unfortunate fellow, Mensmore, suffer no one knows what consequences from the events of to-day? It is out of the question."

"Very well, I leave you to it. Everyone seems to forget that it is I who suffer most." The baronet stood up and dejectedly gazed into the fire.

"I, at least, can feel for you, Lyle," said Brett sympathetically, "but you must admit that things cannot be allowed to remain in their present whirlpool."

"So be it. Let them go on to their bitter end. If my wife was tired of my society she might at least have got rid of me in an easier manner."

With this trite reflection Sir Charles quitted his friend's house.

Brett sat for a long time motionless. Then, as his mind became calmer, he lit a cigar, took out the doubly mysterious letter, and examined it in every possible way, critically and microscopically.

There could be no doubt that it was a genuine production. The condition of the ink bore out the correctness of the date, and the fact that the note-paper and envelope were not of Continental style was not very material.

It did not appear to have been inclosed in another envelope, as the writer implied, for the purpose of being reposted in London. Rather did the slightly frayed edges of the cover give rise to the assumption that it had been carried in someone's pocket before postage. But this theory was vague and undemonstrable.

The handwriting was Lady Delia's; the style, allowing for the strange conditions under which it was written, was hers; yet Brett did not believe in it.

Nothing could shake his faith in the one solid, concrete certainty that stood out from a maze of contradictions and mystery—Lady Delia Lyle was dead, and buried in a pauper's grave at Putney.

At last, wearied with thought and unsatisfactory theorising, he went to bed; but Smith sat up late to regale his partner with the full, true, and particular narrative of the "lydy a-cryin' on her knees, and the strange gent lookin' as though he would like to murder Mr. Winter."

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE HANDWRITING.

LIKE most men, Reggie took a different view of events in the morning to that which he entertained overnight.

Yesterday, the surprises of the hour were concrete embodiments, each distinct and emphatic. To-day they were merged in the general mass of contradictory details that made up this most bewildering inquiry.

That matters could not be allowed to rest in their present state was clear; that they would, in the natural course of things, reveal themselves more definitely, even if unaided, was also patent.

Mrs. Hilmer's partial admissions, her brother's evident knowledge of some salient features of the puzzle, that utterly strange letter in the admitted handwriting of Lady Delia herself, and bearing the prosaic testimony of dates stamped by the Post-office—these sensational elements, when brought into juxtaposition, could not help reacting into additional phases.

Long experience in criminal investigation told Brett that, under certain circumstances, the best course of all was one of inaction.

Digitized by Google

On the basis of the accepted truism in the affairs of many people that "letters left unanswered answer themselves," the barrister knew that there must be an outcome from the queer medley of occurrences at his residence on the Monday evening.

Reviewing the history of the past three months several oddities stood out from the general jumble.

In the first place he wondered why he had failed to deduce any pertinent fact from the manner in which Mrs. Hilmer's dining-room was furnished on the occasion of his first visit to Raleigh Mansions.

He distinctly remembered noting his reception in an unusual room littered with unusual articles, when the luxurious and well-appointed suite of apartments was considered as a whole. It was suggested to him at the time that the drawing-room, which he saw during his second visit, was dismantled earlier, but he did not connect this trivial incident with the feature in Mensmore's flat that he noted immediately—namely, the discrepancies between the arrangement of his sitting-room and all other chambers in the place.

These things were immaterial now, but he indexed them as a guide for future use.

Lady Delia's motive for that secret visit to Raleigh Mansions—that was the key of the mystery. But how to discover it? Who was her confidant? To whom could he turn for possible enlightenment? It was useless to broach the matter again to Sir Charles Lyle. The baronet and his wife had been friends sharing the same ménage rather than husband and wife. Lady Delia's relatives had already been appealed to in vain. They knew nothing of the slightest value in this search for truth.

In this train of thought the name of Jane Harding cropped up. She was the personal maid of the deceased lady. She had sharp eyes and quick wits. Her queer antics shortly after the inquest were not forgotten. Here at least was a possibility of light if the girl would but speak.

If she refused what could be her motive?

Anyhow it was worth while to make a fresh effort.

Early in the afternoon Brett called at the stage-door of the Jollity Theatre.

"Is Miss Marie le Marchant still employed here?" he asked the attendant.

"I dunno," was the careless answer.

"Well, think hard," said the barrister, laying a half-crown on the battered blotting-pad which is an indispensable part of the furniture in the letter bureau at a theatre.

"Yes, sir, I believe she is, but she has been away on a week's leave."

"Indeed. Has she returned?"

"I was off last night, sir, but if you will pardon me a moment I'll inquire from the man who took my place."

The stage-doorkeeper disappeared into the dark interior, to return quickly with the information that Miss Le Marchant had appeared as usual on the Monday night.

"She was away most part of last week, sir," added the man, "and I believe it wasn't on a holiday, as she was a-sort of flurried about it as if someone was ill."

"Thank you. Do you know where she lives?"

A momentary hesitation was soon softened by another half-crown.

"It's against the rules, sir. If you were to find yourself near Jubilee-buildings, Bloomsbury, you would not be far out."

This information was sound. Miss Marie le Marchant's name was painted outside a second-floor flat.

Brett knocked, and the door was opened by an elderly woman whom he had no difficulty in recognising.

"Is your daughter in, Mrs. Harding?" he said.

For a moment she could not speak for surprise.

(Continued on page 314.)

25,000 TRIAL PACKAGES Free!

Rheumatism Cured by a Single Remedy that You May Try Without Spending a Cent.—Cured Many Cases of 30 and 40 Years' Standing.

JOHN A. SMITH

If you have rheumatism, write to me, and I will send you, free of cost, a trial package of a harmless remedy, which cured me and thousands of others, among them cases of over fifty years' standing. It is a grand remedy, and in order that every suffering reader may learn about it, I will gladly send them a Trial Package free, even if more than 25,000 invalids should apply. Many a distressing case of rheumatism, among them some which defied Hospital, Drugs, Electricity, and medical skill, were successfully cured. In Denham, Ind., U.S.A., it cured a lady, who then cured fifteen of her neighbours. In Prosser, Nebr., U.S.A., it cured Mrs. C. Morritz, who had been afflicted for fifty-two years. In Fountain City, Wis., U.S.A., it cured Hon. Jacob Sexauer, after suffering for thirty-three years, notwithstanding having employed seven physicians. At 130 Oak Street, Vincennes, Ind., U.S.A., this remedy rescued Miss Emma Callender from a case of rheumatism, which her physicians considered fatal. Rev. C. Sund, of Harrisville, Wis., U.S.A., testifies that this remedy cured two members of his congregation, one who had suffered eighteen, the other twenty-five years. In England the following have written me cordial letters of thanks, and testify that they have been completely cured of rheumatism through Gloria Tonic: J. E. Smith, of Ranskill, Notts; Mrs. C. Gregory, of South Woodford, Essex; Mr. W. Booth, of Dudley, near Huddersfield; Miss Mary Fullon, of Bally Truckle; Mrs. Henry Bester, of Weldon, near Daventry. Thousands of similar instances could be mentioned where this horrible plague has been completely cured. Write at once for a free trial package and other information, for it is an honest remedy that you can test before you part with your money. Be sure and write your name plainly and give your full address, to avoid any mistakes in delivery. Mr. Smith's principal offices are in Germania Building, Milwaukee, Wis., U.S.A., but for the convenience of the British public he has also opened London offices. Address all letters to John A. Smith (Dept. 1007), 6 and 7 Stonecutter Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"Well, I never," she cried, "but London is a funny place. Do you know me, sir?"

"Anyone would recognise you from your daughter, if they did not take you for her elder sister," he said. Brett's smile was irresistible.

"My daughter is not in just now, sir," replied Mrs. Harding, "but I expect her in to tea almost immediately."

"Then may I come in and await her arrival?"

"Certainly, sir."

Once inside the flat, Brett was struck by the pretentious but fairly comfortable nature of its appointments, the ex-lady's maid's legacy must have been a nice one to enable her to live in such style, as the poor pittance of a coryphée would barely pay for the rent and taxes. Moreover, the presence of her mother in the establishment was a distinct factor in her favour.

Mrs. Harding had brought the visitor to the tiny sitting-room. She seated herself near the window and resumed some sewing.

"Have you been long in town, Mrs. Harding?" said Brett, by way of being civil.

"In London, do you mean, sir? About two months. Ever since my daughter got along so well in her new profession. She's a good girl, is my daughter."

"Miss Harding is doing well on the stage, then?"

"Oh, yes, sir. Why, she's been earning £6 a week, and last week she was sent for for a special engagement, which paid her so well that she's going to buy me a new dress out of the money."

"Really," said Brett, "you ought to be proud of her."

"I am," said the admiring mother. "I only wish her brother who went off and 'listed for a sojer had turned out half as well."

Mrs. Harding nodded towards a photograph of a cavalry soldier in uniform on the mantelshelf, and Brett rose to examine it, inwardly marvelling at the intelligence he had just received. Was it reasonable that the girl could be the recipient of a legacy without the knowledge of her mother? In any case, why did she conceal the real nature of her earnings, as the story about £6 a week was a myth.

Near to the portrait of the gallant hussar was a large plaque presentment of Miss Marie herself, in all the glory of tights, wig, and make-up. Across it was written in the best theatrical style:

"Ever yours sincerely, Marie le Marchant." And no sooner had Brett caught sight of the words than he almost cried out in voluntary astonishment.

The handwriting was identical with that of Lady Lyle.

Gulping down his amazement, Brett devoured the signature with his eyes.

The resemblance was truly remarkable. What on earth could be the explanation of this phenomenon?

"Your daughter is a remarkably nice writer, Mrs. Harding," he said, turning the photograph towards her.

"Yes," said the complacent mother, "she taught herself when—before she went on the stage. She was always a clever girl, and when she grew up she improved herself. I wasn't able to afford her much schooling when she was young."

"I have seldom seen a nicer hand," went on Reggie. "Have you any other specimens of her writing convenient? I should like to see them if they are not private."

The smooth surface of the photograph might perhaps lend a deceptive fluency to the pen. He wanted to make quite sure that he was not mistaken.

"Oh, yes. She's just copying out the part of 'Ophelia' in Hamlet. And she acts it beautiful."

Mrs. Harding handed over a large MSS. book, and there, written on the first page, was the name of the luckless woman whose fatal passion had moved millions to tears.

The barrister seized at once on the weird coincidence that lent similitude to the two names.

The last four letters of "Ophelia" were so precisely like the same letters in the signature of Lady Delia Lyle that, without other evidence, he would have sworn, to the best of his belief, that the deceased lady herself wrote the word.

He admired Miss Marie le Marchant for her efforts in the direction of culture, but he was determined, once and for all, to get from her some explanation of her actions.

The rattle of a key in the outer door caused him to throw aside the coveted "part," and the young lady herself entered. A few weeks of stage experience had given her a more stylish appearance. There was a "professional" touch in the arrangement of her hat and the droop of her skirt.

She knew him instantly, and listened with evident anger to her mother's explanation that "this gentleman has just called to see you, dear."

"All right, mother," she cried. "I see it is Mr. Brett. Will you get tea ready whilst I talk with him? I shall be ready in two minutes." This with a defiant look at Reggie.

When Mrs. Harding had left the room her daughter said in the crisp accents of ill-temper:

"What do you want with me, now?"

"I want to ask you why you dared to write a letter to Sir Charles Lyle in the name of your dead mistress?"

The answer was so direct, the tone so menacing, its assumption of absolute and unquestioned knowledge so complete that for a moment Marie le Marchant's assurance failed her.

She stood like one petrified, with eyes dilated and breast heaving. At last she managed to ejaculate:

"I—I—why do you ask me that question?"

"Because I must have the truth from you this time. You are playing a very dangerous game."

That he was right he was now sure beyond doubt. It was impossible for the girl to deny it with those piercing eyes fixed upon her, and seeming to read the secrets of her heart.

Yet she was plucky enough. Although she was confused and on the point of bursting into tears, she snapped viciously:

"I will tell you nothing. Go away."

"You are obstinate, I know," said Brett, "but I must warn you that you are juggling with edged tools. You should not imagine that you can trifle with murder. What is your motive for deliberately trying to conceal Lady Delia's death? If you do not answer me you may be asked the question in a court of law."

"You have no right to come here annoying me," she retorted.

"I am not here to annoy you. I come, rather as a friend to appeal to you not to incur the grave risk of keeping from the authorities information which they ought to possess."

"What information?"

"The reasons which led you to leave Sir Charles Lyle's house so suddenly, the source whence you obtain your money, paid to you, doubtless, to secure your silence, the motive which impelled you to use your ability to imitate Lady Delia's handwriting in order to propagate the false news that she is alive. This is the information needed, and your wilful refusal to give it constitutes a grave indictment."

"I don't care that for you, Mr. Brett," replied the girl, her face set now in a scarlet temper, whilst she snapped her fingers to emphasize her words. "You can do and say what you like, I will tell you nothing."

"You cannot deny you wrote that letter to Sir Charles Lyle last Saturday?"

"I am waiting for my tea, Mr. Brett. Sorry I can't ask you to join me."

"Your flippancy will not avail you. See, here is the letter itself—your own production—written on paper of which you have a quantity in this very room."

The shot was a bold one, and it very nearly hit the mark.

(Continued on page 316.)

Digitized by Google

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

Y-U-UZIT. THE NEW DENTRIFICE. THE ONLY WAY DISCOLOURED TEETH

can be RESTORED to their original colour WITHOUT SCALING is by using this Tooth-powder, the proprietors of which guarantee the return of your money in full if the powder does not do what is claimed above. No other Tooth-powder in the world is sold under such conditions. Obtainable from all Chemists. Price 1/1. per box, or direct from the Proprietors and manufacturers.

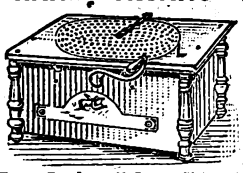
BLATCHFORD ROGERS SYNDICATE,
Moorgate Station Chambers, E.C.

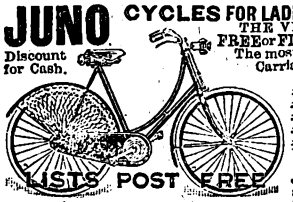
HAND ORGANS FROM 20s.



Made in three sizes, in black and gold case. Full tone. Six metal tunes, plays all songs, hymns, or dance music. Sent on receipt of 4s. P.O., if desired, balance 4s. monthly. Send for list of tunes, prices, &c. ATLAS CO., 182a High Street, Camden Town, London; 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; and 14 High Road, Kilburn.

JUNO CYCLES FOR LADIES & GENTS.

THE VERY BEST.
Discount for Cash.
FREE or FIXED WHEELS
The most up-to-date.
Carriage Paid.



LISTS POST FREE

		Monthly.
£8 10s.	...	14/2
£11 11s.	...	19/3
£12	...	20/-
£12 12s.	...	21/-
£14 14s.	...	24/6

Write for New Season's List.
JUNO Cycles and Accessories (over 100 pages) sent Post Free.

JUNO ... ... £10 ... 16/8 monthly.
Lady Safety ... £11 ... 18/4 monthly.
Leatherly Hard Wood Cycle Stand, 2/6. Handlebar Basket, 10½d.

METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS CO. LTD.,
Juno Cycle School, and Works, 75, 76 Bishopsgate Street Without, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

FREE. FREE. Our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch (with chain), or A Real Gold Ring

Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

SEND NO MONEY.

NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money.

Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

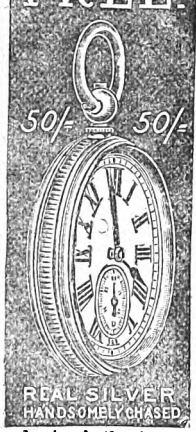
Send no money. Write to-day.

BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 5), 282 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

£50 EASILY EARNED

Send No Money, We Trust You.

FREE.



WE GIVE YOU YOUR CHOICE of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1s. 6d. each. (Regular price, 2s. 6d.)

WE DO NOT WANT YOUR MONEY.

JUST WRITE US A POST-CARD

with your name and address clearly written, saying that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your post-card, we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13s. 6d. you have received for same, and we will AT ONCE send you (no waiting) ABSOLUTELY FREE, our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch, with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A Written Guarantee for Ten Years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1s. 6d. each article. We have thousands of testimonials and press notices as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents. With each packet we send you particulars of how you can easily earn £50, and remember

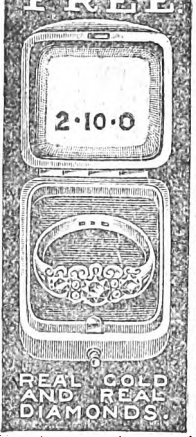
FREE



IT COSTS YOU NOTHING.

to try. Herewith we append copy of receipt from the lucky winner of the £50 prize offered during January, 1901:—

22 Cory St., Resolven, near Neath, S. Wales.
Received from the British Goldsmiths Co., Bank of England Note for Fifty Pounds in payment for Cash Prize, in addition to the Presents offered for selling the largest number of their packets of jewellery during the month of January, 1901.
Feb. 5, 1901. (Signed) JOHN SANDERS.

SEND NO MONEY. WRITE US TO-DAY.
SEND NO STAMPS. ONLY A POST-CARD.
BRITISH GOLDSMITHS CO. (DEPT. 29), 48 GRAY'S INN RD., LONDON.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.

GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS
148 Old Street, London, E.C.

HAVE YOU TRIED KEATING'S LOZENGES FOR YOUR COUGH?

ANY DOCTOR WILL TELL YOU "there is no better Cough Medicine."—One gives relief: if you suffer from cough try them but once: they will cure, and they will not injure your health; an increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 13½d. tins.

PHOTOS. PHOTOS. PHOTOS.

From Carte or Cabinet.

One Permanent 12 by 10 Enlargement, Mounted on Plate sunk mount, measuring 20 by 16, with six highly-glazed Cabinet Portraits of same for 10/6

3 Cabinets 2/6; 6 for 3/6; 12 for 6/-. 6 Cartes 2/-; 12 for 3/-; 24 for 5/6. All sent carriage paid. Send to day P.O. to H. BRADBURY, Photographer, The Chase, SOUTHGATE.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darwley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

Digitized by Google

She was staggered, almost subdued by this melodramatic production of the original, and his clever guess at the existence of similar notepaper in the house.

But her dogged temperament saved her. Jane Harding was British, notwithstanding her penchant for a French-sounding name, and she would have died sooner than beat a retreat.

"I will thank you to leave me alone, Mr. Brett," she said.

There was nothing for it but to retire as gracefully as possible, but the barrister was more than satisfied with his visit. He had now established beyond a shadow of doubt that for some reason which he could not fathom the ex-lady's maid not only knew of her mistress' death but wished to conceal it.

This desire, too, had the essential feature of every other branch of the inquiry; it grew to maturity long after the day when Lady Delia was actually killed. What did it all mean?

From Bloomsbury he went west to Portman Square, and found Sir Charles on the point of going for a drive in the Park.

He briefly told him his discovery.

The baronet at first was sceptical. "Do you mean to say, Brett," he cried fretfully, "that I do not know my wife's writing when I see it?"

"You may think you do, but when another person can imitate it exactly, of course, you may be deceived. Besides, if this girl, as is probable, was helped in her work by your wife, what is more likely than that Jane Harding should seek to copy that which she would consider the ideal of excellence. Don't harbour any delusions in the matter, Lyle. The letter you received on Monday morning was written by Jane Harding. I am sure of that from her manner no less than from the accidental resemblance of the two styles of handwriting. What I could not find out was her motive for the deceit."

"It is a queer business altogether," said Sir Charles, wearily; "I wish it were ended."

CHAPTER XXV.

Miss Phyllis Browne Intervenes.

Brett was quite positive in his belief that Jane Harding was the paid agent of some person who wished to conceal the facts concerning Lady Delia's death.

Her unexpected appearance in the field at this late hour, no less than the bold rôle she adopted, proved this to his satisfaction. But in England there was no torture-chamber to which she could be led and gradually dismembered until she confessed the truth.

So long as she adhered to the policy of pert denial she was quite safe. The law could not touch her, for the chief witness against her, Sir Charles Lyle, was obviously more than half inclined to admit the genuineness of the letter, even in opposition to the superior judgment of his friend.

Yet it was a matter which Brett considered ought to be made known to the police, so he sent for Mr. Winter and told him of the strange result of his interview with Miss Marie le Marchant.

"Dash everything!" cried the detective when he heard the news. "I made a note some time ago that that girl ought to be watched, but I clean forgot all about it."

"Remember," said Brett, "that my discovery was the result of pure accident. My object in visiting her was to endeavour to induce her confidence with regard to Lady Delia's former life and habits. Indeed, I handled the business very badly."

"I don't see that, sir. You got hold of a very remarkable fact, and thus prevented the success of a bold move by someone which, in my case, at any rate, nearly choked me off the inquiry."

"True. So far chance favoured me. But I ought to have been content with the assumption. There was no need to frighten her by pressing it home."

"Oh, from that point of view"—began the detective.

But Brett was merely thinking aloud—rough-shaping his ideas as they grouped themselves in his brain.

"Perhaps I am wrong there too," he went on. "If this girl is working to instructions she would have refused to help me in any way, and she already knows that I am on the trail. There is one highly satisfactory feature in the Jane Harding adventure, Mr. Winter."

"And what is that?"

"The person, or persons, responsible for Lady Delia's death know that the matter has not been dropped. They are inclined to think that the circle is narrowing. In some of our casts, Mr. Winter, we must have come so unpleasantly close to them that they deemed it advisable to throw us off the scent by a bold effort."

"No doubt you are right, sir, but I wish to goodness I knew when we were 'warm,' as I am getting tired of the business. Every new development deepens the mystery."

Mr. Winter's face was as downcast as his words.

"Surely not! The more pieces of the puzzle we have to handle the less difficult should be the final task of putting them together."

"Not when every piece is a fresh puzzle in itself."

"Why, what has disconcerted you to-day?"

"Mrs. Hilmer."

"What of her?"

"I've had another talk with the maid—her companion, you know—a girl named Dobson. It struck me that it was advisable to know more about Mrs. Hilmer than we do at present."

Brett made no comment, but he could not help the reflection that Pyne, the stranger from Wyoming, had entertained the same view.

"Well," continued the detective, "I went about the affair as quietly as possible, but the maid, though willing could not tell me much. Mrs. Hilmer, she thinks, married very young, and was badly treated by her husband. Finally, there was a rumpus, and she went on the stage, whilst Hilmer drank himself to death. He died about a year ago, but they had been separated nearly five years. He was fairly well-to-do, but he squandered all his money in dissipation, and never gave her a cent. Three years last Michaelmas she set up her present establishment at Raleigh Mansions, and there she has been ever since."

"Then where does the money come from? It must cost her at least £2,000 a year to live."

"That's just what the maid can't tell me. Her mistress led a very secluded life, and was never what you could call fast, though a very pretty woman. During this time she had only one visitor—a gentleman."

"Ah!"

"It sounds promising, but it ends in smoke, so far as I can see."

"Why?"

"This gentleman was a Colonel Montgomery—an old friend—though he wasn't much turned thirty, the maid says. He interested himself a lot in Mrs. Hilmer's affairs, looked after some investments for her, and was on very good terms with her, and nobody could whisper a word against the character of either of them. He was never there except in the afternoon, and on very rare occasions took Mrs. Hilmer, whose maid always accompanied them, to Epping Forest, or up the river, or on some such short journey."

"Go on!"

"I'm sorry, sir, but the chase is over. He's dead."

"Dead?"

"Yes. The maid doesn't know how, or when exactly but one day she found her mistress crying, and when she asked her what was the matter Mrs. Hilmer said, 'I've lost

(Continued on page 318.)

Digitized by Google

FOR EVERY PERSON, EVERY OCCASION.

The 20th Century Chambers's Encyclopædia is not simply for the learned and the educated, though all scholars, from the fellows of colleges downwards, testify to its immense usefulness to them. It is for every one who wishes to succeed in life, whether he is merchant or manufacturer, banker or broker, clerk or engineer, physician or lawyer—or whatever his occupation. It is useful, too, at all times and on all occasions, whether one is engaged in reading, writing, conversation, or work. This, which can scarcely be said of any other work ever published, is true of the

20th CENTURY

Chambers's Encyclopædia

Which is now offered by the "Daily Express" at a very low price and convenient monthly payments.

IN EDUCATION.

The 20th Century Chambers's is the only work that will answer the question of the little child, of the grammar and high school pupil, and of the college undergraduate. It is an indispensable aid from the time the child begins reading, writing, and arithmetic, until he leaves the university an educated man.

IN BUSINESS.

The 20th Century Chambers's is a recognised authority on all questions of commerce, finance, trade, etc. The business man is a busy man, and he wants information that is trustworthy and accurate, but concise and readily accessible. The 20th Century Chambers's will place at his disposal a fund of information of the greatest value in his daily work.

IN THE PROFESSIONS.

The 20th Century Chambers's gives much information not found in any law, medical, or theoretical work of reference, and in every case the information is the latest and is authoritative. No professional man who wishes to be well equipped can afford to be without it.

IN THE HOME.

Nowhere else can one find such clear, authoritative, practical answers to the thousand-and-one questions which are constantly arising in these days of books and lectures. The 20th Century Chambers's will help you in building a home and in furnishing it; will tell you about dress, about the table, about disease, about books, persons, places, and things. The plain everyday information so often wanted is always in Chambers's, as well as the most erudite information sought by scholars.

IN LEISURE MOMENTS.

When one wants information about works of art or architecture, about music, about books and famous characters in literature, about famous plays and actors, on this and every other subject, the new Chambers's acts the part of a friend. It has admirable illustrations and coloured maps, making it a thing of beauty as well as of service.

HOW TO PROCEED: CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA is so well and so favourably known, and this offer is so remarkable, that the distribution of these 10,000 sets may be only a question of a few days. Although we have no desire to press a decision, we feel bound to urge most seriously the propriety of immediate application by every one who desires one of these sets. There is no better time than the present, and a later day may be too late.

Cut Out this Application Form and hand it at once with 3s. to your Bookseller or Newsagent for transmission to the DAILY EXPRESS.

To the General Manager, DAILY EXPRESS,
17 Tudor Street, London, E.C. Date.....1901.

I enclose 3s. Please send me Chambers's Encyclopædia (20th Century Issue).

[Strike out one of these lines.] (a) Cloth, for which I agree to make to you, or to anyone you may appoint, nine further payments of 8s. 6d. each.
(b) Half Morocco, for which I agree to make to you, or to anyone you may appoint, nine further payments of 13s. each, my next payment upon delivery of the complete ten volumes, and my succeeding payments on the corresponding day of each month following. Until such payments are completed, I engage that the volumes remain your property, and shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise. I further agree that if, owing to unforeseen circumstances, of which you shall be the judge, the volumes cannot be delivered, the return of this deposit of 3s. shall cancel this agreement.

[F9] [Signed] .....

[Rank or Occupation].....[Address].....

CARRIAGE PAID TO ANY RAILWAY STATION IN THE UNITED KINGDOM.

Digitized by Google

my only friend." The maid said, "Surely not Colonel Montgomery, madam?' and she replied 'Yes.' She quite took on about it."

"Had the maid no idea as to the date of this interesting occurrence?"

"Only a vague one. Sometime in the autumn or before Christmas. By Jove, yes; it escaped me at the time, but she said that soon after the colonel's death another gentleman called and took her mistress out to dinner. I was so busy thinking about the colonel that I slipped the significance of that statement. It must have been you, Mr. Brett."

"So it seems." The barrister's active brain was already assimilating this new information. If a woman like Mrs. Hilmer had lost a dear and valuable friend—one who practically formed the horizon of her life—she would certainly have worn mourning for him. It was a singular coincidence that Mrs. Hilmer should have "lost" Colonel Montgomery about the same time that Lady Delia disappeared. The detective and the maid both had drawn a false inference from Mrs. Hilmer's words.

"We must find Colonel Montgomery," he said, after a slight pause.

"Find him!"

"Yes."

"I hope neither of us is going his way for some time to come, Mr. Brett," laughed the policeman.

"Winter, I shall never cure you from jumping at conclusions. Upon your present evidence Colonel Montgomery is no more dead than you are."

"But the maid said——"

"I don't care if fifty maids said. There are many more ways of 'losing' a friend than by death. Pass me the Army List, on that bookshelf behind you there."

A brief reference to the index, and Brett said:

"I thought so. There is no Colonel Montgomery. There are several captains and lieutenants, and a Major-General who has commanded a small island in the Pacific for the last five years, but not a single colonel. Winter, you have blundered into eminence in your profession."

"I'm glad to hear it, even as you put it, Mr. Brett. But I don't see——"

"I know you don't. If you did, a popular novelist would write your life and style you the English Lecocq. Mrs. Hilmer 'lost' the gallant colonel at the same time that the world 'lost' Lady Delia. Find the first, and I am much mistaken if we do not learn all about the second."

"Now I wonder if you are right."

The detective's eyes sparkled with animation. It was the first real clue he had hit upon, and Brett's method of complimenting him on the fact did not disconcert him.

"Of course I'm right. You have done so well with the maid that I leave her in your hands. Try the coachman and the cook. But keep me informed of your progress."

Winter rushed off elated. So persistent was he in striving to elucidate this new problem that he paid no heed for some days to the side-light furnished by Jane Harding and her exceedingly curious powers as a letter-writer.

Brett purposely left the inquiry to the policeman. He realised intuitively that the disappearance of Lady Delia would soon be explained, but he shrank from subjecting Mrs. Hilmer to the ordeal of further questioning.

His abstinence was rewarded later in the week, for Mensmore came to see him.

The young man wore an expression of settled melancholy which surprised the barrister greatly.

"Have you prevailed on your sister to take us into her confidence?" said Brett, when Mensmore was ensconced in a chair in his cosy sitting-room.

"No. She is more fixed than ever in her resolve to take the whole blame on herself."

"Surely this mistaken idea can be shaken?"

"I fear not."

"And you share it yourself?"

"I do. Bear with us, Brett. This is a terrible business. It has broken me up utterly."

"Nonsense. You are in no way concerned save to shield your sister, and no one credits her wild statements regarding complicity in this crime."

"Look here, Brett, I have come to ask you if this investigation cannot be allowed to rest. It means a lot of misery that you cannot foretell or prevent. Knowing what I do I cannot believe Lady Delia was murdered."

"Knowing what I do I can accept no other conclusion. A worthy and estimable lady leaves her home suddenly, without the slightest imaginary cause, and she is found in the Thames with a piece of iron driven into her brain whilst the medical evidence is clear that death was not due to drowning. What other inference can be drawn than that she was foully done to death?"

"Heaven help me, I cannot tell. Yet I appeal to you to let matters rest where they are if it is possible."

"It is not possible. I cannot control the police. I am merely a private agent acting on my own responsibility and on behalf of Lady Delia's relatives."

"Don't misunderstand me, Brett. I am not asking this thing on account of my sister or myself."

"On account of whom, then?"

Mensmore did not answer for a moment. He looked mournfully into the fire for inspiration.

"Perhaps I had better tell you," he said, "that I have broken off my engagement with Miss Browne."

Brett jumped up from his chair. "What the dickens do you mean?" he cried.

"Exactly what I have said. When we met on Monday night, I could not mention that Sir William and Lady Browne and their daughter travelled back to England with us. On Tuesday I saw Phyllis. In view of the shadow thrown on us by this frightful charge I thought it my duty to release her from any ties to me. If my sister has to figure in a court of law as a principal, or accomplice, in a murder case—and possibly myself with her—I could not consent to associate my poor Phyllis' name with mine. So I took the plunge."

"You are a beastly idiot," shouted Brett. "If I had the power I would give you six months' hard labour this moment. Who ever threatened to put your sister, or you, in the dock."

"You have done your best that way, you know."

"I?—I have shielded you throughout."

"I feel that. But your own admission shows that I am right. Shielded us from what? From arrest by the police, of course."

"But why take this precipitate action? What has Lady Delia's death to do with your marriage with Miss Browne?"

"That's it, Brett. I cannot explain. I just have to endure silently."

"Did you give her any reason for your absurd resolution?"

"Yes. I could have no secrets from her."

"Did you inflict all this wretched story on a woman you loved and hoped to marry."

"You may be as bitter as you like. That is my idea of square dealing at any rate. What other pretext could I invite for—for giving her up?"

Mensmore found it hard to get the words out. In his heart Brett pitied him, though he raged at this lamentable result of the only bright interlude in the whole story of death and intrigue.

"And what did Miss Browne say?"

"Oh, she just pooh-poohed the whole business and pretended to laugh at me, though she was crying all the time."

"A nice kettle of fish you have made of it," growled Brett. "You help your sister in her folly of silence and then proceed to give effect to it by ruining your own happiness and that of your affianced wife. Have you seen Miss Browne since?"

"No"

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

A

STANDS FOR

Alexandra,

OUR QUEEN.

Every lady in the land should read the illustrated article about her in

Every lady in the land should read the illustrated article about her in

The Lady's Magazine.

READY MARCH 9th. . . . SIXPENCE.

ORDER AT ONCE AS IT IS SURE TO GO OUT OF PRINT.

Digitized by Google

THE EDITOR'S PAGE.

The new features introduced into Short Stories last week, viz., the tales entitled "A Keeper of Secrets" and "Tales Told Off Duty" (which, of course, you are reading) by no means exhaust our improvements. While we have, metaphorically speaking, taken off our coat in order to cope with the additional work which new features always entail, we have decided to put a new coat altogether on Short Stories. And very smart the new cover will look, as you will see for yourself next week. By the way, you might ask your friends to look out for it, too. And your enemies as well, for that matter, though after being introduced to Short Stories they could not, I feel sure, remain your enemies any longer. They would recognise at once that such a good turn deserved another, and a reconciliation would be the upshot. So you will observe that, in addition to being the best fiction paper in existence, Short Stories may become a royal road to good-fellowship.

❦❦❦

"Frank" of Kilburn lives away from his people, who reside in Northampton. He is on perfectly good terms with them, writes to them occasionally and sees them two or three times a year. But his "dear old dad" has a paternal bone to pick with him on the score that he doesn't write often enough. "I would write more frequently," says my correspondent, "but the fact is, I never know what to say. I stick pretty closely to my work and live a commonplace, humdrum life in which nothing happens that is worth chronicling. So I am always in a difficulty as to how to write other than a few bald sentences."

Don't worry, "Frank," but write oftener. Depend upon it, the "dear old dad" doesn't regard your letters as so many "bald sentences." It is not the details of your letters that he prizes. What he wants is to hear from you, even though yours be the briefest of epistles. For so long as he receives any communication from you he will know that he is in your thoughts. And that is a tenderly-prized reflection to the parental mind.

❦❦❦

"R. P." asks me the question as to why civil servants are uncivil.

"While," he writes, "all sorts and conditions of shopkeepers are the very incarnation of politeness, civil servants are the exact contrary. I allude more particularly to post-office clerks, who, to my mind, are the most careless, negligent and impolite body of people I have ever known. Why they are so I can't imagine. Certainly they have no sort of right to be. For when all is said they are the servants of the public, not, as they would have us suppose, the masters. Frequently, I have entered a post-office, and been kept waiting for several minutes for a penny stamp, solely because the lady behind the counter was not disposed to put down the novel she was reading, or was so engrossed in carrying on a flirtation with somebody else in the place. Nor are my charges of neglect and impoliteness confined to the female clerks. The men are equally culpable in this connection. Now, as a taxpayer, I must strongly protest against this abuse of the public funds."

❦❦❦

My correspondent is a little sweeping in his charges. I am bound to say that, although I have met post-office clerks who were not over attentive to business, I have also met those who went out of their way to be obliging. "R. P." should remember the old saying about "black sheep," and should not attack a class for the sake of a few offenders.

❦❦❦

Apropos of this subject, have you ever heard the story of Lord Rosebery and the post-office clerk? It was during his lordship's tenure of the Premiership that he one day went into a post-office to send a wire. Wishing to be quite explicit in the message, he was rather more diffuse than one is wont to be. Whereupon the clerk, who did not know Lord Rosebery, and who was of an officious character, impertinently remarked that the sender of the wire seemed to have a lot of money to waste.

❦❦❦

Lord Rosebery gave him one glance, then quickly ascertaining the name of the impudent official from another clerk, filled up a second form and addressed it to the Postmaster-General, and requested that the clerk should be removed from his position. The clerk, on seeing the signature "Rosebery" to this wire, turned white and red and white again, stammered out a dozen apologies, and behaved generally like a man who is quaking from head to foot. The upshot of it was that Lord Rosebery, after giving him one or two words of very cogent advice, promised to overlook the matter. Since that time that clerk has been one of the most polite of men.

"Terence" has a little suggestion to make which, if adopted, would do much to turn the industrial methods of the world upside down.

"I am extremely fond of outdoor sports and exercises," he writes, "but except on Saturday afternoons have very few opportunities of indulging in them. This is because I am employed in an office all day, and by the time my work is done it is too dark for al fresco occupations. Now what I want to suggest is this: Why should we not work at night instead of in the daytime? Start say at five p.m.; work till one a.m.; then sleep, and have the beautiful daylight in which to recreate. By such an arrangement employers would get the same number of hours from their workpeople, while the latter would have conferred upon them an inestimable boon. What glorious times one could have—a football match every afternoon."

Very likely "Terence," but you seem to forget that life is not all beer and football matches. Apart from our pleasures, there is always staring us in the face the hard grim fact that we must live, notwithstanding the satirist's remark that he didn't see the necessity. In order to live we must work, and the fittest time to work is after sleep. Just imagine, after a couple of hours at "Soccer," having to go and do eight hours work. You wouldn't like it, would you "Terence"? And there are other objections to your suggestion, if you carefully think the matter over.

SHORT STORIES
ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ,,	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,,	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,,	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,,	12 10 0
,, half ,, ,,	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, March 12th, if intended for the issue on sale March 26th, and dated March 30th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Height 12ins. Width 7ins.

Rye Clock

(WITH ALARUM) 18/-

WE will supply any reader of Short Stories with one of these 18/- Alarum Clocks on monthly payments as follows:

YOU send us 2/6 with your name and address, and we will send you one on approval.

IF you approve of it, you send us 3/- on receipt, and 2/6 each month for five months, making the full 18/-.

BUT OUR NET-CASH-WITH-ORDER PRICE IS 16/- ONLY.

And we will refund the Cash sent, if you do not approve of the Clock, and you return it at once. (Signed) J. N. MASTERS.

A FREE TRIAL FOR 2/6

OUR 20th CENTURY CATALOGUE

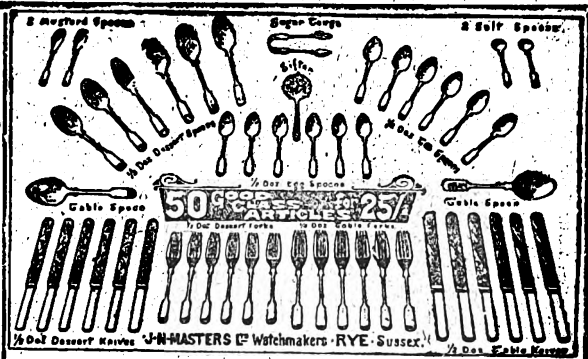
containing illustrations of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, &c., &c., at 20 per cent. below London prices will be sent to any address on receipt of postcard.



OUR TERMS.

We will supply any reader of Short Stories with one of our Parcels of Cutlery on monthly payments as follows:—

YOU send us 2/6 and your name and address, and we will send you one on approval.

IF you do approve of it you send us 2/6 more on receiving parcel, and 5/- each month for four months, making the full 25/-.

BUT OUR NET-CASH-WITH-ORDER PRICE IS 22/6 ONLY.

And we will refund the cash sent if you do not approve of the parcel and you return it at once. (Signed) J. N. MASTERS.

Each Parcel contains 50 High-Class Table Articles.

RETAIL CASH PRICES.

6	White Bone Table Knives	3/6
6	,, Dessert ,,	3/-
6	"Warewite" Table Forks	5/3
6	,, Dessert ,,	3/9
2	,, Table Spoons	1/9
6	,, Dessert ,,	3/9
6	,, Tea Spoons	2/-
1 pair	,, Sugar Tongs	1/-
1 only	,, Sugar Sifter	1/6
6	,, Egg Spoons	1/6
2	,, Salt Spoons	1/-
2	,, Mustard Spoons	1/-

50 "Good Enough for a Gentleman's Table."

PLEASE NOTE! That we also supply other goods on similar terms.

SILVER, 2/-

Gold 20/-

Any name supplied.

J. N. MASTERS LIMITED, "VERACITY" WATCHMAKERS, &C., RYE, SUSSEX.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

THE DAILY EXPRESS.

HALFPENNY.

A FREE GIFT.

500 40-EGG INCUBATORS,

Ladies and Gentlemen can greatly increase their incomes by POULTRY BREEDING, thus converting 1d. Eggs into 1s. Chickens. To encourage this industry we intend supplying each applicant during the next 28 days with one of our 40-Egg Incubators.

Write for Gift Free Form to POULTRY BREEDERS' APPLIANCE Co., 422 Kingsland Road, London, N.E.

SILVER QUEEN CYCLES.

ON MONTHLY PAYMENTS Enormous Stock. New and second-hand. From 10s. MONTHLY. Carriage paid. ILLUSTRATED PRICE LISTS POST FREE any address. SILVER QUEEN CYCLE CO. LTD., 231 Tottenham Court Road, London, W.

A BOY'S NORFOLK SUIT

can be made by any lady who follows carefully the Paper Pattern and instructions

GIVEN AWAY

with every copy of

THIS WEEK'S

HOME NOTES.

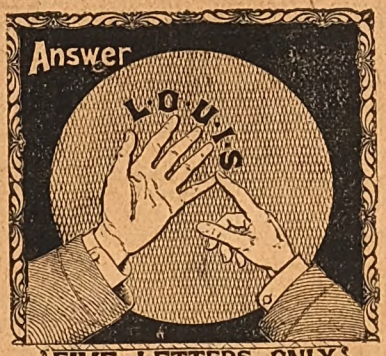
The Best and Daintiest of Ladies' Weeklies. You should get a copy at once.

ONE PENNY.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

HOW DO YOU SPELL VELVETEEN?



FIVE LETTERS ONLY.

Don't Forget this when You Buy.

Every Yard is Stamped L-O-U-I-S

PREVENT FRAUD

of CHEAP GERMAN air tubes fitted to genuine outer covers of

DUNLOP TYRES

Examine Air-tube Trade Mark=

Trade Mark.

Doubtful tyres tested at any of our depots. No charge.

The most expensive rubber made is employed in GENUINE Dunlop air-tubes.

The DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE CO. Ltd.,
FACTORY: Alma Street, Coventry.

BRANCHES: London, Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Nottingham, Manchester, Glasgow, Dublin, &c.

Estd.] [1790.

WE WILL EXCHANGE FREE

Any Garments worn by Ladies, Gentlemen, or Children of

THE "GRIFFIN" BRAND OF PURE
WOOLLEN UNDERWEAR
should they become too small by Shrinkage in the wash.

Ask your Draper or Hosier for them, and see "Griffin" Brand Tab is sewn on each.

WRITE FOR NAME OF NEAREST AGENT.

F. & W. E. WHITE, Loughborough.

NATURE'S AID TO THE SKIN

Icilma

Icilma is the modern Fountain of Youth Fejery

THE OXYGENICED NATURAL WATER

The only Natural and absolutely Safe Remedy for the Complexion, for Bruises, Chapped Skins, Chilblains, Roughness from East Winds and all Irritations of the Skin. "ICILMA" stops bleeding immediately, and with a magnifying glass the skin can be actually seen to grow over a cut or wound. Never be without it: and if a Clear, Smooth, Transparent Skin is desired, use always ICILMA SOAP MADE WITH ICILMA WATER.

(N.B.—"Icilma" has been examined at Somerset House, and as a Natural Mineral Water is exempt from the Patent Medicine Stamp.)

"ICILMA" ACTS AT ONCE AND LIKE MAGIC. Shilling Bottles (Scented 2s.)
Of all Chemists or from Barclay & Sons Ltd., 95 Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

ZEBRA

Grate Polish

No Hard Work.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

No. 637.] For Week Ending March 16, 1901. [One Penny.

Short Stories

A Weekly Magazine for Home and Train

In a Sedan Chair

Digitized by Google

"No Better Food."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa

300 GOLD MEDALS, &c.

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c., lecturing on Foods, says:—"The chief text in the Gospel of Nutrition is that Tea and Coffee are not Foods at all, while Cocoa is an admirable and sustaining diet. Than FRY'S PURE CONCENTRATED COCOA, no better food product of this nature can be obtained or used."

N.B.—Sold only in tins with gilt tops.

PHOTOS. PHOTOS. PHOTOS.

From Carte or Cabinet.

One Permanent 12 by 10 Enlargement, Mounted on Plate sunk mount, measuring 20 by 16, with six highly-glazed cabinet Portraits of same for 1/6
3 Cabinets 2/6; 6 for 3/6; 12 for 6/-. 6 Cartes 2/-; 12 for 3/-; 24 for 5/6. All sent carriage paid. Send to day P.O. to H. BRADBURY, Photographer, The Chase, SOUTHGATE.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.
GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS
148 Old Street, London, E.C.

A FREE GIFT.

500 40-EGG INCUBATORS.

Ladies and Gentlemen can greatly increase their incomes by POULTRY BREEDING, thus converting 1d. Eggs into 1s. Chickens. To encourage this industry we intend supplying each applicant during the next 28 days with one of our 40-Egg Incubators.
Write for Gift Free Form to POULTRY BREEDERS' APPLIANCE CO., 422 Kingsland Road, London, N.E.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "I may send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Walnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Coniston, says: "I wish much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

Don't Cough—use

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves.
Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

Keating's Lozenges

£500 CASH FREE

NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

We give you your choice of either of our £2 10s. REAL SILVER WATCH (with chain), or A REAL GOLD RING set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones, for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money.

Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the Jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

We are giving away £100 per Month during March, April, May, June, and July, making £500 in all. Is not this worth trying for? Particulars with each packet of Jewellery sent out by us.

Send no money. Write to-day.
BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 5)
252 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Co's CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. Assorted sample boxes, 6d., to be obtained from all Stationers. If out of stock, send 7 stamps direct to the works, Birmingham.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 637.] For the Week Ending March 16th, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

A Keeper of Secrets

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Being Days in the Professional Life of the late Mr. Hugo Pontifex, the Famous West-end Solicitor.

To those who had only met him casually in Society, the late Mr. Pontifex was a good-tempered mystery. Bluff, handsome, and, in spite of his middle-age, a little of a dandy, he seemed the last man in the world to deserve his reputation, which was that of the keenest, most audacious, and unerring of family lawyers. Fair-haired, and powerful as an athlete, his striking appearance was increased by his eyes, one of which was grey and one blue.

In reality, however, Hugo Pontifex had a wide and almost exclusively aristocratic practice. He seldom briefed a barrister, seldom set foot in a court of justice, but single handed he hunted down, captured, and safely buried mystery after mystery of terrible import to Mayfair and Belgravia.

An expert in strangling scandal, he lived a life of enthralling interest, and died a rich man. When his executors went through his papers they found nothing to satisfy their curiosity, though plenty to excite it. Hugo Pontifex knew the value of fire—and the dangers of ink. But from time to time he related to the writer, who enjoyed a certain measure of his confidence, the incidents which form the basis of the following stories. In speaking of these strange fragments of drama, Mr. Pontifex himself employed fictitious names, the present author being left to guess vainly at the identity of the genuine actors.

THE INCIDENT AT THE RED VILLAS.

THE window of Mr. Pontifex's private room looked out upon St. James' Street and was peculiarly high and narrow.

The blind hung always to the middle bar of the sashes, and a tall panel of wire gauze screened the apartment from the glance of the passer-by.

Mr. Pontifex, however, saw most of what went on in the famous thoroughfare, and many an actual and possible client traversed the solicitor's field of vision without dreaming how closely they had been scrutinized by the sharpest eyes in London.

As Mr. Pontifex, early one bright October morning, sat opening his letters, he was aware that, on the other side of the gauze panel, a pair of dashing greys were drawing to the kerb a small landau, in which, nestling among furs, there swayed the figure of a young girl. A moment the lawyer studied the pretty face, with its large dark orbs, its rippling, childish curls on brow and temples, and its clearly-cut, aristocratic features. Then he occupied himself once more with his correspondence.

He was soon interrupted by a tap at the door beyond which the deaf clerk kept his invariable guard. Absent mindedly, Mr. Pontifex called to him to enter. The stooping form shuffled across the floor in its shabby garments and laid a card on the writing-table. The solicitor scanned it. It read:

MISS MURIEL WAKEFORD.

"Show her in," commanded Mr. Pontifex, still absorbed in his letters.

The clerk retreated with his usual clumsy quietness. When he reappeared it was to announce the caller. The lawyer looked up, throwing off his preoccupation. To his surprise he beheld the very figure that had so recently been visible through his office window.

Miss Muriel Wakeford was as nervous as she was handsome, and as handsome as she was well-dressed. For an instant she gazed anxiously at the solicitor. After a searching inspection of his acute countenance, she inquired falteringly:

"Mr. Pontifex, I believe?"

"The same," said Mr. Pontifex, smiling at the simple caution of his charming client; "what can I have the pleasure——?" He paused suggestively.

The visitor pushed her fur cloak from her young shoulders.

"Please!" she answered eagerly, "I want you to help me out of the most awful trouble I was ever in. They say you are very clever and kind, and that you never, never let things get into the papers."

"I shall hope to sustain my reputation in your service, Miss Wakeford," replied the solicitor; "but may I not learn what I am to keep out of the papers?"

Muriel Wakeford coloured up to her brown lashes.

"I—I am engaged," she stammered, "or, at least, I was—oh, dear, how am I going to start! Mr. Pontifex, I'm to be married in a month, and what I shall do if you don't help me, I can't imagine."

[All rights reserved.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Pontifex smiled again, in spite of himself.

"Hadn't you better begin at the beginning?" he observed. "I think I might grasp the case more easily in that fashion."

"Forgive me!" begged his pretty client. "You see, it's this way. I'm in love with Mr. Allan Temple; we have known one another since we were boy and girl. But we didn't realise that we cared for each other till about six months ago, when Albert—he is Allan's twin brother—began to show me a lot of attention. Then our eyes were opened, and Allan and I knew that we—we loved one another, and that we always had done. So we engaged ourselves, just before I went to Nice with Aunt Margery."

"Wait until I return," Pontifex instructed, and they saw him vanish into the night.

Mr. Pontifex nodded gravely—to indicate that he had appreciated these momentous details.

"Well," pursued Miss Wakeford, "Allan and I wrote regularly, and at last there came a dreadful piece of news. Albert had taken my engagement with Allan so much to heart, they said, that it had turned his brain. They had been obliged to shut him up, with a doctor to take charge of him, in one of the garrets of the house in Regent's Park—the Temples live in Regent's Park when they are in town. Allan is exactly half-an-hour older than Albert, so he inherited all his uncle's fortune. But he has always given Albert a good allowance, and I thought it just like him when he wrote me that he was having a resident specialist and doing everything that was possible for the poor fellow."

Mr. Pontifex bent his bushy brows—he was listening shrewdly to Muriel Wakeford's disjointed story.

"I came back from Nice," continued Muriel, hesitatingly; "and—and Allan and I were often together, as we had been before. Yet I felt as if we had drifted miles apart in the few weeks we had been separated, and I even caught myself wondering how I could ever have imagined myself in love with him. Finally, I tried to break off the engagement, but he was too determined for me, and Aunt Margery began to arrange for the — the wedding. That frightened me, for I had made up my mind that, whether I ever had loved Allan or not, I didn't love him now."

Muriel Wakeford leant across the writing-table by which she was seated.

"Yesterday," she said, "the truth flashed upon me, and I understood why my love for Allan seemed dead. Allan Temple isn't Allan at all, but Albert."

Mr. Pontifex had commenced to twist his sapphire ring—an infallible sign that he was deeply interested. His client proceeded, encouraged by the lawyer's calm reception of this astounding statement.

"Allan and Albert," she added, "were so alike from childhood that when they became older Allan wore a moustache and Albert didn't, in order that people might distinguish them. For years that has been the only striking difference between them. And now, absurd as it may sound, Mr. Pontifex, I am positive that the man who calls himself Allan Temple, whom I am supposed to love, and whom I am actually about to marry, is, in reality, Albert Temple, whom I always feared, perhaps almost hated. He has grown a moustache such as Allan wore, and the disguise is sufficient for everyone in the world but me. And, if I had not loved Allan, I, too, should have been deceived."

"In that case," demanded the solicitor coolly," who is the unfortunate gentleman that is asserted to be mad?"

Muriel shuddered.

"It—it must be my poor darling," she murmured; "that is, if anybody is mad. This is what I want you to find out for me, Mr. Pontifex. If the person who is believed to be Albert is Allan all the time, then I am certain that he isn't the least bit mad, but that Albert has only shut him up in order to take his place and try to marry me; and, if he is a prisoner in that wretched house, Mr. Pontifex, he must be set free, whatever it costs. I can pay; my money is my own now—I was twenty-one last birthday."

Muriel Wakeford looked very lovely as she made this spirited speech; had not Mr. Pontifex been lost in a reverie, he would doubtless have admired her extremely. But he was engrossed in his sapphire ring, which he had been twisting industriously for fully five minutes. It stopped merely that Mr. Pontifex might reach to a sheet of scribbling-paper.

"May I ask for the address of the Temples' house in

Digitized by Google

Regent's Park," he observed, picking up his favourite pen-holder of gold and cornelian.

"Number twelve, Romanoff Avenue," replied his client, impressed, as were all who had similar experience of Hugo Pontifex, by his quiet directness.

"And your own address?" queried the lawyer. Miss Wakeford repeated it—it was that of a mansion in the dull but wealthy locality of Portman Square.

"Thank you," concluded Mr. Pontifex, touching the bell at his elbow; "as soon as I have anything to report, you shall hear from me. Meanwhile, if I may be pardoned a word of advice, Miss Wakeford, keep your suspicions to yourself. Good morning!"

As the door closed behind the graceful young figure, Mr. Pontifex began to slip off his frock-coat. In its stead he donned a loose jacket and the same unfashionable overcoat that he had chosen from his professional wardrobe for that expedition into Soho, which proved of such importance to the Bantry peerage. A flat-topped felt hat dealt a final blow to his legal appearance.

Mr. Pontifex hung up his frock-coat and glossy "silk" in the capacious corner-cupboard, locked away the rings that ordinarily glittered upon his white hands, and took a heavy umbrella. Thus equipped, he passed out through his private door, and chartered a hansom to convey him in the direction of Regent's Park.

Half-an-hour later he was surveying Number Twelve, Romanoff Avenue, having dismissed his cab at a hundred yards distance, and approached his goal on foot.

Number Twelve was a huge, semi-detached villa of red-brick—four stories and a basement, with ample garden. The loftiest floor had, in the middle, an ornamental dormer window, with a pointed roof. This window was spanned, from sill to lintel, with stout horizontal bars. Mr. Pontifex noted this with satisfaction; those bars lent to Miss Wakeford's extravagant statement a kind of support. For the rest, Number Twelve, though conventional, was grim and frowning, especially on an autumn day. Its neighbour, Number Ten, was equally grim and frowning, but much less orderly, being, in fact, to let. Otherwise it was an exact copy of the house with the barred window. Mr. Pontifex read the name of the agent, which was displayed on a discoloured board in the garden, and strolled out of Romanoff Avenue.

When he re-entered that quarter of the Regent's Park district, it was to ascend the steps of Number Ten, and procure admission with a latch-key. He had rented the house—much to the astonishment of the agent—without a preliminary visit to the interior, had paid a quarter in advance, and been yielded possession forthwith. Mr. Pontifex was essentially a man of rapid methods.

The solicitor mounted the dusty staircase that led from the hall to the upper regions. He climbed leisurely to the garret floor, and gained the room with the dormer window.

Muriel looked, and a low cry broke from her lips.

Unlike the corresponding one in Number Twelve it was not barred, but the casement was set flush with the wall, leaving no ledge or parapet to connect the two villas.

Mr. Pontifex explored the other apartments on the same floor. They were a couple of bare and shallow rooms, illuminated by skylights in the almost level roof.

Digitized by Google

The lawyer raised the larger of these and swung himself through. He could move easily on the tiles, and attained in a few strides the brick slip that separated the houses.

From where he stood he could see the skylights of Number Twelve. They were both barred by iron rods, screwed down on the outside of the frames.

The solicitor had learnt all that was immediately necessary; he dropped agilely through the skylight by which he had come, brushed the dust from his garments; and went down again into Romanoff Avenue.

The evening was beginning to close in, and he had had no lunch. He found a restaurant, ordered a steak, and abandoned himself to reflection. His meal eaten, he sallied forth, made several small purchases, got into a cab, had himself driven to Portman Square, and sent in his card to Muriel Wakeford.

He had been shown into the library, a splendid, book-lined place, that suggested, by its rare paintings and rich curios, the extent of the fortune his pretty client had fallen heir to. She joined him at once—an anxious little figure in a trailing tea-gown.

"You have been quick," she said; "oh! I do hope it is good news—is it?"

"That depends," decided Mr. Pontifex; "have you a maid you can trust implicitly?"

"Y-yes," replied Muriel Wakeford, her eyes shining with instant excitement.

"That is lucky," answered the solicitor; "then may I ask you to change that charming dress for a plain walking costume, and tell your maid—the one you can trust—to prepare to accompany you. It would be as well for your footman to summon a four-wheeler—we shall need it. With your permission I will wait."

Muriel Wakeford looked at the cool, masterful face of the lawyer, and drew a sharp breath. But Mr. Pontifex said nothing more, and she hurried away to do his bidding. It was not long before a four-wheeled cab left Portman Square. Inside were Mr. Pontifex, Miss Muriel Wakeford, and a puzzled maid-servant. In silence they were carried to the northern fringe of Regent's Park. Here the solicitor checked the driver, paid the fare, and escorted his companions into the sombre and winding roadways that surround Romanoff Avenue.

Muriel Wakeford started as he led them to the gloomy portal of the house adjoining Number Twelve. Yet she ventured no remark until they had entered, and Mr. Pontifex, having produced a tiny dark lantern, was busily putting a match to the wick.

"Am I—are you going to let me see him?" she murmured quiveringly.

"I trust so," responded the lawyer; "you seem to be the only person who can distinguish between the brothers. Naturally, I do not want to make any mistake. But all this is in the nature of an experiment."

Carefully veiling the lantern, that it might not be seen from the street, he pioneered them up the staircases towards the garret. The yellow rays flung mysterious shadows about them as they ascended. Under the skylight by which Mr. Pontifex had investigated the roofs of the red villas, he paused to give the lantern to the maid, and once more swung himself up.

"Wait until I return," he instructed, and they saw him vanish into the night.

Surmounting the brick slip between the tiles of Number Ten and Number Twelve, the lawyer approached the skylights of the latter. One was illuminated—the radiance pierced the darkness with a gilded beam. Mr. Pontifex peered in. In an armchair below there sat a young man, reading. From somewhere in the chamber a light fell full on his countenance. He was melancholy, but handsome, and wore a well-shaped black moustache.

He rose to go, but found himself seized in a grip of steel.

The solicitor retraced his steps to the skylight of Number Ten.

"Help your mistress up," he told the maid. The girl obeyed, and Mr. Pontifex, with a steady contraction of his powerful muscles, was able to draw Muriel Wakeford through the opening. She was very quiet and determined, yet trembled nevertheless.

"Stay where you are," the lawyer ordered her maid, and himself steered his client's course across the roofs. When they were near the illuminated window of Number Twelve, Mr. Pontifex motioned to her to look in. Muriel did so and a low cry broke from her lips.

Digitized by Google

"It is Allan," she cried: "oh, my darling, how could they say you were mad?"

The sound of her voice penetrated the glass and Allan Temple glanced up. For an instant he seemed dazed by the sight of those two watchful faces overhead. But a gleam of intelligence and hope came into his bewildered expression—and he kissed his hand, presumably, to Muriel Wakeford herself.

Mr. Pontifex, now thoroughly convinced of the accuracy of his client's story, extracted from his breast-pocket a strong screw-driver and commenced to remove the bars of the skylight. Allan Temple waited impatiently till the last one was unfastened, and then pushed open the hinged window.

"Quick!" he panted. "Pull me up—it is nearly time for Albert's daily visit. There is not a moment to be lost."

Muriel would have clasped her lover's hands to execute his wishes, but Mr. Pontifex thrust him back.

"Go slowly!" he said. "Mr. Temple, I am a lawyer, and acting in your interests. Instead of escaping, permit Miss Wakeford and I to share your captivity. I suspect that I am to be saved a great deal of trouble."

To Allan Temple's amazement, he slid through the skylight and assisted his young client to descend by means of a table and a chair. This done, he shut the window and restored the furniture to its former position, too diplomatic to observe that, while he was so engaged, the lovers had indulged in a passionate embrace.

"You say," remarked the solicitor, lowering his tones, "that you are expecting a visit from your brother. Do not waste time in explanations—we have guessed all. Decoy your brother, when he arrives, into discussing his plot, offer to give up your property, your name, and your betrothed, if he will only allow you to go abroad. Let him think your spirit broken—it is necessary for my purpose that he be thrown entirely off his guard."

The rattle of a key in the lock struck on their ears—it was that of the door at the summit of the garret stairs. Mr. Pontifex darted into the furthest of the rooms, taking Muriel Wakeford with him. They were scarcely concealed, when a step was heard in the middle apartment, and a man in evening dress appeared. Save for his costume, he was the living image of Allan Temple. For protection against the pretended lunatic, he bore, dangling from his wrist, a ponderous life-protector.

"Hullo," said the visitor, sitting down; "how are you to-night? Docter Pat tells me you're getting positively reasonable. By Jove, I believe he'll cure you one of these days—the clever little scoundrel!"

And Albert Temple laughed heartily.

"Oh, I'm cured right enough now," sighed Allan, taking the cue given him by Mr. Pontifex; "it's no use trying to fight you with this terrible likeness playing into your hands. All I ask is that you will let me go abroad. I can't live and die shut up here."

"Ah!" retorted his brother, cheerfully; "I thought you'd appreciate the situation sooner or later. You're right, Allan, my boy, I am one too many for you, with Doctor Pat to swear—at a price—that you're as mad as a hatter, and Murie Wakeford getting ready to marry me, as the real Allan Temple, in a month."

Allan groaned theatrically, but held his tongue. He had no desire to check the revelations which were being made before the hidden witnesses.

"I won't be hard on you," pursued his brother tolerantly; "a week after I'm married you shall be shipped off to Canada, with five hundred pounds in your pouch and two hundred a year as long as you're good. For the present, you're safer up here, though I'm glad you've decided to be sensible. Ta-ta!"

He rose to go, but found himself seized in a grip of steel. Mr. Pontifex had caught him round the neck from behind, and, holding him in a strangling clutch, was issuing low commands with military brevity and precision. In the twinkling of an eye Albert Temple was gagged, deprived of his life-protector, and bound in a chair.

From a natty case the lawyer fished out his pair of pocket-scissors, and dexterously snipped off the moustache of the writhing Albert—that moustache by whose aid he had been able to masquerade as Muriel Wakeford's betrothed. Then, carrying him into Allan's bedroom, the lawyer and the pretended lunatic stripped the plotter of his evening attire. This Allan substituted for his own lounge-suit, the latter being forced upon the struggling limbs of Albert Temple. The transformation completed, Albert was unbound, relieved of his gag, and deposited on the bed. Mr. Pontifex, putting away his scissors, delivered a pithy explanation.

"My dear sir," he said, "you are now Albert Temple again, and, thanks to your own machinations, that person is supposed to be as mad as a hatter. Ultimately, no doubt, we shall allow you to be cured, and sent abroad to Canada. But, for the present, you are safer up here. Your brother will be too busy with his approaching marriage to be responsible for you."

He drew up the table, lifted a chair on it, and aided Muriel Wakeford to mount to the open skylight, before Albert Temple's incredulous gaze. The lawyer followed her, after seeing the other twin-brother safely out of the garret.

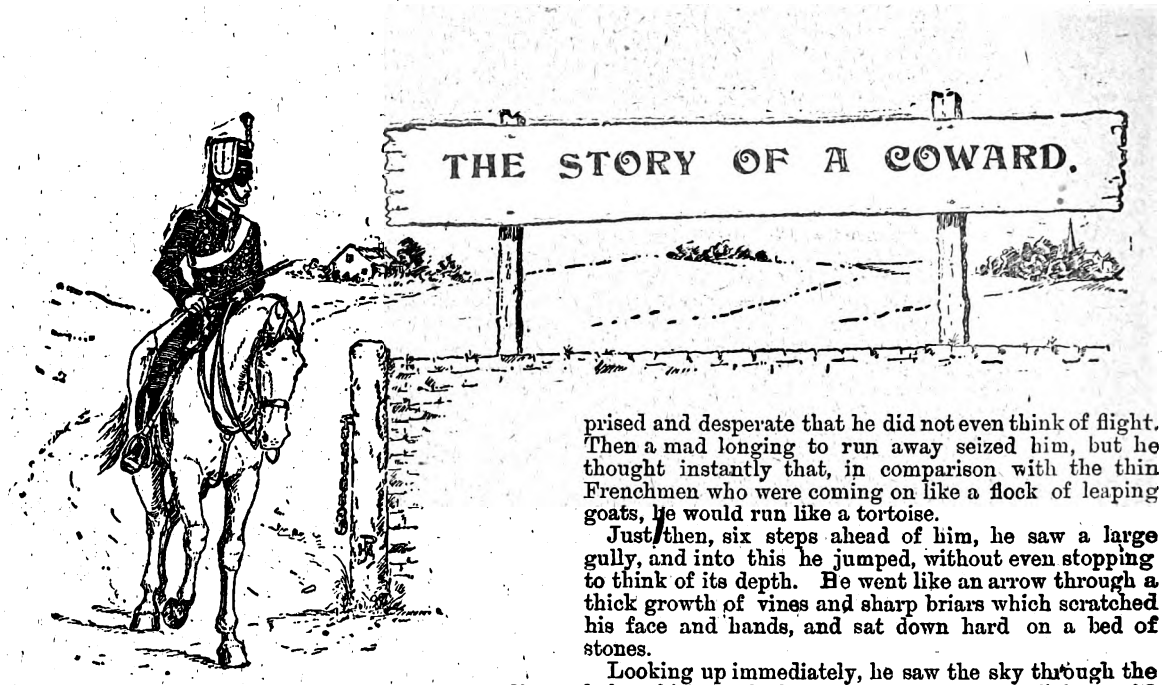
"If Mr. Allan Temple chooses to call at Portman Square, to-night," he remarked, just before the door at the top of the stairs was closed by the man he had so cleverly rescued, "Miss Wakeford will probably be at home. As for myself, I will only say au revoir."

He replaced the furniture once more in its customary position, and, keeping a vigilant watch on the sullen Albert, swung himself up again to the roof. Having screwed down the bars with deliberate skill, he led his pretty client back to her wondering maid and the open skylight of Number Ten. In his pocket—as a memento—he carried the life-protector.

* * * * *

Mr. Pontifex's prophecy proved true. For a month Albert Temple was held under lock and key. Not until the Temple-Wakeford marriage was a week old did he descend from the floor with the barred windows. And then it was upon the certificate of the rascally little Irish doctor, with whom he had plotted to defraud his brother of wife and fortune. But "Doctor Pat"—being generously treated by Mr. Pontifex—kept his own counsel, and gravely congratulated his "patient" on a "surprising recovery."

Digitized by Google



EVER since he entered France with the invading German army, Walter Schnaffs had considered himself the unhappiest of men. He was stout, walked with difficulty, puffed a good deal, and suffered much from his feet, which were flat and very fat. He was, besides, of a peaceful and kind disposition, not at all heroic or warlike, father of four children, whom he adored, and husband of a fair young wife, whose kisses and caresses and thoughtful care he missed sadly every day. He liked to go to bed early and get up late, to eat good things at his ease, and to drink beer. He believed, moreover, that everything worth having ended with life, and he cherished in his heart a deep hatred, which was both instinctive and rational, for cannon, rifles, revolvers, and swords, and, above all, for bayonets, for he felt that he was not able to wield that weapon quickly enough to defend his large body.

And when at nightfall he went to bed on the ground, rolled up in his cloak beside his snoring comrades, he thought for a long time of those he had left behind, and of the dangers which surrounded his path. If he should be killed, what would become of his little ones? Who would feed them and bring them up?

And sometimes Walter Schnaffs wept. At the beginning of each battle his legs felt so weak that he would have fallen if he had not feared that the whole army would pass over his body. The whistling of the balls made his hair stand on end. And so for months he lived in a state of fear and anguish.

The main body of the troops was advancing towards Normandy, and one day he was sent to reconnoitre with a small detachment which was simply to explore a part of the neigbbourhood and then fall back again. Everything seemed quiet in that district, and nothing indicated an organised resistance, but just as the Prussians were calmly entering a little valley, crossed occasionally by deep gullies, a brisk firing brought them to a standstill, cutting down a score of their number, and a body of sharpshooters, rushing out from a handful of trees, charged them with bayonets fixed.

Walter Schnaffs at first remained motionless, so surprised and desperate that he did not even think of flight. Then a mad longing to run away seized him, but he thought instantly that, in comparison with the thin Frenchmen who were coming on like a flock of leaping goats, he would run like a tortoise.

Just then, six steps ahead of him, he saw a large gully, and into this he jumped, without even stopping to think of its depth. He went like an arrow through a thick growth of vines and sharp briars which scratched his face and hands, and sat down hard on a bed of stones.

Looking up immediately, he saw the sky through the hole which he had made. That tell-tale hole would betray him, and he crawled along on his hands and feet, at the bottom of the ditch, under the roof made by the interlacing branches, going as fast as he could away from the fighting. After a while he stopped and sat down again, squatting like a hare in the tall, dry grass.

For some time he still heard the shots, cries, and moans. Then the sounds of the struggle grew fainter and ceased. All was calm and quiet again. Suddenly something stirred close by him and gave him a frightful start. It was a little bird which had perched on a branch, and rustled the dead leaves.

For nearly an hour Walter Schnaffs' heart beat with great bounds. The night was coming on, filling the gully with shadows, and the soldier began to reflect. What would become of him? What should he do? Must he begin again that horrible life of anguish, terror, fatigue, and suffering which he had led since the beginning of the war? No, he no longer had the courage and the energy necessary to bear the marches and face the incessant dangers.

But what could he do? He could not stay in this ditch and conceal himself until the war was over. No, indeed! If he had not been obliged to eat, that prospect would not have disturbed him; but he was obliged to eat—to eat every day.

Suddenly he thought, "If I were only a prisoner!" and he was filled with a sudden, violent longing to become a prisoner. A prisoner! He would be saved, fed, lodged, sheltered from shots and sabres, without any further apprehension, in a comfortable, well-guarded prison? What a glorious dream! And he immediately decided to make himself a prisoner. He got up, resolved to carry out his plan without a moment's delay.

But suddenly he stopped motionless, assailed by disagreeable thoughts and new terrors. Where was he to go to make himself a prisoner? In which direction, and how? And frightful pictures of death rushed into his mind. He would run great risks in venturing alone about the country in his spiked helmet. What if he should meet some peasants? As soon as they saw a wandering, defenceless Prussian, they would murder him with their pitchforks, their pickaxes, their scythes, their shovels! They would reduce him to a pulp in their rage at their country's defeat. What if he should meet sharpshooters? They would shoot him as soon as they saw him to amuse themselves, to pass away the time, for the fun of the thing.

Digitized by Google

And he fancied himself already standing against the wall, opposite to a dozen gun-barrels, whose little, black, round holes seemed to be looking at him. And if he should meet the French army itself! The vanguard would take him for a scout, for some bold and crafty soldier reconnoitering alone, and they would shoot him down. And he heard already the irregular firing of the soldiers, hidden in a thicket, while he, standing in the middle of the field, sank down, riddled like a sieve, by the balls which he could feel entering his flesh.

He sat down again in desperation. His situation seemed hopeless to him. Night had by this time quite settled down—dumb, black night. He did not move, but trembled at every slight and unknown sound which was heard in the darkness. A rabbit stealing through the leaves nearly put him to flight. The hooting of the owls tore his soul with sudden fears, as painful as wounds. He strained his large eyes to try to pierce the gloom, and every moment he thought he heard a footstep near him.

Into this he jumped.

After endless hours of torture he saw the sky growing light through his roof underbrush. At that a great relief filled him. His muscles relaxed, and he stretched himself with a lightened heart. His eyes closed, and he slept.

When he awoke, the sun seemed to be almost overhead; it must be noon. No noise broke the dull quiet of the fields, and Walter Schnaffs discovered that he was seized with sharp hunger. He rose, walked a few steps, found that his legs were weak, and sat down again to think. For two or three hours he weighed the pros and cons, changing his mind every minute hesitating, unhappy, and distracted by the most conflicting emotions.

One idea seemed to him sufficiently practical: It was to watch until some unarmed villager should pass by, one who had no dangerous farming tools with him, and then to run out and put himself in his hands, making him understand that he surrendered himself. Then he took off his helmet, the spike of which was likely to betray him, and thrust his head out of his hole with infinite precaution. Not a soul was to be seen. Yonder, at the right, the smoke rose towards the sky from the roofs of a little village—smoke from the kitchen fires. At the left he saw, at the end of an avenue of trees, a large house. He waited thus until evening, suffering frightfully, seeing nothing but flocks of crows. And once more night fell around him. He stretched himself at the bottom of his retreat, and slept an uneasy sleep, haunted by nightmares, the sleep of a famished man.

Dawn broke again over his head. Once more he took up his post of observation. But the country was as deserted as it had been the night before, and a new fear possessed him—the fear of dying of hunger! He saw himself stretched at the bottom of his hole, flat on his back, with eyes closed.

This thought nearly maddened him, for he would be overcome with weakness and unable to walk. And he was quite determined to hurry to the village, to dare all, to brave all, when he saw three peasants coming towards the fields with their pitchforks on their shoulders, and he drew back into his hiding-place.

But, as soon as the evening darkened the plain, he crawled slowly out of the ditch, and started off towards the large house, preferring to go there rather than to the village, which seemed as formidable to him as a den of tigers. The lower windows were lighted up. One of them was open, and a strong odour of roast meat came from it, an odour which, rushing through the nostrils of Walter Schnaffs, made him impatient, made him pant for breath, drew him irresistibly forward, and filled his heart with desperate courage.

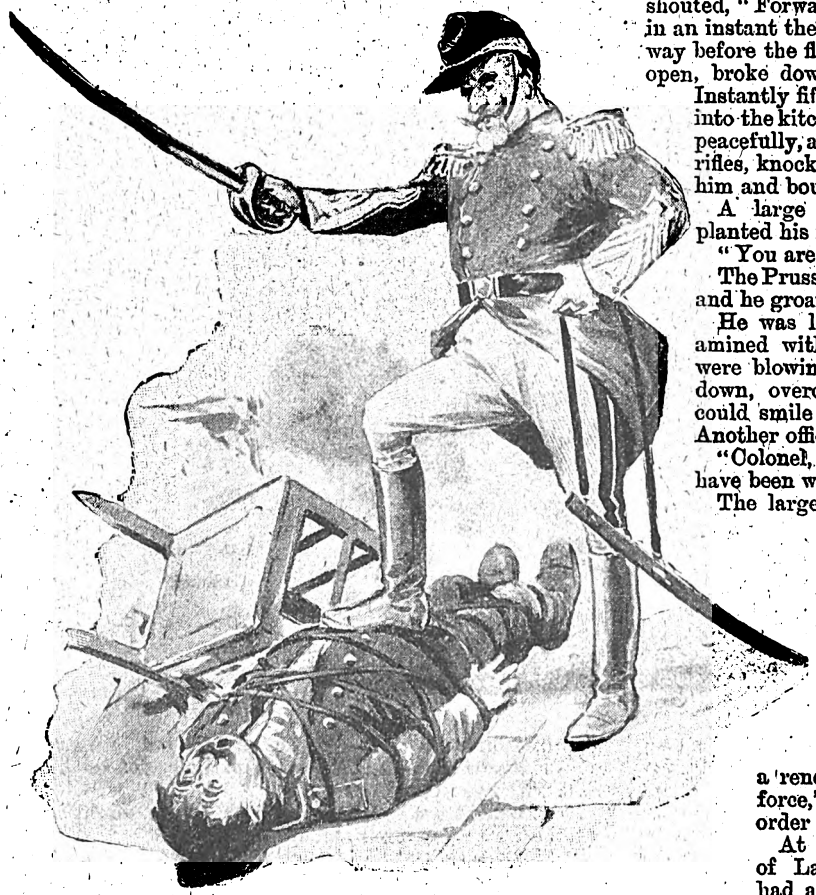
Suddenly, without stopping to think, he appeared with his helmet on in the open window. Eight servants were seated at dinner round a large table. All at once a nurse stopped, open-mouthed, dropping her glass, and stared fixedly ahead of her. All eyes followed hers.

They saw the enemy! Heavens! The Prussians were attacking the house!

Digitized by Google

There was at once a cry, composed of eight screams uttered together by different voices, a cry of frightful terror, then a confused rising, and a stampede to the door at the back of the room. Chairs were knocked down, the men upset the women and rushed over them, and in two seconds the room was empty, abandoned, with the table covered with food standing before the astonished Walter Schnaffs, who was still at the window.

After an instant of hesitation he climbed in and went towards the table. His great hunger made him as weak as a man in a fever, but he was still paralyzed by terror. He listened.



"You are my prisoner! Surrender!"

The whole house was in a tumult; doors were slamming, and rapid footsteps were heard overhead. The uneasy Prussian listened to these noises, and heard dull sounds as if bodies were falling into the soft earth at the foot of the walls, human beings who had leapt from the storey above. Then all movement, all the commotion, stopped, and the great house became as silent as a tomb.

Schnaffs seated himself before a full plate and began to eat. He ate in large mouthfuls, as if he were afraid of being interrupted too soon, before he had had enough. He emptied all the plates, all the dishes, all the bottles; then, satisfied with eating and drinking, stupefied, flushed, his mind uneasy and his tongue thick, he unbuttoned his uniform to breathe more easily, incapable of taking a step. His eyes closed, his thoughts grew confused, he leant his heavy head on his arms folded on the table, and soon lost all idea of persons and things.

The quiet house raised its great black silhouette against the sky. Two windows only on the ground-floor were lighted. Suddenly a voice of thunder shouted, "Forward! To the assault, comrades!" And in an instant the doors, the shutters, the windows gave way before the flood of men who dashed forward, burst open, broke down everything, and invaded the house.

Instantly fifty soldiers, armed to the teeth, rushed into the kitchen where Walter Schnaffs was sleeping peacefully, and placed against his body fifty loaded rifles, knocked him down, rolled him over, seized him and bound him from head to foot.

A large soldier, much bedecked with gold, planted his foot on his stomach, crying out:

"You are my prisoner! Surrender!"

The Prussian heard only the one word "prisoner," and he groaned, "Ya, ya, ya!"

He was lifted up, bound to a chair, and examined with lively curiosity by his captors, who were blowing like whales. Several of them sat down, overcome by emotion and fatigue. He could smile now, sure of being a prisoner at last. Another officer came in and announced:

"Colonel, the enemy has fled; several seem to have been wounded. We are masters of the place."

The large officer wiped his forehead and cried "Victory!" and he wrote in a little memorandum-book which he took out of his pocket:

"After a desperate struggle the Prussians were put to flight, carrying with them their dead and wounded, estimated at fifty. Several of them remain in our possession."

"What orders shall I give?" said the young officer.

"We are going to fall back to avoid a renewed attack with artillery and superior force," answered the colonel, and he gave the order to retire.

At daybreak they reached the prefecture of La Roche-Oysel, whose National Guard had accomplished this feat of arms. The anxious and much-excited townspeople were expecting them. When the prisoner's helmet was seen loud outcries were raised. The women held up their hands, the old ones wept, and an old man threw his crutch at the Prussian, and wounded one of his guards on the nose. The colonel shouted, "Keep the prisoner safe!"

They came at last to the Town Hall. The prison was opened, and Walter Schnaffs, freed from his bonds, was put in it. Two hundred armed men mounted guard round the building. Then, in spite of the symptoms of indigestion which tormented him, the Prussian, wild with joy, began to dance madly about, waving his arms and legs, and laughing crazily, until he fell in a heap, quite exhausted.

He was a prisoner. Saved!

Colonel Rotier, cloth merchant, who managed the affair at the head of the National Guard of La Roche-Oysel, was decorated.

Digitized by Google

THE LION'S WARS

The Two Great Sikh Wars of 1844-1847, 1848-1851.

SOME illusions die hard. On the continent the belief exists to this day that our conquest of India was achieved by marching regiments of Indian soldiers, commanded by British officers, against any native Prince who had, unfortunately for himself, incurred our displeasure, our procedure being to defeat his troops, seize his person, grant him a pension, and annex his dominions.

By this time it must be clear to the reader, that so far from this being the case the wars we have waged with India were forced on us by the ceaseless efforts of the feudatory Princes, whose states we guaranteed against invasion, to drive us out of India.

Once engulfed in a policy of conquest we had to fight our way steadfastly and courageously, foot by foot, till the entire Peninsula acknowledged our sway.

Long before the Sikhs war broke out, our Indian statesmen saw that peace would never be assured till the frontier tribes of the west, and north-west, had been brought under the wing of our motley Empire.

So no sooner had we rescued the inhabitants of Scinde from the grip of the savage Beluchis than we turned our attention to the Punjaub, inhabited by the warlike Sikhs.

We first hear of the Sikhs in the XVI. century. A brave and robust race had migrated to the Punjaub and had become one of the most powerful nations on the frontier of India.

The French, ever our enemies, forseeing that the warlike temperament of the people would sooner or later bring us into conflict with them, secretly introduced into the country, shortly after their defeat at Waterloo, a number of officers who trained the Sikh troops to such a pitch of efficiency, that it was thought by competent judges that they would prove more than a match for the British.

During the life of Runjeet Singh the Lion of the Punjaub (a man of great talent although of poor education) the chieftains had been kept in rigid subjection. A man of indomi able will, he consolidated a number of small estates into one vast kingdom, ruling it with a rod of iron. But the breath was no sooner out of his body than the country fell into a state of anarchy. His eldest son was slain in a brawl, his wife and infant child fled, whilst the army which for years had been pining for conflict, demanded to be led against the British.

The authorities at Calcutta, knowing that the long smouldering hatred of the Sikhs for us would burst into flame, had on the death of Runjeet Singh quietly massed 30,000 men and ninety guns to a camp lying between Meerut and Loodiana under the command of General Sir H. Gough.

One of the first acts of the Sikh army was to insist that General Pollock and his "Army of Retribution," which was to punish the Afghans, and bring away the beleaguered garrisons, should be refused a passage through the Punjaub.

This being declined they insisted on being allowed to raid the convoys and cut the communication. As Sheer Singh, the successor of Runjeet Singh, refused to sanction these proceedings, Ajeet Singh, his brother-in-law, with the connivance of the soldiery, murdered him.

Digitized by Google

Ajeet then, in order to render his rule supreme, proceeded to murder the rest of the royal family.

Unfortunately for his plans two escaped—Djehan Singh and Heerah Singh.

These worthies, after capturing the murderer, handed him to the mob who literally tore him in pieces. After this, murd r and debauchery of every kind marched hand in hand through the Punjaub.

When the pleasures of murdering each other began to pall, the Sikh chiefs began to mass their forces in the neighbourhood of Lahore, their capital.

The mother of Maharajan Dhuleep Singh (a mere boy who now succeeded to the throne), fearing for her own and her son's life, then circulated a report that the British Army, which had been increased to 40,000 men, was intended for the conquest of the Punjaub, besides throwing out hints as to the value of the treasures stored in Agra, Delhi, and Benares. Their cupidity thus roused, the Sikhs at once crossed the Sutlej. The two chiefs who led the Sikhs might easily have crushed the small force stationed on the river bank under Sir John Littler, but a timely bribe from one of the East India Company's secret agents induced them to grant a truce of one week to enable us to retire. This gave time for Sir H. Gough, by means of a forced march of 150 miles in six days under a burning sun, to appear on the scene.

Bitterly repenting of their folly, Lah Singh and Tib Singh attempted to bar Gough's passage with a force of 10,000 infantry and 4,000 cavalry. In the hand to hand struggle which followed the British saw that at last they had met foemen worthy of their steel. After a sanguinary engagement lasting six hours they succeeded in driving the enemy back, but their losses were dreadfully heavy considering the smallness of the attacking force. In this skirmish, as it was called, our casualties were 215 killed, and 607 wounded. A few days later the two British forces effected a junction at Ferozeshuhur.

Having rested his troops, Sir H. Gough, undismayed by the numerical superiority of the foe, which was so great that their front exceeded a mile in extent, resolved to attack. For some reason or other, however, the assault was delayed till the day was far spent, and, to still further cloud the issue, Gough hurled his men at the enemy's position without stopping to think what the enemy would do.

Gough was one of those generals which have always been plentiful in the British Army. Of strategy he had not the slightest notion. His plan was to point to the enemy, shout in a loud voice: "there they are, my lads, and now let us give it them hot," and then placing himself at their head, rush headlong to the attack.

Gough took charge of the right wing, Littler the left, whilst the Governor-General, Sir H. Hardinge, a soldier of rare ability, modestly contented himself with the centre. Gough would not hear of any other plan: his orders to Littler were, "March straight on till you get within a hundred yards and then charge and capture their guns."

Littler did draw attention to the strength of the Sikh position, but Gough rode impatiently off. Littler carried out his instructions. In the teeth of a most tremendous fire his men fought their way right up to the very mouth of the guns. There the storm of bullets worked such deadly havoc that after holding their ground for two hours the ranks became so thinned that they were compelled to retreat.

The attack of General Gough was even more vigorously conducted than that of the left, but the Sikh gunners who had been splendidly trained by the French, fought well. Their fire injured many of our guns, decimated squadrons of horse, whilst their heavy shot tore deep lanes in the ranks of our infantry.

Matters presently began to look so hopeless that Gough ordered a retreat. But his men were in no mood to listen. Heedless of the growing darkness they refused to return and marched on, getting so hopelessly entangled that officers found themselves heading companies of which they knew nothing. All discipline vanished, but there was something which took its place, a fierce determination on the part of our men to bivouac in the enemy's camp.

How they lived through the deadly concentrated fire poured on them during the last hundred yards by their well trained adversaries is not to be explained. But they somehow contrived to get inside the Sikh trenches, and once there refused to budge. This demonstrates that the science of teaching war stops short at the bayonet. The bayonet got them in and the bayonet kept them there. Having cleared all the enemy out, the troops, now thoroughly exhausted, went to sleep beside the dead bodies of their victims although their position was one of great danger, the main body of the Sikhs being only a short distance off.

At another part of the field the position was equally critical. Sir Harry Smith, who subsequently defeated the Boers at the battle of Boomplats in the Orange Free State, by dint of severe fighting had actually fought his way into the heart of the Sikh position. Followed by a body of our wonderful infantry, Sir Harry even obtained possession of the village of Ferozeshuhur and would have made good his position had supports been sent up. These not being forthcoming, this same matchless infantry seeing they were surrounded, cut their way out, but retreat further than two miles they would not.

Sir Henry Hardinge was more successful. In spite of a most destructive fire, his men fought their way right up to the edge of the Sikh position, intrenched and held their ground despite all efforts to dislodge them. The night was bitterly cold, the men in all parts of the field were without food or covering, but no one murmured, for they all knew that next morning they would either have to defeat the enemy or die dishonourably on the field. During the night the Govenor-General went among the soldiers, told them that the losses had been tremendous, and offered to retreat to Ferozepur, but they all repudiated the idea with disdain. It was well they did, for in the night a serious quarrel broke out in the Sikh camp.

The soldiers having demanded their pay, which was greatly in arrears, it was declared that the military chest had been rifled. The two chiefs, Lal Singh and Tib Singh, were both accused of the theft and recriminations were fast ripening the quarrel into a fight when the British appeared.

The temper of our men was shown at the commencement of the battle. A powerful gun had been run forward over a mile to check our central advance. Although it was protected by 5,000 of the Sikh crack shots, the brave 80th made a dash for the gun and despite all the efforts of the Sikhs, carried it off.

In the meantime, Sir Henry Hardinge on the left, and Sir Hugh Gough on the right, marched on, despite

Digitized by Google

Drawn by] The Sikhs rode into our disorganised ranks. [Lawson Wood.

Digitized by Google

volleys of musketry, till the Sikh lines were reached. Then they made straight for Ferozeshuhur, the carrying of which—for five assaults on it were repulsed—entailed a fearful loss of life. So soon as the village was taken the two wings changed front and swept the whole of the Sikh position from end to end like a hurricane.

Still victory hung in the balance. Our men were beginning to think about dinner, when Tib Singh and 20,000 splendid Sikhs and seventy guns, came in sight. Dismayed at finding the village in our hands, and little dreaming that the troops were quite worn out, they contented themselves with a distant bombardment and retired. Had they attacked, nothing could have saved our Army from total destruction. Our losses in this battle were terrible, the number being nearly 3,000, of whom 1,721 were killed outright. We killed 2,000 Sikhs and wounded 6,000 more, besides capturing seventy-three guns.

Although we had captured seventy-three guns, the Sikhs withdrew so slowly across the Sutlej, that it soon came to be believed that the battle could hardly be called a victory for our arms. A fresh campaign was therefore undertaken in order that the honour and prestige of Britain might be thoroughly vindicated. But the time spent in collecting supplies was so great that the Sikhs, misunderstanding the cause, again at the end of January, 1846, crossed the Sutlej and advanced against the important station of Loodiana. In order to prevent the Sikhs attacking a valuable convoy from Delhi, Sir Harry Smith moved to Aliwal, and at once came into contact with the Sikh army, 15,000 strong, under Runjur Singh. Our general had only 11,000 men, but having the instincts of a true soldier he turned the enemy's position, throwing them by this manœuvre into such confusion that with the aid of the bayonet he was able to storm the village of Aliwal. This reverse so discouraged the Sikh chiefs that they opened secret negotiations for peace with Calcutta.

Our terms were that the Sikh force should be disbanded, but as the Sikh leaders were not powerful enough to effect this, the Army being omnipotent in the Punjaub, they sent an emissary to Calcutta proposing that the Sikh army should be attacked unawares and that after the battle our troops should march straight to Lahore where no resistance should be offered.

During these negotiations the Sikhs, 40,000 in number, occupied a strongly-intrenched camp on both sides of the Sutlej, connection being established by a bridge of boats near the village of Sobraon. The Sikhs having regained their old confidence were anxious to try conclusions with us, and their ardour was inflamed by an old warrior, Shen Singh, who to propitiate the god of battle declared he would offer his life as a sacrifice in the next engagement.

The desire to recommence hostilities was just as keen in the British camp. Reinforcements in addition to powerful ordnance arrived in such numbers that on the morning of the battle of Sobraon, Feb. 10th, 1846, our force had increased to 15,000 men, of whom quite 5,000 were British.

So soon as it was observed that the Sikhs had planted their artillery in a fort built in the centre it was resolved to make the attack on both flanks, break through, and if possible capture the guns. Nothing can be urged against this plan, but when it was further resolved that as the enemy's right was weak its destruction would be assured were it assailed by General Dick, who was at the head of our strongest division, a grievous blunder was committed.

It is true we might be able to crush the Sikh right, but would an attack by our weak right be able to succeed against the Sikh strong left? Doubtful. In fact it was only the courage of the British soldier which saved the day.

A fog at daybreak enabled us to approach within striking distance of the left. When it dispersed the two armies were close together.

The Sikhs, quite undismayed, met our rushes in the most heroic manner.

Our right after a most sanguinary fight managed to break through the enemy's lines, but the pressure of numbers soon so huddled them together, that they would have been annihilated had not the officers broken through the throng, and calling on their men to follow them made for the centre.

With a loud hurrah our red coats crossed a ditch, and before the gunners could realise what was taking place, had scaled some ramparts, and bayoneted every gunner in the central fort.

Victory on the left and centre would have come much sooner after the capture of the centre fort had not Shen Singh roused the fanaticism of the Sikhs to fever heat by galloping, clothed in the white robes of martyrdom, right into the middle of the British left.

In an instant 10,000 Sikh soldiers were at his heels and a fight ensued which for sheer ferocity has probably never been equalled in history.

Whilst the issue was still undecided the treacherous Tib Singh, having destroyed the centre boats of the bridge, ordered a retreat.

So few heeded the order that the betrayal of his countrymen might have been averted had the Sikhs been fighting any other soldiers but British. As it was, the stern unbending courage of our men triumphed over the fiery valour of the Sikhs.

After being driven to the river brink the Sikhs, owing to the bridge being broken, had to still fight on.

The orders being that their army was to be thoroughly dispersed the batteries were brought up and such a torrent of shot and shell poured into the defeated foe that next day over 7,000 dead bodies were counted. Their total loss is said to have exceeded 12,000. Our own too was sadly heavy, 320 being killed and 2,083 wounded.

We then crossed the Sutlej without opposition and invaded the Punjaub. On February 12th we captured the town and fortress of Kussoor, and on the 20th, reached Lahore.

By the peace which followed, the boundary of the Punjaub was pushed back from the Sutlej to the Beas and the army disbanded, save about 20,000 Sikhs to act as police.

But the peace was of short duration. In 1848 Mr. Vane Agnew and Lieutenant Anderson, our representatives, were murdered. Owing to Sir H., now Lord, Gough, not caring to move the troops in mid-winter time was given for a rebellion to be organised.

In August General Whish and 7,000 men were dispatched to recapture Mooltan, but owing to the treachery of Shen Singh, our General was compelled to intrench and await reinforcements.

This misfortune led to the rising becoming general. Lord Gough at once went to the front. Advancing with all his impetuosity, he attempted to drive Shen Singh across the river. Had he waited for his artillery he might have succeeded.

As it was the Sikh artillery on the opposite side of the river so effectually checked his progress that he resolved to try and effect their capture.

Digitized by Google

This was a prudent resolve, but so much time was wasted in marching up stream to find a ford, that Shen Singh was able to remove his army to the Jhelum where he fortified his position with such skill that several weeks elapsed before we were ready to attack it.

On January 14th, 1846, Gough advanced against the Sikhs, coming in touch with them at Chillianwallah. The foe had taken up, as we have said, a splendid defensive position and fortified it after the best European methods.

The dangers of a frontal attack were so evident even to General Gough, that he determined on a reconnaisance in force (a most unusual movement with him) previous to attacking. Before it could be carried out his old impetuosity reasserted itself. The insolence of the Sikh gunners so annoyed him that although it was within two hours of nightfall, he gave orders for an immediate advance.

On receiving the word our men as usual rushed headlong at the guns. But the Sikh artillery, in addition to occupying an almost unassailable position, was so numerous and so well served that long before we reached them our men began to drop by scores. Still they persevered, but when over seventy of their guns got our range the ranks thinned at such an alarming rate that the survivors, to avoid extermination, beat a hasty retreat.

The native soldiers, unused to such a sight, became panic-stricken, seeing which the Sikhs swooped down on us with inconceivable fury. The 24th were cut to pieces besides losing their colours, and the native troops driven pell-mell off the field. The handful of British still left fought with the most stubborn bravery, hurling back charge after charge of the Sikh horsemen. But as the reserves sent by Lord Gough, owing to their having lost their way in the jungle, failed to reach the little band on whose efforts the fortunes of the day depended, defeat seemed certain.

The result was trembling in the balance, another instant and it would be all over, when General Campbell, who before the battle had marched his men round the enemy's rear, appeared on the scene. Grasping the situation, the General ordered his men to get to work with the bayonet.

Baulked of their prey, the maddened Sikhs refused to retreat before the dreaded steel, pressing our men so hard that it was doubtful whether the day would have been saved, had not the cavalry who had been told off to guard the ammunition and wings, been sent into action towards the close. The 9th Lancers and the 14th Dragoons drove into the solid mass of Sikh infantry, hacking and hewing at them till even these dauntless warriors were compelled to fly.

Then disaster again threatened us. An undiscovered traitor called out as the Sikh horse galloped towards us: "Threes about." Some of our fellows obeyed and retreated, others did not. Still, the whole regiment was thus thrown into such confusion, that the Sikhs, seeing that a good opportunity was come, and burning to retrieve their losses, rode into our disorganised ranks cutting us down right and left, besides capturing five guns.

In other parts of the field we were more successful. Yet it must be confessed that, although we held the ground during the night, Chillianwallah cannot be reckoned a British victory.

We lost over 2,000 men, the Sikhs probably more. We captured twelve guns and lost five. In Britain, the battle was regarded as a defeat. Lord Gough was recalled and Sir C. Napier sent out to break the power of the Sikhs for good. But the Fates had relented. Before Napier landed Lord Gough had fought and won the battle of Guzerat, Feb. 21st, 1849, and the Punjaub was annexed.

In this last battle we thoroughly re-established our supremacy. After breaking up the Sikh army, we chased it across the country for miles.

The Sikhs now fight on our side. If Russia ever invades India she will find the Sikh soldier an awkward antagonist.

(Next week: The Wars in Ashanti.)

It's no good pushing . . .
A good thing . . . . .
If you can't get . . . . .
That good thing . . . . .
Supplied fast enough . . .

THAT'S BEEN OUR TROUBLE.

The orders for TWENTY TEAZER exceeded the capacity of the making machines by tens of thousands. These orders have now been fulfilled, and we are in a position to meet any demand.

TWENTY TEAZER IS THE 20th CENTURY PUZZLE.

6d. EVERYWHERE. 6d.

WHO KILLED JAMES TRENT?

The weirdest, most mysterious, most fascinating story since Wilkie Collins' "Woman in White" will start in P. W. in a few weeks. Will you try to solve the mystery? We shall offer £100 Reward.

WHO KILLED JAMES TRENT?

WHAT THE KING SAYS:

The Bust of Her late Majesty Queen Victoria, made by Miss Gieflowski, is "the best likeness I remember ever having seen."

Readers may secure one of these busts—the original bronze of which was to have become the possession of Her Majesty—for a half-crown postal-order. Carriage is paid by us.

Address your order to Room 38, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES THAT MAKE YOU LAUGH.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "Guilty Gold," by Headon Hill, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, March 18th. Post-cards only, please.

The Prize of One Guinea for the best Storyette has been won this week by Mr. R. A. H. Goodyear, of Tune Street, Barnsley, Yorks, for the Storyette entitled "Elucidated."

Elucidated.

THE first question the bishop put to the children was, "Can any of you bairns tell me what average is?"

This, apparently, was too easy, for hands shot up along every desk in the class-room, importuning his notice.

"I'll let you tell me, my little man," said the bishop, patting the curly head of the schoolmaster's son, who had been artfully placed in the front row.

"Please, my lord, average is what a hen lays eggs on," was the startling answer.

Sorely did this definition puzzle his lordship, and he was constrained to ask the boy for further enlightenment.

"Well, sir," explained the boy, "I don't quite understand it myself, but when people ask mother how many eggs her hens lay, she always says, 'twenty a day on an average.'"

R. A. H. G.

A Parting Shot.

IT was in an American railway car, a fierce battle raged between a male and female. He was smoking where smoking was "strictly prohibited."

She objected on principle, and because she loathed the "horrid weed."

There was no lack of ammunition and the attack threatened to last through the long journey, till the woman, ever hoping to have the last word, shrieked:

"If you were my husband I would put poison in your coffee."

"And," replied the man, "if you were my wife, I would gladly drink it."

With this cruel and victorious shot he left the car, feeling that he had won the day!

J. G. B.

Sensational.

A REPORTER for the NEWS was taken on trial.

He went hunting for items and returned in the evening with a sensational report:

"This morning I saw a sight that froze my blood with horror. A cabman driving down the street at a rapid pace nearly ran over a nurse with a baby. There would have been a most heartrending catastrophe had not the nurse with wonderful forethought left the child at home before she came out and providently stepped into a milliner's shop just before the cab passed. The cabman, too, just before the crossing, thought of something he had forgotten, and, turning round, drove back. Had it not been for this wonderful forethought of both, a doting father, a loving mother, and affectionate brothers and sisters, would have been plunged into the deepest sorrow."

The reporter will be kept on.

G. D.

She Spoilt the Scene.

THE Amateur Thespians were giving a performance of The Lady of Lyons, and the village institute was packed to its utmost capacity with an indulgent and none too critical audience.

All went well until the scene was reached where Claude Melnotte, masquerading as a prince, proposes to Pauline, and begins to describe his imaginary palace on the Lake of Como. He had no sooner started the well-known lines, however, when an old woman jumped up from her seat, and addressing herself to the young lady who was sustaining the title rôle she shouted out:

"Dunnot thee believe him, wench, for he's telling thee nowt but a pack o' lies. He's noather a prince, nor has he a palace. Aw'll tell thee what he is: he's a weaver down at Brookside factory, an' it's a rare week for him when he draws fifteen shillin'!"

Then she sat down, but it took the audience some time to stifle their merriment, and it is needless to add that the scene was entirely spoilt.

A. V.

Willing to be Knocked Down Again.

A CIVIL word is the cheapest thing in the world, and if spoken at the proper time is often a solace to a weary heart. I was abruptly turning a corner the other day when I ran against a boy who was ragged, small and freckled. Stopping, I turned to him and said:

"I beg your pardon; indeed, I am sorry."

The boy looked up in blank amazement for an instant, then, taking off about three-fourths of a cap, bowed very low, smiled until his face was beaming, and answered:

"You kin hev my parding and welcome, miss; and yer may run ag'in me and knock me clean down an' I won't say a word."

As I was passing away he turned to a comrade and said, half-apologetically:

"I never had anyone ask my parding an' it kind o' took me off my feet."

MISS S.

Breaking It Gently.

Two soft, white arms go stealing around his neck, and a fair, peach-like cheek is rubbed carelessly against his own.

Faintly whispered, "Dear papa," and "Darling old boy," and "Don't you love your sweet?" reach his startled ears as he vainly attempts to pull himself together and avoid the loving, sugar-coated attack which he well knows is coming.

"Well, daughter mine," he finally asks, "what is it? Not another new dress, surely?"

"Oh, no, papa darling."

"H-m-m, that's good. And it can't be the milliner again?"

Digitized by Google

"No, papa, love."

"H-m-m, better still. It isn't the florist?"

"No, you dearest papa."

"H-m-m, great Scott! You don't want a trip to Italy, do you?"

"No, you lovely old dear."

"Well, what in the name of goodness do you want, my little girl?"

"Darling papa mine, I don't want anything—ah, that is—Jack wants me."

A. P.

Bill and the Ghost.

THE topic of conversation in a certain country inn one evening turned to ghosts, and, of course, the local ghost came under consideration.

Old Bill declared he did not believe in ghosts at all, The result was all the company said he dare not go through the wood at midnight.

He took the bet and the condition was, that he took a certain article and placed it against the gate on the other side of the wood.

Arming himself with a heavy stick he set forth on his hazardous journey.

In the middle of the wood a weird white object with horns appeared, and slowly moving to a narrow part of the path, prevented Bill passing. Its white body presented a ghastly contrast to the dark wood.

"Let me pass," called Bill.

No response.

"Let me pass or you will feel this stick."

No response. Thud went the stick right between the horns. The ghost fell and Bill passed on.

He deposited the article and returned.

"Did you see anything, Bill?" they all shouted in chorus.

"Yes, but I hit him between the horns and he shifted."

Two or three of the company rushed through the wood and there, groaning in a semi-conscious condition with a pair of bullock's horns fastened on his head and a sheet drawn over so that the horns appeared through the sheet, lay the man who originated the plot to frighten old Bill.

J. S.

Not Her Laddie.

A GENTLEMAN on a walk from one of the suburbs of Glasgow happened to call at a farmhouse, where he was readily supplied with a glass of milk.

He offered the lady sixpence, but she declined all payment.

"I couldn't take money for 't," she said, in her own proud way.

The gentleman expressed his acknowledgment and went on his way, but at the garden gate he detected a small boy playing.

Surely, he thought, this is the lady's son. So he put his hand in his pocket to give him the sixpence, when he heard a shrill voice:

"That's no ma laddie, sir."

Then there was a pause, and the voice afterwards resounded, this time directed to a small boy at the side door.

"Gang oot, Willie, an' speak till the nice gentleman at the gate."

G. E. G.

The Reason Why.

A SCHOOLMASTER in a village school had been in the habit of purchasing pork from parents of his pupils on the occasion of the killing of a pig.

One day a small boy marched up to the master's desk and inquired if he would like a bit of pork, as they were going to kill their pig.

The schoolmaster replied in the affirmative.

Several days elapsed, and, hearing nothing of the pork, the master called the boy up to him, and inquired the reason he had not brought it.

"Oh, please sir," the boy replied, "the pig got better."

E. R.

She Startled Him.

"Now, Mr. B——," coldly said the handsome young widow, steadfastly watching the butcher as he weighed the sirloin she had just selected, "while I am fully conscious of the honour you wish to confer upon me, I must tell you that I have no present intention of marrying again, and I am compelled to refuse the offer of your hand."

"Bu—bu—but, ma'am," stammered the astonished butcher, "I never offered you my hand, and—er——"

"Then why are you trying to weigh it on the scales with the meat, sir?"

J. R. T.

At the Inquiry Office.

"HALLOA. Is this the gas office?"

"What is it?"

"When do the entries for the next races open?"

"We don't know anything about the races, this is the gas office."

"Just so; but I thought you could tell me."

"Why what do you want to know for?"

"Oh, nothing particular, I have a gas meter which I would like to enter, that's all!"

J. E.

"The Vag of his Tail."

A GENTLEMAN was walking with his little boy at the close of the day, and in passing the cottage of a German labourer the boy's attention was attracted to the dog. It was not a King Charles, nor a black-and-tan, but a common cur. Still, the boy took a fancy to him, and wanted "pa" to buy him. Just then the owner of the dog came home from his labours, and was met by the dog with every demonstration of dog joy. The gentleman said to the owner:

"My little boy has taken a fancy to your dog, and I will buy him. What do you ask for him?"

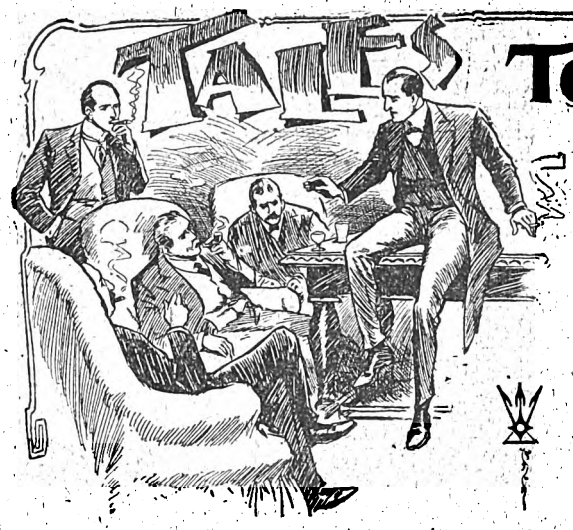
"I can't sell dat dog," said the German.

"Look here," said the gentleman, "that is a poor dog; but, as my boy wants him, I will give you a sovereign for him."

"Yaas," said the German, "I knows he is a werry poor dog, and he ain't worth almost nottin'; but dere ish von leetle ding mit dat dog vot I can't sell—I can't sell de vag of his tail ven I comes home ad night."

P. R.

Digitized by Google



TOLD "OFF DUTY."

[You probably don't know the "Stand-Easy" Club. It isn't in the directory, and you might live next door to the place for years without knowing of its existence by that name. It isn't a conventional club; there is no subscription, and there is no register of members. It is merely a room in a quiet, orderly, and select hostelry in Westminster, where, by common consent, a number of officials of all kinds meet when "off duty." There you may find detectives from Scotland Yard, near by; firemen, commissionaires, a soldier or two, and maybe a doctor from St. Thomas' Hospital or elsewhere. A motley crowd they would be if they wore their uniforms, but at the "Stand-Easy" uniforms are a rarity, "mufti" being the unwritten rule. The result is a gathering of quiet, well-behaved, and well-dressed men. Saturday night is the time when one sees the biggest muster, for then it is the custom for one member to regale the company with a story, the story being, as a rule, an account of some incident in the teller's own career.]

Corporal Croft: Deserter.

Told by the COMMISSIONAIRE.

"WELL, gentlemen," said the one-armed sergeant of commissionaires, as, with a dexterity born of practice, he filled and lit his pipe, "seeing that you've picked on me for yarn-duty to-night, I suppose I must obey orders. But I give you fair warning not to expect anything of the thrilling sort from your humble servant.

"It's true I saw plenty of tough fighting in the Afghan campaign of '79-80 (lost my arm there, worse luck!) but, what with the war in South Africa, I fancy most of you have had more than your fill of battle-yarns lately; so, if you've no objection, I'll try and sling you a true tale of a less-exciting sort.

"This tale begins as far back as the year 1876, and ends up as recent as the day before yesterday; it won't take long in the telling, for all that."

Having said this much, by way of preface, Commissionaire-Sergeant Pollard reflectively fingered his heavy, iron-grey moustache, lay down his pipe, and proceeded:

"When I enlisted, I reckoned I was going to be a full-blown sergeant in about six months. 'Twasn't long before I found out my mistake. The stripes take a deal of earning—a lot more than some folks appear to think; and when I discovered what a lot of smart, well-conducted chaps there were who'd been soldiering for years and got only one stripe (sometimes not that) to show for it, I came to the conclusion that I'd made a precious fool of myself in joining the Army.

"However, there I was, and there I'd got to stop. 'You've got to make the best of a bad job, Tony Pollard,' thinks I to myself. 'Promotion may be slow, but it's sure, providing you behave yourself. Only behave yourself, Tony, and you'll be a sergeant-major yet—in the far-off days to come!'

"That was how I argued the matter out with myself, gentlemen, and, sure enough, I'd only a trifle over two years' service when I was given the lance-stripe. It was a step up the ladder at any rate, though there wasn't anything extra in the shape of pay hanging to the rank.

"Some months afterwards, I appeared in 'orders' as full-corporal, and about the same time, I got struck all of a heap by a young woman whom I saw one morning walking across the barrack-square.

"I soon found out that she was Carrie Sanders, daughter of old Bob Sanders, the colour-sergeant of K company.

"It appeared that since she was a twelve-year-old girl, she had been living near London with her aunt. This aunt having died, Miss Carrie had come back to live in barracks with her old dad, who was a widower.

"'Twas a case of love at first sight with me. Such a fine, pretty wench she was, with a pert little nose and chin, and a pair of brown eyes that were full o' fun and mischief.

"The gal fairly turned my head, and, after some manœuvring, I managed to strike up an acquaintance with her. She didn't give me much encouragement, nor did her father, though I tried all I knew to get on the right side of the old colour-sergeant. However, I didn't lose hope, for if on some days Carrie would scarcely look at me, on others she would chat in a nice, confidential sort of way that made me fancy she had more than a friendly regard for me.

"Of course, had I understood the sex like I do now, I'd have known that them cold, distant airs which made me so miserable for the time being, were part of the love-making game. But I was green in those days; ignorant as a baby of woman's little artfulnesses—well, there you are!

"I hadn't made much headway in winning Carrie Sanders' affections, when I suddenly learnt that I wasn't the only chap that was after her. In fact, there was a rival in the field—a dangerous rival too, from what I could gather.

"His name was Croft, and he was, like myself, a full-corporal. But whereas I belonged to H company, he was attached to K company, which was old Bob Sanders', and though Croft wasn't at all liked by the men, it was said that his colour-sergeant thought a lot of him.

Digitized by Google

"Now, I knew Corporal James Croft pretty well. We'd been recruits at the depôt together, and a more unsociable chap you couldn't have found anywhere. He chummed with nobody, turned up his nose at the rations, and seemed to fancy that he was altogether our superior.

"Not that he had any reason to give himself airs; for he was a dismal-looking, fishy-eyed customer, and such a wooden-headed recruit that he almost drove the drill-sergeant mad. And in spite of his stand-offish ways, Croft had no manners to speak of. He found fault with the grub, but he bolted it ravenously all the same. He was the greediest man in the whole squad, and those of us who suspected Croft of being a 'gentleman-ranker' dismissed that idea when we noticed the manner in which he wolfed his rations.

I saw her wa'king across the barrack-square.

"When our squad was drafted to the battalion, I was put into H Company, and Croft into K. He wasn't a bright soldier as I've said; but he behaved himself, and, only a few days after I'd been made 'lance,' Croft likewise got his stripe. Then I blossomed out as full-corporal, and, almost directly, Croft did the same; so we were running a neck-and-neck race for the promotion stakes, as you might say.

"Truth to tell, when I heard that Croft was sweet on Carrie Sanders, it didn't worry me much. For—though I say it that shouldn't—I was a passable-looking young fellow at one time, while Croft was what we used to call 'a bit of a slouch.' He always looked dismal—in fact, his men called him 'Dismal Jimmy,'—and, altogether, he seemed the last man in the world a lively young gal like Carrie would take a liking to.

"Howsomever, I soon found out that she did see something in him; and when I heard that he'd walked out with her three nights running, I came to the conclusion that Corporal James Croft was a more dangerous rival than I'd given him credit for being.

"I'm not going to describe in detail how things went on for the next month or two.

"You all know what the courting business is, and when I've said that one hour I walked on air, and the next was down in the deepest dumps, you'll understand my lovesick state.

"The fact was, Carrie Sanders played me and Croft off against each other, and if I hadn't been so blessed green, I should have known that I was the favoured party. But, like a fool, I let her see I was jealous, and the more I did that the more she flirted with Croft.

"So things went on, until one night, Croft stopped me and challenged me to fight for the girl. It appeared that he had popped the question to Carrie, and she had refused him.

"At that he angrily accused her of having kept him dangling at her bow in case 'that fellow Pollard' (meaning me) jilted her. Then she fired up in her turn, and told him that if he could prove himself a better man than Corporal Pollard, she'd marry him right away. All this Carrie told me long afterwards.

"I readily accepted Croft's challenge, and a few evenings afterwards we fought for Carrie Sanders in a meadow a mile or two away from barracks. The scrap lasted only three rounds—hot rounds they were too; for, if neither of us displayed much science, we managed to exchange some precious hard blows.

"It was more by luck than skill that I eventually knocked my man out with a swinger on the side of his head.

"Luckily for me, he'd put in most of his work about the ribs, and my face was practically undamaged. Croft, on the other hand, had a badly-bruised nose and a pair of black eyes; which meant a day in the hospital, followed by reduction to the ranks. And if Croft or either of our seconds split, it meant reduction for me also—and then it was all up with my chance of marrying Carrie Sanders.

"Well, me and my second started back to barracks, leaving Croft and a 'lance-jack' named Barrett, who'd sponged him down, to follow us when it got darker. Barrett turned up all right; Croft didn't. After walking some distance towards the barracks, Croft had remarked that if they were seen together, Barrett would probably lose his stripe for being concerned in the fight. He therefore suggested that they should take separate roads; to which Barrett agreed, and passed the sentry just before 'first post' sounded. He lived in the same room as Croft, and for half the night he lay awake wondering why the corporal didn't make his appearance.

Digitized by Google

"But never more was James Croft seen inside Burchester Barracks. He had deserted!

He started to open the letter.

"There was the usual hue and cry; but he wasn't to be found, and in due time active search for him was abandoned.

"Nobody except myself and the seconds knew about our little sparring affair, and, for our own sakes, we kept the secret well.

"As soon as I was made sergeant, old Bob Sanders agreed to my splicing his daughter. The wedding took place, and we had a happy year or so. Then came the war in Afghanistan, from which I was invalided home, minus an arm. My pension wasn't, of course, sufficient to keep a home going, so as billets for one-armed chaps wasn't plentiful, I reckoned it safest to join the Corps of Commissionaires.

"And now, in order to wind up my yarn, I must make a big jump from '81 to the day before yesterday.

"Most of you know that I'm messenger at some big offices in the City. Well, two days ago, one of the clerks hands me a letter and tells me to deliver it at once, and wait for an answer. The letter was addressed to Lord —— well, I mustn't mention names, or I might get into trouble, so we'll call him Lord Blank. I jumped on a Piccadilly 'bus, which put me down near the street in which Lord Blank lived. I soon found the house, and rang the bell. A footman was just opening the door, when up drives a pair-horse carriage, out of which steps a tip-top swell, wearing a tall hat, a fur-lined coat, and an eyeglass.

"'Here's his lordship himself,' whispers the footman to me, and, holding the letter ready, he stands waiting while the swell comes up the steps.

"'The commissionaire's just brought this, my lord, and says he is to wait for an answer,' explains the chap in livery.

"'Oh, very well,' replies my lord, and started to open the letter just inside the hall. Then he chanced to look at me, and I saw him give a bit of a start. At the same moment I gave a start, too; for in spite of the change which years had brought about, I knew him again directly, and he knew me.

"Lord Blank was no other than my old rival—Corporal Croft, the deserter!

"His lordship didn't finish opening the envelope. He quietly asked me to follow him into his library; where he sat down, read his letter carefully, scribbled a reply, and, as he handed me the note to take back to the City, remarked:

"'I see you've lost a limb since we met last, Pollard.'

"'Yes, my lord, lost it in Afghanistan,' answers I.

"'Couldn't knock me out in three rounds now, eh?' he says, without the ghost of a smile on his queer-looking phiz.

"'P'raps not, my lord; I'm a bit handicapped,' says I, looking just as solemn as himself.

"'And how was Miss Sanders when you saw her last?' he asks.

"'Mrs. Pollard was in the best of health, my lord, when I left her just after eight o'clock this morning.'

"'Ah!' says my lord, very dry, 'happy to hear it, I'm sure. Good morning, sergeant!' and he touches the bell.

"Just as the footman was shewing me out of the library, Lord Blank slips a five-pound note into my hand, and as I 'ain't a proud man, I didn't offer any objections.

"And that gentlemen," concluded the commissionaire, "about finishes my yarn. Corporal Croft, it appears, was a 'gentleman ranker' after all. I found out yesterday that the present Lord Blank succeeded to the peerage about ten years ago. At the time he enlisted, there were well-nigh a dozen lives between him and the title. His was a very poor branch of the family, and his father had married very humble.

"I gave that 'fiver' to the missus, and told her it was a tip I got from Lord Blank; but I didn't tell her that his lordship was an old acquaintance of hers. You see the worry of bringing up a big family on very little money, has sharpened Mrs. Pollard's tongue a bit. When she's in one of her bad-tempered fits, she's apt to be rather trying. If once Carrie learnt that she might now have been a 'my lady,' instead of a poor commissionaire's missus, I should never hear the last of it."

Digitized by Google

FOR THE BUSH CONTINGENT.

I.

It was on a Saturday afternoon early in January, 1900. A number of men had gathered round the stock-yard at Bringenbogie Station. Three of the smartest men on Bringenbogie were about proceeding to Sydney to volunteer for the bushmen's contingent, and the owner, Mr. M'Kinnon, had given them the pick of the station horses, and was otherwise providing for each a full outfit.

They had already chosen their horses, and the fine unbroken filly now in the yard was there merely incidentally. But as she was there, Ivey—otherwise Owen—O'Neill, one of the volunteers and the crack rough-rider on the station, must needs proceed with her handling. She was one of a number that had got away weeks before into the Wild Horse Gullies, and only two days ago, after a very merry ride, had the stockmen yarded her.

The talk round the yard was all of war, interspersed with words of wisdom relative to horseflesh, and in particular the filly now in hand.

Presently, with unassuming air, a selector who lived some distance away rode up.

"Here's Joe Larkin," said Jack Sutton, another of the volunteers, who saw Joe first. "Hello, Joe. Good-day, Joe!" he sang out.

"Good-day, Joe!" cried another. "'Day, Joe!" bawled a third, and, amid much merriment, round swept a repeating chorus of "Good-day, Joe," drawn forth principally by the entire simplicity of Joe's appearance.

Quite abashed by the tumult his unassuming advent had made, Joe advanced to a group at the fence, put one foot and one arm each on a rail, and in a voice as unassuming as his appearance replied to his laughing and calling associates. He did not seem to realise that there was a joke on at his expense, and turned his soft violet eyes and serious kind face from one to the other in perfect good faith.

Joe rarely smiled, but when he did there was a peculiar winsomeness about the smile. It seemed to throw sunshine through the light cloud of brown beard which, soft and curly and virgin, no razor had touched. He wore an old tweed coat, a Crimean shirt, moleskin trousers, hob-nailed boots, and one spur.

"Here's the man for the bush contingent," cried Sutton. "A man of blood from his youth up, eh, Joe?"

"That's him," cried Bob Archer, the flash man of the run. "The wrathful dove ain't a patch on him."

"Let's put him through the riding test," said Jack Archer, Bob's brother. "Jump on this filly, Joe. Look at her, the beauty. Her tail has curls in it just like your beard."

"Never you mind Joe's beard," called out Ivey O'Neill. "It's soft, an' the girls like it, don't they, Joe?"

Joe listened quietly to the banter. At last—

"Why don't you volunteer an' come along wi' us, Joe?" inquired Ivey.

"I have volunteered," said Joe. "I wrote away yesterday that I'd be in Sydney next week."

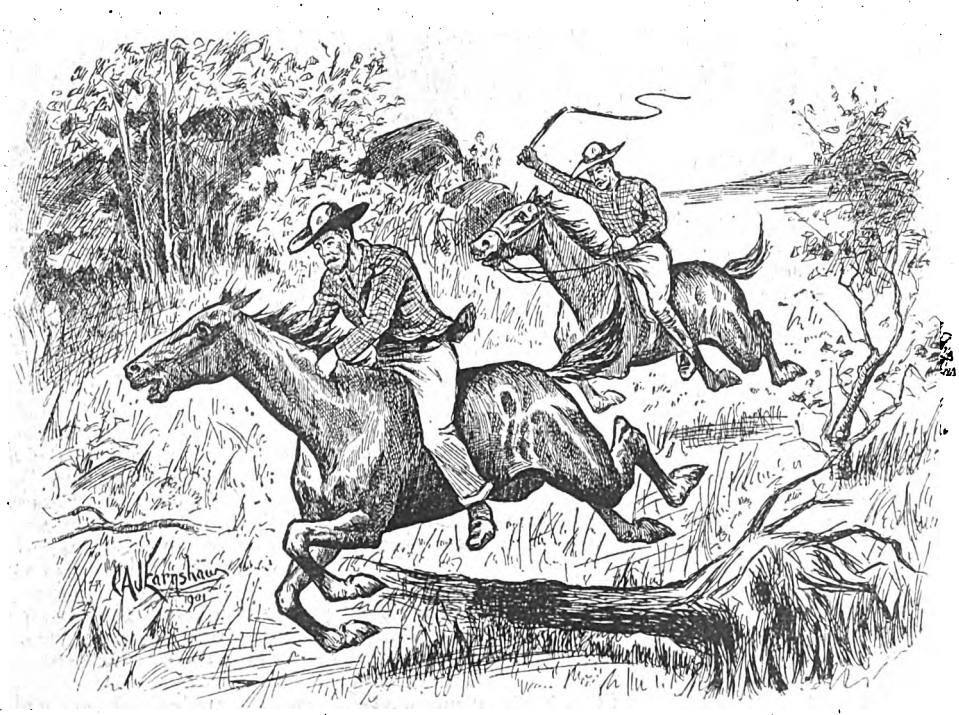
"You? Good lad!" cried Sutton, grasping Joe's hand.

Then there was more or less of an uproar, ending with "Three cheers for Joe."

Joe stood up very straight. He was of a type that can go all day and night, sleep anywhere and eat anything—light, muscular, and wiry.

"The boss might give you a horse, Joe, same as us," said Sutton.

"I'd like that filly," said Joe, watching Ivey dexterously working his way about her.



On they flew, the filly putting forth all her powers.

Digitized by Google

"She'd break your neck first thing. You don't profess to be a rider, do you?" said Bob Archer, who was a comparatively newcomer to the district.

Joe's violet eye showed a trace of lightning.

"I think I could show you the way," he said quietly.

Several of the men applauded him, and rather warm words flashed between him and Archer.

"I'll tell you what I'll do," said Joe at last, in the same quiet tone. "We'll take that filly out now to the Wild Horse Gullies an' let her go there with me on her, an' no saddle or bridle, and I'll bet that you an' your two brothers there can't run me in."

The other men again backed Joe, and Archer took up the challenge almost compulsorily.

Having obtained Mr. M'Kinnon's consent, the men set off for the chosen spot—rough, open country, which in former days had swarmed with wild horses.

Ivey led the filly, Sutton backing him up, while Joe jogged along on his rough little mare, looking like anything but a wild horse tamer.

The conditions were that Archer and his two brothers were to run Joe into the stockyard, near the gate leading into the Wild Horse Gullies, Joe undertaking not to prevent the filly's turning whenever fairly wheeled. He was to get a start of a furlong from the others half-a-mile from the yard, and was to be yarded within three hours.

When the starting point was reached Sutton gave Joe a quick hoist upon the back of the blindfolded filly, and at the same time Ivey pulled off the fold and halter.

The mare bounded forward like beauty and strength gone mad. Joe sat her splendidly, as plunging and terrified, and crashing over fallen timber and through scrub, she made for her well known gullies.

The Archers started forward. Bob, who was on a horse that he particularly fancied, pressed on ahead to take the first wheel, his brothers being content to keep in sight for a time.

Then followed some magnificent riding. Straight down a rocky hill thundered Joe, Archer following no less gallantly, and taking advantage of a risky short cut. Behind came his brothers, and then eight or ten horsemen eager to see the fun.

For a mile and a half the utmost that Archer could do was to keep Joe well in sight. Then, by taking advantage of another short cut, he drew close up. The filly was making for a well-known gap, and Archer's great object was to prevent her going down it.

Straight and fast he rode, while the filly, afraid, made a slight detour in spite of Joe's efforts to steer her. On they flew, the filly—by this time desperate but with recovered senses—putting forth all her powers, while Archer did the same.

Nearer they drew to the gap—almost reached it—and then, at the last moment, Archer's advantageous straight run came to his aid. His whip rang out, as with a "Whoa back there!" he wheeled the filly from the entrance to the gap.

Onward to the left she pressed along an old fence, but Jack Archer, cutting across from the rear, wheeled her again a quarter of a mile further on. She took a turn behind him, and with deep-drawn breath fairly outpaced his stock horse, and drew ahead on the course from which he had tried to turn her.

"Squad, right turn! Dismiss!"

Then in came the third rider, Dick Archer, getting so close that he lashed at the filly with his whip, and pressed her hard for three hundred yards. She was heading for a break-neck track, and Joe, his shirt torn and his face bleeding from scratches, crammed her at it. Down into a precipitous gully she bounded, her perilous descent getting her fairly away from her pursuers.

The last the spectators saw was the filly toiling up a distant and rocky pathway, while two of the Archers, on their nearly blown horses, followed three hundred yards in the rear. Bob Archer was limping home without his horse.

Joe was not yarded, but half-an-hour after the expiration of the time limit he rode the filly, dripping and at a jog, up to the spot from which he had started.

Digitized by Google

He stayed at the men's quarters that night, and was made much of. But an attempt to get a speech out of him was an absolute failure.

Later in the evening Mr. M'Kinnon came along.

"Well, Joe, I hear the riding exercise has been successful this afternoon; also that you are volunteering for South Africa?"

"Yes, sir," answered Joe.

"Then take your pick of the station horses. Have you any fancy?"

"I'd like that filly—well," said Joe, looking at Mr. M'Kinnon in his simple, steadfast way.

"Take her, my lad, and welcome," was the reply.

II.

Joe was one of two sons. His father was an idle, humorous man, who periodically drank himself blind. His brother Fred was an idle man without the humour, who drank rather more than his father, and was regarded as generally useless.

Joe, who, like many bushmen, neither drank nor smoked, had been a kind of free slave to the rest of the family all his life. His mother was a woman who had suffered bitter hardship, and came out with a bitter spirit and tongue. Joe recognised the hard battle she had fought, and stood by her loyally, though her grumbling was directed principally against him.

Fred alone escaped her tongue, careless whether he did or not, and Joe felt, not without passing anger, that a great deal of the hard-earned money which he handed his mother went to Fred. He felt also that his mother would be determinedly opposed to his leaving, and often thought, with a cut-off-his-nose-to-spite-his-face sense of duty, that he ought to stay at home and keep things together. But an indefinable longing was upon him to go and see and do, and go he must.

He felt sure of the sympathy of his father, who himself was an old soldier. When he reached home on the day after his ride on the filly, Joe went straight to his father. The old man held himself like a soldier, for all his lame leg and absolute deafness—arising from his having slept with it in a mud puddle all night—of one ear. "And I wish he was deaf in the other, too," his wife often said.

Old Larkin was enthusiastic over the matter.

"You go, Joe," he said. "Women always want men to stay at home, more's the pity. Look here, Joe, you've s'aved here half your life, supportin' your —— drunken old father an' your beautiful brother. Now, I'll put the peg in, an' look after the place, an' serve the gran' old country over the sea once more by makin' it so that my flesh and blood can fight for her. You go, an' get a slappin' mouthful of raw, rank, big, enticin' life. It called to me just the same when I was young, an' the call must be answered. Ah, but if I was young again! You'll go for me. Your mother may or may not object to this project. I think she will, so it's likely she won't. She's in laager over at the pigstye now. I'll beat about out o' range while you tackle her. Perhaps I may git in the kitchen, and cut her off from her base."

Joe smiled half sadly at his father's words. He knew that the old man, but for drink, might have done much, but—the tree had fallen.

He went straight to his mother and told her briefly and simply what he had done. To his surprise she listened quietly.

"I part expected this, Joe," she said, when he had finished. "They tell me them Boers fire on women an' children, and murder men under the white flag, an' fire on our poor wounded laddies. You go, Joe. I can spare ye for this. I'm a daughter of Old England, an' you're my son."

"Good old woman," roared her husband from near at hand. "Squad, 'shun! Present—arms!"

Up went the spade he had in his hands in the true old military suit.

"Of all the old fools!" cried his wife, perhaps more vexed at being caught speaking feelingly than at anything else. "Didn't I tell you to finish that diggin', you old fool, ye? Always idle an' talkin'. Now Joe's goin' you'll have to put out another foot, I assure ye."

As her words pelted the old man he grinned jovially.

"Now ye see what it is to be steady under fire, Joe," he said, with his spade at the shoulder. "Squad, right—tarn! Dismiss!"

And off he hobbled, chuckling to himself.

Joe left for Sydney two days later. To his surprise Fred offered to ride with him to the railway town twenty miles distant.

"I'll like to go with you altogether, Joe," he said in his sullen-faced way as he grasped his brother's hand in farewell. "But the Queen doesn't want men who can't keep sober for a fortnight at a stretch."

Then, full of pity and wonder, from the carriage window Joe watched him, a pathetic, aimless figure, standing loosely on the platform as the train left.

Some time later Mr. M'Kinnon, driving past, found Joe at work on the old place.

"Hello! I thought you'd gone to the war!" he exclaimed.

Joe drew back and surveyed the post-hole he was digging, spat on his hands, then picked up the crowbar, and drove it home.

"Didn't pass, sir. They reckoned I couldn't ride," was his brief reply.

An Unfortunate Incident.

"Well," said the family doctor to little Willie's anxious father, who had sent for him in great haste, "and what is the matter with your son?"

With a voice choked with emotion, the fond parent replied:

"It happened like this, I gave Willie 3s. 6d. to spend yesterday, and he went straight to the nearest bookseller and purchased a copy of 'The New Master,' by Arnold Golsworthy ('Jingle' of Pick-Me-Up), and what with the fun of the story and the screamingly humorous illustrations by Tom Browne, he has split his sides with laughing, and I want to know whether you will be able to mend them."

THE BEST SIX-SHILLING NOVELS TO READ.

A HONEYMOON IN SPACE.
By George Griffith.

THE TAPU OF BANDERAH, and other Stories.
By Louis Becke and Walter Jeffery.

'TWIXT DEVIL AND DEEP SEA.
By Mrs. C. N. Williamson.

THE STRANGE WOOING OF MARY BOWLER.
By Richard Marsh.

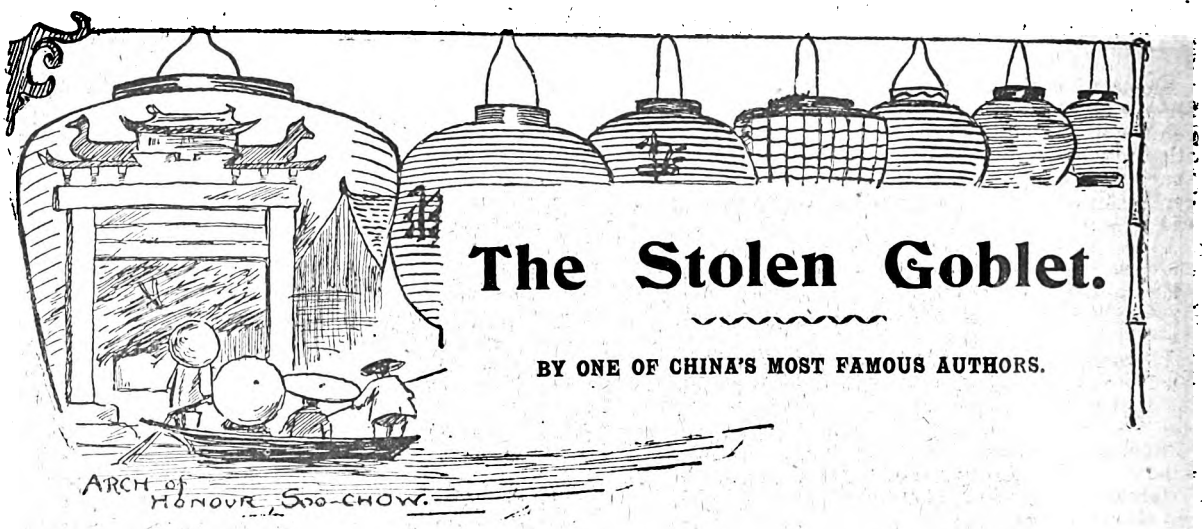
THE INVADERS.
By Louis Tracy.

THE SENTENCE OF THE COURT.
By Headon Hill.

MORD EM'LY. 3s. 6d.
By W. Pett Ridge.

London: C. ARTHUR PEARSON Ltd., Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google



The Stolen Goblet.

BY ONE OF CHINA'S MOST FAMOUS AUTHORS.

The following story is by P'u Liu Hsien, one of China's most famous authors. He began to write romances when quite a boy. His best known work—from which this sample story is taken—is called in China the Liao Chai Chih Yi, and the fame of the book is supposed to rest upon the beauty of its style. Most European readers would perhaps scarcely indorse China's favourable verdict in this matter. It is an interesting fact, however, that though Chinese literary men are, or pretend to be, contemptuous of anything in the shape of novels or tales, they make an exception in favour of this work. Without regard to the interest of the story, we present it to our readers as a literary curiosity.

ONCE upon a time, in the town of Li-cheng, there lived a poor scholar named Yin. In the place where he lived there was a large stretch of ground, in the midst of which stood a handsome house with outhouses and courtyards attached.

These buildings were uninhabited and gradually falling into decay; while it was currently reported that the place was haunted, and that strange and fearful sights were to be seen there.

Now Yin was one day dining with some of his fellow-students, and this haunted house became the subject of the conversation. One of his companions remarked: "If any one among us will venture to sleep a night in the haunted house the rest of us will buy him a dinner, and let him order it."

Yin, on this, jumped up and cried: "Who's afraid? I will take my bedding and go there at once."

His companions took him at his word, and so Yin got his bed ready, and they escorted him to the entrance of the haunted garden, where they took leave of him, telling him to shout for help if he saw anything dreadful.

Yin laughed and assured them that whatever he saw he would catch, and bring away with him for a curiosity. So saying he went inside.

The moon at this time was in the first quarter, and it was only just possible to discover the entrance into this house by its feeble light; but after some trouble, Yin succeeded in getting in. He went upstairs into a big room, where he determined to sleep. He sat for some time waiting for something to happen, and watching the thin, new moon sinking behind the western hills. Nothing extraordinary occurred, so he spread out his bedding and went to sleep.

Presently a man dressed as a servant, and bearing in his hand a lamp shaped like a lotus-flower, entered the room, and on seeing Yin lying there started back, and then ran to the stairhead and told his companions that a man was lying there.

They asked him who the stranger was; but, as he could not tell them, an old gentleman, who appeared to be the master of the house, came up. This individual, after a long look at the sleeper, turned to his followers and said:

"This is a gentleman named Yin, a good scholar, who will be a great man one of those days. We need not mind him in the least, for he has a good heart, and even if our noise awakes him, he will be perfectly friendly with us."

When he had finished speaking, the doors of the house were thrown open and a large crowd of people flocked in. The lamps were lighted in all directions, until every room was as bright as day. Yin felt that it was foolish to pretend to be asleep any longer, so he began to toss backwards and forwards, and to make a noise as though he were clearing his throat.

The master of the house at once came forward, and, making a low bow, addressed him thus:

"Your servant has a poor daughter who is to be married to-night. We did not expect to have the honour of your company, and I trust therefore that you will not be angry with us for disturbing you."

Yin got up in a hurry and made a low bow in return, and replied:

"I was unaware of these festivities to-night. Had I known I would have come prepared, and would have brought a wedding gift."

"Your presence," rejoined the old man, "is better than any wedding gift, for it drives away all evil influences. I shall, therefore, be grateful if you will give us the honour of your company."

Yin accepted the invitation with much pleasure, and then he and his host betook themselves to another room, where everything was laid out with the greatest splendour.

Digitized by Google

Here was a lady of some forty years of age, who came forward to greet Yin, and was introduced by the old gentleman as his wife. Just then a sound of horns and other instruments was heard, and a servant came in to announce the arrival of the bridegroom. The old gentleman went to the door to receive his son-in-law, and introduced him to Yin.

It was not long before the ladies flocked in in a bevy, and then the servants brought in the supper. But in addition to eatables the board was decked with jewelled bowls and gold cups, in which wine was handed to the guests.

Yin observed the bride closely, and thought that she must be the fairest woman in the world, but just then the current of his thoughts changed, because the wine was being handed round in magnificent golden goblets. each of which would contain several measures of wine.

As one of these came within his reach he slipped it up his sleeve and then leant his head on the table as though he had fallen into a drunken sleep. Shortly afterwards the company broke up.

The old gentleman now ordered the servants to clear the tables, and one of the large gold cups was found to be missing. Search was made everywhere. One of the servants remarked that perhaps the sleeping stranger had taken it, but the host bade him angrily to be quiet and not to make a fool of himself by insulting his guests.

The old gentleman and his followers then took their departure, leaving Yin still sitting at the table. When they were gone, Yin got up. The place was now, of course, pitch dark, and he might have thought all his adventures a dream had it not been that he had the cup up his sleeve.

In a short time the eastern sky began to grow red and the day to break, so he rolled up his bedding and walked down to the gate, where he found his friends waiting for him. Yin told them his adventures, and produced his golden cup.

A few years after these occurrences Yin took his doctoral degree, and was appointed to an office in Fei Chiu, in the Province of Honan. At that place lived a rich man named Chu. He invited Yin to dinner one day, and ordered the servants to put out the best gold cups.

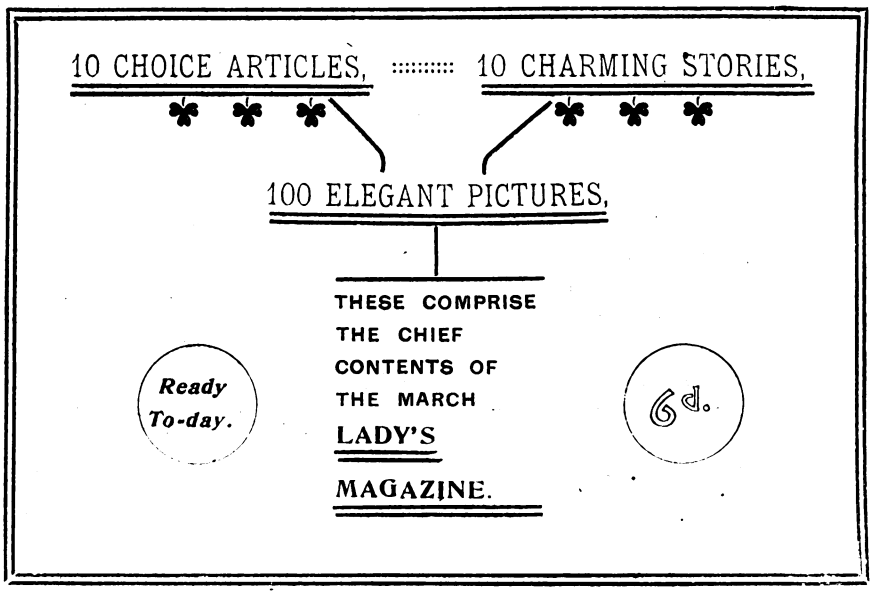
It was some time before this order was obeyed, and while the cups were being placed on the table, the butler whispered something to his master, which seemed to disconcert him considerably. Seven large gold cups were now handed round, and Yin saw to his astonishment that they were exactly like the goblet which he had stolen at the marriage feast in the haunted house. He turned to his host and asked him where he had procured these cups.

"My father," replied Chu, "had an office in Pekin, and, when there, happened to hear of a goldsmith whose work was considered wonderfully artistic and elegant. My father commissioned him to make a set of eight drinking cups, which cups have since come down to me as a heirloom in our family. I regret to say, however, that though the box which holds these cups has been locked and sealed for fifteen years, one of the golden goblets has mysteriously disappeared. I don't understand it at all. I believe one of my servants must have stolen it and forged my seals."

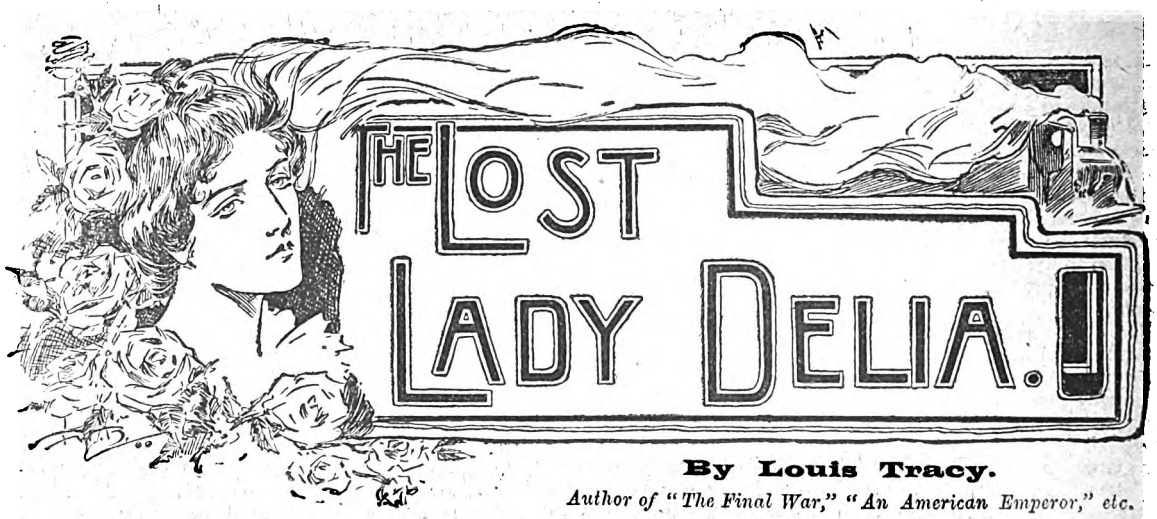
"Possibly," replied Yin with a laugh, "the cup itself made wings and flew away. But I know what I will do. I have a goblet at home of the same pattern as this, and, as a single cup is of no use to me, I will send it to you to complete your set."

Chu expressed thanks, and Yin on his return home sent the stolen cup to his friend, with a full account of how he had obtained it.

Moral: Sooner or later stolen things revert to their proper owners.



Digitized by Google



By Louis Tracy.

Author of "The Final War," "An American Emperor," etc.

CHAPTER XXV. (continued).

His visitor was so utterly disconsolate that Brett was at a loss to know how to deal with him.

He felt that if Mensmore would but speak regarding Mrs. Hilmer's strange delusion, and the cause of it, all these difficulties and disasters would disappear. He resolved to try a direct attack.

"Have you ever heard of a Colonel Montgomery?" he said suddenly, bending his searching gaze on the other's downcast face.

The effect was electrical.

Mensmore was so taken aback that he was spellbound. He looked at Brett, the picture of astonishment, before he stammered:

"I—you—who told you about him?"

"He was your sister's friend, adviser, and confidant," he replied sternly. "He it is who, in some way, is bound up with Lady Delia's disappearance."

Mensmore rose excitedly.

"I cannot discuss the matter with you," he cried, "I have given my sacred promise, and no matter what the cost may be I will not break my word."

"I do not press you. But may I see Mrs. Hilmer again? When she is calmer I might reason with her."

The other placed his hand on Brett's shoulder, and his voice was very impressive, though shaken with some strong emotion:

"Believe me," he said, "it is better that you should not see her. It will be useless. She is leaving London, not to avoid consequences, but to get away from painful memories. Her departure will be quite open, and her place of residence known to anyone who cares to inquire. One thing she is immovable in. She will never reveal to a living soul what she knows of Lady Delia's death. She would rather suffer at the hands of the law any punishment that might be meted out to her."

"Don't you understand that this man, Montgomery, is now known to the police. Sooner or later he will be found and asked to explain any connection he may have had with the crime. Why not accomplish quietly that which will perforce be done through the uncompromising channels of Scotland Yard?"

"Your reasoning appears to be good, but——"

"But folly must prevail?"

"Put it that way if you like."

"So this wretched imbroglio may cost you the love of a charming and devoted girl?"

"Heaven help me, it may—probably will."

"I swear to you," cried the barrister, who was unusually excited, "that I will tear the heart out of this mystery before the week expires."

Mensmore bowed silently and would have left the room, but Smith entered. In their distraction they had not heard the bell ring. Smith handed a card to his master. Instantly Brett controlled himself. His admiration for the dramatic sequence of events overcame his eagerness as an actor. It was with an appreciative smile that he said, without the slightest reference to Mensmore:

"Show the lady in."

Mensmore was passing out, but the sight of the visitor drove him back as though he had been struck. It was Phyllis Browne.

Her recognition of him was a bright smile. She advanced to Brett, saying pleasantly:

"I am glad to meet you, though the manner of my call is somewhat unconventional. I heard much of you from Bertie in the Riviera, and more since my return to town."

Brett suitably expressed his delight at this apparition. Mensmore, not knowing what to do, stood awkwardly at the other end of the room.

Neither of the others paid the least heed to him.

"Of course I had a definite object in coming to see you, Mr. Brett,' went on the young lady. "I have been coolly told that, because somebody killed somebody else some months ago, a young gentleman who asked me to be his wife, is not only not going to marry me but intends to spend the rest of his life in Central Africa or China—anywhere in fact but where I may be."

"A most unwise resolve," said the barrister.

"So I thought. You appear to hold the key of the situation, Mr. Brett; and as it is an easy matter to trace you through the Directory, here I am. My people think I am skating at St. James'."

"Well, Miss Browne," said Brett, "I am neither judge nor jury nor counsel for the prosecution, but there is the culprit. I hand him over to you."

"Yes, but that goose didn't kill anybody, did he?"

"No."

"And I am sure his sister did not; from what little I saw of her she would not hurt a fly."

"Quite true."

"Then why don't you find the man who caused all the mischief—and—and—lock him up at least, so that he can't go on injuring people?"

Miss Phyllis was very brave and self-confident at the outset. Now she was on the verge of tears, for Mensmore's saddened face and depressed manner unnerved her more than his passionate words at their last interview.

Digitized by Google

"You ask me a straight question," replied Brett, though his eyes were fixed on Mensmore, "and I will give you a straight answer. I will find the man who killed Lady Delia. As you say, it is time his capacity for doing injury to others should be limited. Before many days have passed, Mr. Mensmore will come to you and beg your pardon for his hasty and quite unwarranted resolve."

"Do you hear that, Bertie?" cried the girl. "Didn't I tell you so?"

Mensmore came forward to her side of the table.

"I need not wait, Phil, dear," he said simply. "I ask your pardon now. This business is in the hands of Providence. I was foolish to think that anything I could do would stave off the inevitable."

"And if you have—to go—to China—you w-will take me with you?"

Brett looked out of the window, whistled, and said loudly, addressing a beautiful lady in short skirts who figured in a poster across the way:

"Let me ring for some tea. All this talk makes one dry."

CHAPTER XXVI.

Lady Helen Montgomery's Son.

When the young people had gone out—Mensmore ill at ease, though tremulously happy that Phyllis had so demonstrated her trust in him, Phyllis herself radiantly confident in the barrister's powers to set everything right—Brett devoted himself to the task of determining a new line for his energies.

The first step was self-evident. He must ascertain if the Lyles knew a Colonel Montgomery.

He drove to the club frequented by Sir Charles, in the first place; but the baronet was not there, so he went to Wensley House.

Sir Charles was at home, in his accustomed nook by the library fire. He looked ill and low-spirited. The temporary animation he had displayed during the past few weeks was gone. If anyth ng, he was more listless than at any time since his wife's death.

"Well, Brett," he said, "anything to report?"

"Yes, a good deal."

"What is it?"

"I want to ask you something. Did you ever know a Colonel Montgomery, or was your wife acquainted with anyone of that name to your knowledge?"

"I do not think she was. Had she ever met such a man I should probably have heard of him. Who was he?"

The baronet's low state rendered his words careless and indefinite, but his friend did not wish to bother him unduly.

"The police have discovered," he said, "that Mrs. Hilmer formed a close intimacy with someone whom she designated by that name and rank, though I have failed to trace any British officer who answers to his description. He disappeared, or died, as some people put it, about the same time as your wife."

"Is it not known what became of him then?"

"No."

"Won't Mrs. Hilmer tell you?"

"She absolutely refuses to give any help whatever."

"On what ground?"

"That is best known to herself. My theory is that a man she loves is implicated in this affair, and she is prepared to go to any lengths to shield him."

"Ah!"

Sir Charles bent over and poked the fire viciously. Then he murmured: "Women are queer creatures, Brett. We men never understand them until too late. My wife and I

BOVRIL WAR PICTURE

"THE RELIEF OF LADYSMITH." JOHN H. BACON.

A Magnificent Historic War Gravure, 28in. by 18½in., printed on Fine Plate Paper 40in. by 30in., free from advertising matter.

FREE TO PURCHASERS OF BOVRIL IN BOTTLES in accordance with a plan, full particulars of which as well as coupon are given with every bottle.

Digitized by Google

never cared a jot for one another whilst she lived, to all appearance. Yet I now realise that she loved me, and I would give the little remaining span of existence, dear as life is, to see her once more."

This was a morbid subject, so Brett tried to switch him off it.

"It is almost clear to me," he said, "that this Colonel Montgomery's name was assumed. Few people realise the use of the alias made in modern life. I have a notion that the custom amongst otherwise honourable people has arisen from the publicity given to the fact that Royal and other distinguished personages frequently choose to conceal their identity under less known territorial titles."

"The idea is ingenious. We are all slaves of fashion."

"However that may be, it should not be a difficult task to lay hands on this gentleman should he be still living."

"Suppose you succeed. How can you connect him with my wife's death?"

"At this moment I am unable to say. But the cabman might be of some use."

"The cabman. What cabman?"

"Did I omit that? I ought to have told you that I have found the driver of the four-wheeler in which poor Lady Delia was taken, dead or insensible, from Sloane Square to Putney."

"What an extraordinary thing!"

"What is?"

"That you should have forgotten to inform me of such a striking fact."

"Not so. Now that I recollect, I have not had the opportunity. It was impossible to discuss anything else but that letter on the last two occasions we met, and it was only a few hours prior to your visit on Monday that I got the cabman's story fully. By the way, do you now see any reason why Jane Harding should have tried to deceive you in such a manner?"

The barrister perceived that Sir Charles was nervous and irritable, so he deemed it a needless strain to enlarge on the history of his discovery of Foxey.

"I am tired of letters, and plots, and mysteries. My life is resolving itself into one huge note of interrogation. Soon the great question of eternity will dominate all others."

Lyle's mood unfitted him for sustained conversation. Brett could but pity him, and hope that time would calm his fevered brain, and still the unrest that shed this gloom over him.

"Really," said Reggie after a long interval, during which both men sought inspiration from the dancing flames in the fire-place, "really this is too bad of you, Lyle. You showed a marked improvement for a little space, and now you are letting yourself slip back into a state of lonely and unoccupied moping again."

"My thoughts find me both occupation and company," was the despondent reply.

"There is nothing for it," continued Brett cheerfully, "but a tour round the world. You must start immediately. A complete change of scene and surroundings will soon pull you back to a normal state of mind and health."

"I have been thinking of a long journey for some time past."

The barrister glanced sharply at his friend. The double entendre was not lost on him. Lyle was in a very depressed and nervous condition. The uncertainty regarding his wife's fate was harassing him unduly, and it was with a twinge of conscience that Brett reflected upon his own eagerness to pursue a quest which, by very reason of its indefiniteness, attracted him as an intellectual pursuit.

"Look here, Lyle," he cried, on the spur of the moment, "I have long desired to see the Canadian-Pacific route. Will you arrange to start West with me a fortnight hence? We will return when the spirit moves us."

"We will see. We will see. To-day I feel unable to decide anything."

"Yes, I know, but the mere fact that you take the resolution will serve to re-animate you."

"It is very good of you, Brett, to trouble so about me. Had you asked me earlier I might have gone straight away. But let it rest for a little while. When I have recovered my spirits somewhat I will come to you to ask you to sail next day, or something of that sort."

Beyond this Brett could not move him.

In pursuance of his promise to Phyllis Browne he lost no time in striving to finally solve the problem of Lady Delia's disappearance.

There was one link in the chain of evidence that would be irrefragable if discovered. Was this Colonel Montgomery in any way connected with the house at Putney where the murderer had disposed of the body? If this could be established the unknown visitor to Raleigh Mansions would experience a good deal of difficulty in clearing himself from suspicion, as Brett was certain that, once the "Colonel" was traced, much would come to light regarding him to explain Mrs. Hilmer's, and her brother's, dread lest his identity should be discovered.

An inquiry addressed to the house agents to whom possible tenants were referred elicited the information that the present owner, a lady, was prepared to let the house annually or on a lease. They inclosed an order to view, which Brett retained in case he should happen to need it.

A second letter gave him the address of the lady's solicitors, Messrs. Small and Sharp, Lincoln's Inn.

To them Brett betook himself on the Wednesday afternoon. He posed as a possible tenant, with a desire to purchase the property outright if this proposal could be entertained.

Mr. Sharp, the partner who dealt with this estate, became very suave when the suggestion reached his ears.

"You will understand, Mr. Brett, that your request requires some consideration. The rent my client asks is comparatively low, because the house is old-fashioned, but the splendid riparian position of the property, a freehold acre on the banks of the Thames at Putney, gives it a highly-increased future value. Any figure you may have based on a rental calculation would therefore——"

"Not meet the case at all," said Brett, repressing a smile at the familiar first move in the game of bargaining.

"Precisely."

"May I ask you who the present owner is?"

"Certainly. The lady's name is Small. In fact, she is my partner's wife. Her father, the late Rev. Septimus Childe, purchased the estate some years ago, largely because the house suited his requirements as the head of a very successful private school."

"Has the estate changed hands frequently then?"

"Oh, dear no. Indeed, it is well understood that the Rev. Mr. Childe acquired it more as a friendly transaction than otherwise. The place is a portion of the separate estate of the late Lady Helen Montgomery, who married Sir William Lyle, father of the present baronet, who perhaps—good gracious, my dear sir, what is the matter?"

Had Brett been a woman he must have fainted.

As it was, the shock of the intelligence nearly paralysed him. Sir Charles Lyle!—Montgomery!—the house at Putney the property of his mother! What new terror did not this frightful combination suggest?

Why did his friend conceal from him these most important facts? Why did he pretend ignorance not only of the locality, but of his mother's maiden name. Like lightning the remembrance flashed through Brett's troubled brain that he had only heard of the earlier Lady Lyle as a daughter of the Earl of Tilbury. A suspicion—profoundly horrible, yet convincing—was slowly mastering him, and every second brought further proof not only of its reasonableness, but of its ghastly and inflexible certainty.

(Continued on page 348.)

Digitized by Google

10/6 PATTERNS FREE.

Allen Foster & Co

SOLE MAKERS OF THE 'ALFOSCO' COSTUMES

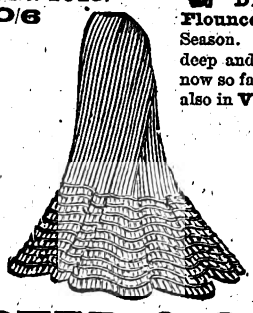
BUY DIRECT AT FIRST COST FROM THE LEADING FIRM OF LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

Design No. 377, 10/6; Skirt alone, 5/6.

DESIGN No. 377. 10/6. A smart New Design in Ladies' Costumes. Best Value in the Market. Produced in Black or Navy, or any of the colourings of Allen Foster & Co.'s Specialite Serge and Venetian Cloth. The bodice is tight-fitting, and is made to fasten on left shoulder—the lapels, collar, and front are tastefully trimmed with bright flat braid, as shown in sketch. The Skirt is cut full and well-made. A splendid Costume for Half-a-Guinea, securely packed and sent carriage paid for 6d. extra.

PATTERNS FREE.

Design No. 1045. 10/6



DESIGN No. 1045. 10/6 New Corded Flounce Skirt. The fashionable Costume Skirt of the Season. The flounce, which is lined linenette, is about 16in. deep and trimmed round with rows of the New Cording now so fashionable. Made in the Specialite Serge and also in Venetian Cloth. 10/6. Sent carriage paid 5d. extra. Send for one.

A SPECIAL LINE OF COSTUME SKIRTS
In Black & Navy Serge, lined throughout.
PRICE ONLY 3/11;
Carriage 5d.

10/6 BY PARCEL POST.

10/6

DESIGN No. 2131. HALF-A-GUINEA. The Fashionable three-quarter Sacque Jacket, 30 in. long. Made in a superior Beaver Cloth, in Black, Fawn, Brown, and Royal. This Jacket has a Chesterfield front, with the new side pockets. Price only 10/6; carriage, 6d. The Greatest Value on the Market. Send for one. All sizes in stock. In sending order, give bust measurement under arms. Money returned if not approved.

ALLEN FOSTER & Co., THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS, 47 Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C.

A FREE TRIAL FOR 2/6

THE SET consists of Violin, Bow, Resin, &c.

VIOLIN OUTFIT COMPLETE.
Price £1 10s. 0d.

We will supply any reader of Short Stories with one of these VIOLIN OUTFITS on Monthly Payments, as follows:—

You send us 2/6, with your Name and Address, and we will send one on approval.

If you approve of it you send us 2/6 on receipt and 5/- each month for 5 months, making the full 30/-.

BUT OUR NETT CASH WITH ORDER PRICE IS 27/- only.

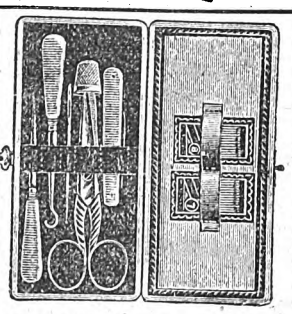
And if you do not approve of the Outfit, we will refund the cash sent, if you return the Outfit at once.



LADY'S COMPANION.

Containing 7 useful articles, exactly as illustrated, with Hall-marked Silver Thimble, in fine Leather Covered Velvet Lined Case. Price only 4/3.

MASTERS' 'FAVOURITE' MELODEON 12/6.

We will supply any reader with this Melodeon on receipt of 2/6. If you approve of it you send us 2/- on receipt and 2/- each month for 4 months. Nett Cash With Order Price 11/- only. If you do not approve of it we will refund the cash if you return the Melodeon at once.

Watches Clocks Alberts Medals Pendants Wedding rings Gem rings Signet rings Cutlery Cruets Electro-Plate Carvers Tea-pots Field glasses Pins Brooches

CATALOGUE

J.N. Masters, Ltd., Jewellers, RYE, Sussex.

Digitized by Google

Again the lawyer's voice reached his ears, dully and thin, as though it penetrated through a wall.

"Surely you have been taken suddenly ill? Let me get you some brandy."

"No—no," murmured the barrister. "It is but a momentary faintness. I—I think I will go out into the fresh air. Are you—quite sure—that Mr. Childe bought the property from Lady Helen Montgomery's trustees?"

"Quite sure. If you can wait even a few moments I will show you the title-deeds."

"No, thank you. I will call again. Pray excuse me."

Somehow Brett reached the quiet square of the Inn, and then plunged into the turmoil of the street. Amidst the bustle of Holborn he had a curious sensation of safety. The fiend so suddenly installed in his consciousness was less busy here suggesting strange and maddening thoughts.

Why — why — why — fifty questions beat incessantly against the barrier of agonised negation he strove to set up, but the noise of the traffic made the attack confused. Each incautious bump against a passer-by silenced a demand, each heavy crunch of a 'bus on the gravel-strewed roadway temporarily silenced a doubt.

He was so unmanned that he felt almost on the verge of tears. He absolutely dared not attempt to reason out the fearful alternative which had so fiercely thrust itself upon him.

At last he became vaguely aware that people were staring at him. Fearful lest some acquaintance should recognise and accost him he hailed a hansom and drove to Victoria Street.

All the way the steady beat of the horse's feet served to distract his thoughts. He forced himself to count the quick paces, and tried hard to accommodate the numerals of two or more syllables to the rapidity of the animal's trot. He failed in this, but in the failure found relief.

Nevertheless, though the horse was willing and the driver eager to oblige a fare who gave a "good" address, the time seemed interminable until the cab stopped in front of his door.

Once there, he slowly ascended the stairs to his own flat, told Smith to pay the cabman half-a-crown and to admit no one, and threw himself into a chair.

At last he was face to face with the troublous demon who possessed him in Lincoln's Inn, struggled with him through the crowd, and travelled with him in the hansom. Phyllis Browne should have her answer sooner than he had expected.

The man who murdered Lady Delia was Sir Charles Lyle, her husband.

"Oh, Heavens!" moaned Brett, as he swayed restlessly to and fro in his chair; "is it possible?"

He sat there for hours. Smith entered, turned on the lights and suggested tea, but received an impatient dismissal.

After another long interval, Smith appeared again, to announce that Mr. Winter had called.

"Did you not say I was out?" said Brett, his hollow tones and haggard air startling his faithful servitor considerably.

"Yes, sir—oh, yes, sir. But that's no use with Mr. Winter. He said as how he was sure you were in."

"Ask him to oblige me by coming again—to-morrow. I am very ill. I really cannot see him."

Smith left the room, but only to return and say:

"Mr. Winter says, sir, his business is of the utmost importance. He can't leave it; and he says you will be very sorry afterwards if you don't see him now."

"Oh, so be it," cried Brett, turning desperately to a spirit-stand to seek sustenance in a stiff glass of brandy. "Send him in."

Quite awed by the circumstances, Smith admitted the detective and closed the door upon the two standing looking at each other without a word of greeting or explanation

CHAPTER XXVII.

Mr. Winter's Method.

The policeman spoke first. "Has Jane Harding been here, then?" he said.

His words conveyed no meaning to his hearer. They were so incongruous, so ridiculously unreasoning, that Brett laughed hysterically.

"You must have seen her," cried Mr. Winter, excitedly. "I know you have learnt the truth, and in no other way that I can imagine could it have reached you."

"Learnt what truth?"

"That Sir Charles Lyle himself is at the bottom of all this business."

"Indeed. How have you blundered upon that solution?"

"Look here, Mr. Brett, this time I am right, and you know it. It was Sir Charles Lyle who killed his wife. Nobody else had anything to do with it, so far as I can guess. But if you haven't seen Jane Harding, I wonder how you found out."

"You are speaking in riddles. Pray explain yourself."

"If Sir Charles Lyle had not been out of town, the riddle would have been answered by this time in the easiest way, as I should have locked him up."

"Excellent. You remain faithful to tradition."

"Mr. Brett, please don't try to humbug me. I am quite in earnest. I have come to you for advice. Sir Charles Lyle is guilty right enough."

"And what do you want me to do?"

"To help me as to the proper course. The whole thing seems so astounding that I can hardly trust my own senses. I spoke hastily just now. I would not have touched Sir Charles before consulting you. I was never in such a mixed-up condition in my life."

Whatever the source of his information, the detective had evidently arrived at the same conclusion as Brett himself. There was nothing for it but to endeavour to calmly reason out the situation and adopt the best method of dealing with it suggested by their joint intelligence. Brett motioned the detective to a chair, imposed silence by a look, and summoned Smith. He was faint from want of food. With returning equanimity he resolved first to restore his strength, as he would need all his powers to deal with events before he slept that night.

Mr. Winter, nothing loth, joined him in a simple meal, and by tacit consent no reference was made to the one engrossing topic in their thoughts until the table had been cleared.

"And now, Mr. Winter," said Brett, "what have you found out?"

"During the last two days," was the reply, "I have been unsuccessfully trying to trace Colonel Montgomery. No matter what I did I failed. I got hold of several of Mrs. Hilmer's tradespeople, but she always pays her bills with her own cheques, and none of them had ever heard of a Colonel Montgomery. That furniture business puzzled me a lot. The change of the drawing-room set from one flat to another on November 7th, I mean. So I found out the address of the people who supplied the new articles to Mrs. Hilmer——"

"How?"

"Through the maid, Dobson. Mrs. Hilmer has given her notice to leave, and the girl is furious about it, as she appears to have had a very easy place there. I think it came to Mrs. Hilmer's ears that she talked a lot with me."

"I see. Proceed."

"Here I hit upon a slight clue. It was a gentleman who ordered the new furniture, and directed the transfer of the articles replaced from No. 61 to No. 12, Raleigh Mansions. He did this early in the morning of November 7th, and the foreman in charge of the job remembered that there was some bother about it, as neither Mrs. Hilmer nor Mr. Pyne, as Mensmore used to be called, knew anything about it to

(Continued on page 350.)

Digitized by Google

A Boon to Dyspeptics.

Quoted from "The Lady."

"In these high-pressure days, when men and women alike have to work incessantly with brain and hand to hold their own in the great battle of life, it is the exception rather than the rule to find any one who does not suffer from that insiduous and most distressing complaint—Dyspepsia—in one form or another. The most general symptoms of this disease—for it invariably develops into a disease if its progress remains unchecked—are loss of Appetite on most occasions, varied by craving desires for food which is extremely indigestible; fearful Depression of Spirits, together with various aches and pains in nearly every part of the body; the digestive organs refuse to perform their offices in a perfect manner, and if neglected, the result is too often apparent in the contraction of cancer or tumour in the Stomach, abcess on the Liver, and many serious internal complications. The great remedies for these evils, if taken when Dyspepsia has not yet assumed its later and, in fact, fatal phases, are a really good tonic and a careful diet, combined with sensible Health precautions; but hitherto no entirely satisfactory tonic for Dyspeptics has been discovered, as most preparations of the kind contain iron or quinine in some form, which, though valuable preparations in many cases, are devoid of digestive qualities. The preparation known as Guy's Tonic is, however, a wonderfully efficacious remedy. It is entirely free from iron, and therefore does not induce Constipation, a most important consideration. It contains no quinine either, but is composed of Vegetable tinctures from the British Pharmacopœia, and is prepared from the formula of a London physician. It is more than a tonic, as besides strengthening the whole Nervous System and correcting a Sluggish Liver, it assists the process of Digestion in a very great degree; moreover, it is pleasant to take."

Quite Hungry Now.

"Charleville Forest, Tullamore,
"King's Co., Ireland.

"I am truly thankful to say that I am greatly "better. My Appetite has returned, and I feel "quite hungry for my meals. I also have slept "perfectly since I took Guy's Tonic. It is "splendid.—(Miss) L. Diamond."

A new size (Six-Ounce) Bottle of Guy's Tonic, price 1s. 1½d., is now on Sale at all Chemists and Stores.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Shilling packets

Kaputine "the" safe Remedy for Headache

WARNING. Instead of using the common White Headache Powders, which generally consist entirely of a crude drug, which has been condemned as dangerous by the medical papers, insist on having a bona-fide anti-quack remedy, recommended by such eminent medical authorities as Dr. RAMAGE, L.R.C.P., Dr. THURSTIN, L.R.C.P., late Dr. BOYD-WILLIAMS (Liverpool), the Editor of the Medical Journal, "Health," etc., etc. The name of this safe remedy is KAPUTINE.

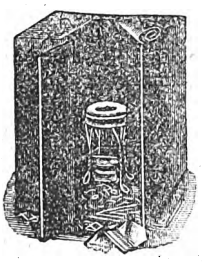
ALL LEADING CHEMISTS SELL IT, OR CAN GET IT FOR YOU IN A FEW HOURS.

Sold by BOOT'S, TAYLOR'S, DAY'S, WHITE'S and other Stores. Most Co-operative Stores sell it.

PACKETS, 1/-. SAMPLES ONE PENNY,

or KAPUTINE LIMITED, HUDDERSFIELD,
will send it FREE for 12 stamps.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.



A

TURKISH BATH

For 1½d.

The U.S. Turkish Bath Cabinet is the best of all Cabinet now sold. It is a tight, double-walled room, rubber coated inside and out, fitted with door, and so made that it folds into a small space only six inches thick, and is handsome, convenient, and strong. With this cabinet all the benefits of the best Turkish Bath Rooms are obtained. Absolutely no essential feature is lacking; no breathing of hot air; no risk of exposure afterwards; saving of time and expense.

For the cure of Rheumatism, Kidney and Blood Diseases, no other treatment can approach it. The U.S. Hygienic Hot Air Bath forces all impurities there may be in the blood through seven million of pores at once. All who value a clear complexion and superb health should own one of these Cabinets. One Bath will stop a cold.

The U.S. Turkish Bath Cabinets are guaranteed to be the very best on the market, and are sold on approval, to be returned without expense if not satisfactory.

PRICE FROM 25/- TO 70/-.

Carriage paid to any address in the British Isles. Send for Illustrated Catalogue, with Medical Testimonials.

THE U.S. TURKISH BATH CABINET CO.,
Dept. S., 20 Regent Street, London.
(Opposite the Junior Army and Navy Stores.)

Digitized by Google

all appearance. But the gentleman came the same morning and explained matters. It struck the foreman as funny there should be such a fearful hurry about refurnishing a drawing-room, for the gentleman did not care what the cost was so long as the job was carried out at express speed. Another odd thing was that Mrs. Hilmer paid for the articles, though she had not ordered them nor did she appear to want them. The man was quite certain that Mr. Mensmore's first knowledge of the affair came with the arrival of the first batch of articles from Mrs. Hilmer's flat, but he could only describe the mysterious agent as being a regular swell. He afterwards identified a portrait of Sir Charles Lyle as being exactly like the man he had seen, if not the man himself."

"How did you come to have a portrait of Sir Charles in your possession?"

"That appears later," said the detective, full of professional pride at the undoubtedly smart manner in which he had manipulated his facts once they were placed in order before him.

"Of course," he went on, "I jumped to the conclusion that the stranger was this Colonel Montgomery. Then, whilst closely questioning the maid about the events of November 7, she suddenly remembered that she had lost an old coat and skirt about that date. They had vanished from her room, and she had never laid eyes on them since. This set me thinking. I confronted her with the clothes worn by Lady Delia when she was found in the river, and I'm jiggered if Dobson didn't recognise them at once as being her missing property. Now, wasn't that a rum go?"

"It certainly was," said Brett, who was piecing together the story of the murder in his mind as each additional detail came to light.

"Naturally I thought harder than ever after that. It then occurred to me that Jane Harding must have had some powerful reasons for so suddenly shutting up about the identification of her mistress' underclothing. She was right enough, as we now know, in regard to the coat and skirt, but she admitted to me that the linen on the dead body was just the same as Lady Delia's. Curiously enough, it was not marked by initials, crest, or laundry-mark, and I ascertained months ago that owing to some fad of her ladyship's, all the family washing was done on the estate in Yorkshire. This explained the absence of the otherwise inevitable laundry mark."

"Thus far you are coherence itself."

"Well," said Mr. Winter complacently, "I was a long time getting to work, Mr. Brett, and had it not been for your help I should never, probably, have got at the truth, but I flatter myself that, once on the right track, I seldom leave it. However, as I was saying, I felt that Jane Harding knew a good deal more than she would tell, except under pressure, so I decided to put that pressure on."

"In what way?"

"I frightened her. Played off on her a bit of the stage business she is so fond of. This afternoon I placed a pair of handcuffs in my pocket and went to her place at Bloomsbury, having previously filled in a bogus warrant for her arrest on a charge of complicity in the murder of Lady Delia."

"It was a dangerous game, Mr. Winter!"

"Very. If it had gone wrong and had reached the ears of the Commissioner or got into the papers, I should have been reduced or dismissed. But what is a policeman to do in such cases? I was losing my temper over this infernal inquiry and never getting any real light, though always coming across startling developments. It had to end somehow, and I took the chance. The make-believe warrant and the production of handcuffs for a woman—they are never used, you know, in reality—have often been trump cards for us when everything else failed."

"This time, then, the 'properties' made up the 'show,' as Miss Harding would put it?"

"They did, and no mistake. I gave her no time to think or act. I found her sitting with her mother, admiring a new carpet she had just laid down. I said, 'Is your name Jane Harding, now engaged at the Jollity Theatre, under the alias of Marie le Marchant, but formerly a maid in the service of Lady Delia Lyle?' She grew very white and said, 'Yes,' whilst her mother clutched hold of her, terrified. Then I whipped out the warrant and the cuffs. My, but you should have heard them squeal when the bracelets clinked together. 'What has my child done?' screamed the mother. 'Perhaps nothing, madam,' I answered, 'but she is guilty in the eyes of the law just the same if she persists in screening the guilty parties.' Jane Harding was trembling and blubbering, but she said, 'It is very hard on me. I have done nothing.' I nearly trembled myself, then, as I feared that she might offer to come with me to the police-station, in which case I should have been dished. But the mother fixed the affair splendidly. 'I am sure my daughter will not conceal anything,' she said, 'and it is a shame to disgrace her in this way without telling her what it is you want to know.' I took the cue in an instant. 'I am empowered,' I said, 'to suspend this warrant, and perhaps do away with it altogether if she answers my questions fully and truthfully.' 'Why, of course she will,' said the mother, and the girl, though desperately upset, whimpered her agreement. With that I got the whole story."

"Sir Charles Lyle inspired her actions, I suppose?"

"From the very beginning almost. At first Jane Harding herself believed, when she gave evidence at the inquest, that the body she saw was not that of Lady Delia. But afterwards she changed her opinion, especially when she recalled the exact pattern and materials of the underclothing. Then my inquiries put her on the scent. Being rather a sharp girl, she jumped to the conclusion that Sir Charles Lyle knew more about the matter than he professed. In any case her place was gone and she would soon be dismissed, so she resolved on a plan even bolder than mine in threatening to lock her up. She watched her opportunity, got Sir Charles alone one day, and told him that from certain things that came to her knowledge she thought it her duty to go to the police-station. He was startled, she could see, and asked her the reason for her resolve. She said that her mistress had been killed, and she might be able to put the police on the right track. He hesitated, not knowing what to say, so she went on to explain that it would mean a lot of trouble for her, and she would prefer, if she had £500, to go to America and let the matter drop altogether. He told her that he did not want to have Lady Delia's name brought into public notoriety, and sooner than have such a thing occur he would give her the money. An hour later he handed her fifty ten-pound notes."

"What a wretched mistake," said Brett involuntarily. This unmasking of his unfortunate friend's duplicity was the most painful feature of all to him.

"Perhaps it was," replied Winter, "but the thing is not yet clear to me. That is why I am here. But to continue. The girl admitted that then she lost her head a bit. Instead of leaving the house openly, without attracting comment, she simply bolted, thus giving rise to the second sensational element attending Lady Delia's disappearance. But she resolved to be faithful to her promise. When you found her she held her tongue, and even wrote to Sir Charles to assure him that she had not spoken to a soul. He sent for her and pitched into her about not going to America, but took her address in case he should want to see her again."

"He recognised her letter-writing powers, no doubt."

(To be continued.)

Kindly mention
"A Keeper of Secrets"
to your friends.

Digitized by Google

A Flood-Tide Opportunity.

"There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;
Omitted, all the voyage of their life
Is . . . . ."

As such, readers of the "Daily Express" evidently regard our special "Chambers's Encyclopædia" offer. And there is good reason why they should so regard it. It is true that cheap reprints of out-of-date works have frequently been offered at a low price, but never before has such a magnificent opportunity been offered—to obtain, direct from the publisher's press, a newly-completed and universally-endorsed literary production such as the 20th Century Issue of Chambers's Encyclopædia.

(Based on newest statistics, events, and discoveries. The only truly modern work of its kind.)

. . . . . Note that the publishers' motive, in this case, is not immediate profit, but an advantageous introduction of a new edition of their great Work, whose merits will win for it a universal demand as soon as the general public becomes aware of its practical usefulness. This is where the wisdom of the publishers' arrangement with the "Daily Express" appears. Incidentally some of our readers—those who are shrewd enough to seize this opportunity while it lasts—are being greatly benefited. They are obtaining this splendid library at a remarkably low price; besides that, the entire set is delivered to them at once, to use and enjoy while they pay for it in small monthly payments. Better send in your order to-day; a later day may be too late.

Cut Out this Application Form and hand it at once with 3s. to your Bookseller or Newsagent for transmission to the DAILY EXPRESS. Subscribers desiring to complete the purchase in a single payment need only send name and address, making cheque or money order payable to the order of Lloyd's Bank Ltd. If cloth set is desired, enclose £3 15s.; if Half Morocco, £5 12s. 6d.

To the General Manager, DAILY EXPRESS,
17 Tudor Street, London, E.C. Date.....1901.

I enclose 3s. Please send me Chambers's Encyclopædia (20th Century Issue).

[Strike out one of the lines.] (a) Cloth, for which I agree to make to you, or to anyone you may appoint, nine further payments of 8s. 6d. each, (b) Half Morocco, for which I agree to make to you, or to anyone you may appoint, nine further payments of 13s. each, my next payment upon delivery of the complete ten volumes, and my succeeding payments on the corresponding day of each month following. Until such payments are completed, I engage that the volumes remain your property, and shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise. I further agree that if, owing to unforeseen circumstances, of which you shall be the judge, the volumes cannot be delivered, the return of this deposit of 3s. shall cancel this agreement.

[C9] [Signed] .....

Rank or Occupation].....[Address].....

CARRIAGE PAID TO ANY RAILWAY STATION IN THE UNITED KINGDOM.

Digitized by Google

THE EDITOR'S PAGE.

As I expected, the subject of pretty girls, broached on this page a fortnight ago, has provoked a good deal of comment. "Admirer" (who, you may remember, opined that there were more pretty girls in Norwich than in any other place of its size) comes in for a good deal of cutting criticism.

"Why, Norwich cannot hold a candle in this respect to Ipswich," says "A. E.," "and I speak without prejudice, not being an inhabitant of either place."

"Commercial Traveller," who gets about a good deal, is of opinion that Huddersfield bears the palm for feminine beauty, while Leicester comes a moderate second.

"Jack" claims pride of place for Preston on the strength of his fiancée's looks. He sends me her photo and bluntly intimates that if I can tell him where he can find a prettier girl, why then, he'll be blowed!

"Jack" need not undergo the rude buffeting of Boreas or any other wind so far as I am concerned. His fiancée is extremely fair to look upon, and deserves to be the pride of Jack's heart and the pride of Preston. May I keep the photo, "Jack"?

❦

"This question which you are discussing is quite a fruitless one," remarks "Archie" in the course of a long letter. "In the first place, beauty is quite a matter of opinion, What is a beautiful face to one man may be to another nothing more than a plain one, and vice versâ. If this were not so there would be no accounting for the large number of (as I think) plain girls who are married or engaged. The fact is there are two kinds of beauty; the kind that knocks you all of a heap at first sight; and there is the other that is perhaps not apparent at first, but develops—or reveals itself—gradually as acquaintance with the subject grows. This is the more sterling beauty, the beauty that is more than 'skin deep,' that reflects the soul, fosters love, and retains possession of a man's heart once it has deeply attracted it. Mere surface beauty often fails to do this, accompanied so frequently as it is by flippancy, conceit, and shallowness of heart."

Which is a hard saying, and one with which I hasten to assure all my pretty readers, I have no desire to be associated.

"Edward P." writes to tell me that unfortunately he had in his youth but a very meagre education. What he knows he has, in a great measure, taught himself, but he finds himself lamentably ignorant on a great many subjects. This state of things he wishes to rectify. He has a laudable ambition to become a "well-read" man, and asks for hints as to a profitable course of study.

It is not easy to recommend books without knowing a man's specific tastes and requirements, but I cannot go wrong in suggesting that Chambers' Encyclopædia would probably be the best thing for my correspondent to get. It deals with every subject under the sun, and is certainly the most complete and up-to-date publication of its kind. Moreover, the Daily Express is offering it just now on such easy terms as to place it within the reach of even the poorest. Particulars are given on page 351.

❦

"Touchstone" is quite unable to understand why people are pleased or otherwise by music. To him one tune is like another, merely being a meaningless succession of monotonous sounds.

My correspondent probably suffers from "tone deafness," a disability which bears something of the same relation to the ear, as colour-blindness does to the eye. His is not a unique case, though the misfortune cannot be said to be common. A well-known Irish peer suffers similarly. On his own confession he is unable to distinguish, so far as the melody is concerned, between "Home, Sweet Home" and the National Anthem.

❦

Like many another person, "H. R." is desirous of making money. But not being able to earn much in his employment, he has lately sought to increase his capital by betting on horses and playing cards, with results the reverse of those for which he hoped.

Which is the order of things more often than not. "H. R." is doing a very foolish thing. Avoiding altogether the ethics of gambling, with which it is not my province to deal, I would recommend my correspondent to forswear the habit at once. The ways of the racecourse are devious, full of pitfalls for the uninitiated, and replete with every species of trick and roguery. A story in next week's Short Stories will vividly exemplify this.

If you must make money (and a reasonable quantity of it is a desirable acquisition), stick to work, my friend. Work hard—work, if need be, when idle folks are playing. Industry always tells in the long run.

❦

"C. Brabin, Jun." (Liverpool) has been a reader of Short Stories for some years, and thinks the number containing the first stories in the two new series one of the best he has seen.

For which kind and cheering words I thank him heartily, and all other readers who have written their appreciation of the new features.

TO CONTRIBUTORS.

I am open to consider original stories of any length from 1,500 to 4,000 words. The character of stories required may be best ascertained by a careful reading of the contents of the paper. All MSS. are dealt with promptly, and every effort is made to return rejected stories which are accompanied by stamped addressed envelopes. At the same time, I cannot hold myself responsible for MSS. accidentally lost. Communications of this kind should be addressed The Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, Strand, W.C.

SHORT STORIES ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,,	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,,	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,,	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,,	12 10 0
,, half ,, ,,	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, March 19th, if intended for the issue on sale April 2nd, and dated April 6th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A Treat for the Children.

When children meet at birthday and other parties, the hostess is naturally anxious to provide the most suitable and acceptable fare. Children do not require heavy meat-food, yet they need variety, and the mother would do well to secure—among other appetising things—a supply of Chivers' Gold Medal Jellies. These excellent Jellies are refreshing and cooling and also nourishing. Chivers' Gold Medal Jellies are flavoured with ripe fruit juices, expressed by the firm themselves from the fresh fruit. Their sale and popularity are ever increasing. It is merit that does it all, the merit that takes pains to do the best. Children like Chivers' Jellies—there is no doubt about that. Put it to the vote where they have been used and the "Ayes" have it unanimously. The Medical Press, after careful analysis, says: "Chivers' Jellies are to be commended for the delicacy of their flavour and for their absolute purity." The Woman's Signal gives this testimony: Chivers' Jellies can be confidently recommended, they are perfectly pure, absolutely clear and pleasant to look at on the table, and the flavour is simply perfect." A high-class Cookery Teacher writes: "Your Jellies are almost daily on our table, and they are, without doubt, the best in the market."

Chivers' Gold Medal Jams and Table Jellies are sold by Grocers throughout the United Kingdom. Insist on being supplied with Chivers'. A free sample packet of Jelly will be forwarded on receipt of post-card. S. Chivers and Sons, Histon, Cambridge.

TO SUFFERERS OF INDIGESTION

A cure of Indigestion is guaranteed in a few Weeks by the use of REES & CO'S. INDIGESTION CURE. If not, money will be returned. A Trial will convince. Price 1/6 per bottle.—REES & Co., Narberth, Pem.

Free

From the Antexema Co., 83 Castle Road London, N.W., if this paper is named, a booklet on the Skin and a FREE SAMPLE of

"Antexema."

It is absolutely the most wonderful Skin Cure that has ever been discovered. It gives immediate relief from Itching and burning and cures all skin diseases and every form of Eczema.

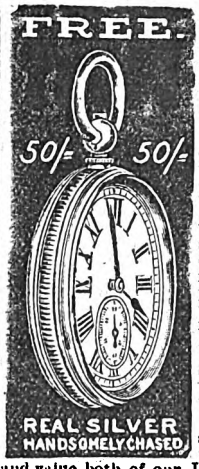
1/1½ bottles of chemists, post free for 1/3.

£50 EASILY EARNED

Send No Money, We Trust You.



WE GIVE YOU YOUR CHOICE of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1s. 6d. each. (Regular price, 2s. 6d.)

WE DO NOT WANT YOUR MONEY.

JUST WRITE US A POST-CARD

with your name and address clearly written, saying that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your post-card, we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13s. 6d. you have received for same, and we will AT ONCE send you (no waiting) ABSOLUTELY FREE, our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch, with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire. A Written Guarantee for Ten Years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1s. 6d. each article. We have thousands of testimonials and press notices as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents. With each packet we send you particulars of how you can easily earn £50, and remember to try. Herewith we append copy of receipt from the lucky winner of the £50 prize offered during January, 1901:—

IT COSTS YOU NOTHING

22 Cory St., Resolven, near Neath, S. Wales.

Received from the British Goldsmiths Co., Bank of England Note for Fifty Pounds in payment for Cash Prize, in addition to the Presents offered for selling the largest number of their packets of jewellery during the month of January, 1901.

Feb. 5, 1901. (Signed) JOHN SANDERS.

SEND NO MONEY. WRITE US TO-DAY.

SEND NO STAMPS. ONLY A POST-CARD.

BRITISH GOLDSMITHS CO. (DEPT. 29), 48 GRAY'S INN RD., LONDON.

A GIRL'S

PINAFORE DRESS

Can be made by any lady who follows carefully the paper pattern and instructions

GIVEN AWAY

with every copy of this week's

HOME NOTES.

THE BEST & DAINTIEST OF LADIES' WEEKLIES.

YOU SHOULD GET A COPY AT ONCE.

ONE PENNY.

Y-U-UZIT.

THE NEW DENTIFRICE. THE ONLY WAY

DISCOLOURED TEETH

can be RESTORED to their original colour WITHOUT SCALING is by using this Tooth-powder, the proprietors of which guarantee the return of your money in full if the powder does not do what is claimed above. No other Tooth-powder in the world is sold under such conditions. Obtainable from all Chemists. Price 1/1. per box, or direct from the Proprietors and manufacturers.

BLATCHFORD ROGERS SYNDICATE, Moorgate Station Chambers, E.C.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 176 Oxford Street, London, W.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and style to any machine To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO. 184a High St., Camden Town, London, N.W., 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

JUNO CYCLES FOR LADIES AND GENTS. FREE OR FIXED WHEELS.

THE VERY BEST. Carriage Paid. Discount for Cash.

	Monthly
£9 10s.	14/
£10 10s.	17/6
£12	20/-
£12 12s.	21/-
£14 14s.	24/1
£15 15s.	26/3

LISTS POST FREE

Roadster ... £9 10s. 13s. 10d. Monthly. Write for New Light Roadster, £11 0s. 16s. 8d. Monthly. Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories, over 100 pages, sent post free. Second-hand Bicycles, Tricycles, Tandems, Cyclometers, 10,000 miles, 1/6

METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS CO. Ltd. Juno Cycle School & Works, 75, 76, Bishopsgate Street, Without, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Don't THROW MONEY AWAY ON DOUBTFUL REMEDIES,

AND DO NOT BE INDUCED to buy an article of which little or nothing is known.

STOP BEING MISLED. The Proprietor of BEECHAM'S PILLS does not publish testimonials, but he could fill a volume with those he has received if he so pleased.

He is content to let BEECHAM'S PILLS stand on their own merits, knowing they recommend themselves; this they have done, are doing, and will continue to do.

REFRAIN FROM MAKING EXPERIMENTS with so-called remedies, but adhere to the bridge that has probably carried you over many an anxious time.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

But if you have never tried BEECHAM'S PILLS, then ask your parents or friends what they think of them, and judge by what they say; you can generally trust your own acquaintances, though there are some folks it is very hard to believe, just as there are some advertisements published which are open to grave suspicion.

You can get 56 BEECHAM'S PILLS in a box labelled 1s. 1½d.

You can get 168 BEECHAM'S PILLS in a box labelled 2s. 9d.

No other advertiser of a recognized first-class medicine gives such good value, so WHY THROW AWAY MONEY ON DOUBTFUL AND UNTRIED REMEDIES? BEECHAM'S PILLS have been before the public for over FIFTY Years, and in spite of all opposition are to-day

MORE POPULAR THAN EVER, and why?

Because THEY RECOMMEND THEMSELVES.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

No. 638.] FOR WEEK ENDING MARCH 23, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

ONE PENNY

**

Every Tuesday.

The astounding adventures of Hugo Pontifex (see inside) are causing a great sensation.

Digitized by Google

KAPUTINE

The Best & Safest Remedy for

HEADACHE.

NURSE HILL, of the London Association of Nurses, writes:

"I have seen Kaputine administered to many patients, and can truly say it is a remedy which should have a place in every household."

All Leading Chemists sell KAPUTINE, 1/-. Samples One Penny.

If your Chemist has not KAPUTINE send his name and address to KAPUTINE, HUDDERSFIELD, and we will send you a SHILLING PACKET FREE.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

U. R. IN LUCK in seeing this advertisement, which will put you into communication with one of the most liberal firms in Europe — from whom you will be able to Purchase the Finest Goods at

ABSOLUTELY WHOLESALE PRICES.

Send your Name and Address to H. SAMUEL (a post-card will do) for a copy of

H. Samuel's Bargain Book 25/-

Nearly 200 pages, adorned with over 3,000 illustrations and descriptions of Gold and Silver Watches, Jewellery, Diamonds, Plate, Cutlery, etc., etc.

FREE BONUS REWARDS

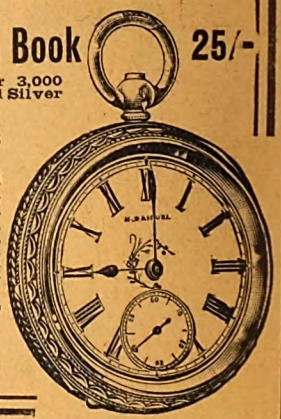
Ten Lists of Presents for Selection.

H. Samuel's Lady's 'Acme' Watch

contains special inventions protected by Royal Letters Patent, and obtainable only in H. Samuel's Watches. Fine Three-quarter Plate, Jewelled, Richly Decorated Dial (plain if preferred), and Highly Engraved Case. Warranted for Five Years, and sent with BONUS FREE GIFT on receipt of 25s.

A FULL MONTH'S FREE TRIAL is allowed with every article.

H. SAMUEL (Dept. 29), 95, 97, 99, 101, 89, and 121 Market S., MANCHESTER.



"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

PHOTOS. PHOTOS. PHOTOS.

FROM

Carte or Cabinet.

One permanent 12 by 10 Enlargement, Mounted on Plate sunk mount, measuring 20 by 16, with six highly-glazed cabinet Portraits of same for 10/6.

3 Cabinets 2/6; 6 for 3/6; 12 for 6/-. 6 Cartes 2/-; 12 for 3/-; 24 for 5/6. All sent carriage paid. Send to-day P.O. to H. BRADBURY, Photographer, The Chase, SOUTHGATE.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 23lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

NEW AUTOMATIC KNITTER

15/- to 30/- Weekly.

FOR HOME WORK.

"The machine that knitted the hosiery and comforts for the troops in Africa."—See what The Times said.

Knits Socks (a pair in 35 min.), Stockings, Fancy Goods, &c. Easily learned. Lessons Free.

Cash, hire, and Work Terms from "Sorres" dept.: 67 Southwark St., S.E.; 55 Oxford St., W.; 192 Upper St., London, N.; 105 Nicolson St., Edinburgh; 58 Union St., Glasgow; 132 Stephen's Green, Dublin; 62 Great Hampton St., Birmingham; 31 Stokes Croft, Bristol.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 638.] For the Week Ending March 23rd, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

A Keeper of Secrets

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Being Days in the Professional Life of the late Mr. Hugo Pontifex, the Famous West-end Solicitor.

To those who had only met him casually in Society, the late Mr. Pontifex was a good-tempered mystery. Bluff, handsome, and, in spite of his middle-age, a little of a dandy, he seemed the last man in the world to deserve his reputation, which was that of the keenest, most audacious, and unerring of family lawyers. Fair-haired, and powerful as an athlete, his striking appearance was increased by his eyes, one of which was grey and one blue.

In reality, however, Hugo Pontifex had a wide and almost exclusively aristocratic practice. He seldom briefed a barrister, seldom set foot in a court of justice, but single handed he hunted down, captured, and safely buried mystery after mystery of terrible import to Mayfair and Belgravia.

An expert in strangling scandal, he lived a life of enthralling interest, and died a rich man. When his executors went through his papers they found nothing to satisfy their curiosity, though plenty to excite it. Hugo Pontifex knew the value of fire—and the dangers of ink. But from time to time he related to the writer, who enjoyed a certain measure of his confidence, the incidents which form the basis of the following stories. In speaking of these strange fragments of drama, Mr. Pontifex himself employed fictitious names, the present author being left to guess vainly at the identity of the genuine actors.

THE SHADOW ON THE NORRIS MILLIONS.

AMONG the most memorable of Mr. Pontifex's clients was an American, tall, spare, clean-shaven, sallow, yet good-looking—there was something about him that proclaimed his nationality even before he had opened his firm, rather melancholy mouth. He did not enter the lawyer's private room alone; with him was a woman—a woman who was unmistakably a lady.

The solicitor's glance rested appreciatively on this latter caller—she was dark, slender, singularly graceful, and not without the more usual beauties of profile and complexion. Yet that which had arrested Mr. Pontifex's attention in particular was the rare strength of will and character stamped upon the pretty face. It betrayed to his critical consideration, a coolness, intelligence, and resolution seldom found in so ripe and delicate a countenance.

The American scrutinized keenly the great lawyer into whose presence he had just been shown. After a rapid survey he drew a sigh of relief.

"I'm real pleased to meet you, Mr. Pontifex," he said, placing one of the carved oak chairs for his companion, and pausing by it. "Pray forgive my hesitation. But I'd only heard you spoken of and I wanted to see what I thought of you before ——"

"Before trusting me," added Mr. Pontifex, frankly, "and now that you have made up your mind to do so, won't you sit down, Mr.—Mr. Norris?"

The solicitor had consulted rapidly the card on his blotting-pad. The name it bore was "Richard Norris."

A smile flickered round the American's lips, but he proved the correctness of Mr. Pontifex's conclusion by sinking into a lounge near the writing-table.

"Before I can explain what I wish you to do for me," said Richard Norris, "I shall have to go back a bit and tell you a sort of a story. You may have heard of me—I struck it fairly rich out at Klondyke, and the newspapers gave me no peace for a while. My name was bandied about from London to 'Frisco. That's where the trouble comes in."

He stopped and turned towards the slight figure beside him. A pitiful expression softened his grave features.

"My wife—Mr. Pontifex," he observed.

The solicitor bowed.

As she returned the salutation, the dark eyes of Mrs. Norris encountered those of Mr. Pontifex; there was a profound sadness in her gaze.

"My life has been but rough-and-tumble," said the American, "with nothing to boast of in much of it, except that it was honest."

A sudden tremor shook the young frame of the woman in the carved oak chair, she raised a gloved hand to wipe away a tear. Richard Norris sighed heavily and bent his head for a moment. When he spoke again it was in the same quiet tone.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"Some three or four years ago," he pursued, "I was in California—at Santa Mercia—horse-breeding, with a man named Edwin Prior."

The American pronounced the last two words with a forced calmness that Mr. Pontifex noted, as he noted many things, in silence.

"I wasn't a partner," continued Richard Norris; "but manager. I had been unlucky in a fruit-growing speculation and froze on to the first chance of a living. At Santa Mercia I grew acquainted with Mab here—she was Prior's cousin, the child of an aunt that had kept house for him before she died. Mab and I fell in love, and Prior, who fancied Mab himself, soured on me. You take the situation, I guess, Mr. Pontifex."

"Oh, if you could," she cried, "you would make me a happy woman again!"

"Perfectly," said the lawyer; he was covertly studying the countenance of Mrs. Richard Norris.

"Mab warned me," admitted the American; "yet I saw no reason to quit my job till Prior should actually present me with my walking ticket. Mab was right, though; a week later I was in prison, charged by Prior with embezzling some thousand dollars. I had received the money beyond a doubt, signed a receipt, and locked the amount in a drawer against my next visit to the bank. From that drawer the money was stolen, Mab and I believe, by Prior.

"The following day he had asked for the dollars, and, as I failed to produce them, had me arrested. To everyone's amazement, on the morning I came before the judge, Mab appeared in court with the money, which she said she had found in the drawer next to that where I believed myself to have placed the dollars. I had evidently made a mistake, she remarked. Everyone but Prior was delighted, and I was discharged amid congratulations."

Richard Norris took a long breath and knitted his brows. His wife's cheeks coloured painfully. The American went on with his narrative.

"Once I was free I threatened all kinds of actions against Prior. Mab was terrified, and begged me to leave Santa Mercia instantly. When I refused she broke down and told me everything. Mr. Pontifex, the money that Mab had brought into court so opportunely was not the money that had been missed—Mab had drawn it from her cousin's bank on a cheque that she had made out herself."

Mabel Norris laid a hand on the speaker's arm, interrupting him with a tremulous gesture.

"My husband means a cheque that I had forged, Mr. Pontifex," she said bravely.

Mr. Pontifex was twisting his sapphire ring.

"The Law, Mrs. Norris," he answered thoughtfully, "prohibits forgery as it does murder, on general principles. It ignores the exceptional cases in which so-called crimes may have a moral justification. It is the task of such a man as myself to screen those cases from the sight of the Law. Believe me, the Law is very often willing to help in the process by looking the other way. But what was the precise point upon which you desired my advice?"

"I beg your pardon," rejoined his client, "naturally that is what you are waiting for. Fearing for Mab—and indeed myself—when her cousin should discover what had happened, I decided to get out of California with all speed. Going down to 'Frisco I was caught in the Klondyke boom. We travelled to the Yukon, Mab and I together—we had been married in 'Frisco—and I did uncommonly well. I am reckoned to-day to be worth three or four million dollars—I really am worth a couple. The papers wrote me up, of course, and in doing so set on our track the very man we most wanted to keep off it—Ned Prior, the holder of that cheque."

Mr. Pontifex was brooding over his sapphire—it seemed the exact tint of his blue eye. Mrs. Norris contemplated him, almost wonderingly.

"Luckily for us," proceeded the American; "Ned had tumbled to the fact that the cheque gave him a big hold over poor Mab, and, instead of applying to the criminal authorities, tried to pick up her trail. When he got on mine, through the newspapers, it was to find that I had married Mab and was a millionaire. Ned had been doing badly and was in want of funds. So he sent me an ultimatum. Unless I pay him at an early date, three million dollars—six hundred thousand pounds—in first-class securities, he will have my poor Mab extradited and tried for forgery, besides reviving the old trouble about the money that disappeared from my drawer."

"£600,000," repeated Mr. Pontifex slowly, "and you are worth at most, you say, £400,000?"

Digitized by Google

"Two million dollars in American currency," said Richard Norris, "and not that, to realise. Now, Mr. Pontifex, as I'm not fool enough to write about such an affair as this, and I daren't see Ned myself lest I should be tempted to drill a hole in him, I should be glad if you would be my messenger. He can have £250,000 within a month, and in exchange for the cheque which Mabel drew. It will cost me the balance of my fortune to collect that amount in gilt-edged scrip. But if he will take it and give you the cheque, I will start at the bottom of the ladder again with a light heart."

Mr. Pontifex abandoned his indolent attitude and his ring-twisting to lean an elbow upon his writing-table.

"Mr. Norris," he replied deliberately, "you shall not regret consulting me in this matter. I will see this preposterous blackmailer, not, with your permission, to offer him any such terms, but to deal with him, I suspect, even more efficaciously. This I believe I can undertake, that you shall have the cheque without publicity and without beggering yourself."

Mabel Norris sprang up.

"Oh, if you could," she cried, "you would make me a happy woman again, and Dick need not ruin himself."

The American interposed, affectionately but determinedly.

"Mab," he said, "I thought we had done with that foolishness. Mr. Pontifex, you have my full consent to make the best bargain you can. But don't try to bluff Ned; he's a smart man, and carries a gun—that is to say, a revolver. He's a dead shot, and easily riled—you'll excuse my mentioning the fact, but you may not be used to such cattle as Ned in this law-abiding island of yours."

Mr. Pontifex fell into a momentary reverie. He roused himself from it to ask abruptly:

"What species of revolver does this rascal Prior affect? An American type, I suppose?"

Richard Norris thrust his hand into a hip-pocket and produced a compact yet formidable weapon.

"The fellow to that," he said, "or did when I knew him; it is a nice gun and one that you can get fond of."

The lawyer took the revolver and examined it. Unexpectedly he opened the breech and began to pull out the cartridges, which he thrust towards the millionaire.

"I will borrow this," he remarked; "I shall not need the ammunition."

The American stared at him—Mr. Pontifex rose.

"I am a man of impromtu ideas," he said; "where can I drop across your friend Prior? Write it down for me."

Richard Norris moved to the solicitor's seat and did as he was requested.

Mr. Pontifex stepped to the side of his client's wife.

"I can see you to be a woman of character and courage," he murmured; "will you confide yourself to me, alone, for a little time. We may be able together to scotch this relative of yours?"

Mabel Norris looked up searchingly.

"I will do anything you tell me," she responded in a shy fashion. But Mr. Pontifex saw that she meant what she said.

Her husband had finished the memorandum he was engaged upon. The address was that of a house in a low street in Pimlico.

Mabel Norris fell heavily to the floor.

"Thank you," commented the lawyer, reading it, "and now, Mr. Norris, I want you to allow your wife to accompany me—unattended—to this place." He flipped the piece of paper on which Richard Norris had written the direction.

The American frowned undecidedly, but Mabel Norris stole close to him.

"Let us trust Mr. Pontifex, dearest," she whispered. "He is a great English lawyer, and can wish us no possible harm. Somehow, I feel a strange faith in him."

Richard Norris straightened himself proudly.

"Mr. Pontifex," he said, "you shall have your way. But if Mabel respects my desire she will not lower herself by any appeals for mercy."

The lawyer received the information without comment.

"Very well," he answered; "I shall hope to restore Mrs. Norris before the expiration of many hours—I will myself escort her to your hotel. Forgive me, if for the present, I ask you to say au revoir."

He rang the bell and ordered the clerk to get a cab.

Digitized by Google

Donning his glossiest "silk," Mr. Pontifex led the American and his wife into St. James' Street. He assisted Mrs. Norris into the hansom, and, with a hasty farewell to her husband, followed her. The American regarded amazedly the retreating vehicle; Mr. Pontifex's rapidity had left him breathless.

Mr. Pontifex threw up the cap, and told the driver to make a call in Bond Street—at the establishment of an expert firm of gunsmiths. Reaching that stage of their journey, he descended, passed into the shop, and was absent for ten minutes. When he returned and they were on the route to Victoria, he showed his fair neighbour the revolver he had borrowed from Richard Norris. It was now apparently loaded.

"These, Mrs. Norris," he explained cheerfully, "are blank cartridges, and incapable of doing much harm to anybody. If by chance you should hear some shots fired this afternoon, it will be from these cartridges, and you need not be in the smallest degree alarmed. By-the-bye, can you act?"

"I think so," responded Mabel Norris, extremely interested. "Most women, they say, are actresses by instinct."

"It is probable," said the solicitor drily. "I feel sure you are one. All that I wish you to do is to faint—or pretend to faint—at a particular juncture. At that juncture I shall say, 'You once loved her—do you not see that she is ill with terror?' As I speak the word 'terror,' count five quickly and then—faint. You comprehend?"

"Quite," said his pupil; "and how long must I be—unconscious?"

"Let me see," muttered Mr. Pontifex. "Yes, until I observe 'It is nothing serious.' Then recover artistically; and whatever happens after that, keep cool."

He commenced to gossip of indifferent subjects—the weather, the thoroughfares, the people in them. Mabel Norris marvelled at the lawyer's command over his nerves.

Near a shabby lodging-house in Pimlico the cab halted. Mr. Pontifex dismissed it, rang, and demanded to see "Mr. Prior—on business." The two were ushered upstairs and into a dingy parlour, clouded with tobacco smoke, where sat, in shirt-sleeves and slippers, a typical Yankee, puffing at a fat cigar.

"What do you mean by business?" he snarled, "I haven't the pleasure of knowing you from Adam—Jehoshaphat!" he broke off, "it's Mabel."

He leapt to his feet and would have advanced, but the lawyer stepped in front of his charge.

"I am here," said Mr. Pontifex, "representing my client Mr. Richard Norris—you will guess upon what errand."

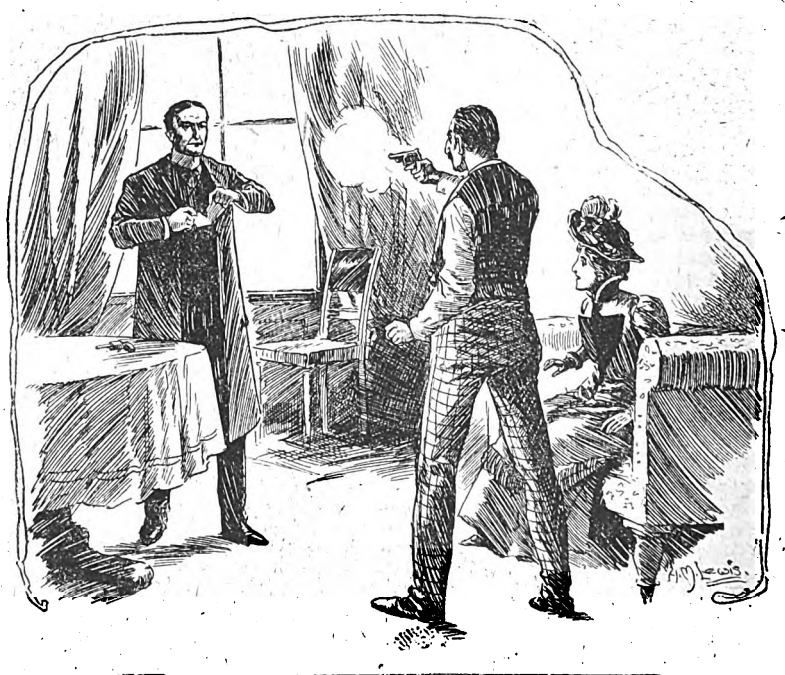
He handed his companion to a sofa, and himself sat down by a large round table in the middle of the apartment, motioning their host to the chair he had been occupying. It stood on the further side of the table. Edwin Prior dropped into it sulkily.

Mr. Pontifex coughed, as if embarrassed.

"Previous to raising the object of my mission, Mr. Prior," he stammered, with assumed uneasiness, "I may inform you that I am aware of your American practice of going armed, and realise that you are not a man likely to respect our British prejudice against pistol-shooting. I have therefore taken the precaution of not visiting you weaponless myself."

He was counterfeiting admirably the faltering, conventional air of a respectable solicitor in an awkward position. But Edwin Prior beheld the barrel of a revolver peeping at him over the edge of the round table, and laughed outright. "Calm yourself, my nervous man at law;" he said, "this isn't a question of pistols, but of diplomacy."

"Then," begged Mr. Pontifex, still with his affectation of shrewd simplicity, "do you mind placing your weapon before you, where I can see it? I will do the same with mine."



He pulled the trigger and a shot rang out.

Edwin Prior shook with merriment, but he drew out a revolver and laid it by him. The lawyer scanned it eagerly—it was the facsimile of that which he was so artfully screening with his coat-sleeve as he bent across the round table to commence the game for which he had been preparing.

"Now, sir," he said impressively; "I will come to my client's message. I am empowered to guarantee you the whole of his fortune, less the cost of realising it, in purchase of a certain cheque which you have in your possession."

"And what may Dick Norris, on his own confession, be worth?" inquired the other mockingly.

"In gross, four hundred thousand pounds," said the lawyer; "on a forced realisation not more than three hundred thousand."

Digitized by Google

"Three hundred thousand cents!" scoffed Edwin Prior; "why, he is known to have three or four million dollars, at any rate, over seven hundred thousand pounds. My price is six hundred thousand pounds in tip-top securities properly assigned, and if I don't get it I'll treat the States to a sensation forgery trial."

"Man, have you no compassion?" said the solicitor sternly; "can you not understand that Mrs. Norris, the reason for whose generous crime you know only too well, is here to plead for mercy. You once loved her—do you not see that she is ill with terror?"

There was a long and shuddering sigh, and Mabel Norris, who had started up convulsively, fell heavily to the floor. Prior rose hurriedly and stooped over her—there was a curious alarm in his mean face. Mr. Pontifex comprehended his thought. If Mabel Norris were dead the chief part of his hold on her husband would be gone. Edwin Prior knelt down, anxiously gazing at the pale features.

"Support her while I send for some brandy," desired the lawyer, and went to the bell. In that movement he found time—unnoticed—to change the revolvers. As he did not do more than imitate the operation of sounding the bell, no response was made.

"There, there," he said briskly, rejoining the pretended invalid; "it is nothing serious, Mr. Prior, a simple fainting fit, I am sure."

The amateur actress accepted the hint and recovered forthwith. The relieved blackmailer aided the lawyer to lift her upon the sofa.

"After all, Mab," he mumbled, "I don't want to be hard on you. I'll take three hundred thousand, if this attorney of yours will hurry up with the settlement. I can't say better than that, can I?"

Mr. Pontifex returned to his seat at the table.

"One thing further, Mr. Norris;" he said, "I wish to be satisfied that this cheque of yours is the real article in dispute, and not some worthless substitute which will allow you to harass us again with the threatened production of the original."

Edwin Prior hauled out a bulky letter-case, and fished up a soiled slip of paper with a ragged edge. Mr. Pontifex extended his hand.

"Not much!" laughed the blackmailer. The lawyer shook his head. "I must be permitted to inspect it thoroughly," he said; "you can cover me if you choose with that pop-gun of yours."

Edwin Prior did so and surrendered the cheque.

"Is this the genuine thing, Mrs. Norris?" queried Mr. Pontifex. The pretty Californian went to his side, with simulated unsteadiness, and, blushing deeply, identified the cheque, which, three years since, she had so romantically forged. The solicitor waited till she had gone back to the sofa and then, grasping the cheque very conspicuously between his thumbs and fingers, tore it—one, twice, thrice.

A spasm of anger distorted the blackmailer's countenance—he pulled the trigger of the weapon he was levelling and a shot rang out, another and another succeeded, yet, to the marksman's utter consternation, Mr. Pontifex was able smilingly to complete the destruction of the cheque. Having reduced it to fragments he put them in his mouth and swallowed them. But before that process was concluded Edwin Prior found himself looking into the muzzle of his own revolver which Mr. Pontifex wielded scientifically while he explained the apparent miracle that had occurred.

"Pray waste no more of my blank cartridges, Mr. Prior," he said blandly, "especially as I hear footsteps on the stairs. If you keep your countenance and leave unchallenged the trifling fibs your shots will compel me to invent, I will promise that you shall not be the poorer for your discretion."

The door was flung open as Mr. Pontifex slipped the loaded revolver into his pocket and turned to apologise to the excited landlady.

"My friend was exhibiting a favourite pistol," he said soothingly, "when it dropped to the floor, and, being loaded, the shock discharged several of the chambers. That is so, is it not, Mr. Prior?" And his singular eyes met those of the blackmailer so significantly that Edwin faltered "Yes."

* * * * *

Richard Norris retained his fortune and his wife her good name. As for Edwin Prior, he received back the amount of his forged cheque with compound interest and a munificent bonus, which generosity so touched him that he admitted his plot to convict Richard Norris of embezzlement at Santa Mercia. It was he who had abstracted the money from the latter's drawer, with the object of condemning his manager to a stiff term of imprisonment.

Mr. Pontifex's superb digestion was even equal to a three-years-old cheque. But the admiring American insisted upon his taking a special fee for the performance, suggesting that it be entered up as "Perpetual Rent of Safe Deposit." And one of the great lawyer's few holidays was that in which he toured the States in luxury, the honoured guest of Mr. and Mrs. Norris.

A STRANGE MEETING.

It is not often that a well-known novelist will admit that a story that has been read and talked about in every part of the globe was moulded by him from a real personage, and on the other hand, it is a very rare occurrence for this personage to allow himself to be immortalised by a novel and yet remain good friends with the author. Such is the case, however, with Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne and Captain Kettle. The distinguished author and the prototype of the world-famous book recently met at Newcastle-upon-Tyne and conversed in the friendliest terms. They had not seen each other for a number of years.

It is interesting in connection with the above fact to note that Messrs. Pearson have just published a splendid sixpenny edition of "The Adventures of Captain Kettle." It is bound in a stout and attractive yellow paper cover and is turned out in style equal to a three and sixpenny novel.

The Daily Telegraph recently said: "The reader of fiction who has not made the acquaintance of Mr. Hyne's fascinating sea captain, is to be pitied," and there is, now, absolutely no reason why every man, woman or child should not possess a copy of this wonderful novel, as it is now issued at a sum within the reach of all and is to be obtained at every bookstall, bookseller, stationer or newsagent in the United Kingdom. Failing these, send eightpence in stamps to the publishers, and a copy will be forwarded without delay.

Digitized by Google

A JAPANESE LOVE STORY

"The only girl I ever loved."
—ANCIENT REMARK.

THE temple at the little village of Meguro, outside the town of Yedo, is celebrated as being the last scene of a highly instructive and sentimental story. The name of Meguro means "black eyes," but whether it obtained that appellation from the pugilistic habits of its people or not, I am unable to say. As France has her grave of Abelard and Heloise for young people suffering from hopeless attachments, as England has her ballad of the forsaken maid of Woodstock town, and Scotland its "Auld Robin Gray," so Japan has its magic love story of Kamarasaki and Gompachi.

On my visit to the place, I was accompanied by a gay young Japanese, in the employment of the British Minister, who spoke most excellent English, and during the drive he told me how that this was how it all happened.

In the old days, when Japan was Japan, three hundred years before the obtrusive foreign devil had come, buying up all the old Cloisonné, and making bad railways and building inferior steamboats for the government at extortionate rates; when gentlemen wore two swords sticking out of their belts, and the Mikado was a man often heard of, but seldom seen, there lived in an inland town a young man called Gompachi. He was a fine-grown young man, who had done credit to his seven or eight bowlfuls of rice and high fish per diem; and except a slight partiality for saki and knocking in late at nights, up to the time when the story commences, his parents must have had every reason to be proud of him. But even as Rob the Grinder met with his fate through his fondness for singing birds, so were dogs the rocks on which Gompachi's bark was destined to come to grief.

Dogs of all kinds he loved, but of fighting dogs it was that he considered himself especially a connoisseur. Where he found them in Japan I can't imagine, for a more pusillanimous lot, more addicted to vanishing round corners as you approach, and valiantly barking from the tops of roofs and other similar points of vantage as you retire, it would be impossible to find out of Egypt.

However, he either bred, or found, or, what is more likely, stole a dog which was able and willing to tackle any canine brother to whom he might be opposed; and Gompachi, from that time forward, began to wear coats of a noisy pattern and "obies" of a preposterous length; and other young men and their dogs got up and slid when he and his tyke were abroad; and he accumulated, by backing his animal, as many brass tempos as would fill a portmanteau, a collection amounting in value to two dollars, or, if brass happened to be up, two dollars and a half.

But one day, another well-grown young man came into the town, and was willing to make a match of it; and on the appointed day came Gompachi to the ground, leading his champion, and swaggering and rattling the tempos in his pocket, and offering odds on his favourite, as was his wont to do. His opponent was also of a speculative turn of mind, and so the bets were made and the fight commenced.

The battle was so equal and sanguinary that at length both dogs lay dead upon the ground; but before giving his final kick, very much to the appreciation of all the cats in the neighbourhood, Gompachi's dog had chawed off more than an inch of his opponent's tail, and on this ground his master claimed both the victory and the bets.

The new-comer, who, if he had lived, might evidently have become a Japanese Gladstone—refused to pay, but declared himself willing to refer the matter to arbitration, and even hinted that two other courses were open for settling the dispute.

Gompachi, however, would have none of it.

"Stump up, or I shall make you," was all he said.

"Make your mongrel disgorge that inch and a half of my dog's tail!" said the other.

Words like these in Japan can only have one ending. It was out swords and cut three times, before you could say "knife." Gompachi was one too many for the stranger upon the ground.

Then Gompachi wiped his reeking sword upon the paper handkerchief of his opponent, and took from his pocket all the small change he could find; after which he said he felt rather delicate in the chest, and thought a little sea-air and change would be about the best thing for him.

Digitized by Google

And though for months afterwards the police kept asserting that they had received "important information" as to his whereabouts, they always failed to produce his person to the authorities.

Gompachi walked away among the hills, till at last he met with some gentlemen who earned their living by sleight-of-hand tricks on the Mikado's highways; and as he began to have cravings for two or three of his usual wash-ba infuls of rice, he gladly accepted their invitation to spend the night in their country house, which at that time consisted of a vast inaccessible cave; and thus, having finished his imitation of Rob the Grinder, he commenced a career on the model of that immoral young Spanish gentleman, Gil Blas.

The robbers had, of course, heard his tempos rattling in his pocket, and had noticed with envious eyes the silver hilt of the sword which had cut short the possibly political career of his late antagonist. But, as I have before said, he was a well-grown young man, and they thought they might as well put off the charitable task of relieving him of these articles until such time as he should be sound asleep. So they brought out the rice and the fish and the usual impossible pickles and saki, and spent a pleasant convivial evening with a slight tendency to feel muddled, till Gompachi arose, yawning mightily, and announcing his intention of placing his neck on the wooden dumb-bell which serves these people for a pillow, he went to sleep.

He was awakened in the middle of the night, not by a pain in his neck or elsewhere, but by the apparition of a beautiful young girl of fifteen summers. Writers of novels and love-tales always say "summers." Gompachi noticed, when the saki was out of his eyes, that she had a pair of the sparklingest black ones he had ever seen peeping over a fashionable fan; a profusion of long, dark hair, the neatest little sandals in the world, and a pannier as big as a haystack.

He began to hope that his queue was sticking properly forward down the middle of his head like a sign post, as the queues of Japanese exquisites should always do; and while thus thinking, a voice like rippling water told him of his danger.

"And if you please," she said, "they're sharpening their swords in the back cave at this moment, sir; and if you're not a bigger fool than you look, you'll get out of this place a great deal quicker than ever you came in, without so much as waiting to say, 'Woki-hi arrigato-ki-si-on-ara,'" which is, being interpreted, "Much obliged to you for your information, and good-night, my dear!"

But then, with want of consistency which makes her sex the ducks they are—except when arguing—she proceeded to inform him that she herself was the daughter of a wealthy old gentleman in Kigoto, who had made his money in the city, and that a few days before, when out for a moonlight ramble, she had been stolen by these robbers, who were making her cook and do for them all kinds of horrid work, which was spoiling her hands, and her figure ever so much, and made her miserable, let alone there not being a bit of polished metal in the place to do her hair by.

I will say this much for Gompachi, that he was not the kind of fellow to go sneaking off and leave her to her fate, and his next intention was the only good one I can record of him.

He whipped out his sword and posted himself outside the door, thereby ending his rôle of Gil Blas, and adopting that of Mr. R. Swiveller, when he aroused the singer lodger of Bevis Marks. And as the first robber put his head in, he was down upon it like a guillotine, and repeated himself like a recurring decimal as each successive robber came to look after his comrades, until he had polished off the entire dozen.

Then, possessing himself of such portable articles as took his fancy, he made the best of his way to Kigoto with the black-eyed moosmie, whose name I need scarcely inform my intelligent readers was Kamarasaki Kigotean. Belgravia made great rejoicings at the return of the missing damsel, though Mrs. Grundy, of course, had something to say about it, with unpleasant allusions to wonderful coincidences, the marines, and so on.

But her old father, who had made his fortune in Korean loans, and by floating companies for the opening of mines and other useful purposes, came out liberally, and offered Gompachi five hundred golden yen, and, what should have been of far greater value to him, the hand of the lovely Kamarasaki herself, who was now madly in love with her preserver.

Gompachi had not the slightest objection to the five hundred yen, but as to the matrimonial side of the business he was not so clear. He was not indifferent to the lady's charms, but at any rate he thought he would like to have a look round the town of Yedo before his

Before he knew where he was, the whitest arms in all Japan were round his neck.

Digitized by Google

wings were clipped. I must fear that his mind was running on fighting dogs and book-making and loud suits.

He therefore dissembled, as villains in love stories invariably do, and said that he would be glad to avail himself of the happiness in store for him, but that first it would be necessary for him to go to Yedo to transact some highly important business.

Her father, being a business man, rather liked this, and thought it augured well for the future. So Gompachi bade adieu to the sweet little Kamarasaki (the brute!) and told her in a false, flirting, kernoodling kind of way not to forget him, and that when the calls of the great commercial world ceased to press upon his anxious mind, he would return and make her Mrs. Gompachi, and never dine at his club, or have bachelor friends to dinner, or smoke in the dining room.

Then he left for Yedo with a gay heart and a large umbrella, thinking how much prettier gold yen rattle in your pocket, as you walk, than brass tempos; and the poor little girl remained behind, to pour salt tears from those br ght eyes into the gold fish-pond in the back yard, and hold private rehearsals of imaginary conversations she would have with him when he returned, to no better audience than the sacred old family tortoise.

Gompachi was not destined to reach Yedo without further adventures. That habit of his of always rattling money in his pocket was, to say the least of it, vulgar; and it would be much better if the old city gent had given him a crossed cheque payable to order, and, best of all, if he had kept it for himself or his daughter.

Gompachi was still a few miles from the town when it was getting dusk one day; and though the drowsy tinkling of his gold yen might have lulled the distant folds had there been any—there are no sheep in Japan—it had a very different effect upon six highwaymen, who were looking out for work, and fell upon him tooth and nail. Gompachi, it has been, I think, conclusively proved, was no coward, and he had the heads of three of them on the ground in a twinkling; but the remainder pressed on him hard and had almost overpowered him, when the arrival of an eighth person on the scene caused them to regard flight as an eligible move.

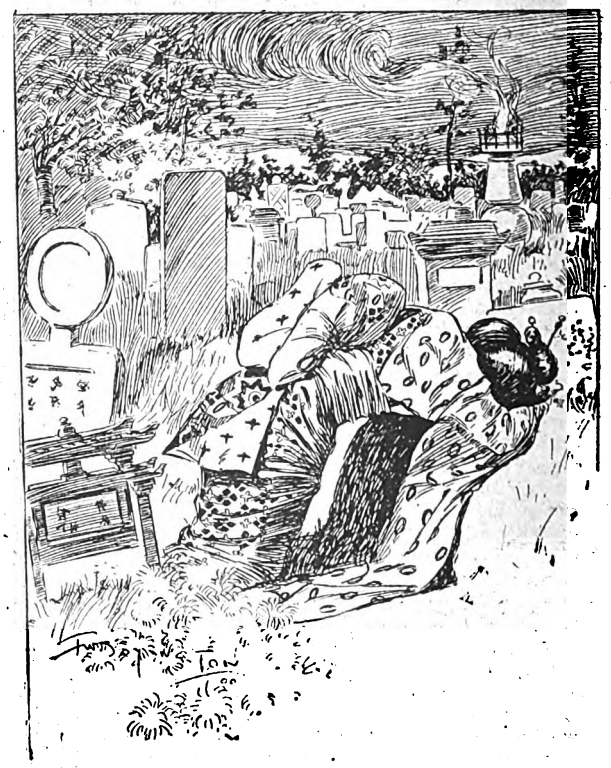
His rescuer turned out to be possessed of the name of Chobei, a wardsman of Yedo; that is to say, he was not of the Samurai, or military class, who were composed of swashbucklers like our hero, but he was an honest burgher, taking part in city affairs, such as sewers and water, and was altogether a stout, simple-hearted, honest old fellow, with more good nature than sense about him, as the sequel will fully show.

Chobei took Gompachi home with him to Yedo, and was so charmed with his manners and conversation that he begged he would continue his guest as long as he should remain in the city.

Gompachi now commenced the diligent prosecution of the important business which had so unavoidably brought him to Yedo. He went in for a regular new fit-out of the old kind of suits—large stripes and squares, with a green dragon across the chest and a pack of hounds down his back. He also bought himself several pairs of lacquered clogs, together with red umbrellas, and "obies" of an even more preposterous length than of yore.

I make no doubt that he would set up a private "juirikisha," had that very handy vehicle been invented at this epoch; as it was, he was obliged to be contented with a gorgeous "norima" or sedan-chair, like a meat-safe, which soon became well known at all the local race meetings, matches, and dog-fights; and youths in Yedo of a sporting turn began to know that they could always get the market odds from Gompachi, and that he was generally good for a quart of sakki, and any number of shovelfuls of rice, if they had the good luck to meet him after ten o'clock p.m.

How the respectable old Chobei could have stood this way of going on I can't imagine; but he appears to have endured it without a murmur, like a regular old Eli.



She flung herself on her face with a bitter cry.

His whole conduct shows his to have been a soft-hearted old fool, and he swallowed all this, and a good deal more at the back, like a boa-constrictor; for Gompachi was always knocking-in late, and must have been heard nightly by Chobei offering inarticulate invitations to the police to assist him in putting his latch-key to any practical use, and was found deep in stertorous slumbers at six in the morning in his dirty clogs upon the nice clean matting, which is the very depth of bad manners in Japan.

He was also a regular attendant at the theatres, and was to be found in the green rooms, chucking the actresses under the chin, and calling them by their Christian, or rather their Pagan, names, and accompanying them home to the Yoshiwara after the opera was over and standing suppers regardless of expense.

About this time it was rumoured among the fashionable Yedoeans that a most lovely and accomplished actress had come to the Yoshiwara, and would act the following week at the Yedoean Covent Garden of the period, it being positively her first appearance upon any stage.

Digitized by Google

And numerous bets having been given and taken as to the colour of her eyes and hair, Gompachi, who, you may have observed, never allowed shyness to stand in the way of business or pleasure, thought he would look round on the sly and see her previous to taking a few bets on the subject; and accordingly he called one afternoon and sent up his card, a flimsy piece of paper the size of a handkerchief, with his name printed in the centre, like the wards of a beer-cellar key.

As he stood near the door, with his red umbrella in full bloom to shelter him from a possible dose of cold water which he fully expected would be sent him as a present from the top-story window, he was, greatly to his surprise, immediately admitted, and before he knew where he was, the whitest arms in all Japan were round his neck, the prettiest face was buried in his bosom, and the brightest blackest eyes in the world were pouring salt tears of joy all over the green dragon and loud stripes that decorated his manly chest.

Need I explain that the owner of all these was none other than the foolish, daring, little, loving, peerless Kamarasaki? Yes, she it was who now sat with her small, white hand in the great, splodgy paw of this vulgar unfaithful brute, who had never so much as given a thought for months and months to the pearl which had been placed so gratuitously beneath his feet. Little by little her story came out.

She had nearly filled up the gold-fish pond with her tears, and had talked the sacred old family tortoise into his grave a thousand years or so before his time. Then she had noticed a change steal over the temper of her father. From being an easy-going, pleasant, old papa he had become each week more scruffy and aggravating, till one day he came home early, and sending his best clogs crashing through the paper window, he had calmly announced that the little game in the city was all up.

The Corean loan had been repudiated, and he had held on too long in the bubble companies, and was hoist with his own petard. To extricate himself from these difficulties, he had imported a cargo of Chinese nutmegs, which unfortunately for him had all turned out to be wooden ones.

In a word, he was completely ruined, and could not pay three tempos in the yen; and at last things turned out so bad that his daughter, little Kamarasaki, had been obliged to come to Yedo and take a theatrical engagement to keep the family from starvation.

Gompachi, being one of those plausible fellows who could have talked the pigtail off a Chinaman, soon made it all square with poor little Kamarasaki, who had finished by mildly reproaching him, as well she might, for his cruelty and neglect. Whether any money was ever remitted to the old city gent, I am unable to say, but if so, I much fear it came out of the pockets of the little moosmie.

Gompachi swore all kinds of perjuries; and she, poor thing, got quite bewildered with the gaiety of town life to which he introduced her.

As the obi and lacquered-clog makers began to call pretty often in the mornings about this time, leaving souvenirs of their visits in the shape of summonses, it became clear that money must be had from somewhere.

Old Chobei had been squeezed quite dry, and as it never at any period of his life appears to have entered into the brain of this young man to work, Gompachi now commenced his last and most celebrated impersonation of well known characters, and this time chose Mr. Turpin as his model.

He took long, solitary walks in the country, and knocked on the head corpulent old farmers returning from market, living faster and more furiously than ever; and Kamarasaki in her innocence thought it was all right, and that the money was the fruit of legitimate business. But, to draw my story to a close, this kind of thing could not last for ever. The tenth farmer proved too much for Gompachi, and being handed over to the authorities he shortly found himself where he ought to have been long before, viz., on the execution ground above the temple of Asakusa; and soon after his head and body, in two separate pieces, adorned the highest gibbet in that place of skulls.

The soft-hearted old Chobei, instead of saying that he had long foreseen it, and that it served him right, went, like an old imbecile, and bribed the Japanese authorities—with the same ease with which, if alive, he could bribe them in the present day—to let him have the body of this "victim to circumstances"—a proceeding which all people with the odour of exclusive sanctity very strong will, no doubt, deeply deplore.

He laid the body in a grave which he dug with his own hands in the sacred ground of the shrine of Meguro, and went back sorrowing to his municipal duties and clean mats; and the tragic tale of this well-grown, immoral, young snob was soon noised abroad throughout the city, till at last it reached the ear of Kamarasaki.

Then she, poor child, arose and said never a word, but she went tripping along on her little clogs from out the gaudy Yoshiwara, and pattered away along the stone flags which lead to the temple of Asakusa, where the sacred pigeons dwell among the high eaves, and lame men offer sandals to the gods; and far beyond, she climbed the hill and crept along under the shadows of the cryptomerias that flank the path, thinking of the robbers' cave where he fought for her so well, and the happy days spent with him in her father's house, and of the loving words and kisses with which he had stolen her heart and made her life so happy; and never letting one thought cross her despairing breast of his neglect or his egregious snobbishness, or his abominable crimes, till she reached the place where her heart lay buried.

And when she got to the grave she flung herself on her face with a bitter cry, and drew the dagger which all Japanese girls keep beneath their obies, and know so well how to use; and then, kissing the new piled sods, she plunged the dagger into her breast, and the bright black eyes grew dim and glassy in death.

Then old Chobei turned up again, like an amiable undertaker, and laid them side by side, and above them he put a large stone, which remains to this day, to mark their resting place.

And all the young men of Yedo ever since who have sweethearts, and who have found that the settlements are all right, and there is no fear of the money reverting back to the family in case of their wives dying without issue, make their vows here, and plight their troth, and write beautiful couplets like those you find in Tom Smith's crackers, and twist the long strips of paper on which they are written among the branches which overshadow the tomb.

And so, lighting a comtemplative pipe, I returned to Yedo with, I am not ashamed to say, a kind thought in my heart for the memory of the faithful, soft-hearted old Chobei.

Digitized by Google

THE LION'S WARS

Our Wars With Ashanti. 1806. 1824-6. 1863-4.

ALTHOUGH the extension of the British Empire has not been accomplished without the shedding of much blood, and the squandering of much treasure, so little was known a few years ago of many of the outlying dependencies that, when we went to war with Ashanti in 1873, the thirst for information and the demand for maps could not have been greater had Ashanti been a newly-discovered country, instead of one we had had dealings with for fifty years. The Ashantis are among the worst of the savage races of Africa, and their history is stained with every imaginable crime.

Ashanti is situated in Western Africa, a little to the north of the Gold Coast, from which it is separated by an extensive country, peopled by a great variety of races. For several years before the war of 1873 broke out, the attitude of the Ashantis towards the white man had been anything but friendly, especially in the matter of encroachments in those districts of West Africa under our protection. To such lengths did these proceed, that at last we were compelled in self-defence to undertake their punishment.

Hostilities were not entered into with a light heart, for in previous wars the Ashantis had twice beaten us. Not because they were better fighters than ourselves, but because in Ashanti our soldiers had, in addition to their black foes, to fight the climate as well.

1806 was the year in which we made the acquaintance of these warlike people. One of the vassals of the king of Ashanti, a chieftain rejoicing in the name of Quacoe, had rifled the grave of a rich man for the sake of the gold ornaments buried with him. The case was laid before the British Governor, we being the suzerain power, and judgment was given against the thief.

As the sacrilegious one refused to pay the award, the chief in whose territory the despoiled grave was situated attacked the town in which the offender lived, and routed the army sent to oppose him.

But Quacoe assembled another force, fought a battle, and won a victory. Finding amongst the booty some valuable Ashanti gold swords and a hatchet, he carried them off.

On hearing of this, the king at once declared war.

Greatly alarmed, Quacoe sought refuge with the Fantees, who, on being ordered to give him up, refused.

When the Governor of Cape Coast Castle, and Governor White of the fort in the Annamaboes country, were informed that the rebel and his allies were supported by the Braffoes and the Annamaboes, and that the king's forces were only fifteen miles from the sea, they naturally became greatly alarmed.

Having defeated his enemies, the king of Ashanti took up his abode in an old Dutch fort.

The Governor now proposed that hostilities should cease, and that the king should return to his dominions.

But the Ashantis having obtained a foothold on the coast, a position they had long coveted, were in no mood to retire, and point blank dared Governor White to interfere.

Although the British garrison numbered only twenty-five, the Governor insisted, as a preliminary, that hostilities should cease.

Digitized by Google

Had this functionary not devoted his whole time to trading with the natives, he would by 1806 have learnt something of the Ashanti character, and probably have shrunk from offending so warlike a people.

Fortunately the walls of his fort were high and strong enough to resist the howling black mob who, maddened with lust of blood and excess, now clamoured for white victims.

The garrison during the next twenty-four hours had to endure over thirty assaults. All of these they repulsed. When their numbers were reduced to eight they sent out a flag of truce. As the Ashantis had lost over 3,000 men they received our messenger most graciously. The terms of peace were not difficult to arrange, owing to the king having conceived the idea that as the English monarchs had beaten all his enemies, and the king of Ashanti had done the same with his, the two kings George III. and himself must greatly resemble each other.

Our second war with these people was not only more prolonged but far more disastrous than the first. We began it rashly, and carried it on with supreme contempt for our foes, till they beat us, for beat us they did, and that most thoroughly.

In January, 1824, Sir Charles McCarthy having (with a supreme disregard for all risk) decided that the Ashantis must be crushed, determined to invade their country and reduce them to submission. Placing one half of his army under the leadership of Major Chisholm, he marched at the head of the other into the interior.

His journey was anything but a promenade. The savages hung on his flank till he approached the country he purposed subduing. Suddenly his path was barred by 10,000 Ashanti braves. A desperate fight followed. So long as we kept up our fire the Ashantis remained on the opposite side of the river which separated the two forces, but as soon as it slackened they swarmed across, greatly terrifying our black allies, who fell back in a panic. Some English militia, all yokels to a man, refused to retire although ordered to do so. To these brave fellows belongs the doubtful honour of having killed the greatest number by the bayonet in any battle. It is calculated that in the charge of the Ashantis after they crossed the river every militiaman killed four.

When the charges finished, the lads from the country removed the bayonets, left their muskets on the ground and dashed into the middle of the Ashantis bringing the average up to eight.

The art and practices of warfare being of savage origin, the strategy of coloured races is frequently better than our own. When the lads from the plough, wearied of slaughter, commenced to retreat, they found, on reaching Secondee, a large force of the enemy armed with long knives planted in their path. The struggle which ensued beggars description.

The bayonet was more than a match for the knife, but the Ashantis had received such reinforcements that our position soon became desperate.

Breaking through our ranks, the progress of the foe could be followed by the headless corpses of our men.

Overwhelmed by numbers, the few survivors fled, but, being overtaken, a massacre followed in which nearly all the officers, including Sir C. McCarthy, were killed.

Two days later the numbers of the little band were reinforced by the remnant of Major Chisholm's force, which had suffered severely. Of the entire force associated with this miserably conducted expedition, only a handful survived, our losses being eighty-four natives and 168 British.

After a lull of three weeks the Ashanti forces advanced to within five miles of Cape Coast Castle. Seeing his danger, Colonel Sutherland, who was now in command, had all the houses intervening between the fort and the bush pulled down.

Grave as was the peril, the Colonial Office evinced no alarm.

In May, 1824, however, the garrison at Cape Coast Castle was increased to 316 rank and file. In July, the Ashantis, hearing that still further reinforcements were on their way from England, determined to attack us before they could arrive.

Owing to a perfectly fanatical weakness of Colonel Sutherland for dividing his forces we were unable for months to gain any advantage over the foe.

In 1826 however, we took a terrible revenge. Stationing the bulk of the native force in the centre with a few British to stiffen them, the two wings consisting of British, Dutch and Danish, the officer in command swung his men round, completely enveloping the Ashanti army. The guns were then got to work and the savages were mowed down in thousands. It was a complete victory, and ended in our capturing the Ashanti camp. To the horror of our troops, one of the trophies which fell into our hands proved to be the head of Sir Charles McCarthy. The Ashantis lost over 5,000 warriors and a number of chiefs; our losses were also heavy, 800 dead and 1,600 wounded with knives.

After this the Ashantis remained quiet till 1864. Two slaves in 1863 escaped from Ashanti to our territory and on our refusing to deliver them up the king dispatched an army for their recovery. Strange to say, the public got to hear of this war before it was over. Although strongly disapproved of, reinforcements were sent which arrived in time to enable us to drive the Ashantis back. Then a small force under Couren marched into the Ashanti country. Why they did so is not known, but they did, and having arrived there marched back again. Our losses on the return journey were enormous, and we had to bury the guns on the road to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy.

This ended the war of 1863-4 and the Ashantis remained quiet till 1873, when, without a word of warning, they suddenly invaded the territory of the Assim tribe. The chiefs applied to us for assistance; but although the Colonial Office must have known that to refuse our protection would be interpreted by the savages as a sign of weakness, we gave them to understand that we should only defend ourselves.

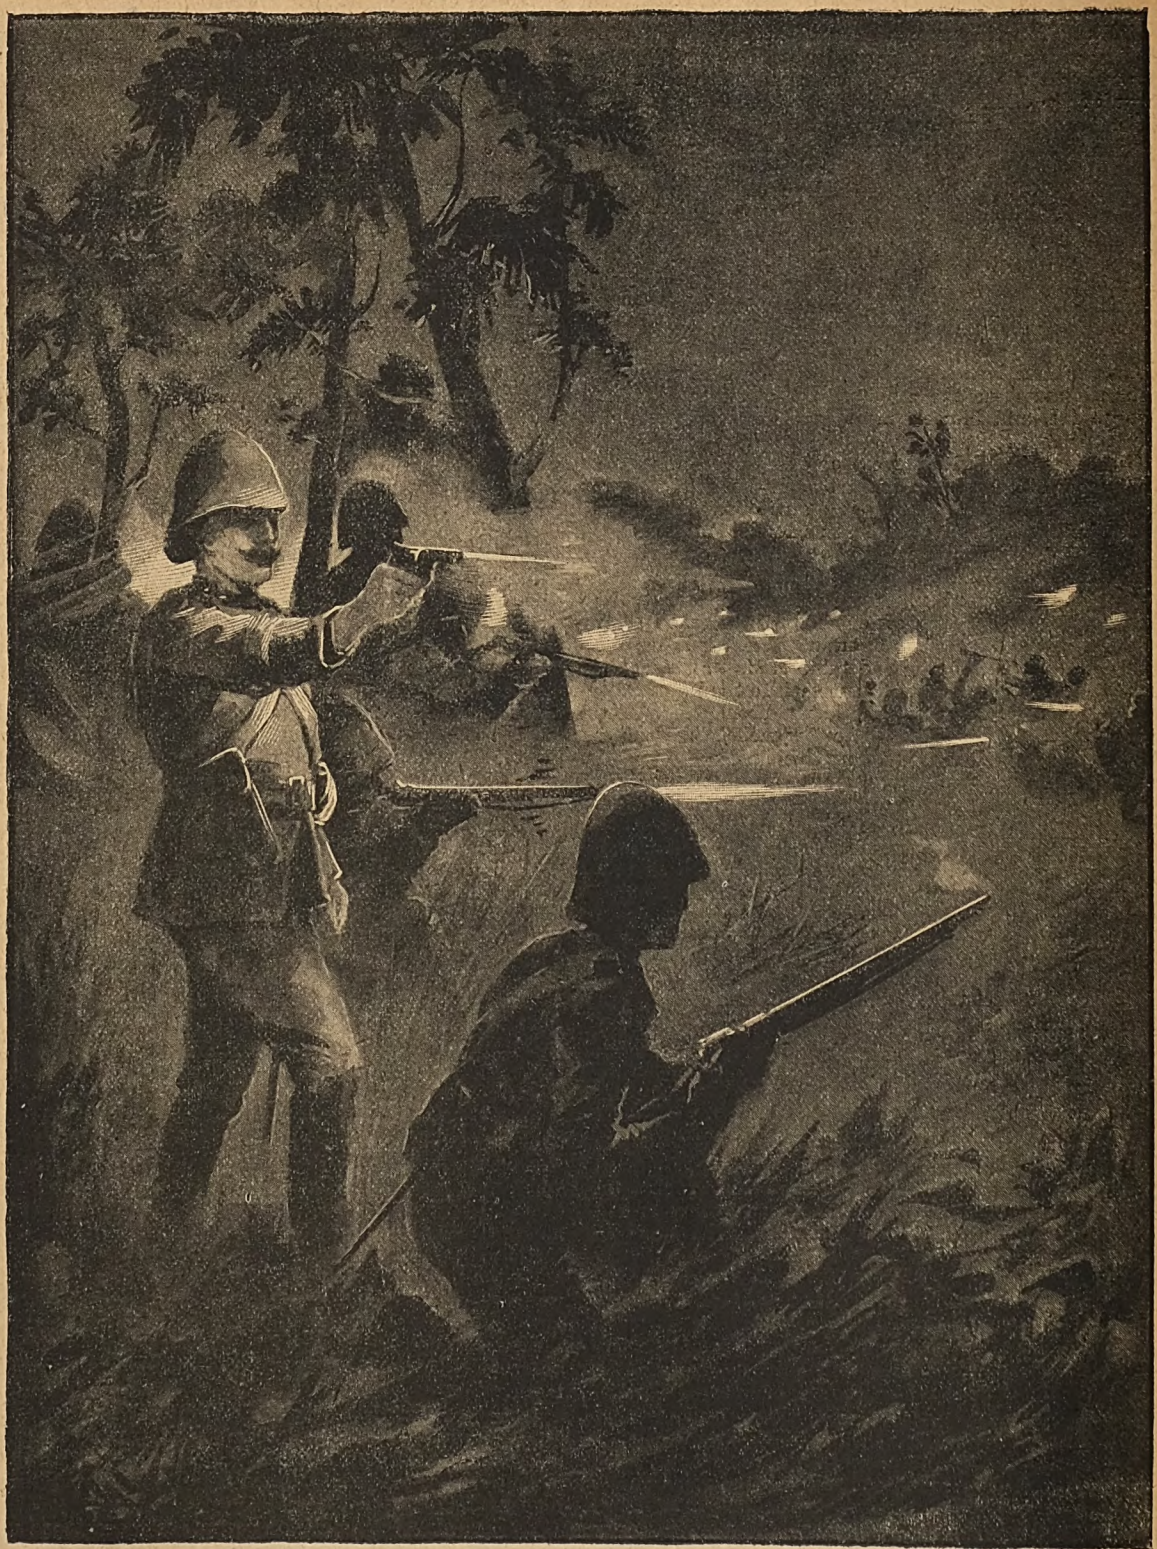
This greatly elated the Ashantis. We, the strong white man who just before had taken over the territory of the Elmini from the Dutch now declared that the native tribes must not look to Great Britain for protection.

By the time the Ashanti army had reached the coast we reversed our policy and besought the natives, especially the Fantees, to fight. After much persuading the Fantees consented to be led against their old foes, and after a battle which lasted the entire day defeated them.

A week later they attacked again, but, being poorly supplied with ammunition, were presently compelled to retreat. The Ashantis pressing on, the retreat became a rout, and the Fantees, having had enough fighting, dispersed.

By February our position became so precarious that the Government hastily dispatched some troops. In the meantime the Elmini, having joined the Ashantis,

Digitized by Google



Drawn by] [In the middle of the night they attacked. [Lawson Wood.

Digitized by Google

proceeded to raid the country round the forts. In June, however, they came into collision with some marines which had just arrived.

Although their advance was severely checked, the climate so soon thinned the ranks of our men that they boldly laid siege to Elmini fort, a formidable structure, built in 1481 by the adventurous Portuguese, from whom it was taken by the Dutch in 1657. As the fort was protected by no fewer than ninety guns, which, although old-fashioned, were powerful enough to keep the savages at bay, time was given for the dilatory authorities to send out more troops.

As soon as it was known in this country that war was inevitable there was a loud outcry. The prophecies of failure were so persistent that, had not the conduct of the expedition been confided to an officer who possessed in an unusual degree the confidence of the nation, its abandonment would have been certain.

The army which was to capture Coomassie, the capital of Ashanti, consisted of some 4,000 men, and included sailors, marines, engineers and artillery. Sir Garnet Wolseley who controlled operations, was in no hurry to commence business. The Ashantis to the number of over 40,000 were devastating the country, but as much depended on the steadiness of the native troops the expedition did not start till his black allies had been thoroughly drilled.

The preparations being at last completed, the British force plunged into the vast primeval forest and made for the Ashanti capital. Up hills, the difficulty of which was increased by dense undergrowth, down into swamps where the air was heavy with the germs of fever, across rolling plains and broad deep rivers, the troops, marching in four columns, toiled on.

The enemy commenced to dispute our advance at Borborassi. Driven out of the village and back into the bush, the savages assailed the sailors on their flank, but were quickly beaten off and chased to such a distance by the irate tars, that the army had to wait till they returned. When the march was resumed the Ashantis made another rear attack on the tars, but the number of Snider bullets which found a home in their ranks was so great that in all future encounters they kept as far from the naval brigade as possible.

Impeded by the rank luxuriance of an equatorial vegetation, the rate of progress would have been alarmingly slow but for the good work done by the engineers, who, protected by strong guards, marched in front making the roads as they went.

At Amoaful we encountered an enormous force evidently prepared to prevent, if possible, the capture of the capital. As the safety of the army depended on the coming battle, Sir Garnet neglected no precaution. He disposed his forces in four columns, Col. Evelyn Wood being in command of the one on the right, having with him Sir Garnet himself. As the Ashantis understood the art of war, the safety of the rear was handed over to Colonel Warren.

At about eight o'clock in the morning Lord Gifford's scouts came in touch with the enemy. The Highlanders at once went to the front, and the fighting soon became general. When the right came into action the Ashantis massed a heavy force and hurled it at Evelyn Wood's column with such fury, that had not Sir Garnet hurried off for the Welsh Fusiliers Wood's men must have given way.

As soon as it was certain that the rear was not threatened, Sir Garnet sent for the Rifle Brigade to drive the enemy from some dense bush, the friendly cover of which enabled them to keep up a most destructive fire. The moment the Rifles began to edge round, the savages, alarmed for their communication, stole swiftly away and joined in an attack on the left. Then for the second time there seemed a chance of our being defeated.

Towards evening, Essamanquatia, the cleverest of the Ashanti generals, suddenly appeared with a strong reinforcement, and, seeing at a glance how matters were progressing, fiercely attacked the already sorely pressed left.

Fortunately, the Rifles had seen the savages they had dislodged from the scrub making for their right, and suspecting their intention they moved swiftly across the left, coming up just in time to hurl back the new attack.

But it was the 2nd West Indians who turned the tide of battle. The wily savages, although they were driven from the field, had plenty of fight left in them. The moment they reached the bush they rushed off to Eusarpe, where we had stationed a detachment two miles away. They charged the intrenchments which the little garrison had taken the precaution to construct repeatedly till midnight, and then sullenly retired.

In the middle of the night they attacked Quarman, a small place where some of the troops had bivouacked, but something of the sort being anticipated they were repulsed with terrific loss.

This crowning disaster, coming after twenty hours' hard fighting, so discomforted them that they fled.

During the day the Ashantis had over 15,000 warriors fighting. Including the losses incurred during the night attacks the whole was reduced to 12,000.

On the following day Sir Garnet pushed on a flying column, which attacked and captured, after a stout resistance, the town of Becquah. As soon as it was destroyed the troops resumed their march on Coomassie.

The Ashantis then prepared a number of most cleverly-contrived ambuscades on our line of march, but Sir Garnet, being a general with brains, cleared them in advance.

The crossing of the river Ordah led to another fiercely-contested battle, but the determined bravery of the British soldier was not to be denied, for although the Ashantis now contested every mile of our advance we still drew nearer and nearer to our destination. Village after village, Ordahon, Eusleyan, Korsi, all were stormed, the Ashantis being beaten back, despite the encouragement afforded by their sovereign, who had now joined them; for King Coffee, though a poor warrior, was greatly beloved by his troops on account of his cruelty.

To discount the advantage of their monarch's presence, Sir Garnet left the attacking to be done by the Highlanders, who, anxious to get the business over, rushed villages and ambuscades in the most reckless manner.

On February 4th we entered Coomassie. The troops were greatly impressed by the imposing proportions of the capital.

The main street was over a mile and a half long and seventy yards wide, the city itself being over three miles and a half round.

Instead of huts we found to our astonishment houses with alcoves and stuccoed facades embellished with Mauresque patterns, the effect being heightened by painting the upper part of the house white and the lower part red.

Digitized by Google

The Ashantis may have been savages, but at least one of their class distinctions greatly resembled our own. The servants of the nobility and gentry lived apart, the passages connecting the different offices being all lined with closets and store rooms.

"Civilised," said the soldiers after inspecting the Ashanti kitchens.

"Savages," they declared when they came on the Death Grove and noticed some forty bodies in various stages of corruption; and savages the Ashantis are.

In 1873 it was quite a common thing for 300 slaves to be killed at one time, when any calamity, such as the death of a king's sister, occurred. Considering that over 1,000 were put to death annually in Coomassie, the people must have been an exceptionally prolific lot.

The palace of King Coffee was measured by a curious Highlander, and found to be 500 feet square. One portion of the building was actually made of stone, the rest was stuccoed.

The tastes of monarchs, like those of lesser mortals differ.

Those of the monarch of Ashanti inclined towards elephants' tails, ivory horns, rusty cutlasses, and sabres, worn-out guns bound round with clips of gold, and war drums well-bespattered with blood. No opposition was offered us as we entered the city. No one molested us, the Ashanti warriors grinned pleasantly at the Highlanders and were very communicative till we asked to see their king, then they froze.

Sir Garnet sent a message by one of the chiefs saying that, now Great Britain had proved her strength, he wished to spare the town if the Ashantis would make peace at once and agree to pay a small indemnity, the amount of which should be fixed later. The chief conveyed the message but the king still remained in hiding.

When Sir Garnet learnt that Ashanti politics exclude all honest dealing, and that treaties are made to be broken, it became clear that nothing was to be gained by negotiation; so as a mark of our power and our ability to punish any future acts of aggression, and, above all, to lessen, if not destroy, the prestige of the Ashantis, the palace and city were ordered to be destroyed by fire.

A few sentimentalists in this country professed to be extremely angry over the burning of Coomassie. They were wrong, for it was a most beneficent act. The Ashanti government was atrocious, their capital was a charnel house, their religion a consummation of cruelty and treachery, their policy was even worse than their religion, and they were a terror to their feebler neighbours.

Just as the troops were about to start on their homeward march King Coffee put in an appearance. Discretion being the better part of valour he thought it would be as well to open negotiations. At Fornangah a treaty was signed by which King Coffee bound himself to pay by instalments an indemnity of 50,000 ounces of pure gold towards defraying our expenses in the war.

He also guaranteed freedom of trade between Ashanti and Great Britain. His majesty also agreed to discontinue the practice of human sacrifices.

The treaty signed the troops started on their march back. The coast was reached on February 22nd, and the soldiers at once started for England.

[Next week: The New Zealand War.]

Short Stories That . . . . Make You Laugh.

The Prize of One Guinea for the best Storyette has been won this week by Miss Annie Jackson, 5 Sutherland Street, Sheffield, for the Storyette entitled "Bringing the Whole Force."

Bringing the Whole Force.

A well-known professor at one of our universities was often annoyed by two Italians playing a street organ before his house.

Giving his servant some money, he told her that whenever she heard an organ she was to go out and pay the owners to take it away.

This was a failure. The men, instead of coming once a week, came twice.

One day, the sound of the organ disturbed the professor while working at one of his lectures.

This so annoyed him that he rushed out and ordered the men away, telling them that if they came again he would hand them over to the police.

They refused to go unless he gave them money.

Enraged at their impertinence, he raced down the street in search of a policeman. Just as he turned the corner of the street he met a sergeant marching nine constables to their beats. Without speaking, he turned and walked alongside the procession.

When they turned the corner the Italians saw the professor with the policemen. It was enough. They were both seized with a sudden desire to see how quickly they could get the organ out of the street.

The cure was lasting, for the professor declares that no one has since been bold enough to play an organ before his house.

A. J.

Those Rationals.

Scene.—An American Court of Justice.

"Which is the plaintiff in this case?"

The plaintiff: "I am the plaintiff, your honour."

The judge: "I thought the wife was the plaintiff."

The plaintiff: "I am the wife, your honour."

The judge: "The dickens you are!"

The plaintiff: "I trust your honour entertains no prejudice against the habiliments of the new woman?"

The judge: "I! certainly not, at the same time I feel it my duty to inform you that you don't stand the ghost of a show with the jury!"

The plaintiff: "Why not?"

The judge: "Because they are all married men."

Shrill voice from the jury box: "You're off judge, four of us are married women!"

A. K. R.

He Met His Match.

A certain well-known railway contractor has the reputation of looking after the minor details of his great business with a keen eye. One morning, while out inspecting the work that was being done on a railway, he picked up a stray bolt lying by the side of the line. Then he walked to where the men were working.

Digitized by Google

"Look here," he called out to one of the workmen, "how is it that I find bolts lying about wasted? I have to pay for these things, you know."

"Why, where did you get that, sir?"

"I found it a little way up the line here."

"Oh, did you?" cried the workman. "I'm much obliged to you, sir, for I've been hunting for that bolt all the forenoon. I knew there was one missing!"

The august contractor concluded that he could give that workman no points on economy, and left in silence.

D. P. R.

Under Ten.

A CIRCUS paid a flying visit to a small northern town not long ago, and the price of admission was sixpence, children under ten years of age half-price.

It was Edith's tenth birthday, and her brother Tom, aged thirteen, took her in the afternoon to see the show. Arrived at the door he put down ninepence, and asked for two front seats.

"How old is the little girl?" asked the money-taker doubtfully.

"Well," replied Master Tom, "this is her tenth birthday, but she was not born until later than this in the afternoon."

The money-taker accepted the statement and handed him the tickets, but it was a close shave.

E. F. C.

A Double Joke.

A SMART man slapped down a five-shilling piece upon the counter of a restaurant in the City the other day as if he were angry.

"Look here, sir," he growled, "I don't often complain of the food that's served me, but that pepper of yours is half peas."

"I beg your pardon," replied the landlord. "You must be mistaken; I buy that pepper whole and grind it myself."

"I don't care a hang about that, sir! I repeat it is half peas."

"Oh! very well, if you say so. There's no need to quarrel over the matter. Still, I'd like to see you prove it," said the landlord calmly.

"Well, sir, I prove it this way—pepper—p-e-p-p-e-r—half p's. See?"

"Oh! yes," said the other, "it's a joke. Ha, ha! That's great! Best I ever heard! Your change, sir; thank you. Ha, ha! Splendid joke."

"Oh! it isn't half bad, but you have given me sixpence short."

"I think not, sir. We charge sixpence extra for peas. Rather out of season, you know, this time of the year!"

R. C.

Good Farming.

"SAMBO, is your master a good farmer?"

"Oh, yes, massa fust-rate farmer—he makes two crops in one year."

"How is that, Sambo?"

"Why, he sells all his hay in de autumn, and makes money once; den in de spring he sell de hides of de cattle dat die for want of de hay, and makes money twice."

T. J. W.

Not Quite Clear.

A YOUNG soldier who had just joined his regiment in India, met an old chum, who had been out there some time, and asked if India was as bad as it was painted in England.

"Oh, no," said his chum, "not at all. The fact of the matter is, there's a lot of young fellows come out here that don't take proper care of themselves; they eat and they drink, and they sleep and they die, and then they write home and tell their friends it's the climate that's killed them."

A. H.

Two Reasons.

THE latest device of a Paris paper for attracting readers is the engagement of two eminent physicians to attend gratuitously upon its yearly subscribers.

Recently the manager of the paper gave notice to one of the physicians "not to prescribe for X. any more; his subscription has expired."

The doctor replied:

"So has X."

C. F.

RESULT OF THE "FITTING FACE" COMPETITION.

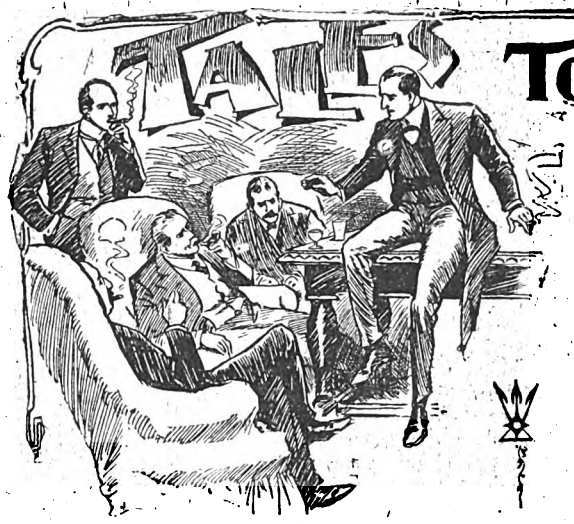
THE first prize of £1 1s. has been awarded to MR. DONALD ROBERTSON, of 95 Grove Street, Glasgow, whose attempt was the most accurate sent in.

A copy of the "Maori Maid" has been sent to each of the following:

R. Williamson, 56 Prince Street, Peterhead.
F. Williamson, 56 Prince Street, Peterhead.
W. Sinclair, 53 Longate, Peterhead.
D. Cooper, 10 Wallace Street, Peterhead.
Jas. Cooper, 10 Wallace Street, Peterhead.
Thos. Collinge, 170 Lodge Road, Birmingham.
A. J. King, The Barracks, Cork.
Miss Lily Smith, 24 The Mall, Clifton, Bristol.
Jas. Robertson, 95 Grove Street, Glasgow.

Here is the correct face:

Digitized by Google



Told "off Duty."

[You probably don't know the "Stand-Easy" Club. It isn't in the directory, and you might live next door to the place for years without knowing of its existence by that name. It isn't a conventional club; there is no subscription, and there is no register of members. It is merely a room in a quiet, orderly, and select hostelry in Westminster, where, by common consent, a number of officials of all kinds meet when "off duty." There you may find detectives from Scotland Yard, near by; firemen, commissionaires, a soldier or two, and maybe a doctor from St. Thomas' Hospital or elsewhere. A motley crowd they would be if they wore their uniforms, but at the "Stand-Easy" uniforms are a rarity, "mufti" being the unwritten rule. The result is a gathering of quiet, well-behaved, and well-dressed men. Saturday night is the time when one sees the biggest muster, for then it is the custom for one member to regale the company with a story, the story being, as a rule, an account of some incident in the teller's own career.]

Sweetbriar's "National."

Told by the EX-JOCKEY.

ALTHOUGH unmistakably "horsey" in dress and appearance, there is little about old Nat Dogget to suggest that he was at one time a professional jockey. For Nat is of average height, and more than average weight, tipping the beam, as he does, at fifteen-stone odd.

Let it at once be said, however, that Nat Doggett was never a flat-race jockey. His public appearances in the saddle were strictly confined to sport "between the flags"—i.e., steeplechasing; in which branch of horse-racing, of course, the burdens by the equine competitors are on an altogether higher scale than those which the fliers of the "flat" are called upon to carry. Hence, it isn't at all necessary to be a pigmy, in order to earn a lining as a professional "cross-country" rider. A man of ten stone, or thereabouts, is as well adapted for the business—rather better, in fact—than a puny mannikin who has to carry a lot of "dead weight" in his saddle-cloths. As old Doggett often declared, "Every pound o' lead tells as much on a hoss as a pound an' a half o' livin' flesh an' blood. Why, I can't profess to tell, but 'tis so."

It is many years ago since Nat relinquished the saddle and started business as a job-master in London. Nowadays his son practically runs the business for him, although Nat still persists in showing up at the "yard" for a few hours daily. Being a widower, he often spends an evening at the club, with the frequenters of which the cheery, ruddy-faced old fellow is remarkably popular.

"Did any of you ever hear the story of Sweetbriar's 'National'?" remarked Nat, when, on a recent evening, he was asked to entertain the company with a yarn. "No? Well, I ain't surprised at that; for though the race caused a bit of a sensation at the time, I don't suppose more than half-a-dozen people ever knew the real facts o' the affair.

"Sweetbriar, I may tell you, was trained by John Farrant, one o' the cleverest cross-country trainers of his day. I was a raw youngster o' fifteen when I got a job in his stable, and not till I'd had several years' hard practice, ridin' exercise, and schoolin'-gallops, was I allowed to have the leg-up in a real race. That mount was a winnin' one, and afore the end o' the season I'd quite a string o' wins to my credit.

"But though I got plenty o' mounts from other stables, I still stuck to my old master, the owners for whom he trained havin' first claim on my services. Durin' the 'off' season, I made old Farrant's place my headquarters, and rode his horses in their gallops the same as I'd done when I was only a stable lad. Farrant's wasn't a big establishment, but it was a select one; for old John was a trifle particular who he trained for, and the horses under his charge generally had a bit o' class about 'em.

"At the time I'm speakin' of, we had a bay mare called Sweetbriar, of whom great things were expected. She was a rare-bred 'un, and though she hadn't proved o' much account on the flat, looked like makin' somethin' out o' the common at the jumping game. As a five-year-old she'd won half-a-dozen little steeplechases off the r el; after which her owner, Mr. Frank Lindley, decided to put the mare aside until the next year, and then have a cut in for the Grand National with her.

"So Sweetbriar was entered, and, as the handicapper only gave her 10st. 12lb., which was rather less than we'd expected, Farrant started preparin' her for the big race. As I could do the weight comfortable, I was promised the mount. I rode the mare in her gallops, and, if at first I hadn't thought a great deal of her chance against such animals as she was to meet, I soo.. held a very different opinion. For not only could Sweetbriar go fast and stay for ever, as the sayin' is, but she jumped as clever as a cat, and I never knew her to put a foot wrong.

"Mr. Lindley, the owner, came over from his place three or four mornings a week, and well pleased he was at the way his mare was gettin' through her preparation. 'We shall win!' he said to me one morning as I was dismountin' after a three-mile spin over fences.

Digitized by Google

'We shall win, Doggett; the mare's a certainty!' 'Bar accidents,' I replied; 'I fancy she will myself, sir.' 'Oh! she'll stand up safe enough,' says Mr. Lindley; 'I don't believe you could pull her down wi' ropes! Yes, we shall win—I'm confident we shall win!'

"Yet, in spite of his speakin' so cocksure, I couldn't help noticin' the terribly anxious look there was on his face. He was only a young man—hardly thirty—and he'd married Miss Lucy Calton, daughter of Sir Peter Calton, one o' the leadin' men in the county, though precious poor for a baronet. The girl didn't bring Frank Lindley any dowry; but he didn't mind that, he was only too glad to take her for herself alone. You see, he was pretty comfortably off, havin' succeeded to his father, old Squire Lindley's, money and estates when he came of age.

"'Twas well known at the time o' the marriage that Miss Lucy had chosen him against Sir Peter's wishes, the old baronet favourin' a certain Captain Denny, who, on retirin' from the Army, had become connected wi' a very cute racing stable, and made a pile o' money on the Turf. This chap Denny was very much 'gone' on Miss Calton, and between him and Frank Lindley there were several scenes. Once, in the huntin' field, the Captain struck the other with his crop, and the young squire had retaliated with interest. A few days after this quarrel, Lindley's engagement to Miss Lucy was announced, whereupon Captain Denny packed up his traps and left Sir Peter's house, swearin' he'd be revenged on Lindley for havin' put him out o' the runnin'. He never visited the baronet again, and you can bet he wasn't invited to the weddin', which came off a few months afterwards.

"Well, for a couple o' years Mr. Lindley and his young wife was as happy as could be. Then it got about that, through the failure of some London concern in which he was interested, the young squire had lost pretty-nigh the whole of his fortune. That there was some truth in it was proved when he sold off most of his hunters and carriage-horses, and started to cut down expenses in all manner o' ways.

"This happened just about the time when Sweetbriar was startin' her preparation for the big steeplechase. Now, Mr. Lindley had never been much of a racin' man; but, like his father afore him, he liked to have one or two horses in trainin' with John Farrant, whose stables, I ought to have mentioned before, were within easy walkin' distance of the squire's place.

Presently a hand appeared through the hole.

"It rather surprised me to find Sweetbriar's owner so keen on winnin' this race, that he should come over several times a week before breakfast just to see the mare do her mornin' gallop. But at last I got to know the reason of his anxiety. It appeared that it was his money, and his money alone, which had brought Sweetbriar from 33 to 1 to less than half the price. In them days of heavy betting, it took some money to shorten the odds to such an extent a month before the race was due to be run.

"The fact was, as I afterwards learnt, that owing to his losses in the city, which I've mentioned, Mr. Frank Lindley's financial affairs were in a very rocky condition, and unless he could get hold of a large sum by a certain date, he'd be compelled to sell off everything. So he had decided to risk his all on Sweetbriar for the 'National.' If she landed the race for him, his winnings would set him on his legs again; if she failed—well, he would be a ruined man.

"The mare continued to do first rate, and her chance was lookin' rosier than ever, when, one day, about a fortnight before the race, she drifted out in the bettin' to 25 to 1. We couldn't understand it, for only the day before she had been well-backed on behalf o' the owner and stable connections at 14's. Young Mr. Lindley at once went up to London, returnin' next day, lookin' very glum and anxious.

"'I don't like the look of it,' he said to Farrant. 'My agent tells me that several of the 'cutest bookmakers are willing to lay almost any odds against our mare, and there seems to be an unlimited laying commission out for her. What d'you make of it Farrant?'

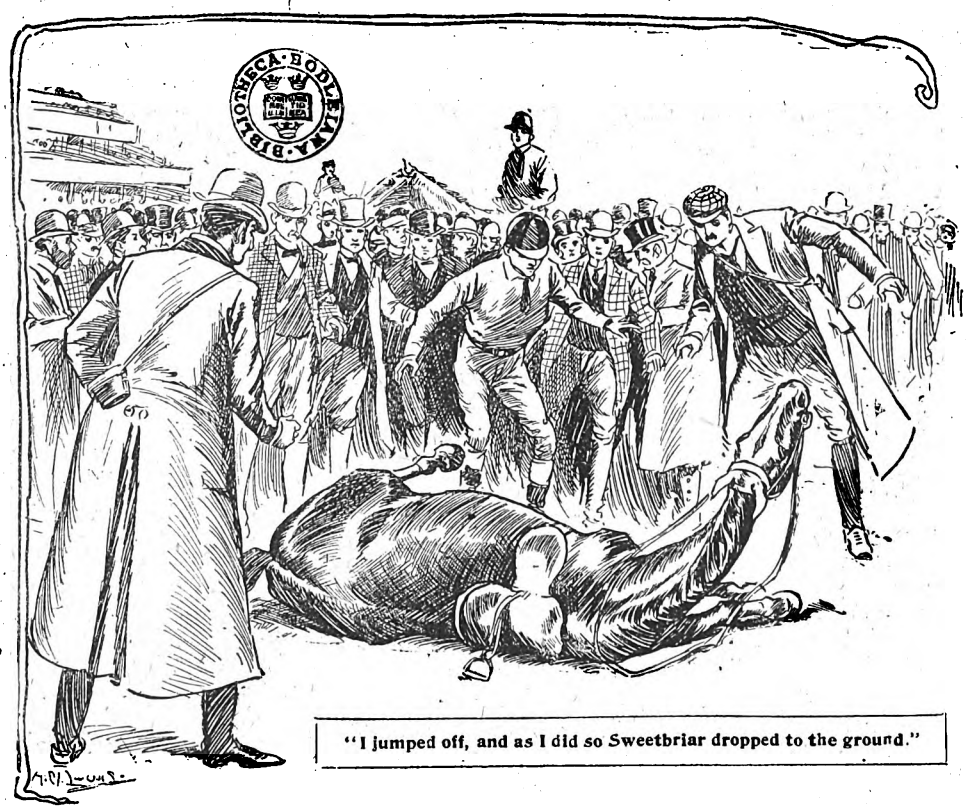
"'I don't know what to think, sir,' answered old John. 'Sweet-briar was never better in her life than she is now, and her jockey's as straight as a die. There can be only one explanation.'

"'You mean that they intend to "get at" the mare?' asked Mr. Lindley.

Digitized by Google

"'That's about the size of it, sir,' replied Farrant. 'But they shan't get at her; no, by Heaven, they shan't. Me and Nat here will take turns watchin' the mare night and day; and if I catch any scoundrel tryin' to come the nobblin' game, I'll thrash him first, and drag him through the horse-pond afterwards! Never you fear, Mr. Lindley; Sweetbriar shall go the post as fit as hands can make her, and if she don't win the Grand National, it'll be simply because she ain't good enough for the job!'

"Well, late on the very next night, while Farrant was keepin' guard over Sweetbriar in her box, he heard a noise as of somebody boring a hole through the stable wall, just above the mare's manger. Presently a hand appeared through the hole, and into the manger was dropped a bolus, about three times the size of a pea.



"I jumped off, and as I did so Sweetbriar dropped to the ground."

Old John instantly pocketed this pill, and then slipped out o' the stable, horse-whip in hand. But he was too late—the would-be nobbler had vamoosed, and though search was made for him till long past midnight, the scoundrel couldn't be found.

"After that we kept stricter watch than ever; but no more attempts were made to dose Sweetbriar, and, two days before the great race, Farrant and me took the mare to Liverpool. She was in grand fettle, and the style in which she did her winding-up gallop over part o' the course, pleased everybody who saw it. Yet she travelled worse than ever in the market, and, when the numbers went up, shouts of '25 to 1 Sweetbriar' came from all parts o' the ring.

"I cantered the mare down to the startin'-post, and when the flag fell jumped her off at a fair pace, so as to avoid the crowdin' which always takes place at the first obstacle. Sweetbriar was over it a length in front of anything else, and we were leadin' at the second fence also; but, between that and the next jump, a lightly-weighted old horse, called The Mandarin, took up the runnin'. Then, as I eased my mount a little, we were passed by several other animals, two of which, however, came a cropper at the water directly afterwards.

"For the next furlong or so, The Mandarin kept the lead, closely followed by Pacific; while Sweetbriar was about three lengths away, well clear of the others. At the 'open-ditch,' The Mandarin fell, so givin' Pacific the lead. Sweetbriar, who was sailin' along just beautiful, took off at the jump all right, but pecked a bit on landin', and very nearly unshipped me. It was the first mistake I'd known her to make, and I could only put it down to her bein' startled at the sight of a man who seemed to spring out of her way as she cleared the ditch.

"Before she'd properly righted herself, Sweetbriar was passed by Tearaway — the favourite — and three or four more. The mistake lost us at least half-a-dozen lengths; as, however, there was a matter of two miles still to go, I reckoned we had enough in hand to make up for lost ground. So shaking the mare up a bit, I sent her out after the leaders. She answered my call gamely enough, and by the time the next jump was reached, we were lyin' second again, a few lengths behind Pacific, who appeared to be goin' strong and well.

"To my surprise, Sweetbriar cleared the fence in very slovenly style, and rolled about on landin'. But on bein' righted, she sailed along all serene, and, in a few strides, recovered the ground her bad jumpin' had lost her.

"As we neared home, however, she jumped worse and worse. How I managed to hold her up and keep my seat, I don't know; but I did it somehow, and thankful I was when we brushed through the last obstacle and I saw that there was only two horses in front of us. The two were Pacific and Tearaway, who were now runnin' neck-and-neck. Sweetbriar was about a length and a half behind 'em, the others bein' a good way off.

Digitized by Google

"Well, I just touched the mare with my whip, and, taking hold of her bit, she crept up inch by inch. Suddenly Pacific dropped back beaten, leavin' the favourite to fight out the finish with Sweetbriar.

"And that was a finish! Runnin' as game as a pebble, my mount got level with Tearaway; then for a few strides they went on locked together, until a few yards from the winnin' post I called on Sweetbriar for a final effort, when, shooting out, she just beat the favourite by a head.

"No sooner had she passed the judge's box, than she swerved right across the course and then stood stock-still, trembling like a leaf.

"Knowin' something was wrong, I jumped off, and, as I did so, Sweetbriar dropped to the ground—dead!

* * * * *

"Mr. Lindley got a veterinary surgeon to examine the dead mare. All he discovered was a thorn embedded in her near shoulder. This thorn was dark-green in colour, and about an inch long.

"'Twas that little bit o' wood that caused poor Sweetbriar's death. For it was a poisonous thorn of a sort which grows in one particular part of India.

"How it got into Sweetbriar's shoulder we didn't know until about two months afterwards, when Mr. Lindley, one day, received by post, a packet containing a queerly-made little air-pistol and a letter.

"The letter bore no address, but the writer of it started by confessin' that he it was who had shot the thorn at Sweetbriar as she landed over the 'open-ditch.' And he it was who had previously tried to dose the mare in her stable.

"Then he went on to say that Captain Denny had promised him £500 in the event of Sweetbriar losin' the National. When the attempt to nobble the mare had failed, the Captain had given him the pistol and poisoned thorn and told him what to do with them.

"In India, where Captain Denny had lived for a time, a scratch from the thorn generally had a fatal effect on either man or beast in somethin' less than a minute. But, for some reason or other, it hadn't acted quite soon enough on poor Sweetbriar, and thus the Captain's little scheme for ruining Mr. Lindley didn't come off.

"On the other hand, Denny had lost so heavily through layin' against the mare that he couldn't, or wouldn't, settle up, and cleared out o' the country. The man he had employed to do the dirty work hadn't received a shillin' for his trouble, which was his reason for roundin' on the Captain.

"Over Sweetbriar's 'National,' Mr. Frank Lindley took a snug little parcel out o' the Ring, but never afterwards did he have any dealin's wi' the Turf. And small blame to him either!"

WON BY A WING.

By Constance Craigie Halkett.

Cyril Benson, taking him all round, was a perfectly sane man—but he was really rather mad on one point (which is, of course, believed by some people to be the case with everybody), and that point was—birds.

I don't mean that he was an amateur bird-fancier, that he kept gorgeous feathered creatures in a cage to win prizes at shows—no power on earth would have induced him to cage any bird, and he utterly despised shows and prizes, the latter because he had drawn nothing else in life's lottery.

No, it was not that. It was on the subject of women wearing birds' feathers in their hats upon which he waxed so eloquent.

He had been known to attack a royal personage—a very stiff royal personage, too—who was so taken aback by his impudence that she listened quite meekly to his observations.

A Duchess, who found him an amusing unit to invite to her house parties, was persuaded by him to insist, when visiting her milliner, that nothing but the feathers of that most unnatural of mothers, the ostrich, should ever be seen on her Grace's head—which, by the way, was rather a clever move on his part, as the said Duchess was young and good-looking, and considered by quite a large number of people as "the glass of fashion and the mould of form."

He was so well known to have this mania that no young woman with any idea of winning his regard (and there were not a few of these, for his rent-roll was large) ever dreamt of appearing before him in a wing-trimmed hat.

As to ospreys it was really better not to mention such things before him—the subject had the same effect upon him as a red rag is popularly supposed to have on a bull—though I must say, in common fairness, that the well-informed section of Society who knew the cruelty practised to obtain these ephemeral vanities cordially agreed with him on this point.

Occasionally he made a convert (as was the case with the Duchess), nearly always, of course, a member of the fair sex. This people began to find rather a bore—an extremely good-looking rich young man with a craze of this kind was one thing, but a girl who attacked everybody on the subject immediately on arriving to stay for a shooting party they found distinctly trying.

The only person who listened to her exhortations with the attention they deserved, was a young curate from the neighbourhood who had been invited to dinner.

The enthusiastic bird-lady was his partner for that meal.

As she was pretty, her words, however foolish, had of course to a male mind a certain amount of weight, and so, when she paused for want of breath, he said with fervour:

"I will join your society, only tell me what I have to do."

"There is only one condition enforced," she said impressively; "one and one only."

"And that is?" he asked eagerly.

"You must never under any circumstances whatever wear wings in your hat!" was the unexpected reply.

The curate looked completely bewildered—the company shouted with glee—but it was some moments before the enthusiastic lady realised the situation.

On another occasion, also at a big house-party, a girl arrived to stay armed with a formidable bundle of

Digitized by Google

"tracts"—not, I hasten to add, on religious subjects—all treatises on the manners and customs of birds.

A dear friend of hers was overheard remarking that she believed Cyril Benson was coming, and it was whispered that Lady Lettice would not be averse to——etc., and so on. In point of fact Cyril Benson did turn up next day, and it was not long before everybody noticed that two heads were frequently seen very close together discussing (presumably) the tracts that lay before them. Indeed, things looked so promising for Lady Lettice that people began to say that it had really been very clever of her to work the thing so well.

But, unfortunately for Lady Lettice and her chances, there lived in the near neighbourhood a famous professor of natural history, who had an only daughter whose name was Violet. People who loved her—and they were many—said she was as sweet as her name. People who didn't said that that shy manner of hers was only put on, that violets, even the real ones, only hid themselves in their leaves to make people want to look for them, and so on.

On her head she wore the smartest felt.

However, when Violet did put in her appearance at the castle one afternoon with her father, the two were voted a distinct success. He with his grand head, interesting talk, and the simplicity of manner which one meets with among the really great of this world—sometimes. She, tall, slender, graceful, masses of golden-brown hair, almost red here and there, large dreamy dark eyes, and the complexion of a girl who has lived a wholesome country life and scorns both powder and paint.

Her dress was just as it should be, though there was a distinct touch of originality about it, and on her head she wore the smartest felt, fresh from "Scott's," and stuck in the folded band of corded silk was a really beautiful blue jay's wing. On this wing Cyril Benson, who was introduced to her, tried to fix his eyes, but they kept wandering to her lovely face in spite of himself, and he forgot all about the jay for a moment while admiring the beautiful curve of throat and chin, and the pretty way her hair grew round her temples, and, above all, noted her entire absence of self-consciousness.

Lady Lettice's prettiness compared to this was the prettiness of a Bond Street female barber's block side by side with a lovely, living woman. Her much befrizzled hair looked almost vulgar beside the thick brown waves into which Violet's fell. However, the blue jay's wing, he told himself, settled the matter.

Here was somebody who badly needed converting, and who more absolutely fitted for the task than himself? He set himself to the work with quite fervent zeal—to find that, when he had said all the things he usually said on the subject so near his heart, this girl was absolutely laughing at him.

Now to Cyril Benson this was a new experience. Women were invariably extremely civil to him, he had been spoilt and petted by them ever since he could remember—not one of them to whom he had condescended to air his views on bird life but had listened with the air of a person who is imbibing highly important, not to say interesting and quite original, information, whereas this girl only laughed!

"My dear sir," she said, in the very quaintest way, when she had finished laughing, laughter which had quite angered him—yet he wished she would laugh again, she looked so adorably pretty, so—"my dear sir, you have been misinformed on one or two points." (Misinformed about birds—he—Cyril Benson!)

"I can speak with assurance on the subject," she went on to explain, "for, as you of course know, natural history is my father's special line of work and research, and as for years he and I have worked together, you understand."

And she proceeded to go over the "points" on which he had been "misinformed," and proved that she knew what she talked about—she never, somehow, gave him the impression that she was airing her knowledge, yet as she spoke she displayed an amount of learning which simply made his brain whirl. She suddenly wound up with:

"So you see really I don't think there is a bird on this earth I don't know something about—but perhaps that is why you talked to me about birds, you thought it was my subject, eh? Now, that is a mistake, you know, people wouldn't always rather talk about their subjects, they want to break up fresh ground, you see."

Cyril Benson looked at her reproachfully.

"Do you mean to tell me that you don't know that that is my subject?" he asked.

She threw up her hands in mock despair.

"What!" she said, "you a naturalist too? Well, then,

Digitized by Google

I suppose I must resign myself to talk shop. Let me see, what do you think of Professor Merton's discovery?"

"I've never heard of it."

She stared at him.

"Never heard of it!" she repeated, "and you a naturalist! That is queer."

"I'm not a naturalist!" he said, quite snappishly, "I'm only the president of the S.F.P.O.C.T.B."

"Ah!" she said, "I have heard of that—the Society

"Never heard of it!" she repeated, "and you a naturalist."

For Preventing Outcasts Coming To Britain—don't you find that rather difficult?"

"It means nothing of the sort," he said stiffly. "It means the Society For Prevention Of Cruelty To Birds."

"Is that it? You must forgive me, but when people talk in capital letters it is really hard to know. You see one letter stands for so many things, doesn't it? But to return to our subject—so you are the president of that Society? Why, how shocked you must be at my blue jay's wing; yet if you knew its history you would really think that blue jay deserved his fate. Our gamekeeper shot it—it was busy pecking a young pigeon to death."

"That is an exceptional case."

"I know, I am only telling you because I don't like you to think bad things about me in your heart."

Cyril Benson's face brightened perceptibly.

"You don't like me to—" he began to repeat her words—then paused—"now that is very good of you—to mind what I think one way or the other."

She laughed softly.

"People do mind as a rule, don't they?" she asked.

He smiled broadly.

"They do." he said slowly, "which is probably why you have put me into such a bad temper. I'm not used to being contradicted—it makes me see myself in a new light."

"And that is?"

"A very ludicrous one."

"How good for your conceit!" she told him gaily.

"Very!—but it's so disagreeable—like looking at oneself in a French mirror."

"That is simply a caricature," she said quickly; "and that is what you could never be."

He bowed gravely.

"Thank you, I am grateful for small mercies in this vale of tears. I see your father is preparing to go—you are walking? Yes? Then may I go part of the way back with you—I need the exercise, there was no shoot to-day."

Violet assented, and the three moved off together.

"There," said Mrs. Lindsay to Mrs. Hamilton, "at last is a girl who is evidently not setting her cap at Cyril Benson. It's really quite a relief."

"Not her cap, it is true," said Mrs. Hamilton, "but—did you see her hat?"

"Certainly I did—what of that?"

"She wore a blue jay's wing!"

"Well—that goes to prove what I have just said—indeed it was seeing that blue jay's wing gave rise to my remark."

"My dear Laura!" said her friend quite sorrowfully, "you are really not so 'quick at the uptake,' as we say in the Highlands, as I thought you were. Don't you see? All the other girls have taken the wings out of their hats in order to win Mr. Benson—and have failed. She has put a wing into hers for the same reason—it was a thoroughly original idea—she really deserves success."

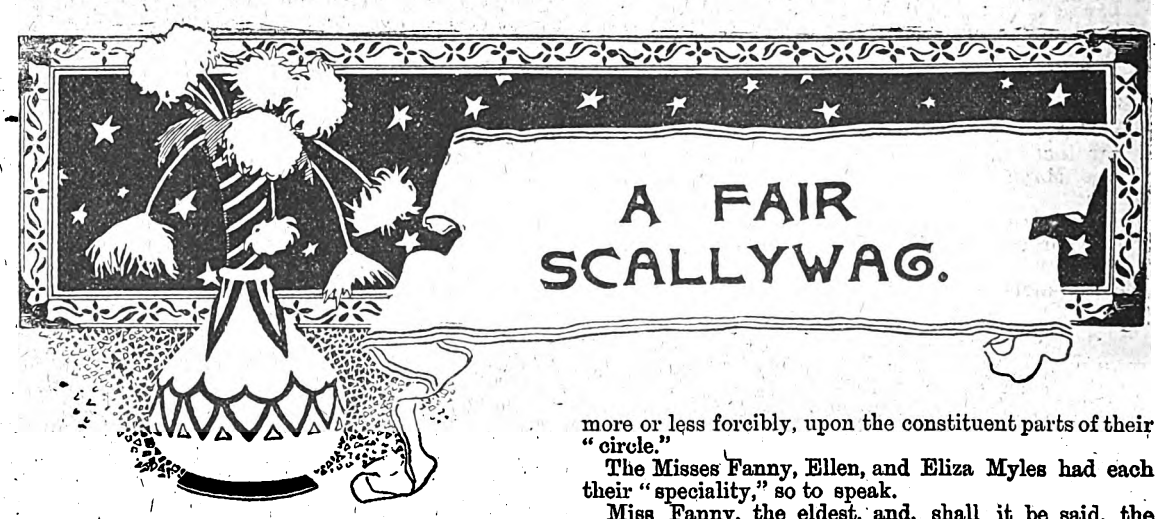
A male listener, sitting close by, shook his head.

"Those women, those women!" he groaned; "they have, from time immemorial, made mountains out of molehills. This time they have arranged a marriage—on the strength of a blue jay's wing!"

But, a few months later, when he read a certain announcement in the list of fashionable marriages of the Morning Post, he had to allow that the two good ladies had been right.

Splendid new serial coming soon.
See "Editor's Page."

Digitized by Google



NOBODY was quite sure where she came from.

This, she being, evidently, only just out of her "teens," was, in a way, unfortunate,—socially; for girls of tender age (and "twenty" is, in more senses than one, a tender age) ought not in the opinion of most right-thinking people, to be objects of doubt and suspicion.

Frankly, there was much—very much, that was attractive about Tita Neene; and the more attractive a woman is, or is thought to be, the greater is other people's curiosity with regard to her.

She had descended upon the inhabitants of Clinton Crescent, South Kensington, with a suddenness that had taken the general breath away.

A few days sufficed to prove that she had abundant means; and that the elderly female, who appeared to officiate dually as housekeeper and duenna, was of that rare and old-fashioned type, so seldom to be met with now-a-days; foster-mother almost; devoted humble friend quite.

Speculation with regard to the new-comer had its first beginning at No. 1; the tenants of which demand a descriptive word or two.

Three maiden ladies, sisters, were they, of——well, not uncertain age, the hand of time being only too plainly apparent.

The impress would not, perhaps, have been so noticeable, but for the fact that all the three (I regret to say it, but truth must out) were undeniably plain—some declared even downright ugly.

Be this as it might, one thing was clear, beyond argument or dispute, that they were more than ordinarily well-to-do; owning, as they did, indeed, the larger proportion of the houses in the Crescent. This rendered it somewhat surprising that, in spite of personal drawbacks, they had been unsuccessful in attracting the more needy of the bachelor tribe.

They were the surviving daughters of a certain long-deceased naval officer, and sometime member of Her Majesty's Corps of Gentlemen-at-Arms. This fact they never failed upon any and every opportunity to impress, more or less forcibly, upon the constituent parts of their "circle."

The Misses Fanny, Ellen, and Eliza Myles had each their "speciality," so to speak.

Miss Fanny, the eldest, and, shall it be said, the plainest of the trio, lived but for the card-table, her taste for whist amounting almost to a passion.

Miss Ellen was of a pensive, soulful (doleful, the ribald called it) disposition, she having, so report said, been the victim of an early disappointment, whatever that may mean.

Miss Eliza was the kitten, the frivolous young thing, whose particular forte was the trilling out, in the weakest, squeakiest voice imaginable, such highly exhilarating ditties as "By the sad sea waves"; (Miss Fanny assisting with the seconds) "My heart's in the Highlands"; "Teach me how to woo, love," and so on.

The "Three Graces"; (by which not inappropriate title they were, sub-rosa, known among their friends and acquaintances); were, therefore, a "shining" sisterhood, and locally a social power to be reckoned with and considered.

"No girl of her age, who is anybody, would be here in such a position; nobody knowing anything about her, too," said Miss Fanny.

"Something ought to be done about it!" said Miss Ellen. "It's not nice for other girls," plainly implying by her manner that they, the Misses Myles, were to be included in the "threatened."

"I hate her!" comprehensively said Miss Eliza. "I hear that she has talked about us already—says that my singing is—there, I hate her!"

"Well, girls," said Miss Fanny, in virtue of her seniorship, "she has only been here a fortnight. We will give her a month, and if, at the end of that time we have not discovered something—well, wrong about her, I will be content not to play another game of whist as long as I live."

Of course all this went the round of the "circle," to the intense relish and satisfaction of everybody.

Meanwhile, the subject of all this talk and delicate attention seemed to be not only quite unconscious of anything of the sort, but, on the contrary, as indifferent to public criticism and opinion as could well be.

To the disgust of the "Three Graces," more especially, Tita Neene rode, cycled, motored, and drove, in a perfectly reckless and outrageous manner, and with no other attendant, in the first and last instances, than a strange, aristocratic young man, who on such occasions, drove or rode up to the door of Number Six; the pair going off together in the highest of spirits, and without the faintest suspicion of conventional "priggery."

Digitized by Google

The gentleman was absolutely unknown in the "Crescent," which, of course, only added to the heinousness of the offence, and the turpitude of the offender.

But there was worse behind.

One, Major Bland, a retired Army veteran, and a prominent member of the "circle," deposed, at a select evening gathering for card-playing and scandal-mongering purposes, at Number One, that the "adventuress" (so they had be-labelled her) had been seen at the theatre—alone—in the Pit!

He, Major Bland, was the witness on this awful indictment; although, he somewhat marred his testimony by confessing that he had felt half-inclined to offer his services; second thoughts, however, deciding him that he had perhaps better not.

"I should think not, indeed!" cried Miss Eliza, hysterically. "Why there is no knowing what the result might have been; these adventuresses are so artful, you know."

"Perhaps so," said the Major. "But there's no denying that she's not bad-looking; and she can take care of herself."

"Not bad-looking!" almost screamed Miss Ellen. "I'm astonished at you, Major!—but there, you men are all alike—you have no discrimination, and—no taste!"

Now, if the Major had been absolutely straightforward, and had told all that he knew, I verily believe that nothing short of a social cataclysm would have resulted.

From something, however, that I have since heard, it appears that on the evening of Miss Tita's escapade, she, although actually there alone, was seen by the Major to meet this same young fellow outside, whence, entering a hansom, they drove South Kensington-wards in company.

After all, the old soldier was not a bad sort, for while, by sheer force of habit, still superficially faithful to his little coterie, he was, nevertheless, resolved to neutralise, so far as in him lay, the baleful efforts of his lady friends to "crush" the maiden at Number Six.

Perhaps, indeed, he was influenced in this direction by an esprit de corps—a fellow feeling—he being persuaded, from certain unmistakable signs and indications that the gentlemanly young flutterer of the Clinton Crescent dovecote was a military man.

His Majesty's uniform could never cover anything save honour, chivalry and rectitude of purpose! There are of course, exceptions, but then, the major had implicit faith in the "cloth," and ignored "exceptions" as being alike misleading and vicious.

Everything that Tita did, or wore, or was reported to have said, was taken up, enlarged, and immediately sat in judgment upon.

The poor girl, affecting a style of dress, now came to be associated with the "mannish" set—the tailor-made "New Woman."

A walking-stick (crooked) too! and, oh, horror! the shameless hussy had been seen by Sister Ellen as the latter, one afternoon, was walking past Number Six; to be smoking!—smoking a cigarette, behind the flimsy veil of the lace curtains, at the open window.

Then her correspondence, it was enormous! Every post seemed to bring her a very avalanche of letters. Had eyes been X. Rays, Tita's epistolary secrets—if secrets they were—would assuredly soon have been public property.

"Well," said Miss Fanny, one morning, after a more than unusually large delivery, "if brother John's child ever turns up, and displays wanton and unmaidenly freedom such as this, we would—at least I would—disown her!"

The other two-thirds of the trio chorused a hearty acquiescence.

Brother John, it may be said, the fair virgins' only brother, had, owing to some disagreement with his father nearly thirty years before, emigrated to parts unknown.

But for a casually-seen birth-notice in an American paper, the sisters would never have known that he had even married; much less that a daughter had been born to him.

As time went on they concluded that his return to England was not to be looked for, and so, beyond an occasional and brief reference to the family scapegrace, he and his passed, for all practical purposes, out of the daily life and interests of the "Three Graces."

* * * * *

Clinton Crescent is nothing if not exclusive, and it will, therefore, he readily imagined that it was stirred to its deepest depth by the startling announcement that Miss Tita Neene would give a dinner party, and an after-dinner reception upon the evening of January 20th.

When the invitations to this function were duly received by the "cream" of the "circle," all was astonishment and open-mouthed indecision.

"To go" or "not to go," that was the question; but as the bell-wethers, (I crave their pardon; the "Three Graces"); decided to accept, the hesitant phase passed, to be succeeded by the curiously expectant.

Tita received her guests with none of that freedom of speech and manner with which she was credited, and which was so objectionable to the more precise among her neighbours.

No lady, howsoever high her station, and good her breeding, could have possibly surpassed her, as, with exactly the right word and the right gesture she smilingly bid welcome to the little crowd of censoriously-disposed critics.

It's no good pushing . .
A good thing . . . .
If you can't get . . . .
That good thing . . .
Supplied fast enough . .

THAT'S BEEN OUR TROUBLE.

+ + +

The orders for Twenty Teazer exceeded the capacity of the making machines by tens of thousands. These orders have now been fulfilled, and we are in a position to meet any demand.

TWENTY TEAZER IS THE 20th CENTURY PUZZLE.

6d. EVERYWHERE. 6d.

Digitized by Google

All was so quiet, so unobtrusively "proper," that nothing in the shape of a "sensation" was even suspected as being imminent.

The dinner over, the reception began. The wealth and fashion of Clinton Crescent flowed up and down the flower-decked stairway, exchanging low-voiced opinions, or indulging in, what I fear I must write, hypocritically enthusiastic comments upon both entertainment and hostess.

Then it was noticed that the "Three Graces" were not making any movement towards departing.

A pink note, delivered about half-past eleven to Miss Fanny, by a servant, ran as follows:

> Will Miss Myles, and her sisters kindly remain for a few moments after all have gone.
>
> Tita Neene.

Most extraordinary! What could it mean?

The last guest had departed, and in the pretty, deserted-looking, wax-lit drawing-room there lingered only the wondering sisters, and—Tita.

* * * * *

It will be long before Clinton Crescent recovers from the shock it experienced at that which took place the next morning.

About noon, Miss Ellen was seen to sally forth, and, making her way to Number Six, to ascend the steps, and knock at the door.

In something less than a quarter-of-an-hour she emerged again with—Tita, with whom she returned to Number One.

Later the following facts leaked out.

Tita Neene was the daughter of brother John, deceased twelve months before, and being her father's daughter, and inheriting the more harmless of his eccentricities, she had adopted this original method of claiming acquaintance with her paternal relatives.

Her surname, Neene, was explained by her having taken it on succeeding to the large fortune of her mother's only brother, a well-known Wall Street broker of New York.

But who was the mysterious young man? Clinton Crescent obstinately refused complete absolution until his intrusion into the story was satisfactorily explained.

This, however, was soon done.

Douglas Grant, the son of people to whom Tita had brought introductions from Montreal, had during the few weeks she had passed in his mother's house, on her first arrival in England, learnt to love her; the rides and drives being the natural outcome.

They were both of them unconventional to a degree; although his "fair Scallywag," as he came to call her, easily distanced him in the race for the "out-of-the-way."

* * * * *

The end of things was even more extraordinary, inasmuch as it went a long way towards realising the "improbable."

The "Three Graces" by reason, maybe, of their niece's winning personality, developed, individually and collectively, wondrous changes; and, though still, in every sense of the word, eminently anti-progressive, displayed a most praiseworthy inclination to take a more rational view of life in general, and of their own in particular.

Ralph Enderby.

The Two Beryls.

Eric Creighton found it difficult to refuse a favour under any circumstances, but to have to refuse when the girl whom he admired above all others was the suppliant was hard lines indeed.

However, there was no option in this case. The Reverend James Wainwright was as unholy as he was unpopular, Eric knew, and the last man in the world to whom he would have thought of presenting the living of Penthurst. That he was the brother of Beryl Wainwright (whom he had met with her mother the previous year in Scotland) made the case a matter of sacrifice.

Beryl had given him no hope of winning her; on the contrary she had let him understand that he was only the companion of a pleasant holiday. And now she had written to him and asked a favour. What a joy it would have been to him to have granted it. By refusing he fully realised that he was forfeiting all claims to her better acquaintanceship. When a woman condescends to ask a favour from a man who loves her she does not expect a rebuff.

All the same he was surprised at her request because the misdeeds of the applicant were well known. But probably she was blinded to his true character by her sisterly affection.

Thinking of all this, Eric, nevertheless, bestowed the living elsewhere, for to please no woman could he abuse the trust reposed in him.

In the course of the next week Eric had to attend some important meetings in the next county. With a heavy heart he arrived at Blankboro', for it was the home of Beryl Wainwright and every reminder of her was tinged with sadness.

* * * * *

"Ah, how do you do, Mr, Creighton? So good of you to spare us an hour or two this evening when you are so busy. You know Miss Wainwright, I believe, will you take her in to dinner?" And Lady Hadley turned to her next guest.

Left together Beryl held out her hand smiling and opened the conversation.

"You have not been to see us since you came to Blankboro', Mr. Creighton. My mother was sorry, as she had something she particularly wished to say to you."

Eric flushed.

"I thought that your mother would, naturally, not care to see me after my ungracious behaviour."

"I did not know—what was it? You see I have only just come home from America and have not had time to hear all the news. But I'm sure you are mistaken, mother will be delighted to see you."

"America! Have you been home long?"

"Only arrived the day before yesterday. I'm glad I came back in time for the first meet. Are you hunting this season?"

Eric was getting bewildered. Ignoring Beryl's question he asked:

Digitized by Google

"But your letter was from Blankboro', you wrote to me from here, did you not?"

"I have never written to you in my life, Mr. Creighton. What are you referring to? I don't suppose you have ever seen my handwriting."

"No, not before, that is true. But really this is curious. There seems to be some mystery here."

Beryl's annoyance vanished when she saw that her companion was in genuine distress. However, her attention was at that moment diverted by her neighbour on the right, who had been trying for some time to attract her notice.

Left for a moment to his own thoughts Eric began to feel less despondent; evidently there had been no great resentment of his conduct, but he was utterly at a loss to understand her forgetfulness.

After a short discussion Beryl turned to Eric again.

"You must tell me about this mystery. What did I write to you about?"

"The living, you know."

"But I'm afraid I don't know."

Then Eric explained that when a living he had in his gift had become vacant he had an application from the Rev. James Wainwright who was well-known to him by name, inclosing a note signed Beryl Wainwright.

"Until then I had no idea that you were his sister," he added.

Beryl was silent for a moment.

"And your answer," she asked at last, then, noticing the look on her face she understood.

